The President was also at the same time deeply moved and sincerely happy, and that evening did not speak much more of the late Presidentska and her principles, but all the more of his own, which he had mixed with mine; and took great pains most earnestly to prove to me what I had only a short time before labored to prove to him. He also spoke much and with fatherly tenderness of Edla and her prospects.

"God knows," said he finally, "how it will go with me during this journey. Learned ladies generally do not very well understand those trifling earthly cares, and Edla by nature is not inclined to think of such. But it may go as it will regarding that, I thank God for what has happened this evening. I could not have thought that Edla was so full of tenderness. She shall never more hear from me an angry word."

In the mean time, Adelaide helped her sister to pack up her things; to prepare herself for the voyage; and thought of everything which could add to their father's comfort and pleasure. The little ones helped with great glee in the packing. Even the servants in the house seemed to remark that something good and something joyful had happened; they looked all happy, and were yet more willing than usual. It is pleasant to see how everywhere, in good houses and under good masters, the servants partake in the joy and sorrow of the latter; how everything is one—one home and one family.

Late in the evening, after Adelaide was gone to bed, Edla went in, and seated herself beside her.

"Are you sleeping, Adelaide?" she asked softly.

"No," answered she, stretched out her hand, and laid it on her sister's knee. Edla took the swan-white hand, and raised it to her lips, as with a weak voice she said—

"Adelaide, forgive all my unkindness toward you."

"Say not so," begged Adelaide; "you have never been unkind toward me, Edla; it was only that you have not been happy."

"No, I have not been so," said Edla, "but I shall become so; for I shall learn from you, Adelaide, to become good and mild."

"My sweet Edla!" exclaimed Adelaide, and threw her arms round her sister's neck, "I am not good—oh, I am so faulty!"

"Hear, Adelaide," said Edla with affectionate earnestness; "make Alarik happy—become worthy of him. You are a good angel, remain so; but these faults which you mention—your levity, your thoughtlessness—correct them, lay them aside, for Alarik's sake."

"I will—I shall," said Adelaide, with tearful eyes.

"Do not go to Aunt Ulla's during his absence," continued Edla; "do not often see Otto—that would disturb Alarik. Make him happy, Adelaide, he is the best, the noblest being—" Her voice trembled. "And now, God bless thee, my good, my happy sister!" said she, as she rose, bent over Adelaide, and kissed her; "God bless thee!" and she hastened away with her handkerchief at her eyes.

The following day the sun and the President rose brightly together. The cloud which threatened to come up was blown away by the west wind—good humor. At breakfast the bouillon was as salt as brine; but the President swallowed it in silence, and when Edla expressed her regret that her father should take that salt soup, he said:

"A very good, very strong soup, my child! a little—perhaps a little too salt, but it is stomachic; I think it will agree with me very well."

The President's goodness made the soup taste yet saltier to Edla, and I am sure that Marie received a serious warning to take care another time.

Immediately after breakfast the President and his daughter set out in the best humor in the world. He had the same morning given me a considerable sum for the purchase of books for Edla, and the setting up of book-shelves in her room during her absence. I made no scruple of immediately whispering something of the surprise to Edla, who heard me with tears in her eyes both of joy and gratitude.

G

When, after their departure, I went to my room, I found on my toilet-table a sealed packet addressed to me in Edla's hand. I broke it open, and read the following words written on a loose sheet:

"I have given you unquiet; I would wish to be able to give you some joy. See in my soul the thoughts which lately have begun to arrange themselves there. I know this will be the best thanks for all your pains."

The packet contained several sheets on which Edla had written her feelings and thoughts. These remarks appeared under a variety of dates, and showed me the continuing development of her soul. I shall here produce some of them.

"I must fully and finally divide myself from the life of the world, not exteriorly, but interiorly. Oh! it is heavy, indescribably heavy, to eat the bread of the world's charity. I am proud enough rather to starve without it, than to beg for it; but I must not even require it, not hunger after it. I must find another bread—I must be sufficient to myself—

"To know oneself—one's natural disposition, one's power—to know what one desires—to desire uninterruptedly, provided it is good, and for the winning of one's object, to direct one's striving, to arrange one's time and one's occupation for every day and every moment; these are the conditions for the enjoyment of oneself and the gift of life, nay, even for the attainment of the esteem and friendship of one's fellow-creatures, the conditions, in fact, by which we are able calmly to dispense with them, when they are denied us by an unkind fate.

"I did not think, I did not feel so before! I have considered as the greatest and only happiness, to please, to be admired, to be loved. I could have desired to have bought this lot at the expense of my own self-respect, or the happiness of others. I desire it no longer. That time is past, thank God, passed for ever! I no longer desire first of all the applause and love of my fellow-creatures, I desire to have clearness and certainty in my own spirit; I will have harmony with myself—peace with God—with his voice in me, my conscience!

"I rather conceive that I yet fully feel in myself the blessedness of that state, in which one uses the world as not abusing it; when one bears with the world and its children patiently and easily, and turns from them to one's solitary room, to one's own heart; and finds oneself undisturbed, and continues in freedom and clearness to work in one's own calling, and according to the plan once laid down for one's life. Is not this already upon earth a state of true liberty and happiness! O God grant, God grant, that I could arrive at this! God grant that every being in my situation might reach this quiet and secure haven! I shall at least not cease to hope, to pray, and to labor.

"Were I only good—were I only very good, then everything would be easier, and happier. Why is Adelaide so happy? Not only because she is so beautiful, and so loved, but chiefly because she is so good. She has peace in her heart, peace with the whole world; she does not know what bitterness, what enmity, what murmuring mean! Were I only good! My God, make me good!

"Resignation! O he who could fully seize thy quiet and strengthening life! Resignation, that is, subdued renunciation. Is it not the fate of almost all people to be forced to forsake something, if they would gain something? But the portion of renunciation of some is great. To forsake is the law—submission is the Gospel. The latter makes the former easy, sometimes pleasant. Pure resignation raises and lightens life. 'Thou angel, whose wings I already seem to feel, hover over my cross, and teach me to pray: 'My God, thy will be done!'

"O! but it is yet beautiful to live, to have been created, if even it is but to look into God's creation—to think of it!

"And when the thoughts become clearer, when they link themselves harmoniously to each other, then they begin to beam, then they enliven the heart, then they enlighten the way.

"It is good to read of the great hearts, which beat, which bled for eternal truths. One feels beside these oceans of strength and love, such a drop, such a little drop! To feel ourselves humble is good. If the drop suffer—what does it signify in the great whole! Nations bleed to death, the life of the hero consumes in fetters; drop—repine not!

"And Thou great and good Master of life, Thou eternal, Thou necessary Will, which rules over the world of circumstances, and sooner or later equals the unequal, let the law of Thy eternal goodness work, and give every virtue its temple, every power its sceptre—it is with my thoughts incessantly fixed upon Thee, that I look into life and its mysteries. Should all darken to my glance, should I faint as I sink down in the whirling stream of circumstances—on Thee will I keep my hold.

"I have been told—Adore God in nature! I sought him there, the All-wise, the All-good—I found Him not. I sought Him in human life—and asked disconsolately, 'Where is my God?' I sought Him in the doctrine of reconciliation—I have found Him—and now first do understand His words in the life of nature and humanity. Sun and flowers, goodness and genius, they are beams of His life! with all my heart I can now love and admire you.

"Admiration! rich well-spring of enjoyment! why art thou not more sought after! thy pure veins will never run dry for the thirsty; to-day on the little earth he can be refreshed by thee; through thousands and thousands of years in a higher development of God's infinite creations, he shall drink of thee, ever young and ever fresh. The enjoyment which thou givest is pure, and followed by no pain. Happy he who learns to admire the admirable!

"My thoughts clear themselves in a way which gives me much pleasure. Conceptions and things arrange themselves in order.

"It is certainly want of discernment which causes the disorder and crookedness which one sees in the life of man, and hears in his judgments. Education should form people to their own discernment. One does not learn to contemplate and distinguish things, without also learning to contemplate and judge oneself. So abortive is human life, so many human caricatures probably only originate in this, that we have not learnt to know our own genius, or the eternal thought of the Creator, which we are called to express in life, and which constitutes our essential individuality. We do not understand ourselves; we float on into unfamiliar spheres, lose our own power and our real originality. What an unsuccessful being would he be who would seek to imitate Adelaide; what an equally unsuccessful who would seek to philosophize without head! Let each remain in his own truth. Each truth has a lie to reduce to silence.

"And what!—enjoyment, joy—they are no longer strange names to me! How swiftly does the day pass, how fresh is my mind in the evening, how happy the thought that I am richer than yesterday, how light the glance cast on to-morrow! O these peaceful conquests in the world of thought, how full of blessing are they not!

"I feel that I am on a way which is in harmony with my natural disposition and my taste, I feel that myself advances with each day; it makes me happy. I become clearer with myself and with others, it makes me milder and better.

"O my father! thou lovest me, then! I shall make thee happy, my father. Blessed be thy tears! blessed this day!

"Yes, my God! yes, my good guiding friend! and thou unknown and now discovered benefactor! I believe it, I know it by the calm and the strength in my bosom. I shall become good, I shall become happy! and certainly yet thank God for that suffering which conducted me on the right way to my real happiness.

Thus Edla, and thus probably many others whom misfortune and sufferings have stricken in youth. They were like one dead, and behold! it was only a trial, a call to higher life! I had taken a pen to correct some mistakes in Edla's line, to place some forgotten dots on a's and i's, as well as to cross one or other t, and afterward allowed my goose-quill to travel in the following unequal lines, which were called forth by my meditations on Edla, and many of her kindred.

THE SNOW-FLAKE IN SPRING; OR, THE SORROWS OF YOUTH.

A May-day came, but slow her tread,
The wind blew from the north,
The heaven hung over all like lead,
When lo! from its gray cloud-land shed,
A snow-flake fell to earth.

But the sun beamed in glory through,
And loosed the power of frost,
A darling pearl the snow-flake grew
Looked upward to the sky's deep blue,
Then in the earth was lost.

Waked by heaven's tear, a seed began
To live; in rapid birth
To leaf, to stalk advancing ran,
And stood one morning, sweetly wan,
The fairest flower on earth.

FAN LENNERN.

Madame to-day will take a grand flight,
And a host of guests by card invite.

MRS. LENNERN.

Soon after her father's departure, Countess Augusta came out to us. She desired, as she said, to assist Adelaide in getting her things ready. I was not greatly pleased with this, for I had wished to pass this time alone with my beloved Adelaide and my little ones. But Countess Augusta made herself so companionable, and friendly, and industrious, that I gradually became quite reconciled to her company. She had acquirements; she did not speak much, but she could speak interestingly on many subjects; and with such capabilities, it is not very difficult in the long run for people to make themselves esteemed and liked.

After Count Alarik was gone, the Baroness and young Otto showed themselves oftener; Adelaide was always friendly with them, and was glad when they came. Adelaide loved them; her heart was so affectionate, that all who showed her tenderness became dear to her.

Our life in this couple of months passed agreeably, but so uniformly, that to give a short account of it, I think I could not do better than employ the model I once found in a certain young lady's Journal.

July 1. Walking; reading; work; conversation.

2.	Ditto	ditto	ditto	ditto
3.	Ditto	ditto	ditto	ditto
4.	Ditto	ditto	ditto	ditto
5.	Ditto	ditto	ditto	ditto
6.	Ditto	ditto	ditto	ditto
7.	Ditto	ditto.	The clergyman was here on a visit.

And so on week after week. But long live gay uniformity, which makes the days pass swiftly and keeps the body and soul in courage and activity!

Imperceptibly the time approached for Count Alarik's return. Adelaide anticipated it with delight, and many times in the day stretched out her arms as if to receive him, and named his name in the softest and tenderest tone.

Another day was also approaching—namely, his Excellence G.'s birthday; and the Baroness and Otto overwhelmed Adelaide with entreaties to take a part in a little piece which was to be represented on that memorable day, and which was to surprise his Excellence, and to edify and delight the whole neighborhood both far and near. I counselled Adelaide not to consent, for I feared that Count Alarik might take it very ill; but Adelaide thought it would be so unkind, so impossible to say no. She said, "I have grieved them so much, how can I refuse to do them this little pleasure, when it can so easily be done!"

She was, besides, so certain of soon making her betrothed again satisfied and contented that I finally ceased speaking, though I saw her really with heartfelt anxiety conducted away by the Baroness. The little ones had unluckily taken it into their heads to catch the ague, which prevented me from accompanying Adelaide and watching over her. Countess Augusta remained with me, to help me in the care of the children, as she said. I never rightly knew how to believe her. Count Alarik had fixed his return for the last days of August, that is to say, about ten days after the one on which Adelaide was carried off by the Baroness. The piece which was to be performed was called "The Unbidden Guest." His Excellence, who was to be surprised with it, as well as with seventy bidden guests, was so polite that he seemed to be deaf to all the nailing and hammering within the house when the theatre was to be set up, and blind to everything which was going on around him; he seemed not in the least to conceive that anything unusual was on foot; nay, he was so delicate and so amiable that when for the benefit of the piece his star and his dressing-gown were secretly taken from him, he informed his family that he had certainly lost them. While every one was laboring to surprise him, he on his side amused himself by surprising the trouts in a little alder-shaded stream, and by the aid of his enchanted wand in speedily transferring the poor little unfortunates from the water to dry land.

The Baroness was the happiest and busiest being in the world: she ordered about the ices and coulisses; the dresses and the lamps; she meditated incessantly between the contending actors, which was certainly no easy matter; for while among friends and acquaintances the parts were offered and accepted, it was sometimes found that the daughter in the piece was to have five mothers, and ere one knew where one was, there were eight daughters and no mother. "Her Grace," became the chambermaid, and the chambermaid became her Grace, and so on. Otto kept firmly hold of the lover's rôle, but he had endless difficulty in learning it by heart. Morning, mid-day, and evening, he was heard to repeat it, and every morning after he had said, "O Heavens! what do I see!" he was obliged to stop to look into the book for what he really ought to see; and every evening when after the declaration with much warmth he had exclaimed, "Heavenly Julia! stop and hear me!" he came to a stop himself. He was, however, so unwearied in courage and good-humor, so earnest, and besides that so obstinate, that no one thought of contesting the part with him. The inconsiderate Adelaide agreed, though after a long hesitation, to play the heroine's part; examined Otto in his, and laughed heartily with him at his forgetfulness and mistakes.

The great day came! The actors were dressed; the guests collected; the lights lighted. The orchestra played Rossini, the curtain went up. His Excellence said, "Ah!"

Who was beautiful; who was a charming heroine; who enchanted all eyes and hearts, if not Adelaide?

Who was enchanted, and who was at a loss, if not Otto! Who helped him; who was of great use, though hidden and forgotten, now as often, if not the prompter! We have got into the way of relating by questions, let us then proceed by the same. Who is this with the pale, severe features, who glides silently among the spectators, conceals himself at the furthest extremity of the hall, and does not turn his dark eye from the form of Adelaide, beaming with youth and beauty! What makes Ade laide's acting become at once so uncertain—what makes her eye wander anxiously, piercingly among the spectators, as if something had flitted past and disappeared?

The moment for the declaration had arrived. Otto exclaimed—"Heavenly Julia, stop and hear me!"

But Julia heard no more; her beaming glance was immovably fixed on some object at the bottom of the hall. Without apology she sprang from the astonished Otto, and into the side scene. Transported with joy and delight, Adelaide here opened her arms to him who came toward her; but it was a cold hand which seized hers, it was a severe though beloved voice which reminded her to return to the theatre and play out her part. Adelaide, surprised and terrified, swallowed her tears and went. The play was soon finished, but another soon commenced. It was not Leonora, who was carried away by her lover's ghost in the night to a yet darker home, but something not unlike it; for when Adelaide went off the scene, she was seized by the same ice-cold hand as before, a cloak was wrappdd round her, and she was hurried into a carriage; and the carriage drawn by fiery horses, was carried away with the swiftness of the wind. Adelaide said not a word, made not a sign of resistance; but when the storm howled around the coach, and the rain beat on the windows, and the black night was round about, and the tall form at her side sat in the flickering lamplight as pale as a ghost, and immovable, and silent, then she felt as if her heart would break; and what love has of tenderness, what contrition has of touching smiles, and prayers, and tears, she poured out over the image at her side. But all in vain! Count Alarik only looked at her with a piercing glance, but did not speak. Finally, Adelaide lost courage; her heart drew itself together; her tongue became powerless; her cheeks grew pale; she became silent; and long was that night-journey for her and for him.

Silently as he had borne her into the carriage, Count Alarik bore her out of the same, and delivered her to me, who came toward them. For himself, he asked to speak with Countess Augusta. Adelaide was in the beginning perfectly dumb with grief and astonishment; but my tenderness and my questions soon brought her back to herself, and she gave vent to her tears and her despair.

"Ah! if he but stormed," said she, "if he reproached me ever so harshly and so violently, it would be sweet to me in comparison with this coldness, this silence—this kills me."

What Countess Augusta said to Count Alarik, I do not know; but it is certain he came from her in a milder frame of mind. I also spoke to him to excuse Adelaide; he heard me politely but coldly; I could perceive that he mistrusted me—that he was displeased with me; and, to say truth, I was so with him. Instead of frankly speaking to Adelaide, to reproach her for her thoughtlessness or inconsiderateness—if he would give her youthful fault so severe a name—instead of afterward forgivingly and affectionately clasping her to his bosom, which she had so well deserved, he made a brief reconciliation with her, in a kind of fatherly manner; and God forgive me! but I think that he had very little of a fatherly feeling just at that moment. He represented to her with a sort of stiff gentleness, the imprudence of playing the heroine's role with a young man whose love to her was well known to the whole neighborhood as well as to herself.

Adelaide agreed to all; but Count Alarik's show of reasonableness, and evident coldness during all this, laid upon her young warm heart a restraint hitherto foreign to it; she became embarrassed and afraid. I was angry with Count Alarik, and began more and more to fear that he was anything but the perfect man I had before thought to see in him. I was angry with him, for he was the first who had disturbed Adelaide's beautiful and amiable confidence; it was he who taught her to know painful fear and anxiety. The sinner! How could he avoid reading her innocence, her love in her eyes—in her whole manner! How! Yes, because he was himself weak, because he was burningly jealous. Besides, I doubt that he was afraid of compromising his own worth, by showing a love which he feared was not fully returned; perhaps he thought himself too good to love Adelaide. I was very angry with Count Alarik.

CHAPTER XIX.

A CRISIS.

A bitter heart seeks to do hurt; but a terrible angel shall come over him.—PROVERB.

THE constrained position in which Adelaide and her betrothed found themselves, became every day more painful, and it was evident it must soon come to some rupture. Adelaide was tender but uneasy; her eyes sought his; but they were often blinded with tears. He, on the contrary, was cold, sometimes even to harshness, toward her; his glances revealed mistrust; his words were bitter; this was often followed by impassioned bursts of love, which frightened even Adelaide herself. It was beautiful to see how she then quieted him, how she with an angel's voice spoke the gentlest words to him, and transported to the Swedish tongue all the Italian's richness of appellations for a beloved-one. It was beautiful to see how the uneasy and unquiet agitation of his mind gradually calmed itself. He would sit whole hours at her feet, sunning himself in her eyes, which beamed with goodness and love—and his eye saw peace in hers, and a calm spread itself over his noble forehead. She played with the locks of his hair, she sung the most melodious songs to him; and lulled by pleasurable and happy feelings, he leaned his head against her knee, and many times the tears ran down his manly cheeks. When Adelaide saw them fall, she wiped them away with the gentlest reproaches, and life was again harmonious and light to them both. After such moments Adelaide gave herself up anew to all her inborn gaiety; she laughed, sung, and played with all who surrounded her, until a severe glance of Count Alarik, a sudden chill in his manners, again smothered her innocent joy.

Countess Augusta often spoke alone with Count Alarik; this gave me unspeakable disquiet. One evening when the lovers seemed for a moment to have forgotten the whole world, to feel only that they belonged to each other, when they stood in each other's arms, beautiful and blest—then I caught in Countess Augusta's dark eye a glance, only a hasty glance—for she rose at the same time hurriedly and left the room—but it was an expression made me shudder. Envy, hatred, despair lay in that glance; it resembled a murderous arrow. A dark suspicion now raised itself in my mind, and I determined narrowly to watch her movements.

I went out to prepare tea, and occupied myself while so doing in implanting in the little ones' brains, that tea grew in China, that it was the leaf of a bush, and so on; when Countess Augusta came and seated herself beside me, seat away the children on some pretext, and while her trembling hand played with the tea-strainer, said in a half-audible voice:

"Mamsell Rönquist," said she, "cannot imagine how the sight of two happy lovers painfully excites my feelings; what a heart-breaking memory such a sight awakes in me. I feel again all the happiness which I once possessed, to feel at the same time what I have lost—lost for ever. I could become mad at such a moment, and I hasten away to avoid a sight which kills me!"

The probability of this explanation, the easy manner in which it was given; the expression of bitter pain painted in her young and beautiful countenance; the tears which ran over her cheeks, all caused me in my heart to make a silent prayer for pardon in expiation of the suspicions I had just formed. This then was the cause that her tenderness for Adelaide, and her industry with her bridal equipment seemed to increase as the important day was approaching. She asked that Adelaide should move into her room, at least during the night, giving for a reason that the thunder which we now had almost every night, strongly affected her nerves, and deprived her of sleep; but she could not endure to have any one with her, excepting "that good angel Adelaide!"

As Adelaide agreed I could not object; but it was a grief to me to lose the neighborhood of my darling, no longer to be the silent witness of her life of love, which, when all was quiet and reposing in the still night, so often expressed itself in prayers for her beloved, in expressions of the most heartfelt gratitude to the Omnipotent origin of all pure love and bliss.

I soon remarked with uneasiness that Adelaide's gaiety evidently decreased from the day she removed to Countess Augusta's, who inhabited one wing of the house, while I with the children occupied the other—and extraordinary enough, her affection for her sister seemed daily to increase.

The Count seemed also oftener to seek the society of Countess Augusta than that of Adelaide; on the latter he often cast glances which I could not explain to myself—so flaming, and yet so dark. I sought an explanation from Adelaide, but she avoided me; Count Alarik did the same, and with more evident coldness, whenever I wished to open the anxiety of my heart to him—and the little ones were continually ailing, and required care and enlivening, cruel and barley-sugar, so that I was forced to leave the unquiet three to themselves, and could do nought but pray God to govern all to the best. This was an uneasy time, and some of the President's relations who came to pay us a few weeks' visit, were at this moment welcome as a distraction; but that such should at such a time be requisite portended nothing good.

Not to interrupt the order of my relation, I will here play the part of a debruyante, and one after the other represent the scenes as they in reality took place, which were first related to me long after they had passed. Let then the curtain be drawn up for the reader, and Countess Augusta appear!

"I am your friend, Alarik!" she would say to him in the long conversations which she often had with him; "your friend, in the deepest, most intimate sense of the word. Your well-being, your happiness is my most lively desire upon earth. O what would I not give that Adelaide were fully worthy of you! I will not hasten my judgment—but Adelaide's flightiness—her boundless desire for pomp and pleasure, which she now conceals for your sake—her friendship for Otto; his love, his riches—her conduct toward him during your absence—all cause me to doubt. Notwithstanding I am certain that Adelaide loves you, as well as she can love; but she is so volatile! What? you would speak openly to Adelaide? Let her only receive a suspicion of your doubts, and your uneasiness—and she would give you assurances of her eternal love, which would dissipate all your doubts for the moment; but how speedily will not this transient flame burn out! Let us hurry nothing, be quiet—show yourself calm with Adelaide, be attentive to her life and manners and you will soon be able to see if she can make you happy, if you are enough for her, if she understands how to love you!"

"It is natural," she said another time, when Count Alarik, excited and impatient, wanted to burst the fetters of doubt, which she had succeeded in binding round his soul—"it is natural that this constraint, this situation of things between you and her whom you so tenderly love, should seem insupportable to you. Go then, Alarik, your sisterly friend will not lay a restraint upon you, she only desires to warn you—go to your beloved, reveal your anxiety, your pain—receive her vows and her tears, and go afterward to unite that holy bond which death alone can loose—O God! Alarik—will it establish or destroy your happiness?"

Count Alarik, uneasy and tormented, expressed his desire to speak to me of Adelaide.

"Mamselle Rönquist!" interrupted the astonished Countess; "Mamselle Rönquist—a fond fool,* who has no thought or conviction of her own, who believes blindfold all that Adelaide says to her; who if Adelaide in an excited moment should protest that she cannot live without you, would find it a marvel that you should not believe it, even if on the following day you should find her in Otto's arms!"

"You, Alarik!" whispered he on another occasion, "you are not a man to allow yourself to be blinded by passion, who would wish to purchase some moments of pleasure with the loss of a whole life's clear and reflected bliss. You stand quiet, and look over the strife in your own, as well as in others' breasts, and calmly allow folly and anger to pass before you judge. You are not the slave of accidents—of others' power, nor even of your own heart—O my friend, how I admire you, and how few are like you! And this painful disquiet will soon cease. I myself have daily an opportunity of looking nearer into Adelaide's soul; you will soon have the light the certainty you desire—and even were this certainty painful—I know you—you are not the one to turn away your glance—calm, even in the midst of suffering, you will look truth in the face—you are a man!”

There is in men an inconceivably weak side toward flattery, particularly the sort of flattery which extols their independence and superior wisdom; and they so easily become bound, exactly because they consider themselves so free.

Count Alarik was a noble and strong-minded man, I repeat it in this moment when the reader must find him very weak. But is he the first and only noble and powerful nature who has had a weak and vulnerable side: who by an awful syren tongue has been seduced from the tender and faithful bosom which breathed alone for him?

We will now see the Countess alone with Adelaide.

In the evenings when they had gone to their room, the former more than once began to weep and lament herself bitterly. She said that she was the most unfortunate being in the world, that she hoped she might soon die. She did not express herself more clearly. Adelaide sought in vain with prayers, caresses, and sympathizing tears, to force her to reveal the cause of her sorrow, or soften its expression. Countess Augusta answered only with tears; and these scenes renewed many times in the course of the night, disturbed both the sleep and peace of mind of my poor Adelaide. Countess Augusta swore her to silence, begged her, unless she desired her sister's eternal misfortune, not to speak of her sorrow and suffering to any creature in the world, and last of all to Alarik; she exacted Adelaide's oath on this, and Adelaide gave it weeping.

One evening Countess Augusta was calmer than usual. She joked gayly with Adelaide, who on the contrary that evening was uneasy, sad and silent. She took out her jewels, pearls, and precious ornaments of all kinds, and decorated Adelaide's hair, neck and arms with them, and conducting her to the looking glass, said:

Adelaide stood before the mirror, contemplating herself, and really dazzled by her own beauty. Involuntary smiles began to beam over her face, rivalling the very diamonds.

“See!” exclaimed Countess Augusta, “how well this princely costume suits you! What a pity that no one in future will see you so—that you will never be able to wear jewels!”

Adelaide turned herself hastily away from the glass. “Take them away! take them away!” she cried blushing deeply—“he would not like it!”

“He? who?” asked Countess Augusta.

“Alarik!” and she tore off the precious ornaments with as much haste as if they had wounded her. She collected them in her hands, and said, smiling gayly: “See, Augusta! all this would I willingly give for a glance of his!”

The Countess took back her treasures, and laid them without saying a word into their cases. This was followed by a burst of grief, more violent than any of the former. She seemed to be near despair. Beside herself with alarm and distress, Adelaide fell on her knees, and weeping embraced her sister's. “Tell me!” she exclaimed, “O tell me, Augusta, why you suffer so deeply! tell me in what manner I can help you! I will do all, all for you!”

“All!” repeated Countess Augusta—and looked at her sister with an incredulous and sorrowful glance.

“Yes, all!” repeated Adelaide, “All which Alarik does not object to.”

“And if it was so—Ah God! I, the miserable—Alarik! beloved Alarik!”

Adelaide looked at her sister in dumb astonishment.

“I love him, Adelaide, I adore him! and he is your—see there the cause of my secret sorrow, my despair and my death. I will not survive the day which for ever unites him with you. And well for me when this heart shall cease to bleed, when it shall cease its long, long struggle. Leave me, Adelaide—leave me, you cannot help me—you cannot, you will not give him to me!”

“And how should I,” said the pale and trembling Adelaide, “be able to give him to you? Is it not his happiness, his well-being which is put in question? Does he not love me!”

“And if—Adelaide! if his choice could yet be free, if his happiness could yet be assured—”

Adelaide looked at her sister amazed and questioning; who seating herself beside her, continued with cruel confidence:

“Tell me, Adelaide, do you think that Alarik is a man who alone seeks after personal beauty in a woman? Do you not think that in his wife he also requires a companion, a friend, who partakes his lofty thoughts, his exalted views of life and things; who loves what he loves, lives for what he lives; who is the confidant of the deepest feelings of his soul, who is all for him, as he is all for her? Or is my conviction of the sort of happiness Alarik seeks groundless? Is it but a dream?”

Adelaide started; she did not answer, but paleness and redness alternated on her cheeks; she breathed quick and deep.

“Do you think,” continued Countess Augusta, “that you possess all that can make Alarik happy—you, who cannot enter into his enjoyments, who cannot understand his aspirations? Pardon me, Adelaide, I do not wish to hurt you: I only wish to show you a truth which you could not much longer conceal from yourself—you are not enough for Alarik.”

Adelaide felt herself astounded. She grew quite pale, she clasped her hands to her bosom, and large heavy drops fell from her eyes.

“No, Adelaide, you are not enough for him; your beauty and your love yet attach him, but you must yourself feel that every day that bond is growing weaker. Day by day he becomes more aware that he cannot be happy with you, that you cannot fill what his great soul requires—day by day he withdraws himself more and more—”

“He loves me! he loves me yet!” cried Adelaide with violent emotion.

“His tenderness—his sorrowful tenderness—bear witness that he pities you; his increasing coldness, his disquiet, that he wishes to be released from you—”

“Released from me!” repeated Adelaide, and her head rose proudly, and her breast swelled as some degree of anger shone in her tearful eye—“from the first moment of such a desire in his breast is he free! But,” and here at once all anger was extinguished, and bitter tears flowed afresh—“why do you speak so, Augusta, why do you torment me so cruelly? You cannot know his thoughts—you cannot—” now show you certain proofs that I know his thoughts and his desires—O Adelaide, foolish Alaride! are other proofs required than those he daily gives us? To whom does Alarik turn when his soul is full of high and noble thoughts, when he requires to express himself and to be understood? To whom does he turn when his heart is oppressed, to whom when he leaves you in anger—to whom, Adelaide?”

“Give me other proofs—I require yet to have, I will see other, more proofs!” cried Adelaide, beside herself.

“Even these can be found, and could be shown,” continued her sister with terrible coldness, as she loosened a hair chain which hung round her neck, and showed a little gold medalion: she pressed a spring, it opened, and Adelaide saw the portrait of her betrothed—another, and she recognized a lock of his hair.

“Do you know this portrait?” asked Countess Augusta; “do you know this hair?—No, do not stretch your hand after it; it is not yours, it is mine! Alarik gave it to me as a remembrance of him, as a proof of—” she did not end.

Adelaide drew in her breath, started up, and wildly clasping her hands exclaimed: “Is it possible! My God, is it possible?”

“And why?” asked Countess Augusta with a scornful smile, “why should it be so impossible, so unnatural? Alarik knows that he and I sympathize in all, that our souls really form but one. Adelaide, hear me, and judge betwixt us, and judge him. I was Count W.’s first love; he loved me before he loved you. It was generally known in the world, it was spoken of every where; an engagement between us was considered as good as completed; even I thought so, for I loved him, and his small fortune was rather for than against him in my eyes. Then, Adelaide, then you stepped between us; your beauty dazzled Alarik—he became, as it were, bewitched by you; but you never fully possessed his affections—you never could possess them! Now Alarik feels this; now, when the enchantment is gradually ceasing, now he looks with regret back to me: he feels that heaven formed us for one another; that with me alone he can find that durable, that noble happiness which he seeks in life—is it then wonderful that he should lament the spell which attracted his attention to another, the weakness which has made him a slave for life? Your self-love, Adelaide, your presumption—”

“Have I been presumptuous, Augusta?”

“Yes, that you have.”

“Then may God forgive me!”

“Have you ever doubted but that every one must love you; that your will must be a law for all? Have you ever been desirous of directing yourself according to the wishes of others, or to live for the sake of others? Have you not received the love which was offered you as a tribute due to your beauty, to your loveliness, not with a Christian’s humble gratitude? Do you not, even at this moment, and it quite natural that the noble Alarik should worship you with all your faults? Is not this presumption—is it not bold, unheard of presumption?”

“You are hard, Augusta. If I have been presumptuous, O! I am sorely punished.”

“All is not your fault in Alarik’s change of mind, Adelaide. Chance even is against you. You are poor, Adelaide—I am rich. Alarik is no enthusiast; he is a prudent man; he feels that he is not formed to shut himself up in a narrow house, among children, weaving-loom, and all sorts of homeliness; he feels that he is formed to shine in the world, to enlighten it; and he knows that I possess what would give him the power to widen his circle of activity, that I can furnish him with the means of attaining that which his ambitious soul strives after.”

“Riches?” said Adelaide, with a tone of deep affliction, “riches, glory—O! could they ever give him more happiness than my tenderness, than my sincere love?”

“I too have tenderness, I too have love, Adelaide!” said the Countess, as she laid her hand on her sister’s arm and pressed it hard. “O! none know how I have loved him—and my love will end with but my life. If your tenderness, Adelaide, were enough for him, why is he not happy; why does he torment both himself and you; why does he seem to become more disquiet, more unhappy, the nearer the day of your union approaches? Be assured, Adelaide, that he would be glad to find a reason and opportunity to break off with you, to put an end to an engagement which suits him so little. It is only compassion for you which restrains him.”

Adelaide wept violently. “I will speak to him,” she cried; “I will ask him if he no longer loves me; and when I hear that word from his mouth, then he shall be free!”

“You will ask him, Adelaide? That he may deny the truth through compassion for you, and cast away his happiness for your sake. Is this noble, Adelaide?”

“I shall ask a friend what I ought to do; I will speak with—”

“With Emma Ronnquist; that she may speak to Alarik, and entreat him with prayers and tears to remain faithful to you. For you well know that she loves you beyond everything else in the world, and would willingly sacrifice every one’s happiness for yours.”

“My God, what shall I do!” exclaimed Adelaide in despair.

“Where now is your much praised goodness, Adelaide? where your clear understanding? You see, you know, that by one word, by one single courageous act of self-denial, you can make two beings happy—that man whom you say above all you love and your sister; you know it, Adelaide, and you will sacrifice them for your own happiness. And what happiness can indeed hereafter be yours, united to a man who does not love you, who only through necessity takes you for his wife? See, Adelaide! I have long concealed my love, long fought against it; but to-day I have clearly seen, that with my own happiness I should even sacrifice Alarik’s; this certainty, this double grief, has snatched my secret from me. Pardon me, Adelaide, pardon the suffering I have caused you; I will be silent hereafter, and soon—soon shall death close these lips; for I know, Adelaide, what you have resolved within yourself—I know it!”

“No, you do not know it,” said Adelaide, as she rose with proud self-command, her eye bright with sublime self-sacrifice. “But O!” and she looked at her sister with clasped hands, and an expression of indescribable anguish, “Augusta, can you make him happy?”

“Do you doubt it after all you have seen. After all I have said? Good-night, Adelaide.”

“No; stop! pardon! but O! I did so love him! there lay such a certainty here,” and she laid her hand on her breast, “such a certainty that I could make him happy, that no one else could do it like me, that I alone had the key to his heart, that he must eternally love me as I loved him, in spite of all my faults; it was a certainty which I thought no one, and nothing in the world, could deprive me of; and yet now—how is it?" asked she in perplexity, as she passed her hand over her forehead, "is it gone? gone?" She took the locket which lay on the table, and asked, "Alarik gave you this?"

"Yes."

"Augusta," said Adelaide solemnly, but with a trembling voice, as she supported herself against the table, "Alarik shall be yours; I will not divide you. O how unworthy were I, could I hesitate between his happiness and mine; but—" and again she put her hand to her forehead, "that they are not one is what I cannot yet understand. I know well that I was not worthy of him, that I never could become fully so; but O! that he should judge me so unworthy! I am yet so young, I admired him so highly, I loved him so sincerely, and that he should so despise me!"

"Pay him back with the same, Adelaide. This pride will become a woman: despise him—reject him!"

"Never!" said Adelaide, as she made a movement of repulsion with her hand, "never! He may forsake me, and I shall still ever love him; he may despise me, and I shall still ever bless him. It cannot be otherwise, Augusta," cried she, as her tears began to flow anew; "in my heart there is nothing but love toward him. Now, now in this moment, when I see the proof of his faithlessness toward me—of his contempt for my love—there is not a drop of bitterness in my heart toward him; now I would, as ever, willingly die for him. Ah! do not I do more; I forsake all my happiness, all the joy of my life, for his sake!"

"Noble-minded Adelaide!" cried Countess Augusta, and clasped her in her arms.

Adelaide sat silent and immovable.

"And now, Adelaide," continued her sister, "be fully noble-minded. Take also the steps which will conduct to the object."

"What shall I do?"

"Write early to-morrow morning a note to Aunt Ulla; ask her to come and take you for some days with her to R."

"To R! And what would Alarik think? Otto is there, you know."

"I thought it had been your intention to restore Alarik to his freedom," said Countess Augusta dryly.

"It is true—O, it is true! Yes, I will write; yes, I will go; and he shall have the opportunity which you say he seeks. And now leave me, Augusta; leave me, I require to be alone."

"And if you repent, Adelaide?"

"I will not; but leave me now—go, go from me. Stop, Augusta! kiss me first! O! if you make him happy, I will willingly forgive you all the pain you have caused me. God bless you according as you make Alarik happy!"

The sisters separated to pass each a sleepless night.

Early on the following morning Countess Augusta forced her sister to write the note she had talked of. She herself wrote privately to Otto to the following effect—

"Courage, my dear Otto! What I long foresaw and expected has come to pass. Adelaide has grown tired of Alarik's continual discontent, as he of her thoughtlessness. The tie which still unites them is so weak, that it would break on the least stretch. Adelaide thinks of you with tenderness. Come to-day to B. Come with your mother, but go directly on your arrival down to the garden, to the arbor to the left; wait there. Be a man, Otto, and you will find her whom you love—a woman. But seem in the beginning to be in despair and inconsolable. Secrecy and punctuality!"

After she had written she went out to dispatch a messenger.

"Already up and out?" said Count Alarik, who, returning from one of his usual morning walks, met her on the staircase.

"This lovely morning has enticed me out, like you. I have passed a bad night; I required to feel the fresh, pure air."

"What is Adelaide doing?"

"I do not know—writing a note I think. O Alarik! my fear is almost confirmed; Adelaide is but a weak and vain woman. Otto and his riches live more in her mind than you; and I suspect that only compassion, or perhaps fear for you, prevents her from openly confessing it. Last night she put on all my jewels—"

"Last night?"

"Yes, and stood long before the looking-glass, contemplating her really dazzling beauty with deep sighs."

Count Alarik leaned against one of the pillars of the balustrade, and cooled his burning forehead against it.

"Alarik, what are you thinking?" asked the Countess, after a silence.

"That I would I could give her jewels," he answered, smiling bitterly. "Yes," continued he lower, and as it were speaking to himself, "so weak am I, that I know nothing so painful as not to be able to give her jewels."

"Unfortunate Alarik!" sighed Countess Augusta. "Alarik, my friend, if it can make you happy, take mine, take them all;—what shall I do with them? Adorn a joyless bosom! Take them, let them be reset, and make Adelaide a —"

"Silence!" said Count Alarik angrily; "not a word more of this. Pardon, Augusta, but you know but little of me. Where is Adelaide?"

"In her room. Do not seek her now. I fear you would not be welcome. Be calm, be quiet, and wait yet awhile; perhaps circumstances ere long will give us a certainty which can fix your actions."

"Yes, certainly, certainly," said Count Alarik with a low but meaning voice, "if even the worst! Only no longer this martyrdom, doubt."

"May it cease! May it cease, so that you may have happiness; and then even I shall have joy enough. In the mean time hear my prayer—do not disturb Adelaide. Let us be quiet, but watchful. Something tells me that ere the day is past we shall have the certainty we seek."

She now left him to rejoin Adelaide, whom she found bathed in tears. Countess Augusta sought alternately with praise, alternately with reproaches, to excite in her sister another turn of mind. "These tears," said she, "these pale cheeks will betray you, and nullify the whole of your noble self-sacrifice. If your intention, Adelaide, is not merely an empty joke, for a couple of hours have courage and resolution; if you will not excite Alarik's compassion, and so lay a restraint on his freedom, wipe away your tears, call back the color on your cheeks, give assurance to your manner—be fully an angel, Adelaide—give up wholly, and act powerfully, else you have done nothing for him you love!”

When Adelaide came out to breakfast she was like a person in a fever. A wild, uncomfortable gaiety appeared in her manners, generally so agreeable, gay, and calm. She bid good morning hurriedly to all, seated herself at table far from Count Alarik, and drank her coffee with disquiet haste, while her bosom heaved violently. Count Alarik did not turn his glance from her; but it was no tender and anxious lover's glance, it was piercing and sharp. Occasionally a deep emotion showed itself in his features; but he overcame it, and remained calm. Adelaide's glance fell under that which was fixed upon her, and her trouble increased with every moment.

Now came the children running in, and throwing themselves as usual into Adelaide's arms. But they soon remarked her altered appearance, and overwhelmed her with questions—why her cheeks were so red, why did she look as if she had been crying?

Adelaide could support it no longer; she rose hastily and went out. Count Alarik rose also, and went to the window. At this moment the noise of wheels was heard, and four snorting, fiery horses flew to the door with Excellent G's carriage. With secret, but boiling bitterness Count Alarik saw the Baroness and her son alight. The latter, however, did not accompany his mother up stairs, but went immediately into the garden. Count Alarik followed him with his eyes. The doors to the hall flew open, we heard the rustle of silk, and the Baroness entered. After having saluted us all with her usual kind friendliness, she said:

“I hear I shall get my sweet Adelaide home with me to-day. The darling girl has herself written to me about it, and I have now come quite proud and quite happy, to carry her off with me;—but where is my angel?”

“I shall tell her that you are here, aunt!” said Countess Augusta, and went out, but cast a glance at Count Alarik.

She found Adelaide in a state of the most violent emotion.

“I know what you have to say, Augusta!” cried she. “I know who is here, know what you desire; but I cannot now—I cannot now go to them, not before every one's eyes to defy him and his will,—my knees cannot support me;—I feel as if my soul would leave me—”

“Adelaide, dear Adelaide! for heaven's sake calm yourself—you shall not go unless you please; everything depends on yourself. No one forces you. Calm yourself, come with me to the garden—you know we can go out at the back door, and reach it without being seen from the windows. The fresh air will do you good, and the decisive moment be delayed; you will gain time to think over it, and determine yourself.”

Adelaide permitted Countess Augusta to guide her. They had not gone far in one of the arched walks of the garden, when Otto sprang out, and threw himself at Adelaide's feet. Adelaide gave him a glance of surprise and wrath, and tried to return; but he embraced her knees, and held her where she was.

“O cousin Adelaide, cousin Adelaide!” cried Otto, “hear me only this once—I must speak to you; what have I done that you should so cruelly hate me?”

“I do not hate you;—but leave, let me go, I beg you, I will have it so!”

“Hear me only this single time, this last time! afterward I will fly for ever—I will go—go to the world's end—”

“Hear him!” whispered Countess Augusta, “it is a pity for him, he loves you so tenderly—hear him, and so you will easier get off with his assiduity; I will go a little aside, and take care that no one comes to disturb us.”

She retired with these words, and hurried out of the garden. In the court she met Count Alarik.

“Where is Adelaide?” he asked hurriedly.

She hurried away, and Count Alarik with glowing cheeks darted on the path she had shown him.

Adelaide had allowed Otto to conduct her into the arbor, and sitting on a bench, she heard the outpourings of his childish but sincere love. There was no hardness in Adelaide's heart. Her natural goodness, her friendship for her young relation, the feeling of her own bitter suffering, made her in this moment very weak. She told him that she could not love him, that she loved Alarik alone in the world; but meanwhile she permitted him, lying on his knees before her, to cover one of her hands with kisses and tears, while with the other she stroked his rich golden curls, and never yet had Otto felt himself so happy. “My good Otto!” said Adelaide's gentle voice; but it was quickly silenced, for before her stood Count Alarik, with a thousand demons in his glance.

A cry of affright and horror burst from Adelaide's bosom. She pushed Otto from her, and wild and unconscious of what she was doing, sprang from the garden into the house, and into the gallery where I was then sitting alone. In a few minutes, however, she seemed to come to herself, and with a calm, as if she had resolved courageously to meet the worst, she sat silent, and deadly pale, with her eyes sunk, while her heavy and oppressed breathing alone bore witness to the disquiet of her breast. Full of anguish, I asked her the cause of her emotion.

“Do not ask me now!” she answered laconically, “soon, soon all shall be told!”

I now heard some one with slow, and as it were unwilling, steps approach the door of the gallery. Adelaide rose up, and began to tremble violently, and her face was as colorless as the marble urn against which she was obliged to support herself. A hand seized the lock, but paused in turning it; finally the door slowly opened, and Count Alarik entered.

I shuddered at sight of him. There was a dreadful expression in his face. There was despair, there was judgment, there was determined, inevitable misfortune. He approached Adelaide slowly, and stopped a few steps from her. Adelaide became calmer, her trembling was less visible, she looked on him with a glance—a heaven of innocence and love lay in it; but it was forced to sink before the unalterable judgment which lay announced in his. She trembled again. In him the storm was mastered, but that it had been terrible might be read on his forehead and his pale lips.

“Adelaide!” said he, in a tone so sorrowful and so severe, that a deadly chill seized my heart on hearing it—“Adelaide!”—he drew in his breath—“we part—we part for ever! I have long suspected that we were not suited for one another; you were not worthy of the love I bore you. I feared it before, I know it now. Adelaide—I forgive, but I pity you!"

Again she cast up her pure glance; again it fell under his. He continued:

"The angel which lent you his shape enticed me, enchanted me. I thought—but it is past—past for ever—your frivolity, your culpable frivolity has parted us for ever. O that I could forget—"

He ceased, overcome by his violent emotions.

I could not endure to hear such language spoken to Adelaide, to see her in such a situation before him. With tears and clasped hands I approached her.

"Adelaide! why do you not speak? why do you not defend yourself? Are you not innocent, my own darling? You are innocent, you cannot deserve this."

Adelaide did not answer, she stood immovable; I went nearer and tried to take her hand.

"Be quiet!" she said, and rejected me gently.

Count Alarik continued, with an emotion which he vainly sought to smother: "May you be happy, Adelaide! Adelaide, remember that life is short—that pleasures give a fleeting enjoyment,—but why should I speak of that to you"—he added, with a contortion of features which was meant to resemble a smile. "I sought you only to tell you you are free! Farewell!"

He turned away and went out. Adelaide followed him, apparently almost unconsciously. At the door she seized his hand and held him back, and looked up to him with an expression which seemed to say, "And is this really true? Is it possible that we are to part? Is this serious?"

He released his hand from hers, but stood still looking at her. She opened with a touching expression of faithful angelic love her arms to him. A demoniac expression flew over his face and contorted his noble features, violently he threw her back and disappeared. The action of his hand, still more the horror of such a moment, threw Adelaide on the marble floor. She lay still and pale as if she were dying, and only clasped her hands hard against her breast. I raised her up, carried her in my arms to her room, I wept over her, I spoke the tenderest words to her; all in vain, she remained silent, breathed quick and deep, and held her hands over her bosom, as if she sought by these means to deaden some severe pain.

I begged the Baroness to go into Adelaide, and hastened to seek Count Alarik, to try if possible to bring him to his senses again, and receive some explanation of the extraordinary scene I had just witnessed.

When the Count had left Adelaide, he gave orders for his immediate departure, and in a few minutes his carriage was before the door.

Then Countess Augusta hurriedly and unannounced entered his room.

"I would say something to you, Alarik!" she said, and her cheeks glowed—"Alarik! when time has lightened your grief—when you have succeeded in forgetting an unworthy—then think—then remember that Augusta loves you, faithfully loves you!"

He looked at her in surprise, and a dim flame burned in his eye. She went nearer to him, and stretched out her hand to him.

"Augusta!" he said, putting her aside with gloomy seriousness, "I cannot even thank you. You can be nothing to me. My life's joy is gone—I have no more love to give. Farewell! Forget me!" and he withdrew hastily.

On the staircase I met him. I stopped him and asked:

"In the name of God, tell me what has happened?"

He fixed his eyes on a little neck-kerchief belonging to Adelaide, which by accident I had taken on my arm with my shawl; he snatched it from me, and instead of answering my questions, hurried away, covering it with kisses. I now saw Countess Augusta with glowing cheeks come out of his room.

"What has happened?" I asked her. "What is the meaning of all this?"

"I scarcely know myself," she answered. "How is Adelaide?"

"Very bad! What was your ladyship doing here? What did Count Alarik say?"

"I cannot take upon myself to give account of his actions!" answered she angrily. At the same moment we heard a carriage roll away. Count Alarik was gone. In the lobby I met young Otto in the most excited and angry mood. He asked my counsel on what he was to do. He was desperate with Count Alarik's having called him "boy!" and having acted most arrogantly toward him. In my hurry and anguish to return to Adelaide, I knew no better counsel to give him than this: "To return home and remain there!"

CHAPTER XX.

LOVE UNTIL DEATH.

I sing, for I must die—and I would pour
Forth with my song my soul, from life and pain.
Farewell! I hasten to that happy shore,
Where with a clearer voice, more certain strain,
My life, my love, I yet shall sing again!

SWAN'S SONG.

WHEN I returned to Adelaide, I found the Baroness sitting beside her busy instilling a quantity of morals and maxims into her, which I know well are capable of making one who is in good health sick, and which therefore, according to the laws of homœopathy should make a sick person well. But on my poor Adelaide they showed not the least effect. She lay silent and immovable, and seemed to suffer. I made haste in the politest way to dismiss the Baroness; afterward I sat silent in Adelaide's room, occupied only with her, and thinking of the best means of getting her to speak, or at least to weep. Ah! it was the first pain which had reached that young tender heart. It was yet too little injured to suffering; it threatened to be crushed beneath the burden.

From the state of death-like repose, in which Adelaide lay till the afternoon, she passed to one of restless disquiet. She went from the one room to another, and seemed to seek something without herself knowing what. My uneasiness on her account was indescribable; I sent for the doctor to the nearest town, and in the mean time followed Adelaide silently and faithfully as her shadow. After she had wandered through almost the whole house, she went out; I let her go; only threw a shawl over her shoulders, and followed her without saying a word. I was glad that she went out, and hoped that the movement and the fresh air would recal her to herself. She took the same way as Count Alarik had gone, and went faster and faster, until she almost ran. Afterward she turned from the road, and continued irregularly, now walking, and now running, through a wild forest track. It was with difficulty that I could follow her, but her white dress, which fluttered among the trees, kept me on her track. For nearly an hour we continued this painful wandering. I wished to stop her, but she seemed to suspect my intention, and every time I approached her she fled from me with the rapidity of a dove. My cries and my prayers she seemed not to hear. All at once I saw her throw herself on the ground. I ran forward, and saw that she had thrown herself down to drink of a little running stream which gurgled out from among the heath and moor. At the same moment that I bent forward to prevent the serious danger of her drinking, I saw a clear stream of blood gush forward, and mingle with the waters of the brook. It came from my poor Adelaide's breast. A violent hemorrhage, which lasted several minutes, had taken place, during which I held her in my arms. She became senseless; and I was near despair.

It was late in the evening, and began to grow dark. We were in the middle of the wild forest, and not a trace of human dwelling was to be seen near us. Where should I turn with Adelaide,—where find help for her?

I had many times said to myself, that it was vain to cry to God for earthly help; for He cannot for the sake of one human being seize with His Almighty hand on the circumstances, whose free play He has once permitted, and which He cannot now restrain without overturning the laws which He has written in nature. For many years, therefore, I had never offered up a prayer for anything temporal—but in this moment of anguish all these arguments were vain; I followed the heart's immediate instinct—I prayed—prayed to God a burning prayer for help for my beloved child. But all remained silent around us; the murmur of the crimsoned brook alone was heard, and the cross-bill beating down an occasional pine-cone which fell to the ground; now and then a sound went through the wood, and the shepherd's horn was heard at a distance. Adelaide lay with closed eyes, silent, pale, and blood-stained: I thought that her last moments were come. I called aloud several times, but the echo alone answered me. Again I prayed silently and with tears, and a promise of delivery reached my ear. It was the tinkle of a little cow-bell, and the voice of her driver; "Get on my pet! see-sò! Where are you going now? Will you only go right!" And an old woman presently stepped out of the bushes, and her cow, who stopped in alarm, lowed at the sight of us. I called to the scarcely less frightened woman; quickly told her what had happened, and prayed for help. Her cottage was not far off, and she assisted me in carrying Adelaide there. Adelaide's blood had ceased to flow, but she lay in a death-like swoon. The cow fol- lowed us gently snorting. About a hundred paces from the stream, just at the end of the wood, lay the little hut. We carried Adelaide into the narrow, dark, but clean place, and laid her upon the straw bed. After this the old woman went immediately to the house, to relate what had happened, and get the necessary assistance. I hoped that about this time the doctor would have arrived.

I remained alone in the hut with Adelaide, and the most painful feelings filled my heart.

There lay my white swan, my darling, blood-stained upon the straw—so beautiful, still—but perhaps near her death. Should I never more see these eyes open, streaming with goodness and joy? This young life of song and love, had it already ceased for ever?

I sat and wept the bitterest tears over her, when she half opened her eyes, and said with a weak voice, "Give me something to drink."

I looked round the place; there was neither meat nor drink to be seen. I did not dare to leave Adelaide to go as far as to the stream, neither should I have dared to give her of this cold water to drink. I was in the greatest distress. At that moment the cow gently lowed outside the hut, and snorted with her nose against the window. Inexpressibly rejoiced, I seized the milk-pail standing in a corner of the room, ran out, and milked the cow, who permitted it quietly enough considering the strange hand. I returned to Adelaide, poured the milk into a cup, and held the mild beverage to her lips. She drank eagerly.

"Ah, that was fine—that was very good!" she said, as I again let her head gently sink on the bed. She looked up, looked full and affectionately upon me, and extended me her hand. "It is better now," said she. "Do you know, it was terrible. Such a pain here," and she laid her hand on her bosom; "I was suffocating, but I could not die! But it is better now. Pardon me! I have certainly made you very anxious—pardon me!"

"Do not speak so," I entreated, covering her hand with kisses and tears of joy, "do not speak now; be calm and still, for God's sake, for my sake, for all their sakes who love you, and all shall yet be well."

She made an assenting motion with her head. An expression of pain spread itself over her features, and her tears began to flow. I was glad of this; she required this relief.

The hut which made our home for the present lay about a quarter of a mile from the house, and an hour had nearly elapsed before people came thence to us. The deepest distress had been excited among them by what had happened. It was said that Countess Augusta had been taken ill. The doctor had not yet come from the town. Adelaide seemed to be too weak to be removed. I feared that the motion would only bring on a new hemorrhage; and as she herself wished to pass the night quietly where she was, I resolved therefore to remain; sent after clothes and some medicines; desired that the doctor immediately on his arrival should be conducted to us, and only retained one maid-servant to pass the night with me beside Adelaide.

In the mean time I occupied myself in washing away the blood from Adelaide's face, neck, and hands, as well as giving her clean clothes. While I was doing it, she was quiet, kind, and contented.

Late in the evening, a message arrived that the doctor was absent from town when our messenger reached it; he could not therefore till the following day be expected. This made me very anxious; and after the servant and the maid had gone to sleep in the cow-house, I seated myself by Adelaide's bed, and remained quietly there through the night. Now and then I laid logs and sticks on the fire, whose kindly flame kept our little room light.

* About a mile and a half English.

The night was stormy, and heavy showers were driven against the window; the owls were shrieking their shrill, ominous cry; but the quieting medicines I had given to Adelaide had procured her a deep though restless sleep. Dark fantasies seemed to occupy her mind, she threw her arms here and there.

"They are driving the wrong way with the hearse," she said; "show them here. In the church at O., there lie my mother and my little brother—there will I also lie; not in the vault. I will not lie there. No; lay me under God's free heaven—let the sun shine on my grave—let the flowers grow there!"

Thus she continued long, to my indescribable distress: gradually, however, she slept more quietly, until the morning about six o'clock, when she started violently with these words—"Air! I suffocate!" I threw open the door, and the fresh morning air streamed in. She breathed it eagerly. Her strength seemed partly returned.

"Emma," said she, "I have prayed neither to-day nor yesterday. O God, forgive me that I have forgotten Thee! Emma, I sin so much. People should not on account of their own sorrows forget God. But I have been so sick—now my reason is clear again. Come, let us pray!"

I fell on my knees beside her bed. With deep solemnity and sincere earnestness she prayed for all who were suffering, all who were sick, for her father, her sisters—finally, she prayed for Alarik with all the warm life of love. She prayed till, wearied out, she fell back on her bed. After this she slept quietly and well about an hour. She then awoke evidently stronger, and said, "I wish to see the sky, and breathe the fresh air—it would do me good. Let us go out, I am strong again."

I gave her a warm pelisse, and led her out of the hut; we seated ourselves on the threshold, and breathed the pure, and uncommon mild September air.

The cottage lay on a height at the skirts of the forest. A wide field bordered by fir-forest lay before us; roads crossed each other on several sides through fields and meadows. It had rained and blown the whole night; but the storm was now completely stilled, and each little pool on the paths lay turned into a mirror for the sky, in which the brightening blue and lingering clouds seemed to contemplate themselves. Little yellow flowers before us waved on their weak stalks in the morning air, saluted and embraced each other; and choruses of little insects arose from the pearly grass without any other design than to dance and to sing. The falcon hovered in wide circles over the plain, and struck the clouds with his bold wing, while the little birds in the yellow birches near us twittered in careless gaiety. The sun was not shining, but a mild light lay over the landscape, more agreeable than sunshine, and along the dark green edge of the forest arose from the white chimneys of the cottages small columns of blueish smoke, which spread themselves gently and disappeared in the quiet air. The voices of men and animals sounded gayly around.

"What a life!" said Adelaide, and looked round her with a glance which again began to beam; "how beautiful is the earth! Ah! if one could be very good, very resigned, then even misfortune would not be felt so bitterly, would not hinder us from thankfully enjoying what God's goodness gives us. Emma, why should my sorrow prevent me from being glad for all the beauty I now look upon? All these voices which are heard around us, they bear witness of gay and happy existences—why cannot I rejoice in their happiness? Do you see all these little pillars of smoke, which rise toward heaven?" and with her finger she pointed to the different places whence they arose; "do they not speak of comfortable homes, of household cares?"—and an expression of anguish passed over her face—"of husbands, and wives, and children collecting to the common meal? Are they not like offerings of thanksgiving which are sent up by earth's children to a bounteous heaven? Why can I not raise my soul to thank God for others' happiness, though I myself suffer? How egotistical is man, Emma; or rather how egotistical am I? I refer everything so much to myself, feel so little for others. I could cry over myself!"

She leaned her head against my shoulder, and her tears flowed freely.

"Good, sweet, beloved Adelaide!" was all I could falter out.

"Ah, Emma!" she said seriously, "I have not been good; I have been proud, foolish, presumptuous—have I not been presumptuous?"

I did not answer, for I could not say so.

"Yes, I have certainly been presumptuous—and with so little cause! God forgive me that Alarik could not love me—I am so full of faults, he so superior."

"Not superior," said I, with the displeasure I felt toward him; "he has been unreasonable—nay, hard and cruel toward you!"

"Not a word against him!" entreated Adelaide solemnly; "I will, I must believe in him—he has judged me, I must have deserved it. I will believe on him and his perfection—if he has ceased to love me, it is certainly my fault alone. Ah! he cannot see to my heart—he would forgive me for my love's sake. God will forgive me, and to him I will go."

I was in the highest degree surprised at these expressions, but did not dare to ask any explanation for fear it would be too much for her strength; I contented myself in the strongest words I was capable of with assuring her that Alarik loved her, and none else but her. I related to her the little scene on the staircase at his departure.

"Take care, take care!" said Adelaide with a wild look, "give me no hope—it is terrible to lose it again! Say nothing, Emma. Ah! I know all—all too well—too well how it is!"

I was prevented from answering by the arrival of the doctor; he was accompanied by people who were bringing a commodious litter; on that Adelaide was laid, and carried with the greatest care and tenderness to her home. We went well, though slowly on our little journey. Adelaide was pleased with the flowers which I picked for her by the road side, and was quiet and friendly. When we had arrived, and I had seen her to her room, and on her bed, I went to write a letter to the President, whom, by the doctor's advice, I informed of his daughter's illness. When I returned to Adelaide, I heard earnest conversation in her room. I stopped in the half-open door, and saw Adelaide half-raised in her bed, with clasped hands, and entreating eyes, speaking to Countess Augusta, who sat beside her bed.

"Tell me, tell me," she prayed, "if all were true that you told me the night before last. In God's name, by all that is holy, I beseech you, Augusta, answer me, tell me the truth! O Ad-guests! I have not perhaps much longer to live—Alarik can be yours when I am no longer on earth—but now for mercy tell me the truth! Did he say he loved you, that he no longer loved me?"

No answer came from Countess Augusta's lips.

"Augusta, do not be cruel," continued the entreating Adelaide; "if you knew how easy it would be for me to leave the world were I only certain that he did not despise me. Augusta, I will promise you not to take a step to reunite myself with him—I cannot do it either, since he has cast me off. But tell me that he loved me, although he found me weak. Give this heaven to my heart, Augusta, dear Augusta! yet upon earth."

The Countess was yet silent. She turned away, and the profile of her face now became visible to me. A violent conflict betrayed itself there.

"Do you think," recommenced Adelaide's weak, soft voice, "do you think that I would be angry with you because you had deceived me, or because you turned Alarik's heart from me? Ah! do not think so, Augusta. Do you not love him? and that explains, excuses all. With all my heart, Augusta, I will excuse the suffering you have caused me. You are impatient—you want to go—Augusta, wait a moment! Do not believe that I make any reservation in my pardon, that I make any conditions with it; no, now, now, if even you should not say a word to give me ease, yet will I give it to you. Augusta, if ever you should have a bitter moment upon earth; if you should regret," she raised herself up, and stretched her arms toward her sister—"Augusta, come nearer—then remember that Adelaide has forgiven you!"

She wanted to clasp her arms round her sister's neck, but at the same time fell exhausted back on her bed.

Countess Augusta hastened from her; but in the ante-chamber I caught her arm, stopped her, and said,

"Countess! I have heard Adelaide's prayers, and now I understand all. In this moment I will write to Count Alarik, unless by a free confession before him and Adelaide you again repair the mischief you have done."

She stammered out some incomprehensible words, disengaged her arm, and hastened away. Half-an-hour afterward her carriage rolled over the court. She was gone.

The conversation with her sister had so violently excited Adelaide, that a fresh hemorrhage was the consequence. It was so violent, lasted so long, and the patient's condition was so deplorable when it was past, that the doctor declared another attack would be inevitable death, and that even now he could not answer for the consequences.

This news spread the deepest sorrow throughout the house; and every word, every accent, showed how sincerely Adelaide was beloved by all.

When, after some hours' sleep, Adelaide had regained a little strength, she read sorrow and disquiet on every face that surrounded her. She beckoned to me, and begged me softly to tell her truly what the doctor said of her state. I repeated to her his words, and in so doing could not restrain my tears.

"I shall then die!" said she, with a countenance beaming with joy—"Ah, God be praised!

Weep not, my Emma, I am happy!" and she wiped away my tears with her hand. "Now I can ask to see him! Now it can no longer wound proprieties if I should seek him. Is it not death—Emma, must not all give way to death? O now I may once more see him—tell him how infinitely I love him; perhaps I may die on his heart! Write to him, Emma, best Emma. Ah, then it is death which shall reunite us!"

I wrote immediately, and directed my letter to his estate, where I presumed he had gone.

I told Adelaide my suspicions regarding Countess Augusta; I wanted to show her how this unlucky misunderstanding had probably arisen, but Adelaide interrupted me.

"Say nothing now," begged she. "My understanding is not clear—I cannot well conceive—I can scarcely remember how it happened. But what does all this signify now?" added she with a bright glance, "shall I not die? Before I die I shall see him—he shall read in my heart. He shall see there so much love, that he will love me for the sake of my love. All will be clear, all well between us; I have not a doubt of it, I feel it. Ah, I am so glad, Emma! All is so easy, so beautiful; God has been so merciful toward me!"

The doctor forbid Adelaide to speak so much. She asked to see her little sisters, and promised to be silent. The little ones came quite surprised, full of trouble and wondering. They crept on their sister's bed, and seated themselves one on each side of her. They had been desired not to speak; they did not understand their sister's danger; but when they saw her so pale they began to cry. She caressed them tenderly, and played with their light curling hair. They kissed her white hands. It was a beautiful and touching picture.

The whole night and the following day, Adelaide remained in the same quiet and happy state, but enjoyed no sleep. She seemed to wait some one, though without disquiet. All the images before her fancy were bright and peaceful. One could say that she reposed in her Heavenly Father's arms, and certain of His love she had peace, and gladly left her fate to Him; she desired only to bid farewell to one friend, and afterward fall quietly asleep.

During this time Adelaide even occupied herself with the arrangement of her small earthly affairs. No possessor of millions ever made his will with greater care. Here were the old and infirm, to whom Adelaide gave a certain sum a year for their maintenance and relief; their children whom she kept at school, and so on. She had hitherto provided for these with her pocket-money, and she desired that at her death her clothes and her trinkets might be sold, and the money proceeding from them might be employed for a continuation of these little pensions. On this occasion I was made to admire, as I have often done, how much beneficence may be effected by small means, when they are managed by sincere good-will, and prudent care and activity.

Toward evening on the second day Adelaide became uneasy, she wept silently. After a moment she became calm again, and asked for the guitar. She raised herself up, struck some accords, and began to sing.

"She must not sing!" said the doctor, who now came in from the other room.

She looked at him with her grave, somewhat defying air, and said, "The doctor must not forbid me what pleases me. 'T is does not do me harm!" and she continued her song. I begged her to stop.

"Do not deny me what I desire!" said Adelaide with some energy. "Might I not sing?" continued she with a dazzling tear in her eye—"does not the swan sing in his dying moments? Am I not the swan? I die—I can therefore sing!" And she sang:

Now it is passed! my life's short day is done,
And I will sing, for I would cease to be.
Yea, it was fair that shore, sailed past and gone,
But yet more fair, beyond death's quiet sea:
The island of the blest which beckoneth me!
I sing, for I must die—and I would pour
Forth with my song my soul, from life and pain.
Farewell! I hasten to that happy shore,
Where with a clearer voice, more certain strain,
My life, my love, I yet shall sing again!

We no longer thought of preventing her. The doctor had sat down, and wiped his eyes. Adelaide continued to sing. Her voice became more certain and melodious, her eyes more beaming. I contemplated her with astonishment and admiration. The chiseled beauty of her features was more than ever remarkable in this moment, when her face was as white as marble, and a sort of mild light spread over it; and as she gave herself entirely up to the inspiration of her singing, her pious and steady eye seemed already to gaze into the home of the blessed. I almost expected that her spirit should be wafted away during this death-song, which gradually began to become more broken and weak. "O God!" I prayed silently, "let me soon follow her!"

Now there was a trampling in the court. With haste and a noise like thunder, a carriage drove up and stopped.

The guitar fell from Adelaide's hands. "It is he! It is he!" she exclaimed; a passing color mounted in her cheeks, after which she sunk back as pale as death. I left her to the doctor's care, and went out to ask after the new-comer. It was really Count Alarik. By the dumb despair painted in his countenance, I saw that he knew all.

Has the Count met Countess Augusta? I asked hurriedly.

He bowed his head affirmatively. "I know all," he said; he looked at me with a glance of inexpressible anguish, and his pale lips could but stammer out "Adelaide?"

"She lives!" said I; but at the same time burst into tears.

He cast a glance of burning gratitude toward heaven, and seized my hand. "Conduct me to her feet!" he exclaimed.

I told him now of Adelaide's weak condition. I represented to him that he must be patient, circumspect; that we must avoid all which could over-excite her. I was interrupted by a message from her which called me in.

Adelaide sat up in bed with eyes full of tenderness and impatience. "Why does he not come?" she asked; "why does he delay? Will he not see his Adelaide? Does he know that she calls for him, that she will die on his heart?"

The doctor wished to prevent the meeting for the evening, saying that it would excite Adelaide too much for the night.

"Will you have me die now immediately through longing and impatience?" asked Adelaide. "You must not be unreasonable, for then I shall become disobedient. Forgive me," she continued, bursting into tears; "I know that you mean well, but you do not know what is good for me. I promise you afterward to be quiet; before that I cannot be so."

A new message came from the Count. He would absolutely come in to Adelaide. It signified nothing seeking to hinder these two loving beings from uniting. I conducted Count Alarik in; Adelaide raised herself up with a weak cry, and stretched her arms toward him: he darted forward, threw himself on his knees by her bed, and clasped her to his bosom.

CHAPTER XXI.

GO NOT AWAY.

Go not away! I will not be alone!
I will behold thee, keep thee to the end.
List to thy voice, the pure, the blessed tone:
Go not away! my treasure and my friend:
Look on me! In thine eyes, as pure as heaven,
My soul has peace, my weary thoughts find rest:
Light unto darkness from thy glance is given,
And calm'd the anxious pulses of my breast.
Speak to me! Let me hear the blessed sound
Which made a heaven of Eden's happy grove,
When only holy love on earth was found,
And man the image pure of God above.
O let me clasp thee nearer to my breast,
Let me within thy faithful arms repose;
Thus! thus: compared with this repayment blest,
How light are all life's sufferings, all its woes!
Go not away, go not! Dark cloud would swallow Thee from mine eyes. Thou goest! give me thy Thine well! his well! Thou goest—and I follow
Into Death's unknown, night-overshadow'd land!

It is a blessed thing—and they who love sincerely know well how blessed—when, after a moment of misunderstanding, nay, perhaps even of mutual transgression, to repose heart against heart, and feel, sincerely feel, that one certainty is to be found on earth, one certainty which defies all the power of hell, one certainty which is heaven upon earth—that they love one another; that they belong to one another; that nothing, nothing in the world, shall divide those who have found each other in true, celestial love. O! this is a certainty, the most beautiful which is to be found upon earth—a certainty, the ground and guarantee of every other. He felt it well, that man, who, about to pass the theatre of life, laid his hand upon his heart, and said, "I love, therefore I am immortal!"

Immortal mortals! well for you if you have here been permitted to experience this explanation of life—true love! Well for you, if God has permitted this golden thread to run through and brighten the dark web of your earthly love!

There are eternal harmonies, eternal sympathies; "there are people who are born for each other." When they meet in the world, then spring up these quickly-woven bonds of friendship—this irresistible power of attraction—those inward sympathies between two beings—which human reason cannot explain, which it has gone out of fashion to believe in, and which yet exist, and are so precious to the hearts in which they reveal themselves. They are sparks sprung from mysteries, which may be well called Elysian.

These lovers for eternity; these two who had found one another; who in spite of all must belong to one another, must become one, I now saw in Adelaide and Alarik. Long reposed they heart to heart, and life seemed to have no enigma, no question for them.

* From Switzerland.

But only for a moment can we on earth bear heaven within our breast. Time gives its slow course, and envelops in mist all the sunshine of life—and thence in this vile world arise difficulties, such as explications and justifications even between the tenderest friends.

"Adelaide, canst thou forgive me?" were the first words which could struggle forth from Count Alarik's violently agitated breast.

"O say not so!" was all she had the power to answer.

"Adelaide, I am not worthy of thee—I have been hard and unjust toward thee—"

"No, say not so! I was faulty, so childish, you must—"

"No explanations!" begged I, warning them, "not now, at least. Remember that Adelaide's life and your happiness depend on being kept quiet and undisturbed to regain her strength. Look at each other, enjoy the certainty of loving each other, of being together—but let fine phrases alone, neither do they now seem to be requisite."

"Only one question, one single question yet!" begged Adelaide. "Alarik!" and she clasped her hands and looked at him with a serious and piercing look; "Alarik, answer me, and tell me the truth, as you would say it before God—do you love me? And do you love me more than any one on earth?"

"Adelaide, you punish me severely!" said Count Alarik, and covered his eyes with his hand; large drops fell on Adelaide's arm.

"No, take away your hand! No, look at me Alarik! my beloved Alarik, look at me. I have suffered so much—my understanding is weakened—answer me so that I may fully understand it—do you love me?"

Alarik looked up at her with the fulness of love, and said with deep seriousness: "God is my witness, Adelaide, that I never loved any other than thou! Thou alone wert my heart's wisdom and folly; my first, my last, my only love!"

With a cry of joy, gratefully outstretched hands, and an expression of happiness which spread a light over her face, Adelaide sank back on her bed.

"And now peace with you!" said I smiling, as I softly tried to separate the lovers. "Be tranquil now if you wish to live for one another."

They were tranquil; they looked at one another, her hand rested in his, words of love and joy glided over their lips.

I seated myself, a shadow in the shadow, not far from this bright image of love, and shed quiet tears over it.

When the night approached, I desired that they should separate, that each might enjoy some repose. But although I pronounced my admonitions in good Swedish, the lovers seemed to think that I spoke the language of the Christian assemblies of the Apostles, which language it is now confessed, though occasionally spoken, is no longer understood upon earth. I could really neither make myself heard nor understood, and therefore ceased to talk in this fashion, and Count Alarik remained the night in Adelaide's room, watched over her, and gave her with his own hand the quieting medicines which the doctor had prescribed. A tenderness and mildness was in his care, an almost womanly instinct, which I had hardly thought belonged to that powerful man. But the most delicate growth can spring from the hardest soil, when it is warmly breathed on by love.

Adelaide fell quietly asleep in the night. She was indescribably beautiful where she lay—an image of innocence, goodness, and peace.

By Count Alarik's words I perceived that he took it for certain that she should live, and would not prepare himself for anything else.

"But if—" said I sorrowfully.

"She shall not die!" said he with a certainty as if he were God himself. O poor mortals!

Shortly afterward Adelaide awoke. "I feel myself very weak," said she in a faint voice. "Alarik, I must speak with you ere it is too late."

"You shall not die!" he cried with wild alarm, and clasped her in his arms. Heaven's angels shall not snatch you from me!"

"But God, Alarik, but God. We cannot set ourselves against God's will. That would be madness. God's will be done! What He does is good."

"God cannot, God will not take you from me!" was his wild and despairing outcry.

"O speak not so, Alarik!" implored Adelaide with affecting tenderness and humility. "Let us not repine, let us be resigned. How can you think that what God does can be other than good? Neither shall I leave thee, though I die. I shall be with thee as an angel. I shall surround thee with my wings when thou sleepest and when thou wakest; I shall wait peace to thy heart; every prayer that thou prayest I shall carry up to God, and return with its answer to thee; I shall await thee, my Alarik, in that bright land where there is no more sorrow nor parting; and in thy last struggle I will appear to thee, I will weep a tear, and take thy spirit with a kiss. Ah! dost thou know it is beautiful there above the clouds in God's clear heaven! I know it: I have felt it within these few days—"

"And thou wilt leave me, Adelaide, for that heaven?"

"If God so wills. Willingly would I live for thee on earth, O how willingly! But God's will be done. We shall soon be reunited."

My pen is impotent to depict the scenes which followed. Who has really the power on one side to represent this despairing combat of love against invisible powers to retain what it loves; and on the other, that angelic peace, that resignation, that pure consolation and higher love, which does not view life in separate moments—which, feeling God's life in its own bosom, sees in death but a passage, a quiet sleep, followed by a new morning, with clearer sun, and more powerful love?

Adelaide exacted from Alarik pardon for Augusta. He could not, he said, forgive her.

"You cannot?" said Adelaide sorrowfully.

"O Alarik! how can we then pray, 'And forgive us our sins?'—"

"Do not speak of her now," interrupted Count Alarik violently; "now I could curse—"

Adelaide laid her hand on her mouth, and began to weep. He kissed away her tears, became calmer, promised to forgive for the sake of her prayer.

I saw them so moved, that I was afraid it might be injurious to her. I prayed them to be calm, and promised to read something to them. They willingly agreed: and that I might at the same time fix their attention and calm their feelings, as well as with the sacred desire of giving a lesson with regard to Adelaide, to the philosopher Alarik, I read Paul's beautiful chapter on love:

"Though I speak with the tongues of men and of angels, and have not charity, I am become—" as sounding-brass or a tinkling cymbal. And though I have the gift of prophecy and understand all mysteries and all knowledge; and though I have all faith, so that I could remove mountains, and have not charity, I am nothing."

I laid particular emphasis on these words—

"Charity suffereth long, and is kind; charity envieth not; charity vaunteth not itself, is not puffed up. Seeketh not her own, is not easily provoked, thinketh no evil. Beareth all things, believeth all things, hopeth all things, endureth all things. Charity never faileth; but whether there be prophecies, they shall fail; whether there be tongues, they shall cease; whether there be knowledge, it shall vanish away. For we know in part, and prophesy in part. But when that which is perfect is come, then that which is in part shall be done away."

"And now abideth faith, hope, and charity, these three; but the greatest of these is charity."

CHAPTER XXII.

THE GOOD SLEEP.

O! who above the clouds like me shall love thee
A glorious seraph in his happy lot!
Wings has he, he has beauty there above me;
The gift to love like me, that has he not.
Unto his holy breast earth's love is vain,
The bliss of his high heaven is of his choice:
While I am bound to thee in joy or pain,
'Tis I alone can answer to thy voice.

"If thou love—if thou sincerely love—if, in thy friend's heart, in her eye, thou have found the sabbath of thy soul—if, in love and its perfection, thou have conceived the goodness of God, and the bliss of heaven, and thou be forced to fear that the beating of that heart will cease beneath thy hand, that love will go out in that beloved eye—

And if then remorse rise accusingly up against thee by the deathbed of thy beloved, and say, "Thou hast not loved well; thy love was soiled by unworthy doubts; for thy sake, thy treasure lies here ready to sink into the dark grave; thou hast plunged her there; wo, wo to him who cannot love rightly!"—

And if friends will console thee; if thy beloved herself will raise her gentle voice, and whisper:

O, murmur not, it is so good to die,
To die while young; from this vain world away:
To turn aside, and calmly close the eyes,
Then open it upon a brighter day.

And if, then, with the sentiment of the infinite love in thy breast, thou art ready to defy heaven itself to give a higher happiness than thy love would have given—

If thou have experienced these sentiments of tremulous love, of remorse, of strife with heaven itself, then thou canst understand Count Alarik's state of mind during several days which he passed watching by Adelaide's bed. She lay in the greatest danger. Count Alarik did not turn his eye from her; he spoke not; but, by the expression of his face, one would have said that he struggled with the angel of death, who had been sent for his beloved. He would not that she should die.

When Adelaide spoke with her betrothed during the course of these days, she tried to prepare him for her departure; she spoke of the happiness reserved for her in heaven.

Alarik answered, "None will love you as I do, Adelaide. Can happiness be increased when the bands of love are sundered? Can any one understand you as I do? Could angels give you more bliss than I? O Adelaide! have you learned to mistrust the strength of my affection?"

She denied it. She smiled on him through her tears. She told him that he alone could make her happy; but that they should not long be divided. All that she said was gentle, was tender, was good, was a soothing balsam to his soul.

On the seventh day, Adelaide fell into a deep sleep. When she awoke, after several hours' rest, the doctor pronounced her better.

"Better!" repeated Count Alarik. He went out; and, for the first time since the evening of his arrival, his tears flowed. He bowed his knees and thanked God.

When he returned to Adelaide, she stretched her arms toward him. "I shall live for thee!" she said.

They wept like children; but oh, how happy they were!

In the evening of that day, the lovers fell upon the desperate thought of explaining the causes of the unfortunate misunderstanding which had arisen between them. This conversation satisfied and yet excited them. Countess Augusta, under pretence of correcting a fault in the drawing, had got the portrait in her hands, which was destined for Adelaide; this the latter had, during the last few days, already suspected. All gradually became clear to their eyes; they wept over their own faults, and shuddered at each other's suffering. The errors of the past shed a light on the future.

"I shall never doubt thee more, my Adelaide," said Count Alarik, as he pressed her tenderly to his heart. "Never more will I disturb thy innocent gayety with a dark suspicion. O, may it never cease as long as I live, my blessed Adelaide! my life's flower! my joy!"

"And if I should live to belong to thee on earth," said Adelaide, "I shall not be childish and thoughtless as before. Ah! this short time of suffering has done me much good! I have, during these few days, thought more and more seriously of life than during my whole lifetime before. I will be thy joy, Alarik; but not only as I have hitherto been; I have caught glimpses of life's higher dignity and beauty; thou wilt teach me to feel it fully. Lead me, my Alarik; I will be thy willing disciple; I will gladly follow where thou leadest; I will——"

"Shall there be pancakes or pastry to supper?" called I suddenly at the door, to make a diversion in this more feeling than healthy conversation.

The little children were with me. They carried a plate each, I myself carried a basket loaded with cherries.

Adelaide called in the little ones. Count Alarik freed them from the plates, and lifted the children upon their sister's bed. They kissed and embraced each other.

But now Adelaide wished also to eat. The children must decamp from the bed.

"May I hold your plate, Adelaide?" said Alarik.

"Yes, if you fall on your knees!" answered she, with all her former joking arrogance.

"You are getting well!" he cried, enchanted, knelt down, and offered her the plate, full of beautiful crimson cherries.

She fed him and herself alternately; they joked, they murmured, they laughed, they took—the cherries from each other's lips; they seemed unable sufficiently to make themselves one.

"O love! blessed, wise madness!

CHAPTER XXIII.

A SHORT CHAPTER.

"Which really were too short, were there not others which are too long." ENRENSWÄRD.

Love and prayer kept watch for Adelaide; death went past. The President returned with Edla, both happy in having learned to know each other. Countess Augusta's wickedness was concealed; she travelled abroad. Adelaide became well, and rosy, and gay. The banns were published in church, but the marriage was performed at home. Adelaide wept and smiled. The children wondered. The priest and President gave their benediction. Certainly amen was said in heaven. The President and Mamselle Rönquist danced the Anglaise. Somebody wept silent tears over the loss of her delight; Count Alarik travelled away with it, some days after the marriage.

CHAPTER XXIV.

APART, BETWEEN THE PRESIDENT AND MR.

PRES.—"She is a genius, and you are—" MAMSELLE R.—"Plait-ù."

THE PRES.—Depend upon it bonne amie! Edla is a real genius. She will be a light for her native country. She wants to know everything; she asks about everything; she understands everything; she has asked questions of me, of a depth—it is a pleasure to me to instruct her. She is astonishing! Professor A. could not sufficiently express his admiration of her clear head. Professor A., Mamselle Rönquist! That is not a trifle, that—I could only wish that Edla were not so distrustful of herself, so shy!"

I.—"Edla is really according to my conviction little inclined to appear before the public with what she knows. She is more inclined to live retired with what she can acquire of intellectual riches, to make herself and her nearest connections happy with them. She has no ambition."

THE PRES.—"That is a pity, Mamselle Rönquist, a great pity. One should not put one's candle under a bushel, but let its light shine for the world. Well, Edla is very young yet, and can have time to prepare herself for her important calling. I will only desire that no lover meanwhile—that devil of a Professor looked to me quite meditative—"

I.—"Edla will never leave her father. I know her determined will in that respect. She will employ her life in procuring comfort and enjoyment for him."

THE PRES.—"God bless her for that. I confess that it would now be very difficult for me to get on without her. Meantime her happiness must be the first object. And when I besides am so happy as to possess in my house a friend, such as Mamselle Rönquist—in truth—I hope—hem—you are—"

I.—"Plait-ù."

THE PRES.—"My best Mamselle Rönquist, my best friend—I hope—"

My reader! I hope that you will not think ill, if I skip over the President's and my hopes, the sooner to conduct you to the 'Home of Happiness.'

CHAPTER XXV.

THE HOME OF HAPPINESS.

"O how beautiful to see, is the smoke of one's own home." FRANKEN.

"The bay of a lake, some wooded heights, between them fields and meadows, and on an elevation from which one has a view of the whole, even of a town itself: such is the general appearance of Sweden."

FOREKEL (Statistics of Sweden).

"Love strikes root in the finite, but strives toward heaven, and breathes in the light for every wanderer—it stands in the dawn of a higher world." B—N.

Is there to be found a gift of heaven more precious, more worthy our most ardent gratitude, than that of possessing a family, a home, where virtues, kindnesses, and enjoyments are everyday guests, where the heart and the eye sun themselves in a world of love, where the thoughts are lively and enlightened, where friends not only by word but by action say to each other—"Thy joy, thy sorrow, thy hope, thy prayer, are mine!"

See how within such a noble and happy family every different gift unites itself to form an agreeable element of goodness and beauty, in which every member of the family finds his life; where each capability receives its development, each feeling its counterpart and its answer; each pure desire its flower! See, how tears are like a heavenly dew, smiles like the sunlight which entices out the flowers, and love, love is the blessed, the fruitful earth from which the seeds of all that is good and to be enjoyed spring graciously up! See, how the body (for it is to be included) enjoys itself and thrives in the harmonious regulations of home, and with fruits which are not, like those of the first Paradise—forbidden!

Life within a happy family is a continual development—a continual spring.

O my mother! O my sweet sisters! Ye who taught me to bless home—it is to you are dedicated these lines, these grateful tears which moisten my eyes!

I will speak of family and home, I will speak of them for Sweden's daughters, not to teach them anything, but to give back to them in a faithful mirror the pictures which the noble among them have let me view, for it is pleasant to be a mirror to the good—may it be my happy lot in life!

I have seen home in the cot on the sandy heath; I have seen it in the princely castle, adorned by the arts; I have seen it in the burgher's simple and convenient dwelling; and in each, where virtue and love united the bonds of family intercourse, there its genius, good and guardian woman, stood watchful and active; I saw everywhere here the same kindly sights, heard everywhere the same soft harmonies! Riches and poverty made no difference.

Goodness and order, these, heaven's serving-spirits upon earth, call forth everywhere the same peace and the same comfort. No bitter root has leave to grow there. Where it would grow comes either a smile or a tear, and with these a kind word to stifle it. Love watches over the cradle of infancy, over the rest of old age, over the well-being and comfort of each individual. In order to be happy, man turns from the life of the world—home.

The sorrowful heart finds comfort in home; the disquieted, peace; the gay has there his life's true element. Where do you hear the agreeable joke, which only excites to satisfy; where those glad words full of tenderness and praise; where that hearty laughter, those cries of sincere enjoyment to which innocence and goodness every day respond, and which form every-day-life's light, living fireworks—where do you perceive them all, these innumerable little pleasantries, which give the objects of life a brightened beauty, if not within the virtuous and happy family? And where, as there, do you find these self-denying lives, these pure unsung sacrifices for each other's well-being; that faithful and hallowed love, which unites itself in this life and lifts the soul to heaven—where, if not there, do you find that pure bliss, which makes us sometimes dream that heaven has nothing more beautiful to offer than earth?

Pious spirits, when they speak of dying, speak of going "home." Their longing for heaven is for them the same as their longing for home. Jesus even shows us, the dwelling of eternal bliss under the image of a home—of "His Father's house."

Does not this tell us that our earthly home is intended to be an image of our heavenly home—a pathway, a fore-court to that higher home?

The North is cold and serious. The arts do not there possess their dwelling-place; the time of flowers is short. Will you see their native earth, see Italy, see France; will you see the consecrated earth of home, of families, see Sweden! See everywhere among the rocks and the forests those quiet dwellings, where man enjoys an ennobled natural life; where, in the bosom of holy and precious relationship, are developed piety and bravery, the national virtues of Sweden.

And now when we are on such a good path, let us turn into Adelaide's home. I have called it "the Home of Happiness," and sincerely desire that my readers may do the same. Let me see if I, with the help of my cousin Beata Everyday's pen (which that late personage bequeathed to me,) shall not be able to obtain the testimony also of your tongue, my reader.

A clear November morning dawned over M. on the morrow of that day on which Count Alarik had introduced his lovely bride into the hall of his fathers. While we are in the way of intruding into houses, and committing indiscretions, let us take a look at the young Countess's drawing-room. No dust on the green carpet; on the windows and mirror no spot. The air is embalmed with mignonette. The breakfast-table, with a dazzling white tablecloth and smoking coffee, is standing by the sofa. Some beautiful pictures, by Sweden's best artists, decorate the walls. Where are the young couple themselves? Yes! Alarik and Adelaide are standing by the window; he with his arm round her waist, she with her lovely head leaning on his shoulder.

The first snow had fallen in the night, and like a large white sheet lay the lake before the stately old castle. The tall fir forest stretched its snowy crowns wide around toward the skies, and on the other side of the lake lay a ridge of rocks of extraordinary form. From afar in the forest was heard the cheerful and vigorous strokes of the axe. Now and then a large snow-flake fell through the quiet air, the sky became clearer and clearer, and the clouds became more deeply dyed in purple and gold, till they were suddenly forced to pale before the beaming glance of the king of day, as he arose clear and glorious from his white bed on the horizon. The fields and the trees were soon clothed in a diamond mantle; they glittered with a thousand stars; but it was not in rivalry, but as homage and thanks.

And this noble scene was contemplated by two happy beings. Count Alarik's eagle-eye reposed on the sun, and bore unaverted his dazzling beams. Adelaide gayly and piously bent her head as if to hail the spreader of joy, and sung Tegner's "Song to the Sun,"

"Die jag sjunger on solen," etc.,

"To thee I raise my song, high glorious sun!"

then suddenly interrupting herself, and clapping her hands in delight, she exclaimed:

"Ah, in spring! then here it must be beautiful when the lake is open, and the sun entices out flower after flower—and all this I may see, may enjoy with thee! O Alarik! how beautiful is life! How pleasant to live!"

"To live!" repeated Count Alarik thoughtfully, "and what is it to live?" asked he smiling as he contemplated Adelaide.

"To love!" replied Adelaide with warmth, "and to adore Him who gave us love. O how much less we should enjoy of the good things of life, had we not an all-good Giver to thank! I love thee, Alarik, I thank God, and this is the same thing to me, and this is my happiness."

"And I will thank Him for the gift of thee, my Adelaide, as for life's best treasure," said Count Alarik as he pressed her warmly to his heart, and looked thankfully up to heaven. "But sentiments alone are not enough for life, we must—"

"I know, I know," interrupted Adelaide with a kiss, and a playful smile, "we must think, study, make ourselves useful in our generation, read history, and all that—no! do not become grave! Look, all wisdom is born merely of the heart's warmth. When the sun shines on the earth it bears forth fruit. I love thee—what is the interest of thy life, will become that of mine also. 'Thy land shall be my land, and thy friends, my friends.'" This last she added with deep-felt seriousness.

"But tell me," continued she, "are people in our days with all their learning really happier than, for instance, the Patriarchs were in their time? Are the Swedes so better and happier than their ignorant forefathers several hundred years back?"

"The greater mass of people are better and happier," answered Count Alarik. "Science and art have by their advance given to humanity organs for their different powers; rich means for enjoyment, and defence against suffering. But the right scale by which to estimate the advance of the human race would be better ascertained by our looking into the family life of former days and comparing it with that of ours. Through acquaintance with family life—this root of the life of societies—we should first learn to perceive in what degree human life has gained in happiness and elevation. I think, my Adelaide, that you by a nearer contemplation would not wish to change our times for former times, nor your home for a hut in the groves of Mamre, though it might be shaded by palm-trees; neither for a knightly castle, though you would there have to work the banner for your armed and plundering Viking; and although in the Patriarchal age, as in the Chivalric ages, there would be no need for you to learn, and you might call your husband, 'lord.'"

"My lord and husband!" said Adelaide as she bowed to Alarik with a humility full of charm—"then as now it had always been a hapwitness and an honour. But tell me, best Alarik, how does it then happen that these our days are not in general happier? Are there not even now many unhappy and divided families?"

"There are," answered Count Alarik; "but it is their own fault; all the elements for happiness and improvement are found in life; we require but to stretch out our hands to reach them. Much evil and much misery, it is true, cleave to our times: but it is a time of struggle and development; a remarkable moment of passage, and the cry of victory already sounds over the cry of distress. We shall, during the winter evenings read history together, and you will there see a noble sight—God's development in humanity. You will see how He gives himself to our race in clearer beams, in a growing intimacy, more and more according as it has power to receive Him. You shall see how humanity, nourished by the life of the Eternal One, develops ever more fully and harmoniously its members—glances more clearly to heaven—how its spiritual, its celestial form gradually brightens in the contemplation of the Almighty—you shall see this, and you shall rejoice; feel yourself happy, that even you are called in your degree, to spread God's kingdom upon earth. And you shall find, my Adelaide, that the enjoyment of life can stand side by side with its seriousness—nay! that they could not be without another."

Adelaide looked brightly and full of glad presentiments up to her husband.

"I think I understand you," said she; "and when all new-married couples keep what they promise before God, as we shall do, when finally the whole human race makes but one single holy family, then the moment of union shall have arrived between God and his earth, and then shall the happy bride say like me, 'O how good is God! God be praised!'"

"O how good is God! God be praised!" joined Count Alarik with warmth, and clasped his wife to his breast.

So stood they both—pious, good and happy, united in an earthly and in a heavenly love—man and woman.

And if any of my readers should fear that a love, which lived so entirely in life's higher regions, should leave temporal concerns in neglect—if some careful and lovely reader should exclaim, "While they are standing here, and speaking, 'pour se former le cœur et l'esprit,' the coffee is growing cold!" I shall take upon myself to inform her respectfully, that in spite of the conversation in the window they were in time to enjoy it quite warm, together with fresh-baked rusks; and I would willingly here make a picture of the lady of the house and the mistress of the house, such as I saw them in Adelaide, the careful and watchful, who had her eye everywhere, and yet left every one in peace and freedom to attend to his own duties. The attentive, who adorned her simple table as tastefully as she arranged her cupboard orderly—who was careful of her noble husband's comfort in the very least thing, and kept the servants in order and in brilliant humor, and entered into the smallest details of every-day life with a spirit and taste which imparted to them a poetry and charm.

"Poetry and charms in every-day life's occupations!" cried distrustfully Mrs. Shopkeeper Tungmln, to whom I read this passage, and she began to sigh over to me pro memoria, of baking, brewing, washing, etc. etc.

Nevertheless it was as I have said; for order, goodness, and gayety, were little household divinities in Adelaide's home, and kept watch, and beat time everywhere.

"And whence had she the power to charm forth these?"

Yes; by this, that she was happy and deserving of her happiness; that she could love him whom she esteemed, with whom she had united her life; and love—love, that celestial guest, has the power to raise this life's heaviest dough.*

And now, beloved reader—if I could offer you a more pleasing picture than that of a loving and happy pair; of a home, a fore-court of heaven—I would try to produce it to do you a pleasure; but as I do not conceive myself to have that power, so—away with my pen!

* Most honored housekeepers! do the Authoress the justice to believe, that she well knows that a proper dough rises of itself, and graciously take this comparison less to the letter.

As the blessed Mamselle Rönquist lay on her death-bed from the unblessed cholera, I received from her a packet with the following words:

"As thou art the best friend that I possess in this world, I therefore send thee herewith some notices of a family with whom I lived the greatest part of my days, and which appeared to me worthy of being penned down. With a somewhat nicer elaboration, they might probably form a continuation of my story of "THE PRESIDENT'S DAUGHTERS." If thou findest in these pages matters to afford interest to the reader, I am persuaded thou wilt set thyself to work them out, and to weave them into a whole. With the age of the actors in the narrative, with the time in which the events occur, as well as with the local circumstances, thou canst deal and order as thou wilt, and allow thyself therein the same freedom which I have allowed myself. All this is of minor importance in a little volume which concerns itself only with the history of the heart. Gladly do I bequeath to thee the finishing of my feeble sketches. Thou wilt certainly perform it better than myself, since thou art older; and life is a teaching, a going to school, in which every new year should advance us into a higher class. I, too, am about to ascend higher: I go to learn more, but probably not to write more. Farewell, till the brighter morning!

Thine,
EMMA."

I have done what Emma Rönquist desired: how! Thou, friendly reader, mayest decide. Behold!

But who, then, is "I?" thou wilt ask. Dear reader, I am—if thou art good, but especially if thou art unfortunate—with my whole heart,

THY HUMBLE SERVANT.

CHAPTER I.

OLD ACQUAINTANCE.

Well, are you all now assembled here?—BELLMAN.

We enter an apartment in which the beautiful carpets, the soft sofas, the brilliant mirrors, the richly-draped curtains, and the like, present that pleasant picture of comfort which luxury, the busy artist of modern times, is continually laboring to perfect. With his gaze fixed on the chess-board, sits on a sofa the well-preserved President, or, more properly, Excellence von H. Before him we see his daughter Edla, as she is in the very act of quietly allowing herself to be checkmated by her father; and this, partly because she has already won one game from him, partly because his Excellence did not take it in the best humor. Now, however, suddenly the play, and with it the humor of the President, take a favourable turn.

"The queen, dear Edla," observed he, "is a costly figure; without her there is no life in the play. You must not be angry if I deprive you of yours, and say check, and—mate!"

"Mate! Yes; actually without salvation," cried Edla. "That was a splendid manoeuvre. How fast hemmed in stand now my knights!"

His Excellence rubbed his nose, blew it, and could not, with the very best will, prevent himself laughing heartily at his fast-imprisoned daughter; upon which he said with great friendliness—"If you be not altogether too completely checkmated, my good child, give me a cup of tea."

"Directly," replied Edla with alacrity.

The President leaned himself back comfortably on the sofa.

At some distance from these, we see at a window another group. A young lady of extraordinary beauty is busy in arranging fresh flowers in a vase which stands before her. Another lady, not young, and still less handsome, but in the most exact and finished toilette, sits opposite to her, and works a shepherdess in an embroidery frame. Before her stands a handsome, high-bred-looking young man, whose large, proud, and penetrating eyes are incessantly fixed on the Madonna countenance of the younger lady.

The President—I cannot yet break myself of the habit of calling him by his old title—had, after chess and tea, brightened into a more cheerful mood; he glanced with a degree of emotion at the group at the window, and said to Edla—"It is really not to be denied that there is scarcely to be found a handsomer couple than Nina and Count Ludwig. It does one's soul absolutely good to look at them both. But when I think that Nina will certainly soon leave us, and that you also, my best Edla, will then soon probably make happy a husband, I feel—"

"As far as I am concerned, my good father, nothing of the sort can be said. I desire nothing less than to give up my present pleasant condition. I feel myself happy, and will never leave my dear father."

"But that I cannot agree to," replied the President. "I cannot desire that you should wholly sacrifice yourself for me. No, my child; happy as your tender care makes me, happy as I should continually feel through it, regard for me must not be allowed to place itself as an impediment in the way of your natural vocation. And I—I—I shall also—"

"My kind, best father," interrupted Edla with tender emotion, "speak not of it. I declare, with the fullest truth, that I only follow the call of my heart, when I desire to change nothing in my present happy existence. I can nowhere find a more agreeable lot than in the house of my kind father, where I can follow all my inclinations."

"You are the best of daughters; but in your father's house also a change may take place—hem! hem! Nina will certainly soon marry, and I—I—yes, my good child, such a match as that with the Professor A., so rich, so learned, and agreeable a man, does not offer itself every day. In fact, I should think it very wrong if you rejected his hand."

"I honor A. with my whole heart," replied Edla, "he is my friend, my very best friend; but a nearer connection would not make me happy. A. often deeply grieves me. His skeptical infirmity—for so one may style his free-thinking want of faith in the highest and most important interests in humanity—is especially painful. I have to thank him for much enlightenment, much useful and valuable teaching; but at the same time he has called forth in my soul many a disquiet and many a pang. His burrowing, unresting, contradictory spirit banishes the quiet of my heart; I have often not been able for days to surmount the impression which a conversation with him has made on my mind."

"But, dear child, that will remedy itself when you see and speak with him every day and every hour. With your knowledge and your firm conviction, you will easily bring him back from his errors. You will wholly change his views: you will make a proselyte of him."

"Ah, my father!" answered Edla, sighing and smiling, "that is a work which far transcends my strength. I question extremely whether a doubter in God and in immortality will suffer himself to be led by argument to embrace the true faith. A. needs a wife, who, through her beautiful soul, her love, her piety and gentleness, will infuse into him the living feeling of that great truth against which his sifting and proving reason struggles. She must not dispute with him, she must vanquish him by her own inward faith, infect him as it were. I know that I by no means own nor possess what A. has need of for his salvation and for his happiness. I certainly could not make him happy."

"Well, then, if it is not to be A., there is yet left us the State Counsellor P., who will assuredly declare himself next. He has already spoken to me of you, and truly in the highest term of praise. He has just lately bought a large house in Queen-street, and really esteems you uncommonly."

"I am sincerely obliged to him for his good opinion, but I doubt whether he thinks of marrying me; and did he, I should also be compelled to refuse him equally with Professor A."

"Hear, my good Edla, my best child, I see how it stands. You reject all, because you think only of me. But I assure you that I have strength to bear it, that I have already thought upon it—yes, dear daughter, for your sake, in order to afford you perfect freedom, I have myself—I am truly no longer young, and the grave—"

"O, my dear father, my kind, best father, speak no more of it!" implored Edla with warmth, while she laid her hand tenderly within his; "my father is still in his best years, and will yet live long for the happiness of his children. As to what concerns me I can only repeat, that I feel myself thoroughly happy in my present circumstances, and would exchange them for none other in the world. At my age one does not give up so readily old and dear habits. You, dear father, and the quiet, pleasant occupations which I can follow undisturbed, fill the whole measure of my soul's desires. Let me hope, best father—tell me that it is no displeasure, no dissatisfaction with me which occasions you to-day continually to speak of my marriage!"

"No! good heavens! no, certainly not! How you talk! How can you only think, Edla, that I could possibly be dissatisfied with you? Now—" he continued with an expression in which a certain self-contentment mingled itself with a degree of ill-humour; "be it then as you will; I think only that it is a pity for the worthy men and for yourself; for people may say what they like—man is still born for wedlock. Besides I fear still, that hereafter, when Nina is married you will find your solitude irksome. I have often pondered how, by some means or other, I might choose you an agreeable female companion, and only on your account—would I myself ever—"

The President paused. Edla glanced attentively across to him, but all further communication was interrupted by the announcement of the State Counsellor P., to whom the President advanced with great cordiality, and welcomed him in the friendliest manner. The State Counsellor was a lively, talkative man. He conversed much with the President, but spoke properly only for Edla, whose countenance and looks he continually studied; and the whole of his demeanor betrayed that he indubitably had it in his mind to make her an offer of his hand and heart.

We will now make another visit to the window, and observe what is passing there.

The Baroness Alexandrine, somewhat small in mind, somewhat self-complacent, and somewhat untransparent, in a word, somewhat mediocre, made commonplace observations on the signs of the times, and on the lamentable tendency to disturb everything, and to leave nothing untouched.

Her cousin Count Ludwig, who generally carried himself high and sharply toward her, answered her remarks either not at all, or turned them off with a dry stateliness.

"The gentlemen," said Alexandrine with flute-like voice, "will rule everywhere, and would have the greatest delight in turning the world topsyturvy. They kindle bloody wars only to indulge their thirst for fame; and neither reflect on the misery they occasion, nor on us poor women, who are obliged to sit as silent spectators."

"When a mighty spirit shapes its own path," answered Count Ludwig, "all lesser considerations must give way, and the hero who does battle for the good and the advancement of millions, cannot pause to inquire whether a cat mews or a woman moans over it."

"Gracious heavens! Cousin Ludwig, how you always speak. Nina, what do you say to it?"

"I think he is right," answered Nina, with a shy and melodious voice; "but—"

"Well, but?"

"But—it might have been otherwise expressed," continued she, deeply blushing.

Over the stern features of Count Ludwig flew also a slight tinge of red as he said, "Miss Nina does not belong to the women to whom my remark referred. You certainly know how, with quiet and penetration, to surrender yourself to necessity."

"That do I understand by no means; on the contrary, I fear that I should prove as weak as any woman whatever. The necessity of war, particularly, is not clear to me. Wherefore must there be oppressor and oppressed?"

"Since such is the course of the world," answered Count Ludwig coldly, "and we cannot alter it."

"If people then, at least, would only carry on war against the Turks," said Alexandrine. "That is an abominable nation, that one should drive out of Europe. Their horrible religion allows them even to drown women who have made a false step. Hu! Nina, have you lately seen the anecdote in the Journal of Fashion? I could not sleep the whole night after it."

"The humanity and freedom of manners in most Christian France, under the rule of Orleans and Louis XV., appear to you probably more agreeable!" asked Count Ludwig, with a bitter ironical smile. "I confess that in these respects I hold similar opinions to the Turks."

Alexandrine called again on Nina for her opinion, but she kept silence. She asked only in her own heart whether no middle course was to be found between laziness and cruelty, and Count Ludwig's words occasioned her, as already so frequently, a peculiar feeling of embarrassment.

Fresh visitors arrived. Nina was asked to sing. She immediately complied, and her voice, which was not strong, but indescribably sweet, awoke in her hearers such an involuntary emotion, that one of them said, "Miss Nina has a tear in her voice."

And really this expression might have been extended to her whole appearance, which was exceedingly lovely, but so enveloped in a breath of sorrow, that the beholder was reminded of a supernatural being exiled from its celestial native land. This was the impression she made, at least on those who were inspired with a breath of poetry, though we must confess that one gentleman of the company, who was blest with a most excellent corpulence, praised the lovely young lady only "weakly." When she immediately afterward spoke with him, he was, nevertheless, not able to prevent himself looking wholly enraptured and inspired. For the rest Nina appeared to send herself forth into the surrounding world, and only to live for the wishes of others. One might have been tempted to ask whether she really had a will of her own, and were in this world on her own account. As the impression of the song died away with the song, the company returned to its ordinary tone, which announced itself by a brisk discourse on the state and the world. Edla was accustomed to keep silence during these conversations; but while she listened to the debates, her eye followed with motherly concern her sister Nina. The louder became the voices in the room, the more she observed her to grow paler, and to lean her head in weariness against the wall. Edla stood immediately at her side, and whispered in her ear, "Are you unwell?"

"Yes," was Nina's faint reply. In silence Edla took her arm and conducted her into her bedchamber, and then returned to the company, though her thoughts remained with Nina.

Count Ludwig approached her and inquired, with a dissatisfied air, "What is this then again?"

"A little faintness. She is not accustomed to be among so many people, and cannot bear the noise of such various voices."

"But do not you think that these nervous attacks proceed principally from imagination; that a degree of compulsion, a serious exhortation to conquer herself would be salutary for her?"

"No—Nina must not constrain herself, she is too truthful, too simple-minded to affect sensibilities: she is much too good not to conquer herself, if she could, because she knows that she would thereby give others pleasure. Time, patience, and a prudent mild treatment will most certainly, though probably only slowly, operate."

"You certainly know best," said Count Ludwig, "but I fear—"

"What! what do you fear?"

"That you allow Nina far too much to indulge in day dreaming after her own way and fancy. Without exertion no one ever learns to conquer himself. I fear that you rather effeminate your sister."

The words of the Count went to Edla's heart; no reproach could be more painful to her, and its impression was strong enough to communicate to her manner a degree of sternness, when after the departure of the company she again sought Nina.

Nina had unbound her beautiful bright hair, to arrange it for the night, but appeared as if she had quite forgotten the task, for she sat by the table on which she had laid both arms, with her face buried in her hands. Her hair flowed in rich waves round her finely-formed snow-white arms. So sat she long, dreaming rather than thinking, and half-suppressed sighs heaved at times her bosom. Her appearance touched Edla; the stern feeling melted in her heart. Nina had not perceived the light entrance of her sister, but a hand which passed softly and caressingly over her hair, made her suddenly look up, and she met the friendly inquiring gaze of her Edla. There was in this gaze something unusually tender, and there was a chord in Nina's bosom which to a friendly touch responded in fullest harmony. She let her arm rest on the arm of Edla, and looked affectionately up to her with the angelical but pale countenance in which trust and melancholy were seen mingled.

"So thoughtful! And why?" asked Edla, with a quiet tone, and her clear and steady manner stood here in most obvious contrast with the disposition of Nina, which swam in affection, in melancholy and indecision.

"I know not myself—" answered Nina; "I would that you could unriddle it for me. Clouds gather over my soul, and disquiet me."

"And these clouds! have they no determined shape, no signification?"

"No! nothing clear; but they come frequently. I wish that I could penetrate them with my glance; they veil from me a clearness which I yearn after. Ah! Edla, tell me, what is life! what it means—to live!"

Edla drew her arm softly from beneath Nina's lovely head, and seated herself beside her.

"Life, my dear child, is a warfare. To live, means to develop our strength, our indwelling goodness."

"But happiness, Edla, what is happiness?"

"To know one's self—that gives peace and freedom."

"But, Edla, what is enjoyment, what is joy? How do we recognise that? Whence comes it? I feel a thirst, and yet know not for what. I would so gladly be gay, so gladly be happy."

"Be good, be serene," said Edla, with fervency.

"Merry, happy! When I hear the birds sing, then I feel that they are joyous. I have seen the countenances of men light with blessedness; I have heard young damsels full of laughter and exultation; they were happy, they could be joyful. I would so willingly be able to be so too."

"That is not difficult, Nina; but there is something higher than this happiness, something nobler, which teaches us to set small value on the mere passing rush of gladness. Wouldst thou not resemble him there?" Edla pointed to a picture of the Saviour in the temptation, as he with quiet resolution cast from him the pleasure of the world.

Nina gazed long on the noble picture. "That," said she, "is sublime; yes, that indicates more than joy, more than happiness; yet perhaps this happiness is only for the strong. And, Edla, strength is unequally distributed, and so too is enjoyment. Are there not multitudes who strive not after this higher blessedness, without therefore being less good, and less innocent in heart?"

"There are none, Nina, whom we can number among the better men, but those who practice virtue, who are active in their love for their neighbour, and labour after knowledge and improvement."

Nina sunk her head upon her hand, and a cloud of sorrow spread itself over her lovely countenance. "I must really be very weak, Edla," sighed she! "I feel nothing in me of the strength which you yourself possess. I admire and love; but why do I yearn rather after the lively, joyous pleasures of the world, than after virtue and perfection? Edla, my second mother! do you understand me?"

"Yes, and there was a time when I felt as you do; but that is a sorrowful weakness—I have conquered it."

"Edla, you have felt thus, and have conquered this feeling! You are so strong and quiet! How does one conquer one's weaknesses, Edla?"

"When we unite ourselves with thorough earnestness to a stronger and higher life—to God, or to a clear, vigorous human soul."

"Edla, keep me with you! Let me ever remain with you! I shall then never feel unhappy; I shall, near you, grow strong, and become what you will!"

Edla concealed the emotion with which she heard these words, and said, "I believe, Nina, you will soon find a better support than I can be to you; an arm with whose help you may become useful in life. Count Ludwig loves you."

A slight shudder passed through Nina. Edla perceived it, and asked with evident disquiet, "But you have no repugnance to him?"

"No; but he is so stern, so cold; I am never without a fear of him."

"Stern, cold!" repeated Edla. "Dearest Nina, in our effeminate times, any one easily appears so to us, who has an independent, energetic will, and will not follow the humors of others. What I fear, and what my innermost heart most revolts against, is precisely that feebleness and laxity which enslave so many minds; that twilight in the spirit which makes them, that they know not what they would; that they effort nothing; that they perform nothing but for the moment; that they do everything only by halves, feebly and inefficiently, and convert the whole of existence into a phantasmagoria. How different is Count Ludwig! How firm and clear; how vigorous and effective in action! I have known him from his childhood, and know no nobler, no better man. But life has been very harsh toward him, and the most painful experiences have so deeply wounded his heart, that indeed it has infused into his mind some degree of bitterness. He well deserves that a gentle amiable wife should again reconcile him to life and humanity, for which he is equally active. Will my Nina not become his good angel?"

"My will shall be yours, Edla," said Nina, while her lips touched the arm of her sister. "Talk to me of him; teach me to love him. O! if he be unhappy, if his life be solitary, if he have no one whom he loves, and who loves him again, I will learn to feel tenderness for him, and do everything to make him happy."

Edla touched at these words, put her arm around her affectionate sister; but as she well knew how dangerous to her health was every excitement of feeling, she quickly collected herself, and said with her accustomed tranquillity, "What I know of Count Ludwig, I will tell you. He will not be angry with me for it, and he deserves indeed that I should make you better acquainted with him than he himself could. You know that he is the eldest son of one of the richest and best families of our country. Splendor, but no joy, no tenderness, surrounded his cradle. His mother never could bear him. His father's house was a joyless, unhappy home; vanity, immorality, and the most capricious despotism reigned therein, with all the discomfort which follows in their train. His parents were a torment to each other, and revenged every contention on the poor child. Violence and injustice were the first experiences of his life. But amid these examples of moral evil, and beneath this melancholy pressure, the heart and sentiments of the boy grew into unwonted excellence. He ever loved steadfastly truth and order. He set himself resolutely in a direction to which everything that surrounded him was utterly opposed. If through this he became stern and reserved, it was because amid seductions of all kinds he stood wholly alone. But presently he was no longer alone; he found a friend who indeed was poor, and of humble station, but endowed by nature with the noblest gifts; a friend of really softer nature than Ludwig, but who appeared to love the good and true as sincerely, and was as energetic and virtuous as he. Ludwig saw in him a thoroughly perfect character, and attached himself to him with his whole heart and soul."

"Count Ludwig had a yet younger brother, who through the severity of the father was feeble and miserable. He had also a little sister, and the manly boy became from her earliest age the protector of the tender lovely child. He sat by the cradle of this little sister, kissed her little feet, and chased away the flies which disturbed her slumbers. So essential to his heart was love. As she grew up he stood as guardian angel between her and her parents, who as the tyranny of their humour dictated, were equally injurious to her by their indulgence and their severity. The mother died, and Count Ludwig was compelled by the command of his father to make the tour of Europe for the completion of his education. He was in despair at being obliged to leave his sister at an age in which she most required his oversight and assistance, and with the purpose of affording both to her and to his unfortunate brother a protector, he introduced his friend into his paternal home in the capacity of tutor. The firmness of his principles, his agreeable social endowments, and the unwonted amiability of his disposition, would, as Count Ludwig thought, exert an equally conspicuous influence on his father, his brother and sister; and thus he made over to the guardianship of his friend that which was dearest to him on earth.

"In a year he returned, and found his beloved, his only sister, snatched away from his father's house, the victim of a horrible death. His father lay on his bed, mortally wounded by a traitor's hand; and he, he who had perpetrated all this—the seducer, the murderer, and still more the pitiful robber of a large sum of money—was his friend! the friend whom he so tenderly loved, and in whom he had confided more than himself! Ah, Nina! it demands no trivial strength, no little virtue, when after such experiences a man still remains steadfast in good, still works vigorously for the benefit of mankind.

"The guilty friend lay in confinement, and could produce no evidence of his innocence. The doom of death hovered over his head, when he suddenly escaped from prison. Count Ludwig pursued him not—he sought to forget him—that was his revenge!

"The death of his sister left deep traces in his soul. I saw him much at that time, as in consequence of this calamity his mind was seized with a deep melancholy. I saw also how your countenance operated upon him; how, near you, he became by degrees quieter and gentler. You were still very young when Count Ludwig lost his sister, and therefore you have probably never heard these affairs talked of. Ludwig has often said to me, that you were even then his guardian angel, as it was only through you that he could learn again to love life and mankind. Often has he declared to me his earnest wish that you should become his; and it has only been the consideration of your delicate health, and my entreaties, which have withheld him hitherto from explaining himself to you and our father. Tell me now, Nina, is this man worthy of being warmly valued? Would one not wish from one's heart to see him happy?"

"He is worthy! O, in the highest degree worthy! Edla, I will be worthy of him, and make him happy; and then I shall be happy too. But, Edla, beg of him not to solicit my hand yet, I am still so young. Remove me not yet, for long, long from you. Guide me, leave me not. There still lies a cloud, as it were, upon me; I still see nothing distinctly; I yet understand neither life nor myself."

"You will lead a more active life, Nina, and then it will become clearer to you."

"And shall I be happy? Shall I experience a joyful cheerful life?"

"Nina, I do wish that you did not ask so much about this. Did they make these anxious inquiries, those distinguished men of antiquity and the Middle Ages, whom we admire, and who lived alone for good, for the better days of the earth, who lived alone for heaven!"

"I am weak," said Nina, as she strove with her delicate fingers to stem the forth-gushing tears.

"You are so," answered Edla, with a seriousness which sounded like severity. "But, Nina, we ought to be ashamed of our weakness, and exert all our strength to conquer it. It is only poor spiritedness which bewails without arousing itself. It is dreadful to deserve one's own contempt; but that is the lot of the feeble. He knows not how to govern himself; he does not know the felicity of saying to the vexations of life—'You cannot perplex me;' to its pains—'You cannot crush me.' He repents to-day of the faults he committed yesterday, and to-morrow commits them again. He will amuse himself and become strong, but the time passes away in empty, indolent wishes. He knows not what battle is, and therefore enjoys no victory. He sees the gulf, and has not power to withdraw from it. How pitiable! how contemptible! Nina, you turn pale."

"It is nothing, it will go over; Edla, your words—Edla, do not despise me!" and she looked up to her with folded hands and an agonized look.

"Be composed, be tranquil, my dear child," exclaimed Edla with a tender earnestness, as she arose; "you are not that feeble creature I portrayed, and will never be it. I would not survive the day in which this picture resembled you. Summon up your strength to abhor it, to drive it far, far from you."

"I will, I shall!" said Nina, extending her arms toward her sister, but in the same moment her arms fell, her head drooped, her eyes closed, she slept. Her brow was pure and clear, no pain disturbed her sweet features; but her countenance was deadly pale, and her limbs were stiff and rigid. It was death in his most lovely form. Edla knew this swoon-like sleep, with which Nina in the weak health of her childhood had so often been seized. For years she had now been free from it, and the more terrifying to Edla was its return just at this moment. But with her peculiar presence of mind she immediately applied all means to repel this fearful sleep, and she had the indescribable delight, after a short time, to see Nina awake.

"What was that?" demanded Nina anxiously. "Was I again ill, as I used to be? There came over me an inexplicable faintness. Edla, how much disquiet, how much trouble I occasion you!"

"It was nothing, my dear child," answered Edla with a tranquil tone. "Your physical weakness is destitute of all danger. With time, when your life is more active, and you have to care for others, it will totally vanish, and your soul thereby become even stronger. "Believe me!"

"I believe you. Why should I not indeed! Was it not you who gave a second time my life? And have I not since then lived wholly through your care, and thought of my own thoughts! Ay! when I already lay in my coffin dim—all still and dark around me, and my little life was closed for this world, when you came and warmed me with your kisses, and awakened me with your words; when I at length opened my eyes and again beheld the light and you—then I became yours, my Edla; my life was your gift, and I felt that my whole future lay in your hands. And thus it is still, Edla; I can have no other thought, no other wish, than to obey your will, and to do everything as you will have it!"

"Thou art my heart's child!" said Edla kindly; "but we have this evening too much excited each other, and that is not right. Go now to rest. I am not sleepy; I will seat myself by your bed, and read to you till you are asleep."

Nina assented, rejoiced by the promise.

And what did Edla probably read to her? "Without doubt a sermon, to send her morally to sleep; or the heathen mythology, with the view of strengthening her weak sister right emphatically through the deeds of the Aesir!" here probably exclaims Miss Witty. Be still wittier, thou witty one! Edla read with a lively delivery from Madame Lengren's life-like writings; and Nina fell asleep with a cheerful smile upon her lips. Then paused Edla, and stooped toward her sleeping sister, contemplating with transport her angel countenance, in which peace and innocence had at this moment mingled themselves into the most affectionate expression. Involuntarily she folded her hands, and prayed out of an ardent heart:

"O my God! watch over her! strengthen her weakness! defend her! Give me strength to guide her to good, to the good which is in Thee. She is the child of my heart, of my cares; make me to subdue the weakness which I feel for her; give me strength to conduct her to Thee, if it be even through suffering."

Nina moved and whispered imploringly, "Mina—Mina, come." There was something in these words which gave Edla pain, but glancing up toward heaven she went on:

"Grant that she love me. Hear me; and instil into her somewhat of that tenderness for me, which I feel for her!"

"Mina, come!" repeated Nina still more importunately than before.

Edla continued: "If it be possible, let me be continually about her, continually watch over her. Lay, O God! on my shoulder that cross which she ought to bear; give me her sorrows, if it be possible. Protect her! Bless her!"

"Edla!" now said Nina with the tenderest expression.

"Let her days be serene, her way be smooth; O Almighty One! give her happiness even here upon earth! But if this does not lie in Thy all-wise counsel, and she may become better through trials and afflictions—O then strengthen her to bear them! Mould her to Thy will, Father, in joy and in sorrow, in life and in death. Make her Thine own possession!"

Nina's sleep was uneasy. Edla now also went to bed, but no slumber fell upon her eyelids; she passed the whole night in thought about Nina, disquieted herself about her, and listened to her breathing. Frequently it seemed to her that this became continually fainter; she arose softly and approached her sister's bed, but when she finally perceived by the light of the night-lamp that Nina's lips wore an increasingly richer color, and felt her fresh breath strike her own cheek like a blessed greeting, she turned away and thanked God.

We also will salute with her the dawning day, and ask what it brings of news.

CHAPTER II.

NEWS.

"No news! no news!"

EDLA.

MORNING came, and with it a letter to Edla, which extremely surprised her, as it bore the hand of the President; but how much more was she astonished at its contents. It informed her of the betrothal of her father with the Countess Natalie M. The President stated to her that he must this day be absent, and had concluded to give her this intelligence by writing, as he feared lest at the first moment she might feel unpleasantly affected by it. He expressed himself to his daughter with the most amiable candor on a step, which he probably did not himself find wholly in accordance with that consistency and prudence on which his whole life long he had professed to act as high a value.

"Many things come to pass," wrote the President, "of which one can give no exact account. But the thing once done, the wisest course is always to turn the best side toward you. I cannot expect, my best child, that my house will in future offer me a greater charm than your affectionate care has diffused through it; I am sure, indeed, you will carry that still farther. The talents of the amiable Countess M. will only add to it a higher splendour. Her wealth will place me in the position to give to our Nina a more befitting dowry. The Countess is enamoured with her, and perfectly happy to be able to regard her as her daughter. You, my Edla, will, I hope, find in the Countess a friend, and an associate which will be as enlivening for you as it will be productive of happiness to her; and I praise heaven when I think that love and friendship will brighten with a still more beautiful union than hitherto my family circle, and spread a clearer sunshine over my declining days. Should you, my dear daughter, also wish to marry, you see now that on my account you may be perfectly easy. If you do not wish it—if you prefer to remain with me—I can assure you from the bottom of my heart that it meets my dearest wish, and will be a genuine joy to Your grateful Father."

Edla kissed with warmth the last words of the letter; and so vivid was the feeling of satisfaction which it afforded her, that it at first took away a great portion of the unpleasant impression which this betrothal could not but make upon her. It returned, however, speedily enough; and Edla could not contemplate this unexpected, this great change, without the most painful sentiment. She was acquainted with the Countess M., and knew well how expert she was to fascinate and rule; that in every company she was the leading star; but she knew equally well that she allowed neither repose nor comfort, and that the life which she diffused was without happiness and without.

peace. She trembled for the peace of her father; for Nina's good; by degrees, however, her accustomed resignation triumphed, and she opposed to the inevitable that quiet power which always brings repose. With this she hastened to meet her father when he returned home in the evening, embraced him, and tenderly wished him happiness.

He felt a tear on his cheek, and this token of a warm feeling, which Edla so seldom allowed herself, touched him deeply. Confused, and at the same time moved, he assumed a half-glad, half-feeble tone, joked and sighed alternately, and really did not rightly know how he should carry himself. He repeated again nearly that which Edla had already read in his letter, only representing more at large how his higher rank brought with it also higher claims—how he was obliged to see and to represent more people, and the like. For all this his present property was not fully adequate; and moreover, he was averse to burdening Edla with a mode of life so totally opposed to her inclinations, so utterly antagonistic to her favourite pursuits; and therefore—and therefore—he had held it for the best, had regarded it as a duty, to unite himself to the Countess M., whose character and talents were in all these respects admirable.

Edla said nothing, held herself still and thoughtful; but when the President at last remained sticking fast in a confused cough, she felt the necessity of reconciling him to himself.

"May she make my father happy," said Edla; "and then she will be dear and precious to us all; and much that is pleasant will certainly come with her into our house. Nina will now acquire a better teacher in Italian and the harp than we could procure for any money. Countess M. will certainly instruct her admirably."

"Splendidly! divinely!" exclaimed the President, who now began to breathe, and saw the most unheard-of advantages for his daughter in this match. He now dilated upon it with correspondent zeal, became quite gay and elated, and persuaded himself more and more that he was offering up his accustomed repose solely for the education of his daughter.

O ye most excellent little contingencies, which accommodate yourselves to great and little follies, which give weight to the unsubstantial, which sweeten the bitter, even enliven misfortune, and bring us into good understanding with ourselves! ye sweet triflers and convenient words, how amiable is it of you that you come to the aid of the benevolent heart, and offer yourselves at the very moment of need! ye are the little pages of a friendly god-head, and fleet and beautiful as the god of love!

When the betrothal of the President became known, it produced a great sensation and no little astonishment. People wondered and queried what could possibly have induced him in his old age to entertain the idea of such a connection. Some insinuated that the Countess had offered herself to him; and that out of politeness and surprise he had said yes to it. Others affirmed that he had a hard life of it with the old maid Edla, and that over her books she forgot the old father. Others again said, that the President rushed into this marriage in order to mend his deranged affairs—an opinion that one often hears. But we, who have some knowledge of the state of things, whisper into the ear of the reader, that the President had had a trifling skirmish with—Cupid, and the rogue had given him in it a tolerably smart wound.

Many wondered at the Countess M.; that she who was so rich and still so beautiful, should give her hand to an old man. This was answered with the assertion, that she only sought through this to win entrance to the Court. Some whispered to themselves, that she purposed by this match nothing but the punishment of an undecided lover. Sentimentality asserted that it was an old inclination which had existed between his Excellence and the Countess in the tender days of childhood, and now suddenly blazed up into a marriage torch. We are so free as to believe that we need no such weighty reasons for people getting married; nay, most generally there requires no reason at all. We believe that people often fall into courtship just because they have nothing else to do.

In certain matrimonial alliances, especially in such as are concluded between people comme il faut, there is so inconceivably little of love and wooing to speak of, that one cannot come fast enough to the wedding. This is the case here, and so to business.

CHAPTER III.

See here the bride, how sweet, how prim!—
The loving bridegroom—look at him!

THE WEDDING GUEST

Connections, lights, and a great company, the wedding ceremony, the clergyman, very fashionable and influential witnesses, congratulations and compliments, champagne and drinking of healths, such is the table of contents of the whole tribe of weddings—and of this among them.

"What! are we to be put off with a genteel disrespectful go-by like this?" I hear my female readers exclaim. "First you invite us to a delectable treat, and then when it comes to the table it is nothing but an every-day dish!"

"My dearest! I feel it; I have sinned against the President and against you, but I cannot now help it; the festivals of life, coronations, weddings, and the like, have no right living colours in my soul. A solitary morning hour, at the rising of the sun—a sigh out of the oppressed bosom—the hand-grasp of two friends in the last moment of existence—these give thoughts, these make the heart beat, and the pen fly—but—"

"But a wedding? A moment in which two hearts, two immortal souls unite in the name of God!"

"Amen! that is certainly divine! if they do not say on this day 'yes,' to each other, in order the rest of their whole lives through to say 'no!' But now I am criminating myself still worse, since I blacken the whole of human nature. Let us look fairly to order to the wedding; and that which passes there, thou, O reader, shalt learn."

In the first place admire the bride! With her five-and-forty years—now I am perpetrating high-treason against her! God be merciful to me, a sinner! she is yet beautiful to admiration. Her figure is slender and majestic! her complexion of a dazzling fairness, which through a delicate addition of real, not pictorial camme, is the more heightened. O! I am really to-day in a shocking way! Her bearing is noble; one sees that she is accustomed to please and to command. Her attire is in the highest degree splendid; jewels glitter in her hair, jewels adorn her bosom and arms. And what blond! yes, I know not myself what everything is. With what dignity she kneels down to receive the blessing; with what tranquil majesty she again rises! A lofty grace reigns in all that she does and allows; toward her new consort she displays a gentle condescension. Her eyes frequently rest with an expression of tenderness and admiration on Nina, who clad in white crape, her shining hair arranged as by an elin hand, calls forth in every spectator the involuntary exclamation of "Angel." The bride desires that Nina shall constantly sit near her, and regards her entirely as her property.

The President shows himself by no means disadvantageously. He is still a right good-looking man; has an excellent bearing, and if his figure truly has acquired something of the emboupoint of age, it by no means yet converts him into an old man. Besides, the blue ribbon of his order spreads a pleasant illusion over it. The star on his breast flashes with brilliancy, and the love of the bridegroom from his eyes. He keeps constantly near his spouse; he carries her shawl, he suffers her not out of his sight; but all with decorum. He gives not the slightest opportunity for satire; a man is not his Excellence, and gentlemanlike and stately for nothing.

And Edla is gayly clad, and really with as much taste as expense. She knows that it will give her father pleasure. Her manner is simple and quiet; she is courteous to all, and friendly to her mother-in-law, who shows herself to her in the highest degree inimicant. Edla's glances rest occasionally on Nina; she seeks to conceal a weight of uneasiness. Professor A. is near her, and talks animatedly, yet more of her than with her.

The rest of the company form various silent groups. We will attach ourselves to one not quite silent, and where the reader, moreover, will renew a former acquaintance.

Baron H. seats himself as commodiously as possible in an easy chair near Miss Greta, who, truly, is something older and stouter than when we saw her last, yet is still even a very pretty and agreeable apparition, and has preserved, amid the manifold annoyances of life and time, her beautiful teeth, her white hands, and her good humour.

Baron H. is always seeking a wife, as he says, with or without money; he expends, however, now more care on his person, and has acquired a still keener eye for the world, a still greater goodness of heart and cheerfulness. The same thing also happens. Baron H. and Miss Greta are infinitely rejoiced to meet each other.

"Now, my gracious lady," said Baron H., after the first salutations, "which of us could possibly have imagined fourteen years ago, as we were together with his late Excellence von G., that we should find ourselves on the same day of the same month at this festivity? Then Miss Adelaide, now the Countess Alarik W., was in her loveliest bloom. But, good heavens! why is she not here! What do you say! Prevented! ha! ha! so! so! I understand. Well, well, that is quite in order. I congratulate. And the little discreet Mamselle Rönquist—a most agreeable person, she not here either! She is prevented! Heavens! what did you say! Ah, yes! she is with the Countess Alarik; nurses her and the children; quite right, most beautiful! I think, when one has character and existence, and has been fourteen years in the same house, the children of the house must become almost one's own. Apropos of the Countess Adelaide—what do you think of her sister, Miss Nina?"

"I testify," answered Miss Greta, "that I hold her to be the most beautiful creature that God has created, only she is nearly altogether ethereal—so to say—almost altogether too little human, too supernatural. One fears that she should suddenly dissolve in air."

"Quite right! quite right! I also love a little more flesh and blood. I would not wish a wife who made you imagine that she would go to pieces if you took hold of her. But it is true though, there is in her something perfectly bewitching. One involuntarily follows her with admiration, and one's eyes and thoughts cannot force themselves away from her. And this veil of melancholy which is diffused over her, how gladly would one draw it aside in order to learn the sweet mystery of her sorrow, which has something charming in it, since it affects the heart rather than saddens it. One sees that it is produced by no present pain. It resembles rather a trouble whose cup has long been drained, or a dark foreboding of future woes. God protect the sweet child! It must really be a devil which could give her pain. Pity that she is so pale; she is actually marble white, and yet there occasionally passes over her a gleam—see there, how even now it tinges her with the roseate glow of the ascending sun."

"Nay," exclaimed Miss Greta, laughing, "that will never do! I counsel you in all earnestness not to look so much at her, or you will become totally enchanted. You already talk so poetically, that I scarcely recognise you again. Bestow rather your attention on your neighbor."

"Most willingly, my gracious friend! But who is the young lady who sits yonder so still and tranquil! An agreeable creature, she looks so modest."

"You are remarkably obliging this evening: I am persuaded she is a very discreet personage, but a little too still and wearisome for me. For this reason, I am not very well acquainted with her. She is called Clara S., and is a legacy of my cousin's, which one of her learned friends some months ago bequeathed to our lovely bride. The girl is poor, the Countess therefore is looking about her for a good match for her, and will give a good portion with her."

"Not at all amiss! a right good idea! And the damsel is actually very charming. She might really make a wife for me, if she, nota bene, were sensible enough to be willing to have me.

She looks as though she would become a most clever housewife, and when she is more exactly noticed, she is also very pretty—she has something that one at first overlooks—something—I might say, holy.”

“Nay, nay, Baron! you go sadly too far to-day. You fall in love actually with everybody, and see angels and saints in the most ordinary mortals. Take an ice and come to yourself.”

“Just as you will. But I could not avoid admiring the young lady in her incomparable repose. She seems to live in the state which La Bruyere calls the Golden Age; she troubles herself about no one, and desires that no one should trouble himself about her. Madame W., with her bird-of-paradise, does not look half so care-free. That must be a right contented, right comfortable condition.”

“That might be very well for the Golden Age, in which people had probably other agremens at hand that one knows nothing of now; but in our time, and in our societies, I praise him who is not heavy and wearisome. I have often been in company with Clara, and have not heard a syllable from her besides yes or no. Absurdities and follies are a thousand times preferable to this killing monotony.”

“Nay, she does not delight me at all; she is intolerable, and a genuine plague; Clara even pleases me better. Do you know F.?”

“A little. Her father belongs to those people who appear to believe that daughters must cost nothing at all, and ought to come into the world of an economical fashion, just like the lambs with their ready-made woollen garb on their backs. This notion operates most injuriously on the life and disposition of the girls. They can but seldom come into society, and when they are there, they conduct themselves like wild sheep.”

“I pity her sincerely, and wish from my heart that the father may alter his theory, or that the daughter may ennoble herself at home.”

“Amen! But see only, I beseech you, the Generalaska P., there in the blue satin dress. Have you ever beheld such a complexion, and such a figure, at full fifty years of age! And, notwithstanding, she has had many a care and many a trouble in life. Do you know what it is which, through all this, has preserved her so youthful and gay?”

“Yes, my most gracious lady, when one considers what it properly is which carries the majority of people through the world, one falls on the most whimsical ideas—”

“To the point, to the point; we will afterward think of the ideas. I now am impatient to learn the beauty-wash of the Generalaska P.”

“I tell you first what it is not, and then you will probably guess it yourself. It is not religion, nor philosophy—and, although she may be a thoroughly good and discreet woman, it is not the life of society—not domestic happiness, for I have these confessions from herself; now, tell me what it is.”

“If these questions related to a man I should answer—a good stomach; but as the subject is a lady, and one too of so fresh a skin, I say—a good sleep.”

“Quite right—excellent! that is it! But how acute you are. Yes, she sleeps so sound and fast, that in the morning she scarcely knows what occurred to her the evening before. A good sleep!—that is her whole philosophy. She is really a totally different kind of creature from Miss Edla, who amid all her dusty books, is not become a whit livelier or handsomer. Yes, her immeasurable pose—”

“Edla,” said Miss Greta with a tone which cut short jesting, “Edla is a person of whom I entertain the highest opinion; and she is also, when you talk with her alone, extremely agreeable.”

“Heavens! I have the very greatest love—; yes, seriously, I have sincere love and esteem for her. I am persuaded that she is an excellent person; I was merely observing how various the classes are.”

“And do you know that even the lovely Nina has had an unusually learned education. It is said that she studies mathematics, political economy, and—”

“God defend us! Yes, then I wonder no longer that the bud is so tender and fine. Who could become fat upon state economy! I am convinced that Miss Clara understands nothing of state economy; and I would wager that she will, after all, have more lovers than the beautiful Nina.”

“I must confess that I do not partake the taste of these lovers. I hold rather with Count Ludwig R., who encircles Nina with the majestic gyrations of the hawk.”

“Ah, yes, quite right, like the hawk, that is the true word. He is a cursedly able and practical man; but he has, in fact, something of the nature of the bird of prey. I would not willingly be his wife, spite of his wealth and high rank.”

“What are you talking about! Is he not universally acknowledged to be one of the most distinguished of men! I have always heard him spoken of as a model of perfection, which by the by—between ourselves—is my antipathy; partly because I have no faith in them, and partly because such model-shapes are commonly excessively wearisome. They say he is a man without a fault!”

“Ah, my most gracious! Perhaps he has nothing of those which the world in general term faults, but on the other hand so many failings that there is probably a whole ship-load of them. Between us be it said—he is a man without a heart, and his justice carries only a sword. But hark! how lively the conversation is. And the new couple have only eyes and ears for each other. One must confess it is very edifying. Wedlock, my gracious lady, is the most honourable institution, and a real heaven on earth. A good wife, as king David says, is more precious than gold and pearls.”

“Perhaps David has said it too,” replied Miss Greta, who was quite at home in her Bible, “but I know to a certainty that king Solomon has.”

“Very true! pere et fils say commonly the same thing, which testifies to the wisdom of both. But I assure you, my gracious one, that my future wife shall never rue the day on which she takes me for a husband. No one will more highly esteem her, no one be more zealous to meet her wishes than I.”

"I believe you, my best Baron; but wherefore do you not prove that by the deed?"

"My gracious young lady, why did you, ten years ago, just as I was about to follow your advice, give me a basket?"

Miss Greta was somewhat embarrassed, but collected herself and proceeded calmly.

"I am curious to hear, how as a married man you could pass your time."

"You are quite too good; but I honestly confess that I have not yet settled anything positively on this head. I mean to write for the advice of my wife on it. The only thing which floats distinctly before me is, that we shall begin our days with getting up, and conclude them by going to bed."

"Well," said Miss Greta, "that sounds, at least, new, and is by no means trivial. I wish you luck, Baron, of these new and very original ideas! According to these fundamental principles I cannot doubt but that your married life will be pre-eminently happy; especially—" Miss Greta hesitated.

"Well, especially?" demanded the Baron, full of curiosity.

"Especially for your wife, as your house is already blessed with a FILIA," continued Miss Greta with a sarcastic look and tone.

The word had the singular effect of throwing the Baron into obvious embarrassment, and he answered with a degree of excitement—

"Quite right, quite right! and if she be not satisfied with that, I can also be satisfied without her."

Miss Greta looked a little offended. The Baron arose, and betook himself to a yawning group.

But, my dear reader, I fear that thou also yawnest and hast found thyself ennuyé; but in every-day life this is now and then not to be avoided. Sometimes, however, one can exert extraordinary means against this, and free oneself from it by force. On thy account, my dear reader, whom I am only too anxious to keep in good humour, I will now exercise one of my magic arts—I break up the company, put out the lights, terminate the wedding, and send everybody to bed.

And now it is night! Sleep with its soft wing touches the eyes of men, and their souls dream themselves away into the land of wonders. The lawyer forgets his suits, the labourer the toils of the day, the man of the world the tedium of his festivities, the unfortunate the occasion of his tears; all through thee, sweet blessing, rich sleep! But if thou findest eyes which thou canst not close, which pain and care keep open and fixed till the very brain becomes numbed and the heart bleeds—oh then, go gentle sweet sleep! and beseech thy pale brother to come, for he is the true physician.

Perhaps, my reader, thou thinkest that I, on this flight which has led me so far from my aim, have myself fallen into sleep and dreams. In order, therefore, to testify that it is not so, I will immediately commence a new chapter.

CHAPTER IV.

EDLA.

MANY are younger in heart and in enjoyment of life at forty than at twenty years of age; so was it with Edla. Her bearing, however, carried rather the stamp of repose and firmness than of what might be called the pleasures of life. Her glance was still and penetrating; no one attempted to explore its depths. One felt that the soul which spoke out of it had fought its way to peace; that it lay not in indolent ease, but went seeking and inquiring after the reality of life. Yes; Edla had indeed combated! traces of deep suffering, not to be mistaken, lay in her countenance and in the half-suppressed sighs which often heaved her bosom. But this might have been as it would; now all was overcome, tranquilized, and reconciled—all was become good. In silence had she wrestled and endured. No one could relate her agonies; she herself did it least of all.

We left Edla fourteen years ago, as she made her first acquaintance with a more fundamental accomplishment. She pursued this path with earnestness and zeal. She thirsted after knowledge and truth. Her glance was directed with an earnest inquiry up toward heaven, or downward into the depths of science and of her own heart; thus she lived still, happy days! and her soul filled itself with the most cheering hopes. Then was her solitary, speculative life suddenly disturbed. Her little sister Mina died, and Nina fell into a sickly wasting away, not unusual in a twin which is suddenly deprived of the sister soul, the half of its own life. Edla saved her from death; and from this moment forward a profound sympathy for the tender creature engrossed her whole heart. She called her her child, and would not allow her to be any more taken away from her. Mamselle Rönquist had left the President's house, and followed Adelaide. Nina therefore was left to the sole care of Edla, and Edla became her mother. She divided her time betwixt her, her father, and her books.

Live books for ever! But who becomes through books alone wise! What does the man when the thirst for knowledge seizes him! In his youthful years he betakes himself to the university, attends learned lectures, and lays the foundation of all knowledge. He reads, he smokes, he scratches his head—one does not believe that this last operation contributes to the development of ideas. He disputes with his comrades—an excellent exercise for reason and the lungs. Life, motion, emulation, leagues of friendship, great teachers, early helps to any science, yes, the very academical atmosphere which he breathes—all these contribute to ennoble his feelings, to nourish his ideas, and to advance him to "ΜΑΓΙΣΤΕΡ." Is the laurel garland won, and the thirst of knowledge still strong as ever, he has, in order to compose him, a mighty flagon—the world! On the summit of Mont Blanc, he can explore the mysterious regions of the stars; in the depths of Golconda's mines, he can dig gold; can sail with Captain Ross round the North Pole; and on the coast of Terra del Fuego admire the setting sun; can read in Iceland the Runic inscriptions, and in India Sanscrit; can explore the ruins of Asia, and the new States of America. The palaces of kings and the dark abodes of criminals stand open to him; to the study of the learned he has free ingress. Fortunate fellow! ought he not to know everything in the world!

Edla was two-and-twenty years old before she learned to think and work with the very slightest degree of method at any season whatever. An unsatisfactory, empty, and patchwork time lay behind her, and therefore—honor and success to the philanthropic principles of the present time, especially in regard to the education of woman! For dear, sagacious reader, who can avoid observing how different, how unlike it now stands with the opportunities, as well as the means, of acquiring solid knowledge? There is no need for me to point out the difference; it stands forward of itself before our eyes. Perhaps it does, perhaps it must be so—I don't know; but it has often seemed to me as if Nature had given thereto her peculiar, her silent confirmation; and if it be so, then good and wise mother, thy daughter will willingly follow thee, and thou wilt probably draw her closer to thy own bosom. Certain it is, that Edla perceived most perfectly the fetters which were laid upon her aspiring spirit; and to these was added this change just mentioned. She looked at her father—he had now, more than ever, need of her; she contemplated the child which she had awoke from death, and she did what so many before her had done, and so many will do after her—she resigned herself. And this sacrifice of the development of her mind and heart—perhaps the greatest which man can make—this she accomplished after a short struggle, stepped forth from her solitude, and joined herself quietly and kindly to the family circle.

Perhaps Edla's sacrifice was less great than she herself felt it. I have already said that we do not become wise through books alone. No! not through books, not through travel, not through clever people, not through the whole world, if we do not carry in ourselves the slumbering power which calls forth out of all the individual parts the harmonious shape; or, to speak more simply, when we do not understand how to unite the end with the sensible deed. But this activity was to Edla the beautiful gift of God; and if we are disposed still to charge her with a certain one-sided view of the world, let us recollect the circumstances under which she first learned to know the world and life. The impressions of her youth, the bent of her character and mind, had led her with the most fervent love to the earliest philosophical doctrines of the human race. They penetrated deep into her soul, because they were in accordance with its most secret impulses. Nothing had Edla discovered so profound, so true, as the might of destiny, as that inexorable must, beneath whose iron yoke mortal man must bow, murmuring or willing, resisting or complying, it muttered not—she must! This impression remained with her, but by degrees assumed a different tone in her soul. She felt still that external must; but still more strongly felt she the inward power which, as it were, in opposition to the first, develops our proper life, and shapes the heavy stone which weighs on humanity into a step, whence it ascends to the eternal liberty of heaven. She felt that man, like Prometheus bound to the crag, although with a lacerated heart, can yet bid defiance to the power of this world, and from the beginning to the end of this phantasmagoria rial scene can caduce and resolve, still vigorous and unwearable. Edla, indeed, remained the same, and became at the same time different; for she had been strong during the trial, and she was now strong in resignation. Complaint, bitterness, and distrust, departed from her breast. She bowed herself while she kissed the mercifully severe hand which, amid wild tempests, calls forth the imperishable flower of virtue. This became to her the loveliest blossom of humanity and of the whole universe. It wound itself with beautifying effect around every creature; the storms of fate tossed rudely its chalice, but served only to promote its fullest expansion; it turned itself, as the sunflower toward the sun, above to God. Strength, capacity of self-denial, equanimity and repose amid the occurrences of life, purity of heart and of the thoughts which arose to God—these Edla sought after, and found. Of the sacred doctrines of the Gospel, those chiefly acquired a living power in her heart which more especially favored this bias: and her view of the world led her to regard man as ordained, before all things, to contest and self-denial. But this view of the world was clear and cheerful; the laurel of victory succeed the trial, and the crown of thorns became the crown of glory. She traveled with rejoicing the path of necessity, and fulfilled her duties from the bottom of her heart. Was this path disagreeable and wearisome, she regarded it not. She continued immovable, and went with firm steps toward the great day of change, in which the soul, freed from sin and the burden of earth, ascends to the everlasting light, to the origin of all life and all love.

But now, how came it that she, endowed with this strength and this inward peace, was not more agreeable to others?

Others, yes, if there were no others, one might truly be more at peace with one's self—only that it is difficult to say what one then properly should be. Edla had now reached the years in which the soul renders itself most independent of the body; in which external beauty or ugliness are of no farther importance, and only in a subordinate degree affect the weal and woe of existence. For Edla this feeling was more influential than for many others; but her youthful days had left behind them too deep traces in her soul, and the clouds which lay upon the morning of her days threw long and broad shadows over her whole life. She had still always a great mistrust of the impression which she made upon others. She was too firmly persuaded that she could not please; she feared even that she never would be beloved, as she deemed her exterior, her person, her disposition, to be too repulsive. This persuasion, some pride, the fear of being wearisome; but still more, that of exciting even in amiable, good men, one disagreeable feeling, all this made her something shy toward her fellow-creatures. But in this she did herself injustice, for among those of her nearer acquaintance there were few who were more amiable than herself; and even in the most splendid social circles there are always many who forget the shell in attention to the kernel. But this very reservedness injured her; people feared her because they could not love her. In company on all occasions she was silent, and thus she continued a stranger to all. Ah, friendly reader! if this be our case, if we are sufficiently sensible of it, "IS IT NOT THEN BETTER TO CONTINUE SOLITARY?"

Happy are they who do so with joy; happy are they who find therein their happiness. It was thus with Edla. Her aspiring soul soared above enjoyments and joys away to a higher home. She found it in the stars, with whose courses she was familiar; she found it in the sacred groves of philosophy. From hence she saw light spread itself over the world; from hence she drew peace with it and with herself. It is true that Edla lived rather in the ideal than in the actual world. She resembled rather the bird of paradise which hovers about the earth, than the nightingale which builds its nest close to its bosom and sings. The consequence of this was, that she knew men better than humanity; the Heaven better than the earth. Above all things loved she the truth; merit she knew how to value, and errors to pardon; but from all effeminacy and laxity, from all egotism and bitterness, she turned with repugnance. And yet was Edla mild; I have known no one—one man excepted—who was as mild as she. She was severe against weaknesses, but she prejudged them not; she was angry with the thing, but not the person. Only toward herself was Edla severe, and besides herself toward one other creature—and this was the child of her care—the darling of her heart—Nina. Nina must not be weak; she must do involuntarily the good and the right, since she had not, like so many, the excuse of a weak and neglected education. Nina was nourished with the very milk of reason. Nina must not totter and waver in the path of virtue; and therefore was Edla strict with her, and therefore did she love her more than herself. Distrustful as she was of the regard of others, she had yet had confidence in Nina's love. And how could it be otherwise? Had not Edla given to her all her heart and her acquirements? And Nina's child-like acquiescence, the necessity of being always with her, her trustful confidence in her guidance, did not these afford the most beautiful testimony of it? The feeling of being so intimately united to so gentle and amiable a being brought many an earthly delight into her transcendental existence. All the ideal beauty which Edla in her loftiest visions fashioned forth, she saw, as it were, realized in Nina. And this was in part her own work. When she afterward beheld Nina so fascinating and enchanting, she was tempted to worship her own creation, and experience all the weaknesses of a mother. But she strove against this weakness, and conquered it. She possessed that deep and powerful love which nourishes its object with its blood to the last drop, and which had rather see the beloved one bleed and perish, than sink and lose itself.

So much for Edla. Now a word upon the favourite.

CHAPTER V.

NINA.

GAZE into a pure fountain in the moment in which day divides itself from night; see the magic light of morning at once mirroring itself

therein with the heaven and its glittering stars, and thou hast an image of Nina's soul. So pure was she—so gleamed in the depths of her being every eternal truth. But all this sweet splendor broke as through a twilight; it was a foretelling of light, not the light itself. She was the original man—as man in his innocence—in his first holy beauty. Her soul seemed to be one with the beautiful body; it belonged to it, and appeared molten into it. Her manner possessed that charming repose which nothing of self-consciousness can counterfeit. Unconstrained but modest, she was still self-collected. It gave a sweet tranquillity to the mind and to the eye to contemplate her. How beautiful and harmonious were the movements of her tender arm, of her fine white hand; her gait how floating, how quiet and noble! It would be difficult to give a description of the beauty and charm of her countenance; but he who had seen the pure finely-arched brow made radiant, silken-soft hair, the wonderful eyes beneath their long dark lashes, the small Grecian nose, the bewitching mouth, the sweet oval of the face, and the dazzling fair skin—must have declared with Miss Greta, that she was the loveliest creature of God's creation. Her eyes had the same form as those of her sister Adelaide, but with a much less lively glance. Over Nina's dark blue eyes lay, as it were, a mist, a moist twilight, whose magic was indescribable. Something pensive, something dreamy, lay in her glance. No clear day, no gay life, spoke out of it; but something foreboding, something of an inward emotion. When she listened to the words of another, she had the most amiable expression of present sympathy, and when she answered in her own manner, rather slowly, but in the most delicious tones of voice, one learned then to estimate one of the most beautiful, but commonly most neglected, of God's gifts to man.

All the world talks now-a-days of education, and wherefore should not I? that is, of Nina's. She had been a child, and was now a blooming maiden, and had read few of the so-called children's books, and no romances at all, neither those of Madame Genlis, nor of La Fontaine. She did not therefore live in the error that every good deed, every virtuous action, immediately received the highest reward here below. She had not been taught that in the fulfilment of the most ordinary Christian duties, a lover would be peeping through a crack of the door, or listening at the key-hole, and must become enraptured at the sight. She thought little on the "qu'en dira-t-on?" since neither by romances nor by the gossip of the day was she led into the habit of living according to the thoughts and opinions of others. She had not studied men on the petty theatre of social life. On the contrary, she had early contemplated them on the great stage of the world. In her youngest years, Edla had made her familiar with the great and beautiful characters of history, with the sublime doctrines of the wise. She feared not to allow Nina to behold the naked actuality of life; but she showed it to her in a higher light, and from more commanding points of view. She permitted her to behold virtue suffering, the wise rejected and contemned; she displayed to her life in all its greatness and all its bitterness. She desired that Nina should make her acquaintance of virtue without selfish motives; and she came actually to love virtue on account of its beauty; and as her mind was constantly occupied with truth and excellence, she herself became true and excellent. Edla thought—"I will make her at home on the heights of humanity; I will strengthen her gaze through purity and clearness, so that when she descends into the ordinary world, her eyes may not be dazzled with earthly splendor, nor her soul become fettered with paltry bands. She shall stand in the world as a high and better creature: she shall not degrade herself to the little and the common, but shall draw them up toward herself; she shall ennoble everything which surrounds her. She shall become happy through the felicity which belongs to the noble man—that is, that which consists in belonging to himself, and in being exalted above every earthly trouble, in preserving peace, freedom, and strength, in life as in death, and in striving only after the eternal."

In the same manner Edla sought to cultivate Nina's sense of beauty. She early learned to know the most beautiful and noble in form and tone; but Edla led her rather to plastic art than to music, whose exciting tones seized all too keenly on her feelings, and she was frequently seen sketching the head of a Muse or a Jupiter, a Holy Mary, or a still enduring Christ. But no Ariadne in tears, no Hercules in the madness of pain, was a subject of her pencil. Everything effeminate, passionate—everything which displayed the confusion of the soul and of human reason, Edla kept at a distance, as unworthy of her. She wished to develop in Nina reason rather than fancy—exactly the reverse of that which is usually done; she desired to call forth and to confirm her strength, ere yet she made acquaintance with the shattering agitations of feeling. For this reason she banished from the presence of Nina all disquiet, everything passionate. She prescribed to herself quiet and self-command; and, in order to moderate the excessive softness and excitability of her sister's character, she even put under restraint the tenderness which she felt for this beloved being; yes, she even discouraged the innocent caresses of the child, and never responded to them. Perhaps Edla might have another reason for this, of which the following circumstance may afford us a hint.

One day Edla's friend, Professor A., was with her. The little nine-year-old Nina drew close to her, and sought to stretch up to her her charming little mouth. Edla put by this caress to the evident trouble of the little one.

"How can you so restrain yourself, as not to kiss the rose?" asked softly the Professor.

"Shall she inherit this?" answered Edla, as she showed her own constantly cracked and wounded lip.

Oh, had Edla but completed what she began! Had not the weakness, the impropriety of another—but we will not anticipate. We have already said how Nina, through the teaching and example of Edla, acquired so much power over herself, as to conquer her natural indolence; how she learned diligence of Edla; and notwithstanding this, how she was frequently seized with a dreaming melancholy mood, which was so much the more disquieting to Edla, because it was in immediate connection with the extreme delicacy of her health—we have therefore for the present said enough. Nina's soul was like a temple in which the worship of the divinity is not yet commenced; a world in which no sun has yet arisen. Warmth, this higher life, was yet wanting.

But some will think, what then said the President to so little a creature receiving so hurried an education?

CHAPTER VI.

THE PRESIDENT.

THE President was converted by Edla; and through her had arrived at the conviction, that a higher, intellectual accomplishment only rendered a wife more agreeable and happy in her own house. Since Edla had given up her earlier speculative life, she had laid upon herself the duty of making the old age of her father joyful; for his sake she found it easy completely to change her serious taciturn nature. With him she was lively and talkative, and she performed this task so beautifully, that the old gentleman found himself almost more comfortable in his house, than in the time of his late Frederica. By degrees he acquired an actual tenderness for his loving daughter, and a confidence so entire in her, that he gave her not only perfect freedom in the arrangement of household affairs, but also seconded her in the education of the little Nina. The President hoped through this to obtain in the younger daughter, a child as observant and tender as the elder one was, and so everything went on admirably till the President had the affair with little Cupid, and began to talk of the grave, in order to step over to a wedding.

I have now the greatest desire, dear reader, after the lapse of fourteen years, to cast a glance at Adelaide. Before all things must I mention their eight children; all extraordinarily pretty, good, and joyous, as the mother. She had nursed them all herself, attended on them, and played with them; from her they learned to love the sun, gladness, and God, and to reckon on papa Alarik as on a gospel. Count Alarik lived only for his wife, whom he adored—for his children, whom he assisted to educate—for his people, whom he made happy. The mother gave them gentleness and gladness of heart, from the father they learned history, and many other good things. Mamselle Rönquist instructed the three daughters in French and English. None could compare with Nina; but they promised to be good and merry, and to pass happily through the world. Adelaide devoted very much time to her children; yet she continued for many others "a song of joy," indispensable at all festivities; and wherever her kind, fair countenance showed itself, under lowly roof or in lofty castle, by the song of mourning or the marriage hymn, there was she greeted as a messenger of heaven sent forth with consolation and joy. She was still the swan of whiteness, freshness, slenderness, and grace, and the happiness of her home was the living well in which she bathed her wings.

Of Alarik and Adelaide it might be said with Job: "They increase in goods. Their seed is established in their sight with them, and their offspring before their eyes. Their house is safe from fear, neither is the rod of God upon them. They send forth their little ones like a flock, and their children dance. They take the timbrel and harp, and rejoice at the sound of the organ. They spend their days in wealth, and in a moment go down to the grave."

In a word, they belonged to the fortunate of this earth. I have seen many such; but have also beheld with wonder the dispensations of this world. "For another dies in the bitterness of his soul, and hath never eaten with pleasure."

But—"Who shall teach God?"

CHAPTER VII.

AND ANGELICA?

So asked many, as the Countess M., after an absence of two years, returned from Rome without her.

Rare are they on earth who live out their whole life, and fully perfect their powers, so that they are able in continually holier forms to bring forth the treasures which lie in their souls. They are the heroes of life's drama, the great geniuses of the earth.

But life has also voiceless geniuses. They think deeply, they feel most fervently; but they had no words to give back those divine images which their eye and ear daily drink in. They pass by without being understood; like silent shadows they hasten away. Let us look on them with pity and reverence, for they are the most unhappy among the children of the earth. But we know that an angel will hereafter loosen their tongues.

There are also beings who live only a moment; but to whom is given the blessed gift, through a deed or word, long to live in the memory of mankind. These also are rare on earth. Their life is rich, but short; a dithyrambic sung in the temple of immortality.

Angelica belonged to these last. Her fiery soul speedily consumed the earthly material, and the unremitting diligence with which she laboured in Rome exhausted her strength before its time. She died, with the pencil in her hand, while she was engaged in giving the last touches to the portrait of an angel who comes with a heavenly greeting to Mary. She departed to approach nearer to the original forms of that beauty which she had imagined and adorned on earth.

This painting, her farewell remembrance to the world, is in the possession of the Countess M. No one contemplates it without deep emotion. Especially can no wife gaze on Mary without saying with her from a humble heart—"Behold I am the handmaid of the Lord!" No one sees the picture without faith in a higher parity and glory. A beam of heaven rests upon it, and lifts the soul on high. Angelica lived not in vain.

And who that has striven ardently, and laboured honestly, has lived in vain? If it be only for a brief morning hour! He works out no whole, but the spark which proceeds from him warms and enlightens the night of many a mortal. He has prepared the work for others, and this also is good and gratifying.

Our little life, how soon it is past! Let us become useful to each other, and it will be immortal even upon earth!

And the tender Otto? and the wicked Countess Augusta? and the lively Baroness? and his Excellence her husband! They are all, each and every, dead of the cholera.

CHAPTER VIII.

FASHIONABLE LIFE.

Drink! they fly, the foaming pearl-drops—drink!
FRANZEN.

To what shall I compare fashionable life, this rushing life of feast and splendor, of sport and laughter, out of which seriousness, tears, and sighs, are banished; this life which prevails in all great cities, which draws all into the vortex—to what shall I compare it? To the foam of life's flagon. It streams up from inexhaustible fountains; the foamy pearls whirl, and win, and vanish; fresh ones rise to the surface; in the flagon's depth there lives a ceaseless hiss and bubble. One must drink the champagne in full draught, not sip it lightly. But it is always the same in the great tavern of the world. Many a noble life, many a happy fortune, goes down in this eddying element; but at the same time, many a sigh, many an agony, many a spasm of pain, dissolves itself therein. Everything has its good—at least for the moment.

"Drink! they fly, the foaming pearl-drops—drink!" Many men cannot exist out of this social element, although they now and then draw a deep breath, and sigh from their hearts—edifying strain—"How lovely is nature! How glorious the exercise of Christian duties! Without seriousness and repose there is no true joy to be found: man must live for heaven!" And after this tribute of feeling then fly to new pleasures and amusements, and dissipate themselves in all imaginable ways.

The Countess M., now Countess H., was one of those worldly natures. Her attachment to Angelica was only one of these breathings out of the customary element of life, to which long before Angelica's death she had returned. She loved the life of the great world, of which, by her beauty and fine tone, she was an ornament. Her large estate gave her all the means of entering with à la. She moved in it with the ease of a fish in water, as though in its own element, and floated as agreeably on the surface as this in the depths of the stream of life. She wrote and received a morning probably twenty notes; she patronized artists and authors, and accepted the dedication of their works. She belonged to all the art-unions and benevolent societies; and loved to intrigue, to recommend, to play a part, to make herself important, to become admired and worshipped, and all this with much success; especially successful was she with those who did not contemplate her too closely. Soon after her marriage she opened her house in the most splendid style; collected around her the most distinguished persons which the city had to offer for talent, rank, and beauty; kept every day open house; arranged living pictures, plays, concerts, declamations, lectures; played everywhere the first and most brilliant rôle, and suffered herself modestly to be styled the CORINNA OF THE NORTH.

And now, my beloved reader, thou probably art imagining that I shall conduct thee smoothly right on in my story, as we drive finally into the hall-court, after having been jolted on the rough country road, and seat ourselves at the well-filled table. Nothing of the kind! The passion for running hither and thither, and ever backward, has for once seized me, and so fall we into a fresh episode; and then—yes, heaven knows what—"and then" will come. Follow me now he that likes it. I betake me to Miss Greta.

Now to what shall I compare Miss Greta? I find no image more applicable to her than a mineral spring. Impetuous and peculiar, fresh and sparkling, and as it were, ferruginous, she contemplated life and men with a glance satirical and yet good-humored, and a friendly smile at the follies of the world lay on her fine lips. This view of society, which she expressed without the slightest bitterness in her manner, was irresistible, and so entertaining that a man must be very phlegmatic, or very unhappy, who did not—at least for the moment—become cheerful and communicative through it. A harmless, cheerful laughter is certainly the most effectual means of reconciling one to life and mankind. This was it which Miss Greta well understood. In profound reliance on the wise ordinations of God, she was thoroughly persuaded that the best aim of men is to amuse themselves as much as possible in this world, that is, so far as is in accordance with the ten commandments and social propriety. Rich and independent, she yet continued unmarried, because, amid the many who had offered themselves, she had found none who could promise her a higher happiness, or a more agreeable life than that which, as a free and independent lady, she now enjoyed. She lived much in the great world, not because she really preferred it, but because her lively, critical humor here found rich material; and this very humorous disposition it was, which made her so much sought after, as the unimpeachable excellence of her character and her sound sense won for her universal love and respect. A sworn foe of every exaltation, she lent her most zealous endeavors to reduce all chords that she found too highly stretched, to a lower tone; and it is not to be denied that here she might easily fall sometimes into a too severe judgment, since, from the kindness and warmth of her own amiable heart, she had not yet had occasion to learn other of its movements, for she had not yet found herself in circumstances of deep passion. She was lady-like, but not haughty, and had a natural respect for every independent person, so that at the same time he did not make too familiar approaches to "Her Grace." She cherished a hearty contempt for all insignificance, and still more for stupidity. Insolent assurance she abominated to perfect hatred, and chastised it where she could. As she was herself secure and quiet in her wishes and sentiments, she had very little desire to witness the intrigues, strivings, pretensions, and complaints of others; though she probably was not quite indifferent to the influence which she exercised on all with whom she came in contact. She was not always mild, not always just; but she operated, as we have said, inexpressibly beneficially on the minds of those around her; and where she appeared, there grew involuntarily a fresher tone, a better condition in the exterior, and higher vivacity in the inner life of society. I have often thought that if one could but multiply Miss Greta a hundred thousand times, the world certainly would need only the half of its hospitals, its lunatic asylums, and its medicinal springs.

The house of the Countess H. was splendid and agreeable. Miss Greta had always been much with her cousin, without particularly liking her, but she pleased the Countess extremely, and she could not herself remain perfectly insensible to the charm which she diffused around her. Yet Miss Greta did not now feel herself quite so much at home in her house as formerly. With Edla she did not feel herself at all on an agreeable footing. They displayed toward each other the most punctilious politeness, and there it ended. Edla withdrew herself almost entirely out of the social circle of the Countess. As to Nina, she was for Miss Greta, according to her own expression, "too little a creature of this world." She found her beautiful, but disapproved of the homage with which the Countess treated her, and thereby seemed to undervalue older friends. This little pique, however, was the cause that she did not do Nina full justice, and occasioned her to find nothing in her to admire beyond her beauty.

Another person of this house was to Miss Greta a regular bore. This was the young lady whom the Countess had taken under her protection, and who was styled by Miss Greta—"the silent Clara," but, however, as her manner justified the cognomen, she might with still greater propriety have been termed "the industrious Clara." Eternally occupied with sewing, or with an eminently beautiful piece of embroidery, she appeared to have no other interest in the world than the finishing of this, and appeared, deprived of her sewing apparatus, to be suffering the most dreadful ennuye. She noticed nobody, and never inquired whether any one noticed her, so that she could but sew. When others contended, and most vehemently took one or other side of a question, she sat still and sewed. When all was life and motion with social enjoyment and talking, Clara still sat silent and sewed. When others yawned, vexed or hurt themselves, Clara sat still and sewed. Some one spoke to her; she looked up, answered politely, but as briefly as possible, looked down again, and—sewed. This tried Miss Greta's patience beyond all expression. Add to this, Clara had adopted a catalogue of certain words, which appeared to comprehend her whole stock of language, and which she, when required, and as Miss Greta concluded, when not required, put into use. They were such as these—"that may be"—"what signifies it?"—"don't trouble yourself!"—"pray be seated!"—"that does no harm!"—"pray desist," and the like. Especially often was heard a certain indifferent, "Oh, indeed!" which threw Miss Greta into actual desperation. She herself possessed, in the best sense of the word, the most beautiful quiet of the soul; and, amid the widely unsettledness of mind, valued herself a little upon it; but this quiet, this indifference, was a caricature of hers; was at once irritating and incomprehensible to her. But what vexed her most of all was, that Clara, spite of her laconisms and sewing apparatus, had a sort of fascination for her, which she was not able to resist. This partly lay in the physical enigma, which excited her curiosity—how a person with reason, understanding, and all her senses, with flesh and bone, could be touched by nothing in the world which interested everybody else, and could be made sensible to no impression. Partly, however, this lay in Clara's disposition—something which irresistibly reminded Miss Greta of Baron H's expression—"holy;" something so simple, so true, so—Miss Greta knew not herself what; but it continued irresistible for her, and drove her attention constantly again to an object, to which she at the same time maintained a steady secret pique.

Clara was not handsome, but one could by no means call her plain. Her somewhat dark complexion made her at the first glance appear plain; but when one observed her more closely, one then saw that her skin was fine, clear, and transparent. If she ever felt herself touched with a lively feeling, a phenomenon which Miss Greta had not yet witnessed, there rose into her countenance a dark purple glow which gave to it a strange charm, and the light-brown eyes raised themselves slowly under the finely cut eyelids, and beamed with radiant gentleness and kindness.

One day Miss Greta resolved, for once, to try a little more clearly what was the real state of Clara's intellectual faculties. She gave herself much trouble to make herself appear amusing and amiable to her, and gave free scope to all her wit and her good humor. Clara listened to her droll remarks with a quiet smile, and—sewed; she answered her questions politely, but briefly, and—sewed; by degrees she seemed to listen only by halves, and answered quite from the mark; finally, came an ill-timed "Oh! indeed!" and Miss Greta's patience snapped. She was seriously angry; stood hastily up, and vowed that she would never again set herself to the attempt of enlivening so cold and uncourteous a person.

From this moment Miss Greta and Clara stood to a certain degree in a hostile attitude, in which the former did not always show herself particularly gentle. There were many things which Miss Greta found requisite, which Clara on the contrary considered as totally unnecessary. As if to provoke Clara, Miss Greta now frequently occasioned certain disquiets and manifold interruptions, on which occasions Clara took refuge in her accustomed "Pray be quiet." Let this be expressed as mildly as possible, it nevertheless always vexed Miss Greta uncommonly, and she replied on one occasion with considerable warmth—"Dear Clara, I am really too old to be made quiet in this manner; you would do much better to edify yourself with your wise exhortations." Such bickerings often recurred; yet Miss Greta's ill humor operated less depressingly on Clara than a single cold look of the Countess's. I will not withhold from my dear reader the following profound remarks on this.

In many a contention lies the seeds of a warm friendship, or many a social agreement is properly only an evidence that we have nothing to say to one another. Indifference will neither quarrel nor kiss.

The silent Clara had three wild brothers: one was a lawyer, the second a naval lieutenant, the third a land officer. The wild-brothers loved the silent Clara from their hearts, and desired nothing so much as to see her married. They looked about on all sides for a good husband for her—before all things for a rich husband, who might take the poor brothers-in-law under his fostering care. They perpetually besieged her with inquiries whether no lover had yet announced himself; whether she dressed well; whether she had put herself forward properly. With the most well-meant views they tormented her continually.

The Countess was not less anxious than the three brothers to make a good match for Clara. She held it as a matter of conscience, and, moreover, would gladly have the threads of a love-story in hand. Clara answered the brothers kindly and evasively, and arranged her toilette as hute as possible after the prescriptions of the Countess. Miss Greta wished all possible earthly success to the exertions of the Countess and the brothers; she, in fact, had taken a little hatred to the incomprehensible Clara, and longed for the day in which this insensible wall should no longer spoil the prospect of the house.

The lovers indeed appeared, and that quickly, and to their hearts' content. Baron H. next showed his attentions, which every one noticed and interpreted, except Clara herself.

Baron H., during the time that we had lost sight of him, accomplished himself in a very unexpected and peculiar manner. We have already said that he was not in possession of a wife. Nevertheless he had—people knew not how—found a son, a charming, pretty boy, whom he named Filius. Leo was his baptismal name. From whom he derived his surname, who he was, whence he came, nobody knew, and it was impossible to obtain from Baron H. the slightest explanation. He only said that Filius was a foundling, and cut short all further information about him. This very mystery, in the mean time, and certain half suppositions which were in circulation on the subject, awoke in Miss Greta a feeling of displeasure not only against the Baron himself, but also against this little somewhat wilful Filius, whose fine countenance and charming complexion did not, in Miss Greta's opinion, authorize him to follow the Baron anywhere, and to receive an education such as the Baron could only desire for his own son. Baron H. had an affection for the boy which bordered on weakness, and did not allow himself to be in the least disturbed by the queries and remarks of Miss Greta; he answered her either not at all, or with the best humor in the world. Miss Greta by this felt herself wounded both in her feelings and her curiosity. On this account she regarded the little Filius with ungracious eyes, whence he had very little to thank her for. On the contrary, he attached himself gladly to Nina, and obeyed her slightest hint. He was called Nina's little worshipper, and presented an example of the power which beauty exerts on the mind of a child.

One evening there was at the President's a great company. The Countess drew all eyes upon her, yes! even more than the lovely Nina. Clad in red velvet, with a gold embroidered turban on her proud head, she seated herself at her harp, and drew thence the most enchanting tones, while with great artistical skill she sang a bravura of Meyerbeer's. A wide circle of admirers stood round her: the President was among these, and was almost beside himself with rapture.

Baron H. drew near Clara, who, in a dark brown silk dress, with a double tulle pelerine on her graceful shoulders, formed as it were the shadow in this glittering assembly. The Baron seated himself in an easy chair by her. "A charming talent," said he, with cool commendation of the Countess's song.

Clara answered with as cool a "yes."

"You probably sing and play too?" asked the Baron with more interest.

"No," replied Clara quietly.

"Then I am convinced that you draw admirably."

"No, I have not the least talent," answered Clara in the selfsame tone.

"So! well, well, and why should you? The whole world has talents. All ladies sing, play, and draw just a little, as they say; and really they consume much precious time with these things, which might be much better employed. How much more proper were it if they qualified themselves for good housewives—learned to cook nicely. I am persuaded you are very clever in these matters?"

"No, I do not understand these either."

"Well, that can be learned, that can be learned," said the Baron consolingly. "One has a clever cook, and then—but you certainly understand how to set out a good dinner?"

"No!" answered Clara, "I can only eat."

"Well said!" thought some one not far off; and a hearty laugh which could no longer be repressed, betrayed Miss Greta as a listener to this discourse. Baron H. reddened, and cast a severe glance at Miss Greta, which she, however, confident of speedy forgiveness, stood firmly; for, spite of all dissonance, there prevailed between Baron H. and Miss Greta an indestructible sympathy, which drew them irresistibly together. Both had need of entertainment, and both found this need never better satisfied than in each other's society.

But Clara's "No!" did not better the Baron; on the contrary, he appeared to take a continually growing interest in the silent being, and sought to make her acquainted with the talents of the little Filius. The boy had a not inconsiderable capacity for drawing, in which he chiefly exercised himself with coal or chalk, and for which Miss Greta would most willingly have rapped his knuckles; but Baron H. prophesied from it a new Michel Angelo. It was not to be denied that he had an extraordinary degree of talent. After the true manner of artists he saw everywhere only means and appliances for his art. Thence arose the disagreeable circumstance, that one often encountered eyes and noses where one least expected to find them. In vain Miss Greta purchased a whole volume of drawing-paper, and spread out the sheets in Filius's way. Filius aspired to the great even in space, and preferred infinitely sketching on floors and walls. Clara did all in her power to guard against the injurious consequences both to Filius and the walls, and the Baron, who dreaded nothing so much as that of laying the imagination of the young artist under obstructive bonds, was beyond words thankful to her for it. He was ever attentive to her, and made his court in the tenderest manner, while he presented to her the most beautiful flowers, which she could not refuse. The Countess already looked victorious and confident; the three wild brothers congratulated themselves on the brother-in-law so soon to be; and Miss Greta said, "Let what shall happen, happen quickly."

Then at once stepped forth a new wooer, a young merchant, who had earlier known and loved Clara in her father's house: but had not asked her hand, because he was then poor and dependent. Now by skill and diligence he had so far advanced himself, that he had purchased his house and garden, and wished to ask his long and truly loved one to share with him his new fortune. We call him Frederiks. He procured an introduction to the house of the President. His manner was a little awkward, but his heart was brave, and a certain fresh genial-spiritedness spoke out of his eyes. Baron H. regarded him somewhat "de haant en nas." Mr. Frederiks, on the contrary, gave right honest-heartedly on the Baron. Both surrounded Clara continually, but paid their attentions in very different ways. Baron H. seated himself by her, praised her work, her diligence, let his white hand with the diamond ring and the golden snuff-box manœuvre before her eyes, and from time to time offered, with much devotion, a pinch. He spoke excellently and with much vivacity of the happiness of a quiet friendly wedlock; made humorous remarks on life and man, in the course of which he did not omit to throw in many compliments to his listener, and twinkled knowingly his "very pretty eyes," as Miss Greta called them. Mr. Frederiks, on the contrary, fixed on Clara a whole battery of glances, was constantly on foot, and had a certain way of stamping and tripping round, which to the still maiden was inconceivably annoying.

He talked much of his arrangements; and jumbled all—equipage, brilliant houses, society, in short, all his plans, into the most motley medley. He wished his future wife to make the Countess her model. In the mean time neither of the lovers appeared to make an impression on Clara's heart. She continued completely herself, and treated one exactly like the other. She took no pinch out of the baron's box, noticed not his ring, made no reply to his liveliest conversations—but sewed. She answered not Mr. Frederiks' eye-language, looked not up at the description of his new chandelier, and if a sigh escaped, it was the consequence of his everlasting basting about. She avowed no impatience on this head; she avowed, in fact, nothing at all, but looked only on her work—and sewed. Miss Greta contemplated her with a secret bitterness, and wished her in Vanina's cabinet of wax-work.

"I begin actually to be staggered in my faith in my Bible," said Miss Greta; "it says there, that there is nothing new under the sun; and yet I am persuaded that the sun has never shone upon such a specimen of humanity as Clara."

The three wild brothers stormed from north and south upon the still sister. She should determine; she should hasten to make both herself and her brothers happy.

The lawyer took part with the Baron, whose rank and fine manners impressed him greatly. The naval lieutenant contended for Mr. Frederiks, "a rich man, a handsome man, and fundamentally so honourable a youth!"

They now learned with an astonishment and a horror that are not to be described, that the still sister would not marry at all, and had resolved to refuse both the lovers, if they did not, as she hoped, themselves withdraw from the coldness of her conduct. Clara had now heavy storms to sustain. The lawyer, who looked upon himself as the head of the family, read the sister long lectures on her duties; he painted the future in the most flaming colors, with pitch-black or glowing rose, according as he associated them with marrying or not marrying. The lieutenants were furiously angry, swore if Clara became an old maid they would never trouble themselves about her, and went in towering wrath away. After such scenes Clara commonly appeared with tears in her mild eyes; and yet had much harder conflicts to sustain. The Countess caused her to be summoned of a morning to her presence; made her long harangues, which, although extremely expressive and well-composed, yet appeared not to possess the smallest rhetorical charm for Clara. The Countess found much in her to blame. She made her observant of the obligations under which she lay to her benefactress, and preached morals out of Lehnberg and Bossuet. She dilated amply on all which under the most favorable circumstances she proposed to do for Clara. With especial emphasis she commanded her to assume a more decided behavior to one or the other of her admirers, so that he might take courage to declare himself; one should not, as hitherto, continue polite and indifferent to both, which resembled the conduct of a coquette, and might end in nothing. In short, she ran through a whole register of teachings and exhortations.

When Clara assured her that she had not the slightest intention of giving hope to either of the lovers, but rather wished with her whole heart that they would leave her in peace, and wholly forget her, the Countess declared this to be a silly and senseless subterfuge. As Clara now more strictly stated that she had no intention of marrying at all, the Countess became highly excited. She talked of ingratitude, and made Clara feel that she lived only through her beneficence. This struck deep and painfully into Clara's soul; and the cause which rendered her resolution so inflexible, must indeed have been very weighty, as they overcame the bitterness with which she was assailed. She remained steadfast, remained finally silent, and returned to her indifference and her sewing. The Countess, however, found it good to interrupt this latter activity as much as possible, and began to employ the silent Clara about the whole house in a multitude of ways. Clara betrayed no trace of ill-humor, performed all cheerfully and with alacrity, but in consequence sat up at night and sewed. In the mean time, her exterior evinced a dejection which, to a certain degree, operated refreshingly on Miss Greta, since she detected at least a trace of feeling, where she had imagined only obtuseness, and she very willingly allowed her a little trouble for the extreme vexation she had occasioned herself.

But ever blacker clouds gathered themselves round the poor Clara, and menaced her earthly welfare. The Countess considered her conduct so incomprehensible, that she began to entertain mistrust, and fell on the idea that Clara must have secret, perhaps unworthy motives for it. She was always prone to a certain system of espionage, the most unhappy of all systems which people can employ in their house; and this she would now avail herself of in Clara's case. She called Miss Greta even to a co-operation, but she answered abruptly, "She did not meddle with such matters."

The Countess now charged her maid to watch and spy out Clara's proceedings, and soon received cause for heavy suspicions. Once or twice in the week Clara was in the habit of going out wholly alone, without saying anything, and then returning as quietly and as little observed as possible. People also now began to take notice that the little gifts which she now and then received from her patroness were never worn by her. They reminded her of her necklaces, of her earrings—but Clara continued unadorned. She answered finally with tears in her eyes, that she was no longer in possession of them, but she refused to give further information respecting them. Upon these discoveries, the Countess built the most strange suspicions; communicated them to Miss Greta, and began to lay a heavy hand on Clara.

We have already intimated that the Countess with her great æsthetic accomplishment was yet destitute of the peculiar beauty of the heart—goodness; and we must add, that she could be hard and morally cruel toward those who fell under her displeasure, and to whom she in her own mind was not well affected. The necessity for her to be perpetually on the scene, to play perpetually a part, and everywhere to command, made her even to those who most sincerely admired her fine talents somewhat inconvenient, but far more so to those who did not understand how to please her and to secure her favor. Clara speedily felt the whole weight of a disposition which, under the most polished forms, yet knew how mercilessly to oppress. It was nothing that she became the lady's-maid as well as house-keeper to the Countess; that she must run from the dressing-room to the kitchen, from the kitchen to the dressing-room, in order to execute a thousand commands—this was really nothing! But that she never received a friendly look; that she was exposed to sharp words and angry mistrust, this was hard, this cost her heart heavy conflicts. But Clara bore all with unshakable patience, and availed herself of the first free moment to return with renewed zeal to her needle. Miss Greta knew, in fact, no longer whether she should, on account of this endurance, more admire or detest her. With deep displeasure she heard of her secret promenades, and feared that the cause of them might be less praiseworthy than her other and daily behavior.

CHAPTER IX.

THE INQUIRY.

That father and mother from death are freed,
Might I now with sore anguish upbraid them;
But God, our sole helper in time of need,
He best knows our hearts, and will aid them.

SWEDISH FOLK'S SONG.

It was a fresh autumn morning; one of those mornings whose clear inspiring air fills our hearts with new pleasures, and new hopes, and emboldens us to enterprise. This influence both of Clara's worshippers felt: they both arose with the very same thought, and issued forth with the same purpose. Slowly and dignifiedly as becomes the aristocratic, and with anxious care not to heat himself, strode forward the Baron H., one hand on his back, and the other on the golden knob of his cane. Quick and business-like as industry's self, and burdened with no excessive compulsion, hastened Mr. Frederiks toward the same goal, but by another and shorter way, so that he reached before the Baron the dwelling of his beloved.

The Countess was in her usual reception-room, amid a multitude of newly-arrived books. By the window sat the silent Clara—and sewed. Thither, after the first salutations, Mr. Frederiks steered, and laid before her short and bluntly his wish to make her his wife. With faltering voice, but decidedly and respectfully, she declined his offer, and the young man was already on the way to withdraw himself, greatly cast down, when the Countess arose and desired him not to be in too great a hurry, and at once to regard this affair as desperate. Clara would certainly bethink herself, would reconsider the matter, she said, and invited him to dinner on the following day. After a brief indecision, and a vain endeavor to read Clara's downcast eyes, Mr. Frederiks accepted the invitation and withdrew. The Countess threw a tolerably fierce look at Clara, and returned to her books. Now appeared Baron H., and the same scene was repeated, as well as Clara's negative answer: except with this difference, that Clara evinced a degree of sympathy, and Baron H. did not look particularly cast down—on the contrary, as the Countess begged him to have patience with a young maiden who did not know what she would have, and would certainly soon come to reason, he answered kindly, that he would certainly exert himself to the utmost not to take Clara at her word till she said, Yes. The Countess invited him thereupon to dinner a day later than Mr. Frederiks, hoping by that time to wring from the foolish Clara a decision.

To Clara's great relief, the Countess was the rest of the day from home. It was not till evening that she returned from a dinner at the castle;

Miss Greta entered at the same moment to spend the evening with her, and the command was immediately sent to poor Clara to present herself in the Countess's bedroom. Clara felt at this message an extraordinary anxiety, and her knees trembled as she passed through the ante-room of the Countess. During the long harangues which the Countess had made her, and at which for the most part she had played a silent part, she had had the habit of pushing to and fro a little gold ring which she wore on her finger. Miss Greta had frequently noticed this uniform manœuvre with silent vexation, and was curious to see whether in this decisive moment it would be repeated. She seated herself at her ease in the cousine in the proper direction, took up the "Memoirs of the Duchess of Abrantes," prepared herself to fix all her attention on Clara, on the words and movements of this "wooden doll!" Miss Greta had found Clara so indescribably tedious and disagreeable, that she had called her "a heavy creature with a hateful mystery-mongery;" so that it is difficult to conceive what great interest she could take in the examination now at hand. She did not account for it to herself; but it is certain that this interest had risen to the highest pitch, and she awaited Clara's entrance with impatience. The Countess sat at her toilette, and was still in full court dress as she had come from the royal table. We cannot resist setting down a few of the wilful remarks which Miss Greta secretly made upon her cousin, while she examined the "History of the Duchess of Abrantes" with sufficient exactness.

"Well, do but see how Natalie throws forward her chest! She sets the right foot forward—plants the left elbow carelessly on the table—the attitude is ready! She retains the pearls yet, in order—she turns her head half toward the door—she erects herself proudly—she thinks herself a Semiramis; and all thoroughly to confound and dazzle the poor Clara, who, like Esther before Ahasuerus, appears and swoons away. Natalie will dash her absolutely down. It will be a precious scene!"

The bearing and mien of the Countess were, in fact, in the highest degree imposing; but perhaps Clara felt at this moment the penetrating glance which Miss Greta fixed on her still more deeply than the proud bearing of her benefactress. In the mean time she fell into no swoon; and whatever might be her feelings, her external appearance betrayed nothing of them. She was somewhat pale, but her manner was quiet. The muslin handkerchief with the broad hem lay as smoothly as usual on the shoulders, and was folded into regular plaits brought forward to the front. The everlasting "fraise" was stiff and white as ever. Miss Greta sighed.

The Countess desired Clara to take a chair, and commenced her speech. She spoke first of the two very handsome offers which had been made her; explained the advantages of both; detailed her conceptions of Clara's position, and of the duties which she herself had to perform toward her: she should consider herself happy to be able to contribute her part toward so honorable a union as either of these; and ended by demanding from Clara an express declaration of her choice.

She spoke beautifully, and with unusual energy; but for all these excellent and logical sentences, Clara had but the old answer, "She was sincerely obliged to both the gentlemen for their proposals, but could by no means fulfil their wishes. She would remain unmarried—she could never marry."

Miss Greta took her lorgnette to look a little closer at Clara on these declarations. She considered the idea of a poor maiden obstinately rejecting two wealthy lovers "very peculiar."

On the other hand, the Countess turned red with anger, and demanded severely, "May I ask, then, what your plans for the future are?"

"That I cannot yet say," replied Clara with a sigh, "but I hope soon to be able."

"Miss Clara acts very independently! and seems to hold me, my counsel, and approval, as nothing at all. Clara! I must remind you your father gave you into my hands, into my protection."

"I have never forgotten it," said Clara with a faltering voice.

"I considered myself therefore justified," continued the Countess, "over your proceedings—"

"I acknowledge it!" cried Clara with emotion.

"I am thankful for all the kindness which the lady Countess has shown me. I will be attentive and obedient—but ah! if no more might be said of my marrying!"

"She is quite interesting," thought Miss Greta, letting the Memoirs of the Duchess of Abrantes fall from her hand.

"Clara!" said the Countess, "your behaviour is too strange not to give ground for suspicions. You are a poor girl; you have not the slightest prospect for the future!"

"God gives the birds food—he will not forget me!"

Miss Greta felt for her handkerchief, and fixed her eyes on the floor, without however taking up from it the Duchess.

"That is really very fine!" said the Countess ironically; "but these God-fearing thoughts are utterly unproductive, and at last people betake themselves to their friends and relatives, on whom they fall as a burden. But don't trouble yourself on that account; I shall always see the daughter of an old friend gladly under my roof. I would not be so pressing for your marriage, since you are so opposed to it, if I did not fear that other, and perhaps less pure causes lie at the bottom of this irrational resolve. I must tell you plainly, Clara, that you are observed, and your conduct has given occasion to the most strange suspicions."

Miss Greta expected to hear Clara say, "that may be!" but Clara did not say so. She turned red and pale; stood up, sat down again, and finally remained standing.

With increased coldness and severity the Countess proceeded: "Since you have been in my house, you have received various articles of value as presents. These have vanished; whither? no one knows. You go out frequently in the dark. Clara, I demand an explanation of this!"

Clara stood speechless and pale.

"Your father," said the Countess further, "confided you to my protection and my oversight; in his name I demand an account of this!"

"I cannot now give it," answered Clara, with an anxious voice, but with more self-possession than before.

"Not now?" demanded the Countess sharply; "when then?"

"I don't know," replied Clara embarrassed, and as if she did not know what she was saying; "I believe—I don't know—"

"You ~~must~~ know it, you ~~shall~~ answer—when?"

Clara cast an expressive glance toward heaven, as if she would say—"THESE!"

"These are subterfuges, Clara! I will hear nothing of them," cried the Countess sternly. "I declare to you then, that my duty toward you and toward your late father compels me to abridge a liberty which you abuse. From this moment you remain in your room, till you either decide for one of these honorable offers, or till no other doubt rests on your unbecoming proceedings."

Miss Greta called once more her lognette to her aid, to observe Clara more closely. She stood still, with her arms not crossed, but laid one upon the other. She was extremely pale; tears glistened in her eyes, although the expression of her countenance was perfectly composed, perfectly innocent. That word "holy" again occurred to Miss Greta. She felt that her meditation was here needed, and with a seriousness, which was not wholly destitute of warmth, she said to the Countess:

"Dear Natalie, that is neither kind nor just. We have no proof that Clara's walks offend against propriety, but before we know this positively, we have no right to shut her up. To criminate any one who may be guiltless, and to punish him without proof of his crime, is in my eyes an injustice which I cannot endure, and which must not be committed."

People will perhaps be surprised at the dictatorial tones which Miss Greta permitted herself in an affair in which she was not properly concerned. But Miss Greta had been long accustomed, as well in her own family as in the wide circle of her acquaintance, to see her claims submitted to like the laws of Solon or Moses in antiquity, and this appeared to her quite in order.

With the same decided tone Miss Greta continued: "If Clara, indeed, has given away, or, according to her pleasure, disposed of the gifts which she has received, I see nothing in that which deserves a punishment or banishment from the country. The only thing, as it seems to me, that we can demand of Clara is, that she voluntarily relinquishes her walks out, at least till she herself assigns a satisfactory reason for them. Will you do that, Clara?"

After a little consideration, Clara answered "Yes!"

"Well, then," continued Miss Greta, "for this time I hope Clara is excused the imprisonment. We have had plenty of cholera and quarantine regulations, and may well be weary of the thing. As regards the proposals of marriage, I really cannot deny that Clara has acted like a silly damsel; but at the same time, in heaven's name, people must not be whipped into matrimony. One can be very happy without it—I think with Paul. The best and surest way is, that Clara does nothing in a hurry, but takes a fitting time for consideration. Dearest Natalie, allow Clara a deliberative time of three months. The worthy gentlemen can very well wait a little for a good wife, and Baron H. looks indeed to me as if he could serve for Clara like Jacob for Rachel. In short, we conclude the contract of peace for three months. Clara gives up her promenades, and, on the other hand, is spared all matrimonial proposals for the space of three months. Will the parties sign?"

Clara looked up to her protectress with an indescribable expression. Miss Greta felt a certain something about her heart she had not known before. The Countess, however, answered with a mixture of displeasure and concession:

"You are much too good to Clara. She does not at all deserve it. In the mean time I will, at your recommendation, allow this time for reflection. I know not, however, whether the gentlemen will find that it will repay them for the trouble to wait so long."

"Let me care for that," responded Miss Greta.

Visitors were now announced. The Countess arose majestically, and went forth without a glance at Clara; but Miss Greta stepped up to her, took her hand, and said seriously and kindly:

"My best Clara! between ourselves, you have acted somewhat foolishly and imprudently; and if, as I suspect, a third bridegroom is concealed behind the promenades, I advise you sincerely to bring him as quickly as possible to the light, and let the other gentlemen retire. Fair play, dear Clara, and a little sound sense, bring us farthest before God and man."

With this she pressed Clara's hand, and left her. Clara covered her eyes with both hands—"Mother! mother! what dost thou cost me!" sighed she in speechless agony.

From this time forward Miss Greta conceived a far higher interest in Clara. This had a threefold ground. In the first place, Miss Greta found her singular; then she wished to fathom the secret; and lastly Clara was become her protégé. She endeavored now with all zeal to become better acquainted with her, in order to win her confidence, and be able to help her. But ah! the interesting Clara, since that remarkable evening, had totally vanished; the still, and stupid one had again taken her place—and sewed! Or she busied herself with the concerns of the house, or with the thousand articles of the Countess's toilette, and all with an attention and silence that might drive one to distraction. The expression of countenance testified to Miss Greta a deep acknowledgment, but speech and answer continued laconic as before.

This then at length wounded Miss Greta, both in her feelings and in her pride—for we must confess that she was a little proud—that so insignificant a person as Clara should understand so little how to value the friendship of a lady of Miss Greta's spirit and character—a friendship which she so rarely offered to any one—this was hardly to be borne. And had not Miss Greta spoken with the Countess? Quietly the three wild brothers, and bargained for the three months of rest? Had she not persuaded the lovers also to three months' patience? Had she not rescued Clara from imprisonment and persecution? It made Miss Greta actually angry, for all those exertions to receive so little acknowledgment.

She determined now in her pride to withdraw herself entirely from Clara; and never to trouble herself about her again. But oh, the sorrow! at this very time Miss Greta was less able than ever to withdraw her thoughts from Clara; to avoid admiring, yes, actually envying her! For her keen glance could not help discerning that Clara, spite of her stillness and reserve, had yet within her a rich and full life. Her looks betrayed it. Miss Greta was the more annoyed at this inward fulness of life in a person of so monotonous an exterior and so joyless an existence; as she herself, endowed with all that fortune, the world, and the interests of life could confer, had often, and especially of late, felt an inward emptiness which she did not know how to fill. And what then could it be which so inwardly satisfied she poor and helpless Clara? which made her so patient under the orders and counter-orders of the Countess? which allowed her to forget that she was deprived of all the joys of youth, and must contemplate a walk to church of a Sunday as her sole relaxation? What was it which made her so soft and obliging to others, while she herself led a life so full of self-denial? Doubts and questions of this sort frequently presented themselves to the mind of Miss Greta. "What is properly joy?" she asked herself; "what is pleasure? After what shall we strive, in order to be happy, and live pleasantly? Natalie possesses beauty, talents, a fulness of affluence, and has countless admirers. I myself can enjoy as much of the good things of this world as I will—for this, I have health, good spirits, a willing body, understanding, and all the senses, and ability to laugh and joke at command; and at the same time, I can very well believe that this still, dependent creature would not exchange with me. And I cannot blame her; for with all I possess in the world, I find it by no means too amusing. But she, who has actually nothing—what does she think of? What satisfies her?" Clara, was Miss Greta's torment.

But it is time that we at length ceased entirely forgetting ourselves in the company of Miss Greta; we will now, therefore, look after the President a little.

CHAPTER X.

THE PRESIDENT.

"How goes it? How goes it?"

THE ACQUAINTANCE.

AND in fact, it is time that we visit the new-married man, and ask him how he does.

"Excellent!" would his Excellence have answered; but Truth whispers us behind his back, "Not particularly so."

It stood indeed as follows. The President was in love with his wife, but found himself to such a degree disturbed in his old habits, in his comfort, in the mode of life which he had hitherto led, that it operated obviously both on his health and temper. His beautiful Countess was a charming hostess, an amiable lady of the house; but an attentive managing wife she was not. He must wait on, care for, ask, do, amuse, fondle, and follow. The poor President got quite out of breath. He was, however, in love; and when she called him, "My sweet one! my angel!" and stroked his chin with her white hand, he was enraptured, and even happy. Ah Cupido! Cupido!

But this amorousness, the secret discontent, and a certain feeling that he had acted foolishly, all this made the President out of humor, and dissatisfied with himself, but awoke in him also a sort of fear before Edla. He was ashamed of his feelings before the clear-sighted daughter; he began to avoid her glance and her society, and this the more anxiously as he felt the injustice he did her, who least deserved it, by this coldness and reserve. Edla soon observed how he sought to avoid her; yet keenly as it pained her, she conformed herself in this respect immediately to the will of her father. She also had much to conceal from him; she too felt herself not happy through the change in the house, and knew not how to say a cheerful word to her father.

The Countess occupied herself chiefly and almost exclusively with Nina. As a fine connoisseur of art, she knew how to estimate Nina's perfect and entrancing beauty. She was thoroughly absorbed by it, and the sight of her was as necessary to her as to an artist that of his ideal. She exerted all that was captivating in her own mind and manner to win Nina to herself. She gave her instruction on the harp, in singing, in Italian, and caressed her without intermission. The lovely Nina was idolized by her, while the ungifted Clara only received from her cold looks and commands. But she was not contented with her own fascination herself, she was ambitious to direct the attention of all the world to Nina's beauty. This was an easy task. Whom do not beauty and sweetness charm? Who can behold the pure features of beauty without having a consciousness of God? A circle of admirers gathered around Nina, but who actually only admired her? There was something more than earthly in Nina, which excited to worship rather than to love. The artists soon gathered about, with chisel and pencil, partly in obedience to the Countess, and partly to their own artistic sense. Södermark must paint her portrait in oil, Waj in miniature; Mamselle Röhl must draw her in black chalk, Fogelberg execute her bust in marble, and model her hand; neither were modellers in wax and cutters of profiles wanting to copy the inimitable head and the muse-like features.

It was not without pleasure that Nina saw herself made an object of so much fondness, so much homage; yet she did not step forth from the cloud which enveloped her as with a magic glory. She continued sweet and amiable, though in a higher sphere of life, through which she floated as an ideal existence, as a vision out of a better world, but never stood there as an ordinary individual mortal. Her life resembled the beautiful picture of the triumph of Galatea.

In her chariot borne by the waves, and drawn by dolphins, the young goddess lay in luxurious ease. Nais and Tritons dance round her, laughing and sporting in the tumbling billows; the God of Love scatters the way with flowers, and Zephyr kisses and fans her cheeks with his soft breath. She lets them dance, and scatter flowers, lets the wind play with her locks, and the floods bear her on, while she carelessly reclines, dreams, and smiles. But this sweet repose, this manner, native as it were, to the higher existences, of receiving homage, and looking down out of the clouds on it, tranquil, mild, and indifferent—this was Nina's especial and most peculiar charm. But perhaps still more captivating was she, when a quiet sadness carried her wholly away from the splendor which surrounded her, and led her feelings into a world of twilight where no thought was able to follow her. There lay then a momentary paleness on her features, as if death rushing hastily past, but gently fanned her with his wing. Yet the exciting, variable life of her present home operated less prejudicially on her health than might have been feared, and most frequently a delicate rose bloomed on her cheek.

Count Ludwig was generally near her, but less in character of a lover than a quiet spectator, keeping his property in his eye.

Miss Greta was heartily weary of the deifying of Nina: of the portraits, busts, and the lessons on the harp. She often made herself merry over them in her lively, intellectual manner; but often, too, gave free scope to her wrath against these absurd goings on, as well as against Clara's inaccessibility, and lightened her heart with Baron H., who now, as she declared, was the only man with whom she could speak a sensible word. Filius through this found himself in better case with her than formerly.

Edla contemplated with growing uneasiness the triumph of her favorite. She had wished to introduce by degrees the tender bloom which she had so long sheathed and guarded in the shades of peace, to life, to activity, and to another atmosphere; and now she saw her suddenly exposed to the scorching beams of the mid-day sun. At first, she tried expostulations with her father against it; but he, opposed to the will of his wife, was much too weak, and desired expressly that Nina should entirely follow the wishes of the Countess. That she might not lose the child of her cares and of her heart completely out of her sight, there now remained nothing for Edla but to make part of the everlasting company. This was as little agreeable to the Countess as it was painful and wearisome to Edla. She exchanged her beloved quiet solitude, for a society in which she felt herself out of place, and assumed near Nina the involuntary part of a gloomy Argus. The Countess soon let Edla feel how superfluous was her presence, and did what she could by petty humiliations and slights to drive her from her brilliant saloon. Edla was of too lofty a character, and had made her soul too free, to suffer herself to be wounded by pin-pricks; but for Nina also was her presence useless, and by her also, as it seemed, was she overlooked. This pained her deeply. Besides, the stepmother invaded most disturbingly Edla's whole life. By imperceptible but certain modes, all power in the house, all interest in the management, was withdrawn from her. The old domestics were dismissed, the new ones could only obey the Countess; and thus Edla saw daily more and more how unnecessary she was in her father's house and to the company. She withdrew in silence to her solitary room, and appeared only at the dinner table, but always friendly and quiet. My sweet female reader! thou who wilt probably understand how gnawing such a domestic position must be, how easily it can embitter heart and mind—oh say, must it not have been a beautiful, a noble doctrine which enabled Edla to conduct herself with so much repose, gentleness, and good sense? In her solitude she found a freer, better company than in the circle she abandoned—and she could have been truly contented and happy in it, had she not missed so painfully her loved pupil, her former daily companion. As she saw that this dissipated life agreed with Nina's health extremely, she was careful to conceal her feelings. When she once asked her beautiful sister whether the present course gave her pleasure, she replied, with her accustomed love of truth—"Yes; it is so pleasant to please and to be beloved."

Edla laid up this word in her bosom: it gave her pain. "Do I not love her too?" thought she; "though I do not flatter her, or misguide her. I would lay down my life for her!" She regarded herself now as misunderstood also by Nina; she became even stiller and more retiring. Nina found Edla cold, unsympathizing. There lay a cloud between the two sisters. Each felt a secret tear well from her soul on this account. Why do we not let them flow? Why may we not betray what the tongue hesitates to acknowledge? What is it which so often, at least for a time, thrusts itself between the best friends, like a necessary cooked by bad spirits? Each sees it, but it is not to be overcome; an insurmountable, invisible obstacle stands in the way; we suffer, we avoid one another, we doubt whether it can possibly be the same person as formerly. Then requires it only an insignificant cause, a trifling word, to produce a division, whence is no return, and which no kindness can heal. The wounds which distrust gives bleed so long!

And yet let me, my reader, here make a reservation, for my heart is full of this matter, and would fain open itself out before thee. I must, then, solemnly protest against that which I have just asserted. No; I believe it not. The real, the genuine friends do not separate.

There are people whose words fall like a frosty day on the earth, and make all that is blooming and odorous vanish. They say—"All is vanity under the sun." This seems to us great, that lovely and pleasant; but who may put his confidence in men? That which at the first was so hot, grows all the more so speedily cool. The exhalation must quickly fly, or it would soon lead to the madhouse. The daily, the customary, that is the best and safest. And then follow examples and stories "out of real life," which are to confirm all this; brand enthusiasm as folly; designate love and friendship as a fleeting effervescence, or as selfish sentiments; reduce man to a nullity; and convert life into dishwater. And truly it is only too certain, that life has a very empty, dry, and poverty-stricken side; that many a purple mantle on the scene is only painted; many a flame goes up in smoke; that the glittering jewel on closer examination proves only a bit of glass; and that which appears alive is inwardly dead. What then? Because a pool dries up, shall we therefore not believe in the fresh spring? Because a meteor and a street lamp go out, are these then no eternal sun—no heavenly, holy lights? God be praised and blessed! there are those which warm and light us to all eternity. And if the immortal clearness of our own life and heart remained not, it were not worth the trouble of living!

It is a sad experience—who can describe its bitterness?—when we see the friend on whom we have built for eternity grow cold in his feelings, and becoming lost to us. But believe it not, thou loving, sorrowing soul, believe it not! Continue thyself only, and the moment will come when thy friend will return to thee; when, at the sound of thy voice, at the pressure of thy hand, his heart will beat quicker; yes, though the separation last long—

And pressed I here no more the ardent hand,
I yet should grasp it in the better land.

Yes, there, where all delusions cease—there, beyond the clouds, the friend will find thee again in a higher light, will acknowledge thee, and unite himself to thee for ever.

But, friendly reader, I probably kill thee with my digressions. Pardon me, and follow me back, on the little serpentine path of a flower-simile, which it is impossible for me to pass by.

Evening is a precious time for friends who live together. Married people know it well, and brothers and sisters know it too. Contrary to the flowers of nature, which close their chalice at the close of the day, the loveliest flower of friendship—continence—loves most to expand itself at evening, and breathes forth its fragrance most gladly under the protection of twilight and silence. Then talk we over the questions of the day; then conclude we peace with our hearts, if we have opened them before to our friend; then seek we reconciliation from heaven, and offer it to the world, ere yet the night comes; and then sleep we so sound and sweetly.

Thus was it formerly with Edla and Nina. Now it was otherwise. How gladly would Edla, as formerly, at the evening of a day which they had not spent together, have looked into Nina's soul. Now Nina came constantly so late from company, that Edla did not venture further to abridge her sleep, which in her now fatiguing life was become more requisite than ever. In the morning Nina naturally slept long, and scarcely was dressed before the Countess appeared to take her down with her. Nina was too weak to oppose herself to this despotism, which she moreover, through the wishes of her father, and through Edla's sullen silence, held to be justifiable. Yes, she even believed that it was really most agreeable to Edla to be able to follow undisturbed her favourite pursuits.

One day Edla was seized with a violent nervous headache. According to her custom she suffered without complaining, and lay perfectly still on her sofa. Every one who has experienced this complaint knows how unpleasantly anything ugly and annoying operates, during its paroxysm, on the senses of the sufferer. Nina sat by Edla and read to her in a low voice, while Edla refreshed herself with gazing on the pure sweet features of her sister, and found the presence of the beloved and beautiful like a longed-for heart's cordial. Then came the Countess to call Nina. There were several acquaintances below; it was wished to act some scenes from Filthof's Saga; but Nina was wanting, nothing could be done without Nina—Nina! the new lovely Ingeborg. But Nina was happy with her sister, who looked so affectionately on her; happy in the thought that she alleviated her suffering, and rejoiced her by her reading. She cast an imploring glance at her sister, and asked in a tone which solicited a yes—

"Do you need me, Edla?"

Edla misunderstood look and tone; a breath of bitterness passed over her soul, and she answered with some sharpness—

"No! go only, I need thee not."

Nina stood hastily up. The answer went like a stab to her heart. She followed the Countess. At the door she stood still; she felt an earnest desire to press to her lips the beloved hand which thus cast her forth; her heart swelled with tenderness and grief; but Edla just then turned her face toward the wall. The Countess urged her not to linger. Nina pressed her hand to her agonized bosom and went.

Edla had turned away from Nina—wherefore? Because two great tears against her will rolled down her cheeks. How many fathers, how many mothers, have wept such tears over their favorite—and certainly with greater cause. These are bitter tears. But Edla never felt a pain without stealing her heart against it; she never shed a tear without a vigorous resolution ripening itself through it. This was the case now. A thought which had long hovered indistinctly before her soul, struck in this hour firm root; and while every pulse in her had throbbled painfully, her heart beat unquiet, with steady reflection she threw out a plan for the future. The necessary condition for a possible quietude of life is a clear judgment on ourselves, on those with whom we share our days, and on the relationship in which we stand one to another. Without this judgment there is everlasting confusion; with it, on the contrary, peace and clearness! Nina did not return till toward midnight. Softly and gently as the west wind over flowers, she approached Edla's bed. Her eyes were closed. Nina believed that she slept, and stooped over to kiss her hand; but the hand moved itself, laid itself tenderly round Nina's neck, and drew her sweet countenance to Edla's cheek. "Good night!" whispered the sisters to each other. It did their hearts good; they best understood each other. Nina slept with a happy angel-smile, and a mild firm thought lay on Edla's quiet brow. When the first rays of morning illumined the chamber, Edla's suffering was past; she felt only a slight faintness in her limbs; but in her soul stood her projected plan firmer than ever. She went over it once more in her thoughts.

"My father needs me no longer; his wife is at present all for him. I see that he avoids me: that my presence gives him no pleasure. Nina breathes more new enjoyments and delights; I cannot, and would not, withhold them from her. I will be no impediment to her; will not spoil her enjoyments; not, like a gloomy shadow, hang over her days. She shall not learn to regard seriousness as something irksome, nor find her truest friend troublesome. Perhaps at this moment I am not that to her which I really ought to be. Perhaps something mistrustful and wearisome has stolen into my soul; perhaps I cannot now be exactly just toward my father, his wife, nor toward Nina; perhaps I feel a real bitterness, because I am all at once so totally forgotten, so superfluous—as it is, however, quite natural that I should. They enjoy the beautiful, the agreeable, the exhilarating—none of which I am. Have they done me also a certain injustice—should Nina especially—Nina not be as she might—should—Oh! she shall learn this through no ill-will, through no ill-humor on my part. I will go hence, that Nina may know nothing of this—but I will come back, and then press her afresh to my bosom. Only for a brief moment can Nina estrange herself from me—she will soon belong to me again. She is the child of my heart, nothing can part her from me for ever. But now I am here, a troubling burden to all in the house. Therefore I will withdraw. My cousin S—needs now a helpful friend. I will go to her for some months. I will free my family from a troubling aspect, from a silent reproach. My soul shall be refreshed by a new activity. I will return with a better mind, with fresher thought; and I hope then to contemplate the relationships here with a more impartial eye. I will then really be for all. May Nina in the mean time look round more tranquilly on the life which now dazzles her; she will not long deceive herself; my letters will to this end be more effectual than my presence can be. I will not disquiet myself concerning her; a pure light, a noble feeling dwells in the depth of her soul—it will shape its own way. When I return, I will find her eye clear—she will find again her friend, and I my child!"

As these thoughts passed through Edla's soul, she stood at the window and saw the wind travel among the clouds, which flew rapidly on in gray and white masses, and let the stars, already paling at the approach of day, glance forth. Edla contemplated with pleasure the hurrying clouds, and the fixed eternal stars. So stands the spirit of man in the unquiet world. The clouds of error vanish, and the pure light shines again in the heaven of humanity.

Edla loved the stars. From her childhood she had held converse with them. In hours of trouble, in the moments of prayer, in those in which her soul yearned after communion with higher spirits, she had often seen the clouds divide, and the stars beam down upon her. This view had always wonderfully strengthened her. She attached no distinct thoughts to this star-greeting, but she felt it as the sympathy of a friend, as an invigorating glance from the eye of the Almighty. From the time that Edla had believed that she should find no friend on earth, she had accustomed herself to look for one in the stars, and had never felt her heart deceived. Besides they were so beautiful, so elevating! Their infinitude causes the Creator to appear so great—the actions and passions of men, so small!

CHAPTER XI.

THE WOOING; AN OLD SONG TO A NEW TUNE.

*Professor A*** to Edla.*

"You will not partake my fortunes. Edla! you refuse my hand, and desire only the half of my heart! The other half you make a present of to some wife—whom I shall never find. Possess yourself of more impressive words and more effective arguments to make a man deny himself a happiness which he regards as the highest upon earth. Edla! you have permitted your friend to speak the unvarnished truth to you; yes, Edla! I have learned to love you for the sake of the love I cherish for my goddess, Truth: through my love of truth, I have alienated most of my so-called friends, frightened away all my acquaintances. You alone, Edla, feared not my rough sincerity; I did not offend you by it; you heard and understood me. You stand alone now as my best, my most sincere friend, the only one to whom I could without fear open my heart; and I acknowledge it as a happiness, that I can venture to say to you boldly, that you have not in your answer dealt truly and honestly by me. You answer me as an ordinary woman dismisses an ordinary man. Foolish reasons! petty considerations! how can Edla condescend to use them! 'You are old and ugly!' Very well, Edla, I admit that you are an old maid. How old? Perhaps forty. Well, then, you are in the best years of a woman, which one may assert without being a fool, like Balsac. Don't talk to me, I beseech you, of your damsels of seventeen. They are lovely flowers, I hear you say. Very well! but I know not, in fact, what I shall say to them any more than to a pretty flower—that is, at most, 'You are excessively charming!' or perhaps—'Have you danced much this winter?' At forty a woman has at once flowers and fruit. My mère made my father happy in her forty-third year, and her son had the happiness of his parent's society for five-and-twenty years. One can with less than this be content.

"'You are plain;' yes, you are plain, uncommonly plain. I hardly know a countenance which at the first sight is so repellent. 'You have also something stiff, something disagreeable.' Yes, you have all that, I concede you that, Edla. Sincerely beloved Edla! Silly, childish, unphilosophical woman! understand you not, that one can love you with all this; yes, precisely on this account? Precisely because you are plain, Edla, do I love you the stronger. Were you handsome; had you only the most usual attraction of woman, then I should fear lest a less exalted feeling mingled itself in my love. But you are 'plain,' 'disagreeable,' and, therefore, do I love you, Edla; therefore do I love you warmly. There is a beauty which is not external, which gives no external testimony of itself. My love to this makes me believe in immortality! And because you are not beautiful, do you think that I cannot love? How womanish, miserable, silly, do you make me, when you believe that nothing else can enchant me than what things and beasts possess as well as human beings!

"'You are tedious;' God forgive you the untruth, Edla; as certainly as all our gossiping, empty nonsense gabbling women will do it. Believe me, Edla, there is more life in your silent presence than in the conversation of most men. But once more, seriously—have you actually intended what you said? Have you believed that I could admit it? No, Edla, you have not! You are not so weak, not so childish! You have deceived yourself and me. I suspect other reasons, of which you say nothing. And why do you not speak them sincerely out? You do not love me. You do not participate in the feelings which I cherish for you. Good! or rather bad! But you know my views on this subject. Women do not so necessarily need the love of the husband to whom they unite themselves. Esteem, confidence—these are requisite to them; and the obligations of honor; the quiet of the house; the activity of the day, together with all higher familiar life, chain them at last with sincere affection to the friend they have chosen. This every day's experience teaches us. O Edla! why should you not in a similar manner become active and happy? Should you condemn the lot of a wife because you know more of the world than the majority of your sex? Then fling your wisdom into the sea! Listen, Edla! Had you a decided, productive talent; were you born to be an artist, or an author—I would not use so many words to persuade you to marry. But you are not that. You have an ear for life, but no tongue to express it. Can it give you joy only to vegetate, without being useful to a fellow-creature, without living for the happiness and good of another? Edla! take my hand; become my wife; the friend of my friends, the joy-diffuser of my house. Make happy a husband who henceforth will live only for you!

"You doubt the truth of my love! Do you expect that I shall sigh, complain, fall at your feet? That I shall threaten to destroy myself, and enact one of those drunken scenes with which the modern romances inundate the frivolous world? That I cannot do! Edla, and you certainly do not desire it. But believe that I love you. Judge of my attachment from rational evidences. Edla, I am not happy without your presence. All that I do, think, write—that requires your sight, your approbation; without this it has no value for me! But I disdain to dilate upon this, to vow, and protest—for fourteen years Edla has called me friend, and has not doubted my word. Why should she doubt it in the very moment in which I open my heart to the core, and say, 'I love thee?' Is this, however, only an empty subterfuge, behind which other reasons conceal themselves? Then it is probably, when translated into the language of truth, 'I fear to give thee my hand, because thou art an Atheist, because thou dost not believe in a God, in immortality; thou art a lost soul.' Can you believe that, Edla? Can you pronounce that in me to be a crime which does not lie in the power of our will? It is true, that my understanding does not acknowledge the doctrine out of which you and many others draw so much happiness. But show me the spot which dishonors me as a man; and then you will have a right to reproach me with the want of faith. Has a word, has a smile upon my lips, ever derided that which to another is holy? Then, Edla, turn away from me as from an unworthy one. Have I ever, since I have become a man, spoken an untruth? Then, Edla, believe me no longer; then mistrust also my love. Yes, I will say still more. I have often indulged the hope of the possibility, that before the evening of my days descends, I may yet recognise a higher light, may yet participate in a faith so beautiful, and so full of blessings. I long, I yearn after it. I too am old, Edla; and my fiftieth year, though it has yet brought no cold into my heart, shows me by the snow falling on my temples that the winter is come. Edla, my dear friend! will you not bring me warmth in the cold season? not kindle that light which shall cheer my evening? If a human being can do this, it is thou, so gentle, and so sensible.

"'Another wife!' I beseech you, Edla, spare me this comfort, this hope, this other wife, who, if I understand you properly—shall be a good sheep. Be you mine, Edla! Let me hope it, or give me better, more solid grounds for a 'No,' which opposes itself to my happiness.

"Yours,

*Edla to Professor A ****

"The reasons which I advanced, my friend, were not false. I have spoken the truth, but perhaps I should have expressed it more clearly. My age, dear A., forbids me to think of a change in my present condition of life; but I alone am in a situation properly to estimate and to judge of this change. My plainness would not seem hazardous to me, could I but surmount the repugnance to exposing it to the gaze of men; and it is not simply the feeling of my plainness—that I could bear—but that hardness and repulsiveness of my disposition, which makes me for others unaccommodating and unpleasing. Even early in my childhood I felt this. The eye of my mother fell on me with a cold and repelling gaze. Forgive me, stern shade! hereafter I tried to advance toward thee with love, and thy glance will rest kindly on thy daughter. Then will all involuntary hardness dissolve, and my rigid disposition melt; then shall I also become amiable. But, here, on earth, that can never be; here there is, as it were, a strange power chained to me, which works disturbingly, turn which way I will. I am not agreeable to others, not agreeable with others, dear A. I feel that, and it constrains and embarrasses me in every action, in every sentiment—I cannot conquer it.

"For you, dear A., I feel the sincerest esteem, the most genuine friendship; and nothing in your person could prevent me giving you my hand, if I were actually persuaded that I should thereby do anything good and proper. I have already written to you explicitly on this head, and will not now weary you with my repetitions. A few words, however, I must here add.

"I honour the vocation of woman, as wife, mother, and mistress of a family, with my whole heart. Why should I not? I know nothing more beautiful. But I feel nothing in me which gives surety for me, that I myself should fulfil it. You speak of the uselessness of my life. I might bid you look at Nina. Till lately I might also have said, 'Behold the happy eye of my father!' But I will not appeal to things which have a universal claim on the outward activity of men. I might say, 'Oh, do not call it pride—look into my heart!' There incessantly labours the desire to do good, not unworthy of the great Master whom we ought to follow. I sometimes think I shall be able to discover the word for that which works so deeply and honestly within me, on which I so seriously meditate; but perhaps I deceive myself—perhaps this moment will never come for me on earth. Be that, however, as it may, I do not therefore fear that I work in vain. They are the happy on earth, who live for the good of others; but they too have not lived in vain, who have laboured still and meditatively at the work of improvement in their own bosoms. Must every virtue, every power be a useless one, which does not exercise itself in the fulfilment of human duties? The life-long captive, cut off for ever from the world, builds a temple to God in his own heart; the anchorite, who places himself in a position through acquired knowledge to illuminate the world—believe you, my friend, that these live in vain? that they will not also one day find a theatre on which they may labour beneficially, if not in this, certainly in another world? I know this is not your belief, but it is mine in the deepest regions of my heart. As regards the usefulness of my life, I am at rest.

"You call upon me to give light to the evening of your days. Ah! there you touch a chord in my heart which vibrates painfully through it. Could I do, could I accomplish what you hope? I fear not. My friend, I know that I cannot! Have we not often exchanged our thoughts for this purpose? Have we not discussed these important matters repeatedly? And what fruit has this produced? I have contributed nothing to you, and you—pardon me! I must say it—you have often wounded me deeply. Believe me, my good friend, it has never come into my mind to call you an Atheist, for your whole life testifies of the God in whom you believe, and who lives in you—to use the words of a great poet—'THE GOD WHOM YOU DENY AVENGES HIMSELF BY SETTING HIS STAMP ON YOUR ACTIONS.' In your works you are a good Christian; while your understanding, or the spirit of contradiction which dwells in your heart, refuses the acknowledgment. But this spirit and this incessant doubt disquiet my soul. Ah! life has so many darkening clouds, so many bewildering enigmas, that we cannot carefully enough guard our minds against every gloom. You have cast many a black doubt upon my days, how should I enlighten your evening? You require a wife of a different mind, with a higher strength of soul than I possess.

"Do you not know, have you not seen the sweet simple wife whose whole being is love; in whose heart words discover themselves which desire not to be spoken, and which yet operate as an illumination? I might term such a one a feminine Apostle John; for she reposes on the bosom of her lord, and is admitted to his most intimate confidence. She draws from the original fountain of love, and thence is it that her wisdom is so deep, her glance so full of blessing, her words so persuasive. She has no arguments for the immortality of the soul, but heaven stands open to her eye, and she has an immediate beam of God. To your doubts, to your questionings, such a wife would reply: 'Let us be happy! Let us love one another! Let us not vex ourselves with these matters! All will one day become clear, all will be good.' And this word, so poor, so trite, that every common-place person conceals his sluggishness behind it, becomes a revelation on the lips of a pious, affectionate feminine disciple. See, A * * *, this is the wife that you must seek. She alone can warm your heart, enlighten your evening; on her bosom will your soul find rest. Reasons cannot always be answered with counter-reasons; evidences with counter-evidences; before such a faith, such a conviction, your desire of contrast will become still, and you will yourself be made capable of listening to the suggestions of your own soul.

"You speak of your love to me. Yes, I certainly hope that I am dear to you. This hope is dear, is necessary to me; but LOVE! LOVE TO ME! No, A * * *, that I cannot believe! I have alluded to your spirit of contradiction; forgive me if I revert to it, and regard it as the cause whence your liking for me has arisen. You were always proud and defiant, dear A * * *, and love to combat with difficulties. You now seek me so zealously, because I retire before you—the consenting Edla would soon be no longer the warmly-beloved Edla. Talk not to me of your love, A * * *, I do not believe you; I do not believe in my own power to inspire such a feeling. I am become too old for fairy tales. Let me continue your friend as before; continue you what you were to me. It is thus best for us both.

"Faithfully, and for ever your friend,

"EDLA."

*Professor A * * * to Edla.*

"You were right, Edla, when you said before-hand that you should only repeat what you had said. Your letter contains only your former assertions, your empty reasons, or rather un-reasons. The only novelty which struck me was, 'The spirit of contradiction,' which is quartered in my brain, and gives itself the trouble to dictate to me my words and actions. The natural consequence of which is that I really do not know what I say, or what I protest. I thank you for this information. But as it lies sincerely at my heart to convince you of the contrary, and as I find in your letter no reasons besides what you had before assigned, allow me, best Edla, to take no notice of them, and by no means to give up the hope one day to call you my wife. You may greet most kindly from me the St. John ladies. None of them will ever be my wife! Edla or none! THE SPIRIT OF CONTRADICTION."

Edla was at once vexed and flattered by the obstinacy of her friend, but only the faster, therefore, clung she to the thoughts of her departure. She knew, indeed, an amiable person who had long loved the Professor A * * *. She regarded her as wholly made for him, and cherished the hope that he would one day be convinced of her suitableness. From the distant bound of her journey she would write to her friend, of Charlotte D. She prepared all in silence for her exit, and then spoke with her father respecting it. The deranged affairs of her cousin S. were made the ostensible occasion of her journey. The President heard her in silence, and then said with a faltering voice, "that she was probably in the right; that she was perfectly free to act according to her own pleasure," and withdrew hastily, leaving her alone with a troubled heart.

CHAPTER XII.

THE PIECE OF WORK.

The red flames stretch their tongues
Up to heaven high.

WALA'S Song.

In the mean time Miss Greta had her trial with Clara. She found her every day more interesting and intolerable. She became to her constantly more and more a stone of stumbling and of offence. One day it occurred to her to prepare a joy for the joyless girl. She went out with the Countess to make purchases, and the whole forenoon they went from one shop to another, from Medberg to Folker, from Folker to Giron. The Countess returned home with numberless packages—with stuffs, shawls, and other fashionable articles. Miss Greta had selected two beautiful necklaces of amethyst and coral, that Clara might choose one of them. Her heart rejoiced beforehand in this surprise; she thought only at this moment of the forlorn position of the poor girl, and had forgotten all her indifference and tediousness.

The Countess busied herself for three successive hours with her purchases. This was intended for Nina, that for Miss Greta, this for Edla, and the chief articles for herself. Not the slightest trifle was for Clara, that she might duly feel the disfavor in which she stood.

But Clara seemed not to notice this punishment. After she had honestly pronounced her opinion of the fineness and color of the purchases, acquainted herself exactly with the price, and fulfilled all the duties of sympathy, she seated herself in silence and indifference by the fire, and to Miss Greta's wrath went on with her sewing.

Miss Greta was but just come in. She took a chair, placed herself kindly by Clara, and showed her the two necklaces, with the question whether they were not pretty?

A glance from Clara, with a feeble "yes" was all the answer which Miss Greta received.

"And which seems to you the prettiest of the two?" continued Miss Greta, without allowing herself to be amazed.

"I scarcely know," replied Clara, with a voice which made one feel at the same time the trouble of the answer; "I understand so little about things of that sort."

"Things of that sort!" repeated Miss Greta to herself, and was on the point of becoming angry; but the desire to give her pleasure triumphed, and she inquired farther: "Don't you think the coral one the handsomer; or would the amethyst probably suit better a darker complexion?"

"Probably," answered Clara in the most absent tone, while she sewed more diligently than ever on her tulle collar. That was too much for Miss Greta; at such a piece of rudeness all her gall was stirred.

"That is a very pretty piece of work," said she, seizing on Clara's beloved piece of sewing; "but as it withholds you from what is much handsomer and of much more importance—namely, from mere politeness and a few minutes" time for an answer—I will herewith rid you of this impediment."

And before the surprised Clara could divine her purpose, the beautiful work lay on the fire. Her first movement was to spring forward and snatch it from the flame, but this had closed already over the light tulle, and devoured it in a few seconds. Clara stood speechless, and gazed into the destroying flame; Miss Greta regarded her attentively. When this fine work was completely reduced to ashes, two great tears rolled over Clara's cheeks, and she went out without saying a word, without casting a look at Miss Greta.

The state of mind in which Miss Greta was, it is not easy to describe. She looked after Clara, she looked into the flame, and had a great mind to send the two necklaces after the tulle; but she restrained herself, and pondered on something better.

At the dinner-table Clara appeared with red and downcast eyes, but her countenance bore at the same time an expression of patience which went to Miss Greta's heart. As Clara once raised her eyes, and their glances met, Miss Greta was involuntarily compelled to cast hers down.

After dinner Clara was in a room near the saloon, and was examining some newly arrived engravings, when she suddenly felt a hand laid lightly on her shoulder, and another held the two eventful necklaces friendly before her eyes. It was Miss Greta, who said seriously and cordially—

"Pardon me, Clara! Forgive my hastiness. Bestow now once more a look on these two necklaces, and try whether 'such things' cannot please you. I had intended to beg your acceptance of one of them; now I beseech you earnestly, as a token of your pardon, to accept both, and to regard them as a little trifling substitute for the burned tulle, whose fate I earnestly wish might withhold you from the beginning of any fresh piece. My good Clara, accept these. Give me your forgiveness!"

Clara blushed deeply; she glanced at Miss Greta with a look as beautiful as that with which she once already had struck her heart, and she desired now, without farther hesitation, to put the ornament on Clara's neck. But Clara held back her head, and exclaimed, "No, no! That is too much—too much—I cannot!"

"Things of that sort," said Miss Greta. "Good! But, dear Clara, if you will not do it from compulsion, do it then out of pity, that yonder flame may no longer scorch my conscience."

"That shall it not," said Clara. "All is forgotten; I recollect only your goodness."

"Take them then!" cried Miss Greta, in medias imperatious.

Clara contemplated the ornament. After a short silence, she said—

"Do you permit me, lady, to do what I will with it?"

"Assuredly, yes; but I will now see it first on your neck."

"But then—then I acquire the right to dispose of it as I please?"

"Yes, to be sure! yes! that follows of course. Take it only out of my hand."

Clara took one of the necklaces; more could Miss Greta, neither by one means nor another, obtain from her. And as she took this out of Miss Greta's hand, she at the same time seized the hand, and kissed it with so deep an emotion, that the friendly giver, herself deeply moved, embraced her tenderly, thinking the while to herself—"He must really, however, be a very strange man, this secret lover, who absorbs so many tulle collars and caps, and now will swallow my costly necklace too. I would fain see him, the fellow!"

Miss Greta had seen much of the world. It had often delighted her to trace out the little Momus who sits in the background of the soul, and plays his game with a man's better self; allows him to utter untruths, imprecations, follies, or boastings, all for the indulgence of a little pride, a little vanity, or yet less noble quality. Miss Greta had so often seen the rogue that she had nearly accustomed herself to consider him as an indweller of human nature, and in general she had more faith in petty than in higher matters. But spite of the secret affair in which Clara had become implicated, and which testified against her, Miss Greta could not prevail upon herself to believe that anything dishonorable lurked behind it. It seemed to her utterly impossible that the said rogue could play his game with Clara's soul; she was in her heart persuaded that the tulle-swallowing lover would at last turn out to be a right honorable honest fellow.

The next day a far more tragical event occurred, and it suggests itself to us to put the reader in possession of it.

CHAPTER XIII.

THE PAINTING IN OIL.

Make the work right good, my son,
Drink, and take thy wages when done.—BELLMAN.

FILIUS had received several genial but twilight inspirations on the subject of fresco-painting, of whose origin and shape in his little brain we can render no account, but can only communicate their results. In the first place it excited in Clara the greatest astonishment, as she in the act of compounding a lobster salad found the newly-filled oil-flasks nearly emptied to the last drop, while the walls and steps of the basement story, had they had the power of reasoning and communication, would have expressed their astonishment at finding themselves one evening covered with fat landscapes of red ochre and Provence oil. But the greatest and worst fate was reserved for Miss Greta, who descended the steps with unsuspicious freedom, set her foot on a high-way of Filius's work, slipped, and plunged her whole length into the unlucky landscape. As she recovered her senses, and attempted to rise, she found herself deprived of the use of both her arms. She cast next a glance at her silk dress, at her costly shawl, and fantastic pictures of the Red Sea, and of the confusion at the Tower of Babel, swept through her brain, while she found it difficult to suppress a loud cry of agony. The servants found her still and death-pale; her tongue was not able to explain the occurrence, and her Roman stoicism disdained to complain. Thus was she carried carefully up the slippery steps. I pass over the alarm of the family, the consternation of the Baron, and the severe castigation which Filius for the first time received from his foster-father, and which one would have thought enough to have taken from him for ever all passion for fresco-painting.

found to be broken above the elbow, the left was dislocated, and must be wrenched back with haste and violence. A Spartan dame could not have displayed more quiet fortitude than Miss Greta. As Clara hastened in with a countenance of deadly paleness, and the most expressive signs of horror and anxiety, Miss Greta even forgot herself, and felt a kind of rapture at this unhoped outburst of feeling. She regarded Clara, scarcely believing her own eyes, and said, "Smell some eau de Cologne, Clara, and give me a little too; we seem both to have need of it." She then turned at once to the doctors, and said, "I am ready, gentlemen."

Edla and Clara were the only ladies present at the operation; Miss Greta endured it with the greatest firmness, and it was not till all was over that she fell into a violent agitation of the nerves. Edla during the whole proceeding had preserved her accustomed presence of mind, and afforded the most active assistance. Clara was too violently agitated to be able to do anything, and only sighed softly with folded hands, "My God! my God!" When all was over she embraced the sufferer with streaming tears and whispered, "Does it not give you excessive pain? Is it not dreadfully agonizing?"

Clara's tears operated more beneficially and soothingly to the nerves of Miss Greta than all the drops and perfumed waters with which they sprinkled her. She was surprised and touched at this testimony of sincere attachment. She could not at this moment speak, but she gazed at Clara with a look full of cordiality and nodded lovingly at her.

As Miss Greta could not be conveyed to her own house, Clara's chamber was converted into a sick-room, and she became at the same time Miss Greta's affectionate and devoted nurse. Now first learned these two souls to know each other, and the silent room of suffering opened up to them a life of the most beautiful reciprocal attachment and joy.

Every man is surrounded by a spiritual atmosphere, which shows better than anything what spirit he is the child of. In accordance with this he works enliveningly or oppressively; beneficially or disquietingly; yes, even into inanimate things he breathes somewhat of his own atmosphere, and they become beautiful or not, according to the nature of the spirit which they serve. In worldly life there are so many storms, so many draughts—all doors and windows stand open—that their ethereal atmospheres are difficult of perception; yes, the world, or its planets—men—whirl so hastily round their sun—pleasure—that it is impossible for them to know and understand themselves. People are scarcely aware of each other; they hurry past one another, and greet each other as, Venus! Mercury! Comet! Nebulus! (their number is Legion) Vesta! Pallas! etc. But that is all. At certain points of life, for instance in the family circle, in the chamber, in the sick-room, we recognize again the soul. Here has she her free atmosphere, and can demonstrate her most peculiar character.

If Miss Greta had read these reflections, she would unquestionably have poured forth a whole troop of jocose remarks on the human planets and their atmospheres, and have injured the seriousness of my thoughts; at the same time it is certain that she experienced their truth. With wonder she felt the beneficent influence of Clara's presence, and quiet activity. All her movements and assistance were so full of repose, so still and gentle, and yet so skilful and certain, that they fell like a balm on Miss Greta's nerves. As she disposed her pillow it was sure to be the most comfortable; when she opened the curtains a little, she let in exactly the most agreeable portion of light; where she set down things, there stood they certainly in the best position. And then—this look of sincerest sympathy, this scarcely obvious, and yet never-ceasing attention to the invalid! The very person whom Miss Greta had found so heavy, so unapproachable, so impracticable altogether, now shunned no annoyance, no exertion, in order to ameliorate a suffering new to her. She became speedily the most skilful surgeon for the sick; she was not only the most excellent nurse, but also the most beneficial company. In the night, when Miss Greta could not sleep, Clara displayed a talent which so many imagine themselves to possess, but which actually so few do possess, and on which Miss Greta set the greatest value—that of reading well aloud. Her pure pronunciation and pleasant voice delighted her listener so much the more, as she read with a simple and sensible expression. Miss Greta, whose mind was now only occupied with Clara, soon discovered in her a ruling desire and innate propensity to render assistance and to diminish anything in the shape of suffering and care; and though she soon discovered also that Clara's attachment to her sprang rather from her general love of her fellow-creatures than from any personal prepossession, Miss Greta only felt herself therefore the more obliged to honor her, and desired all the more ardently to be beloved by her. While she read with so keen an eye Clara's soul, there awoke in her own new and unknown feelings; and for Clara also there opened a new heaven; life acquired for her a charm that it had not possessed before. Clara's inward purity mirrored itself in her outward manner. Miss Greta had hitherto regarded her as too pedantic in the extreme care which she expended on her dress, and on her whole exterior appearance. In her sick-chamber she now experienced only the pleasantness of it. The most precious perfumes could not operate more agreeably on the senses than that fresh breath of pure neatness which constantly enveloped Clara, and which was in fact her cestus of Venus. They who are so happy as to have a Clara about them, know well the power and charm of this highest feminine beauty.

Clara again, on her part, admired and honored most sincerely the heroic patience of Miss Greta: her strength of soul, her perpetual good humor, and her friendliness never varying even in the sharpest pains. Now first did she listen to her words and assertions. The rich treasures of knowledge of men and the world, the genuine humor with which she spoke and observed, opened to Clara a new world. She became acquainted with a side of life which till now had been hidden to her; she heard satire which was destitute of bitterness; she followed a keen gaze into the follies of the world, but which, however, always rested on its object with kindness and sagacity; these opened to her a life full of enjoyment, accomplishment, and instruction, to which hitherto she had never lent heart nor ear; and Clara's capability of understanding, of listening, and answering, and even of joking, equally surprised and amazed Miss Greta. At the same time it often appeared as if Clara feared these new impressions; as if she would withdraw herself from the involuntary gladness which thus affected her.

Then she became suddenly silent; then she was observed to sew more diligently than ever, and deep into the night. Miss Greta frequently watched her, when she thought herself unobserved, and saw how she suddenly folded her hands and gazed up toward heaven, as if she would lay her whole soul in the bosom of God. Miss Greta herself experienced in such moments a feeling which she could not explain. Sometimes there came across her the supposition that Clara was Catholic, and had taken the vow of chastity and labor. Then again resorted to her the walks and the vanished tulle work, and led off her thoughts in a quite different direction. Thus she tormented herself with a thousand enigmas and speculations. But while Clara sews and Miss Greta ponders, we will withdraw the veil from this silent world of prayer and patience. We will seek Clara during her childhood and youth in her father's house, and cast a glance on such scenes, as they often—only much too often—present themselves on the Theatre of Every-day Life.

CHAPTER XIV.

CLARA.

Amer mio, non più del mondo—

ST. CATHARINE.

CLARA's father was a learned man, but a dry one—a perfect encyclopedist, whose heart dries itself up into an arid plain. Her mother was a lovely woman, full of heart and spirit, of gentle birth, endowed with a proud mind, and more than that, with a blind enthusiasm. There are prosaic unbendabilities, as well as there are poetic impossibilities; bring these together, marry them in fact, and you have prepared the most wretched household on earth. The deep and the beautiful may unite themselves, since these have as necessary a connection as root and flower; it is the most glorious union that is found in life. But petrified forms and unbridled animal spirits agree like fire and water. Such was the connection between Clara's father and mother. He loved her first, because she was beautiful and admired his acquirements. She married him out of blind enthusiasm for knowledge and science, and because he paid her homage. She hoped every day to make a pilgrimage to heaven; he hoped every day to have a better dinner. Both deceived themselves. From that time he despised her deficiency in knowledge; she his pedantic forms.

"You don't understand that I you have no conception of it!" were the words she came daily to hear. "You are tasteless! you are intolerable!" was the answer that was never withheld. She opposed the energy of her will to his reasoning despotism. Neither would concede; neither would offer the hand to the other; and thus their days became the prey of contentions, their house a home of injustice and bitterness. He humiliated her with the double power of his official dignity and his learning; she, who had been brought up gently, and who throughout her childhood and youth had been only flattered and caressed, defended herself against him with the power of the trodden snake. He oppressed her; she pierced him with a poisoned sting. As happy married people only think how they can make each other happy, they now studied only how they might cause each other anger and mortification. He was awkward and inexperienced in all affairs of common life; she disorderly and negligent in the internal affairs of the house. Five little children demanded support, and cried for bread. Poverty soon presented itself; and cold, hunger and want, were the dry sticks with which Discord daily heated her hell. How it burned! how it darted forth its flames! In a short time, it might be said of this house as it is said in the legend of Hell's dwelling, "Misery was its parlor, hunger its knife, starvation its key, procrastination its maid, treachery its threshold, decay its roof, consumption its bed, and pale agony its clothing."

Is there a married pair who have beheld themselves in a mirror: Oh, the Lord God have mercy on them!

In this house Clara grew up, and a sister partook this fate. The brothers were made over to relations for support; the daughters alone must bear the cross of the house. For Clara's sister was found what was called a good match; and she married with the hope of liberating herself and her sister. She hoped to find in her husband a friend, and found a tyrant; but she bore it with patience, and bowed herself deeper and deeper till she found rest in the grave.

Clara was left alone. Alone in this house of hatred and complaining; alone after the sacrificed sister; alone—but not! People assert often that where discontent prevails in a house the husband is the least unhappy; he can go forth, he can comfort himself, he has the world, so it is asserted. I do not think so. I am of opinion that the wife has or may have the better lot; I know that she has hard by the gates of the domestic hell a certain place of refuge—heaven! Thither Clara betook herself for escape; and amid the domestic storms, in an atmosphere of bitterness, beneath constant labors of body and soul, there she found peace. But if the people did but know how she prayed! Prayer is the key of the gate of heaven. It does not open it easily. It requires strength, indefatigable knocking, a firm, determined will; but is the door but once open—behold! then there is no further separation between thee and the Almighty; and the angels of the Lord ascend and descend to bring thee consolation and help. Thou who sufferest perhaps like Clara, yearnest for repose like her, O listen! Sip not lightly at the cup of salvation! Drink deep draughts from the well of redemption! Fill thyself with prayer, with faith and humility, and thou wilt have peace!

Clara had as soft a heart, as warm feelings, as vivid a longing after happiness and joy, as any other feminine soul; but she conquered all, she quieted all these within her, through prayer and labor. Her cheeks grew pale; her youth, her fresh spirit of life, vanished; but her soul became a sanctuary, and her eyes, with a mild and heavenly expression, declared its beauty and repose. As oil allays the excited waves, so operated by degrees Clara's pious and acquiescent mood on the minds of her unhappy parents. After she had reconciled and consoled them, they both died; but on her death-bed her mother discovered to her a secret, and demanded from her an oath, which darkened the whole of Clara's existence.

After the death of her parents she was taken by the Countess Natalie, and transplanted to a new world of being and enjoyment. But her soul had acquired its fixed bent, and certain circumstances of life had already made too great an impression on her mind. Her whole life was a sigh of compassion over the sufferings of earth; she would willingly have laid her whole life itself as a balm on the wounds of the world. The Saviour she loved above all things. He was her life, her whole happiness. He had said, "Come to me ye who are weary and heavy laden, and I will give you rest;" and she went to him, and her soul found rest. She followed him thenceforth, and did His will.

In outward and agitated life, in all undertakings, speculations and projects—enough, in all which we commonly call life—Clara saw only burdens and unnecessary labors. But nothing did she dread so much as marriage. In this she had only become acquainted with the extremest misery, the greatest anguish on earth. It appeared to her a condition of care and trouble, the voluntary choice of which she could not comprehend. To be a humble instrument of consolation for the woes of earth, without augmenting them through the afflictions of marriage, Clara regarded as the most beautiful and desirable object of existence. And in fact when we reflect on all the disquiet and strife and misery of this world; when we see how men throng and drive; how they make themselves slaves; how they fill themselves with anxieties, and set all at hazard—then need we not wonder if the heart contracts itself; if people find the greatest pleasure in making themselves as little as possible, in order that they may glide through life unobserved, and yet according to their ability, be able to help the struggling, the exhausted and the hungry. How infinitely vain and foolish to these quiet souls, under the influence of such feelings and views, must not the career of the great world appear! Only the heavenly benignity of their minds can prevent them at once heartily despising this course of life, as well as those who give themselves up to it.

Clara did not yet know that the different spheres of life are ordained through interchange to beautify and ennoble each other. The cheerful play of social life was an enigma to her; the temple of art was closed to her; and the glory of nature she had never seen. At the age of seven-and-twenty Clara had only made acquaintance with trouble and with heaven. Solitary in her father's house stood she now in this new world, isolated in the peculiar world of her own heart. She felt that she possessed none of the gifts, none of the advantages which men so highly value; she was conscious of being understood by no one, and therefore was she silent; therefore she cast round her the deepest reserve like a shell. If a feeling of bitterness came sometimes into her heart, it was when she saw what large sums were expended in delicacies and fashionable trifles. She thought then of the sick and the hungry; she knew from experience what hunger was.

She had probably heard of the doctrines of political economy, and the encouragement of trade; of the benefits of industry, and of the mischievous effects of almsgiving; but she was persuaded that a prudent benevolence does only good, and that a judicious assistance never can do harm; and she felt only too vividly that there are, in fact, always people who are suffering through necessity and sickness, or who win their daily bread by the "sweat of their brow." To these unfortunate ones belonged Clara's thoughts, her heart, and her plans for the future. Yet for a while must she submit herself to present circumstances, to this life of dependence, which appeared to her the hardest service. Still must she, in order to fulfil asacred oath, prepare that adornment which seemed to her so unnecessary—she must gain money in order to expiate the sins and discharge the debts of others. Then would she go into an hospital to live to her love—a love as warm, as true, as ever lived in the human bosom for knowledge, freedom, or honor. Here should her life glide unobserved away, amid labours that occasioned no scruple; but these labours should ameliorate the suffering of others. She would not live a single day in vain.

Travel to Rome, fiery artist! Build thy house, brave citizen! Win thee a pillar of glory, O hero!—yet the mere Clara achieves more than thou!—Pax vobiscum!

CHAPTER XV.

ON MARRIAGE.

Since how knowest thou, O wife, whether thou shalt make thy husband happy? or how knowest thou, O husband, whether thou shalt make thy wife happy?—PAUL.

MISS GRETA WAS now so far recovered that she was able to receive company, and to take part in the conversation. All her lady friends and acquaintances hastened to pay her a visit. One day came two young ladies, sisters, and both betrothed. Eva and Aurora were two pleasant, lively creatures, gladdening to the eye, delightful to the ear, fresh as roses, well dressed, well fed, active as wagtails, genuine as gold—in a word, they were charming, most loveable girls, and, moreover, full of life, full of views and purposes—I say nothing of penetration. They would improve the world, the good girls, the world which they fancied did not stand on a firm foot; they would ennoble mankind, and begin with their sinful, betrothed lovers; they would make society, education, the state, subjects of their attention, and undertook all this with the greatest courage in the world. Miss Greta amused herself vastly with their zeal, and had the art to bring them unconsciously to the unfolding of their principles, ideas, and plans. Then came forth all sorts of unions for the support of the necessitous—amateur theatres, institutions for the care of little children, subscriptions for objects of amelioration; but especially requests for the contribution of embroidery work, to form a lottery or a bazar, and all this mixed up in the most wonderful confusion. Here friends were snatched out of the air, there great air-castles built up—then followed, through a slight impulse, an enormous movement (Archimedes himself might solve the problem), and the king and queen took the whole under their especial patronage. The young ladies would now, all at once, by force ennoble and improve their fellow men, and the machine of state. Miss Greta laughed heartily at their great designs, at the same time that she did not omit to place the weakness of both sisters in the proper light; and the good children were forced to laugh too, without permitting themselves, however, to be beaten one tithe from their philanthropical plans. Clara, on the contrary, looked oppressed; she smiled sometimes, yet sighed only the oftener.

"My best Clara," at length said Miss Greta, "you must not listen with such silence and indifference. You also will soon enter the holy state of matrimony, and then will certainly, like Eva and Aurora, think of improving and polishing your husband and your native land."

"Ah, God preserve me!" cried Clara with a sigh which came from the lowest depths of her heart.

"How so? how so?" cried the sisters as with one voice, full of wonder.

"Dear friends," replied Clara, blushing, and with emphasis, "You think that you are preparing joy for yourselves in the future, and you will only find trouble. You believe that you shall establish good, and you will only find mischief."

"How so! how so!" demanded Eva and Aurora.

Miss Greta turned herself to and fro in her bed with pleasure at this contrast.

"But do speak! What do you mean? What do you mean to say?" cried Eva and Aurora.

"It will be difficult for me," replied Clara, "to express quite clearly what I feel, and perhaps I have no thoroughly clear conceptions of these things, but I can scarcely believe that your undertakings will so far avail as to improve the world, and make you happier in your homes; yes, I confess that I already shudder at the bare thought of all institutions for that purpose. It seems to me much better and more fitting to concern ourselves rather with the things within than without the house, and to take care that every member of the family has the care and attention which are his due. The preparation of your pieces of embroidery for the poor costs far more than the price at which one can reasonably sell them. These schemes and subscriptions, if you won't take it amiss, are properly nothing, nothing but a genteel sort of begging. Perhaps I am wrong, but I only speak out what I think of these matters."

Aurora and Eva spared no pains to make Clara perceive how indescribably confined and one-sided were her notions. At this moment a lady entered who was received by the two young sisters with loud joy. She was related both to them and to Miss Greta, by the latter of whom she was especially valued.

Eleonore E. was no longer young, nor pretty, nor elegant; neither, on the other hand, was she old, or ugly, or ill-dressed. She was, both externally and internally, most comfortable; moreover, neither discontented with her position in life, nor extremely indisposed to change it; nor for this was there wanting an opportunity; for a very estimable man had now for the second time offered her his hand. She was undecided whether to say yes or no. She was full of ~~whimsies~~, ~~irs~~, and ~~sots~~; and had found herself for some time in that odd condition in which the whole existence of a person lies between the words, "Yes, No, Yes!" and "No, Yes, No!"

The sisters, her cousins, who knew her perplexity, began at first cautiously and gently to approach this circumstance; by-and-by, however, they became bolder; and finally would persuade her to decide for wedlock, which they declared to be the greatest happiness on earth; and without which we are not in a condition to be useful to our fellow-creatures.

Eleonore looked at first at this assertion like a startled hare, yet she at length collected herself so far as that she undertook to debate upon it; that is, found herself able to state her doubts and misgivings on the subject. These, however, were zealously combated and rejected.

"To make the happiness of a husband!" cried Aurora.

"To have a sphere of activity; to be able to diffuse joy and prosperity around one;" interposed Eva.

"If we could actually effect anything," sighed Eleonore.

"To bring children into the world!" burst out Miss Greta.

"And educate them!" cried Aurora.

"Ah!" sighed Eleonore, "that is indeed the worst of all; the very thought of it deprives me of all courage. How can one be certain that we can really make the children happy, and actually give them a good education!"

"What do you say to it, Clara?" demanded Miss Greta. "Say, what would you do in this most intricate case?"

"Yes, say, say!" cried both sisters.

"I must first beg permission to put some questions to Miss Eleonore," said Clara.

"Good!" replied Eleonore; "and I promise you to answer them as honestly as I can."

"Well, then, do you love the wooer in question?"

"No—yes—no! I feel no love for him, but the most perfect respect—friendship."

"Very well. My second question is, does he love you? Is it thoroughly necessary to his happiness that you become his wife?"

"Yes—no—yes! I believe that he really loves me, but I believe also that he might be just as happy with another."

"Allow me still a third question. Are you dissatisfied with your present condition? are you displeased with your present sphere?"

"No—yes—no! I cannot say that anything in my present situation dissatisfies me. I am as contented with it as most people who wish to live as long on the earth as God pleases."

"I get quite angry, Eleonore!" exclaimed Miss Greta, impatiently. "How can people know so little of what they would have!"

But Clara said with greater seriousness, "This, then, is my counsel, Miss Eleonore: don't marry." And she added, "Ah! the letting alone in this case can do so little harm."

"Yes, you are certainly right," sighed Eleonore; "but one would nevertheless benefit some one in the world by one's life—one would make some one happy."

"But how can we be certain of achieving this through marriage!" said Clara, with tears in her eyes, and with an animation very rare with her. "Is not life full of trial, disquiet, and sorrowful occurrences! Our own life, our own persons, can indeed so very easily become a fountain of trouble for those to whom we unite ourselves. What a wide field for misfortunes of all kinds opens out itself with the plighting of a marriage truth! And the children! ah! why introduce more beings into a world where already so many contend with want and misery!"

"One gives them a good education, cultivates a talent in them, and procures them a secure income!" cried Eva and Aurora.

"Can we tell, then, beforehand whether we shall be able to do all this?" demanded Clara, with an expression which clearly betrayed that she in this respect had suffered painful experience. "There may be that in the character of the parents which may destroy the happiness of the children for ever. Oh! it is dreadful when the child must say to its mother, Why did you give me life! And when we give life to a child, how do we know that we shall be able to watch over its happiness! Perhaps we die early, and leave behind only little, poor orphans. Oh no! do not marry! it leads only to misfortune and misery. Are there not unfortunate enough already in the world! Is it not foolish to be the means of increasing this number!"

"But one does not die; one has a profitable employment," cried the sisters.

"It may be, it may be!" answered Clara warmly. "We may live; we may be rich; are we, therefore, sure of happiness and peace! Does a husband always continue the same? Is your husband precisely the person that can make you constantly happy? Do you know what it means—a miserable marriage!" Clara became more and more excited. "Look at the gloomy, wet, cold, foggy day"—she pointed out of the window—"it is like the life of a woman in an unhappy marriage! The sun, the flowers, all that is beautiful and amiable changes before it passes the threshold; all shrouds itself in hoariness; body and soul grow numb, and every hope grows pale before the ice-breath or the stormy character of a husband. He can play with impunity the tyrant in his own house, and she then is converted into a worm, a serpent, or an angel. To an angel! yes, if she perish in her misery—if she is able to suffer all for—but no! that is too heavy, too bitter! God send her death! Ah, venture on no such hazardous game! Do not marry! do not marry!" Clara's tears ran in streams.

Miss Greta, in wonder at the long speech of Clara, had raised herself in bed. Resting herself on the one fully-healed arm, she gazed at her attentively, and finally exclaimed, "Are you sane? are you actually in earnest to withhold people from marrying! My good child, how then shall the world be in a condition in honourable style to roll on its way! Perhaps you are of opinion that it would be for the best if some fine day it should go down altogether!"

Clara looked as though she did not see any great harm in that; but she only replied, "Those who really love each other, let them marry."

"Now God be praised!" said Miss Greta; "there I see at length an escape. But all the others, who have not the luck to be fooled in each other till death!"

"These may help the rest in the management of their households and the education of their children, and particularly fly to the assistance of those who groan under the weary yoke of this world."

"As I understand the matter," observed Miss Greta dubiously, "these good people shall indefatigably labour for others, and think no farther of themselves. But Clara, what fortune shall then be awarded to the poor wretches of helpers in this world, since it is nevertheless certain by the will of the Lord, that every one shall receive his portion of happiness and joy on earth!"

"I don't know," sighed Clara with tearful eyes. "I believe it was designed that there should be more joy than pain in the world, but it is rather a vale of misery than an abode of happiness; we are here, however, only in a state of probation. All will one day become good and manifest, when this is over. As things now are, it appears to me that she who remains single is always the happiest. She has only to care for herself; she can bear her burden alone, without distressing another with it. She can pass quietly through the world; needs burden no one, neither in conversation nor conduct; she is nowhere fast bound, and can without trouble go out of every one's way. She needs so little for herself, she can give away all that she has; she need please no one except God. What signifies it if we change, wither up, and lose all external charms! We do not depend on the humours of men; we do not wait their nod to withdraw ourselves; we come and go unnoticed and unblamed; a place on which to lay one's head at evening, that we find everywhere. Whether it be a soft pillow or bundle of straw makes no great difference; we are alone, we have only ourselves to care for, and seek nothing but the way to God."

Clara had spoken without passion, but with deep emotion. Tears stood in Miss Greta's eyes as she continued to gaze on Clara with astonishment. Some words of sincerest feeling lay upon her lips, but she suppressed them; laid herself quietly down; and only said—"It seems then, that though you have permitted marriage to those who really love each other, that you hold even this for half a folly, and are of opinion that it is best to remain unmarried, and to concern oneself with the world as little as possible."

"Yes, it is so," said Clara, and went on sewing with the greatest earnestness.

The three cousins looked in wonder on Clara, on each other, and all opened their mouths to speak, when Miss Greta made a signal with her hand, raised her voice, and spoke thus: "Listen to me, young ladies; and especially you, Clara, listen. I will relate to you a story."

She let Clara arrange her pillows: took a convenient, half-sitting, half-lying position; and began as follows:—

"One day the Virtues became weary of living altogether with the Bishop of Skara, and they therefore resolved on making a journey, in order to breathe a little fresh air. As they were about to enter a boat for this purpose, a poor woman with a pale child approached, and implored charity. Pity put her hand immediately into their travelling purse, and pulled out a piece of money: Economy, however, drew back the arm of her companion, and whispered in her ear—"What extravagance! give her a ticket for soup for the poor!"

"Foresight, who constantly carried a number of these tickets about her, after she had made more exact inquiries into the circumstances of the poor woman, consented to give her one of them. Pity, encouraged by a hint from Gener-ently, pressed secretly the money into the meagre hand. Zeal presented her with a copy of the 'Penny Magazine'; and pleased and thankful, though with a glance of indifference at the latter gift she went away.

"The Virtues now began hastily their voyage; mild winds blew around them, and in edifying conversation on the last sermon of the Bishop, they were borne thence by the dancing waves. Suddenly, however, a black cloud drew itself over the heavens. Foresight, who had bought a new bonnet for the journey, begged that they might go ashore, and seek shelter from the coming tempest. Courage was for defying the danger, but Prudence came to the support of Foresight, and they finally agreed to land. There observed they a boat which steered directly upon them, and whose passengers were in the highest degree jovial, and made a tremendous noise. It was a little company of Vices to which Good-humour had joined herself, and who now pursued their journey with the greatest delight. In passing by, they gave, purposely as it seemed, such a rude jolt to the boat of the Virtues, that it was very near capsizing. Courage took fire, he seized the strange boat, and was in the act to deal his blows among the crew, when Humanity threw herself between, and received on her cheeks the cuffs which the contending parties designed for each other. This pleased Good-humour so exceedingly that with one bound she sprang into the boat of the Virtues, and in doing this, gave such a violent shove to that of the Vices, that it nearly upset, and was borne away. Zeal and Love of Truth prepared to send after the Vices a cargo of insults, but Generosity gave them a signal to be silent; 'For,' said she, 'vice carries its own punishment with it.'

"In the mean time the storm-clouds had disappeared, and they continued their journey amid the most agreeable conversation. The Virtues visited many cities, one after another, and everywhere they sojourned they diffused blessings. Trade flourished, men became cheerful, many marriages took place, and people could not comprehend how it happened that all went so gloriously on earth.

"One evening, as the Virtues drank tea in the good city of Jönköping, and ate gingerbread to it, they boasted of their effects. Prudence, enraptured with their beneficent achievements, was just rising to make a sort of royal speech on the influence of the Virtues on mankind, when her eye accidentally fell on Humility, who cast on her a dubious glance. A member of the company here, after much exordium, made the motion that the Virtues, as they could effect much more good if they did not all keep together, should separate, and spread themselves over all quarters of the earth, in order, like the Apostles, to preach reformation to the world. This motion was received by all with the most zealous approbation; though I must remark that Prudence and Moderation were not present; they had withdrawn shortly before the introduction of the motion, in order in the city to replenish the company's stock of sugar and coffee, which had pretty well melted away. When they returned they did not delay putting themselves in opposition to the adopted resolution, but Courage and Zeal bawled so loud that the softer voices were scarcely heard; and as finally Generosity excited by Zeal, declared herself for the separation, Foresight dared no longer to raise her dove's voice, but bit her nails, and at length went out to order a new pair of shoes for the journey.

"The next day the Virtues separated, and went each, by herself alone into the world, after having agreed that day twelvemonth to meet again in Stockholm by the statue of Gustavus Wasa, in the Parliament-house square, and there to hold a 'plenum' on their own and the nation's affairs.

"Courage blackened his mustaches with lapis infernalis and directed his course to the north. On the way he met the knight Don Quixote, who advised him to arouse the ambition of the fair sex which had so long been suppressed, and to incite them to have self-assistance and self-defence.

"This pleased Courage extremely. While the two knights discoursed on the eventful metamorphosis of the hitherto so-called weak sex, they rode past a church out of which issued a marriage train. The new-made bride was an extraordinarily beautiful young lady, who did not seem quite a stranger to Courage, for she nodded friendly to him as she entered the carriage; this pleased Courage so much that he immediately selected her to become the model of her sex, and embraced the very first opportunity of introducing himself to her. What took place in the new household after this interview, is known in all the coffee-houses of the city of X., and they have pronounced their judgments thereupon. It is related that the young lady became immediately after the wedding as it were metamorphosed, and the husband thereupon nearly mad. Nothing was heard out of the mouths of the young couple but angry words and menaces, which speedily proceeded to blows. Finally the wife called out her husband to fight a duel; but upon this she was, on the recommendation of her own sex, clapped into a lunatic asylum, and the affair gave great scandal in the city and country round.

"Foresight chanced in Stockholm to read a long article in a newspaper on this occurrence. Horrified at the mischief which the folly of Courage had occasioned, she reflected on all the dangers and cross-grained accidents to which one is exposed in the world, and determined in her wisdom to withdraw entirely from it, satisfied that the highest good fortune to be attained here is to escape with a whole skin. In consequence of this conclusion she took lodgings with an old unmarried lady, who from fear of thieves inhabited a couple of attics four stories high. Here Foresight might have spent good and quiet days, if she had not been tormented with a thousand fears and fancies of all possible dangers. Out of terror of fire she scarcely trusted herself to cook anything; she was apprehensive of becoming ill from lack of fresh air, yet going out was not to be thought of; she might be run over by the very first carriage; a flower-pot might fall out of a window and kill her; she might break a leg on the steps, etc. No, no! going out was quite impossible; and such was the repugnance to this, that out of fear that she must one day be obliged to go out to purchase a new gown, she had not the courage to wear her old one, which was already torn in sundry places. At length it came to that pitch that she could neither stir hand nor foot. She had infected her landlady, the old maid, with all her fears and scruples to such a degree, that when at length a fire broke out in the house, the two friends dared to make no efforts for their escape, and must certainly have perished in the flames, had not a chimney-sweep and a carpenter taken them on their backs and brought them out at danger.

"In the mean time Zeal ran out in the world, gossiped, cried, preached, and drove mankind first in one direction and then in another. He tore the peasant from the plough, the mother from her children, and the officer from his bureau, to give to each of them other employment. Then he ran suddenly off, and left them to take care of themselves. As he turned himself from Europe towards China, in order to convert the heathen, he came too near to a mine in Russia in the moment of its explosion, was caught by the powder, and lost—alas, alas!—both his eyes! Still he ran some time longer about the world, creating naturally nothing but confusion, and came into collision with the police. He was ultimately compelled to provide himself with a conductor, who for a certain remuneration led him back to the place whence he had come.

"Humility, it is true, had not passed through such hazardous adventures; yet neither had it gone extraordinarily well with her. Separated from her companions, she cut such a pitiful and lamentable figure that nobody would have anything to do with her. After she had dragged herself, with bowings and curtsies, through the whole world; after actually crawling on her knees, knocking at all doors, and everywhere saying, 'I am not worthy to loose the latchet of your shoes,' and had been everywhere attacked and ill-used, she turned herself homeward, and reached Stockholm completely in rage, and nearly dead.

"Here, at the foot of the statue of the hero-king, saw she, one after another, all her early travelling companions arrive. But, great heaven! how changed were they. They could scarcely be recognised. Zeal had lost his fiery eyes, and was lame of the right leg. Courage carried an arm in a sling, and had in the highest degree the look of a mauvais sujet. Mildness was covered from head to foot with sores and blue marks: on her former angelically soft brow angry passion had seated itself, and every third word was a curse. Generosity had all the air of a comedian; he declaimed and ranted incessantly. Patience and Pity were become so thin and transparent, that they could not be seen without the deepest compassion. Good-humour was anything but sober. Prudence found herself in better case; but she was become haughty and boastful; she measured with an air of deep thought her steps and words; took snuff every minute, carried her head aloft, cast looks at her companions over her shoulder, turned up her nose, and was unbearable.

"It may be imagined whether, under such reversed circumstances, the meeting again of the Virtues was a pleasant one. To confess the truth, they resembled, in their present assembly, the Vices far more than the Virtues. But scarcely were they all together, had extended to each other the hand, and recognised each other, than their appearance began to change, and every Virtue to acquire its former character. Prudence took from her travelling medicine-chest an ointment, rubbed therewith the darker eyes of Zeal, which speedily opened them; so, beaming with their former fires. Good-humour was so struck with the dry, ghastly appearance of Humility, that she became sober on the spot; and the Virtues resolved to strengthen themselves in the next hour with a banquet and a bowl of punch: there would every one relate his travelling adventures, and take a resolution for the future. 'Brave!' exclaimed Courage, and gave Foresight the hand; Good-humour took Humility under the arm and led the way, the rest all cheerfully following.

"It would be leading us too far to repeat all the adventures with which the Virtues entertained each other over the bowl. Suffice it to state the resolve which at the end of the sitting was unanimously adopted by all present; this was, that from this time forward the Virtues should always travel together, and should separate as seldom as possible, since they found that each one given over to herself, without the counsel and support of the rest, only played the fool. With this resolution all the Virtues were highly satisfied. They concluded the feast with a song which Good-humour improvised, and which they styled the 'League of the Virtues.' As I no longer, however, recollect perfectly the verses of which it consisted, and have no desire by mangling them to convert good-humour into ill-humour, I here close my relation, leaving to my hearers the application of it."

The young ladies were enchanted by the story, yet would put questions and seek explanations; but Miss Greta did not go at all into them, but only begged her young friends to digest the matter each according to her ability.

Eva and Aurora soon rose to take leave. Eleonore followed them, after she had requested permission of Clara to come again, to speak with her farther on marriage. Miss Greta claimed for herself the right to be present, and that as an advocate for the lover. Eleonore, smiling and sighing, agreed; yet on her way home the question of marrying went on in her mind with a yes, then a no, then a yes, and then a no again. Aurora and Eva were deeply engaged in projects of purchasing for themselves elegant dresses for the next representation of the amateur theatre for the benefit of those who had suffered in the town of W.

Miss Greta, who now associated in her thoughts the tulle-devouring lover with Clara's horror of marriage, said to her with great seriousness, "Clara, either you are an extraordinary creature, or you are proceeding on a most perilous path."

Clara was silent; and Miss Greta continued—"Your repugnance to marriage is not natural. I can very well conceive that people do not enter it with so light a heart as they enter a ball-room: but your repugnance, and the views which you entertain of life generally, are equally unchristian and opposed to nature. Man is not made to be alone. I cannot indeed exactly say that it would be agreeable to me to be regarded by you as a person fit for a madhouse, if I should take it into my head to marry, which might very well come to pass without my being quite befooled with my chosen one."

"And if you do some time marry under such circumstances, I will not therefore call it foolish; since no one seems to me so calculated as you to make a husband happy. You are accompanied through life by good-fortune and cheerfulness, which communicate themselves to all that surround you."

"It rejoices me, Clara, that you think so of me," said Miss Greta, pressing her hand.

"But if you knew," continued Clara, "what it is to suffer want, to hunger—if you knew how many there are in the world who daily starve—you would certainly not marry, but remain single, in order to be able to assist the suffering, and to feed the hungry."

"My best Clara," said Miss Greta, with her well-known arch smile, "I am certain that if I followed your counsel, that his Holiness the Pope would one day, on that very account, canonize me, and that I should be worshipped as St. Margaret; but that I should thereby effect any good, I do not believe: on the contrary, I fear that I should only increase the number of the giddy and good-for-nothing. As to what concerns 'works of mercy,' I have on that head my own notions. I hold ennui to be the greatest evil, yawning the greatest pest; and those who know how to drive these away by innocent amusement to be the greatest benefactors of mankind. A hearty laugh is worth more than ducats."

"That is true," replied Clara; "but ennui is a self-induced evil, and they who have cause to yawn might have cause also to be merry, if they were wise; but—"

"Well! but!—"

"But with the sufferers of whom I speak it is different. The deepest misery oppresses them. If they would raise themselves, they cannot do it; want and sickness weigh like a stupendous burden on soul and body. The unhappy moulder away in the living body."

"This happens indeed to many of the rich also," said Miss Greta: "I think it is the fault of people themselves when they fall into trouble. Honourable and orderly people always are able to help themselves. Besides this, it is very difficult to dispense alms properly, and the unworthy receive them generally far oftener than the actually suffering."

"It may possibly have its difficulties," replied Clara; "when, however, we shun not the labor, and do not begrudge the time, these are easily surmounted. Do not say, that every one is able to help himself. Ah! there are such inevitable misfortunes, there is such unconquerable misery. One may even regard the failings of men as misfortunes, which it is difficult to avoid. We talk often of the love of pleasure of the poor, of their intemperance. Ah! if you knew how sparingly pleasure is scattered on their path of life! And if life falls heavily upon them, and in a weak moment they are not able to resist the allurements of pleasure—if they sometimes enjoy a fleeting hour, shall they then do penance for it for their whole life? Shall that be punished in them as a crime, which in the wealthy is at worst termed a pardonable weakness? O if you knew how many of these faults have their origin in want, in the privation of enjoyment! The poor need enjoyment just much as bread. Joy is the fresh air which makes man breathe more freely—that he is glad of life, that he believes in God."

Clara's tears flowed so abundantly that she could no longer speak. Miss Greta was silent; but Clara's words opened to her the view of a side of life which she had hitherto passed over unnoticed. She cast a long gaze over scenes which till now had wholly escaped her eyes, and her heart felt itself oppressed. What consequences this had, I do not say; they are too natural, too holy to be trumpeted abroad. If, however, my fair readers suppose that Miss Greta appointed her friend her treasurer, and that Clara therefore shed tears of warm joy, I will so far confess that they have in the main hit on the fact.

And thou, stern judge of merit, and abhorrer of alms, shake not thy head over it. Invest thy money in manufactories, in railways, in what thou wilt; but leave Clara alone. Fear nothing! she will certainly not give her silk gown to a poor woman; her money to a drunkard; she certainly will not, like a certain amiable young Countess, fling her Turkish slippers to a little barefoot chimney sweep. She will conduct the poor child into the school, give work to the unemployed, procure medicine for the sick, and deal out alms discreetly. Is that not putting out her capital to interest! And should it only penetrate at times as a bright moment into a gloomy existence, as a little alleviation of incurable pains, yet—

"Ah! let the wise ones order the world as they will, there will always remain room in it for misfortune, for unmerited suffering; and there will therefore never be wanting a stimulant to the activity of the Sisters of Charity."

CHAPTER XVI.

CONVERSATION IN THE EVENING TWILIGHT.

"This is needful that the right
Ever fearlessly be done;
Then be victory ours, or flight,
Tis, and bideth—all as one."—GILDER.

THE day of Edla's departure was fixed and at hand. Nina alone knew nothing of it, and believed the hour of separation yet far distant. Edla desired to spare to the sensitive mind of her sister the pain of bidding farewell; she saw therefore very gladly, that, as the winter weather was so mild and fine, the Countess accepted an invitation to a neighboring seat, where it was the wish to entertain with great festivity the new year, the new-married pair, and his Excellency's lovely daughter. Edla observed how the Countess took all possible pains to keep them more and more apart, and how she sought to prevent every cordial advance, especially in the few days before departure, when the souls of severing friends are wont involuntarily to overflow with love and confidence. Edla saw the purpose of the Countess, but she disdained any attempt to defeat it. To wish now to hold back Nina, to occasion her tears instead of joy, Edla would have rejected as a piece of unwarrantable egotism. With a sorrow which was not without its sweetness, Edla thought, "She shall be cheerful; she shall sport and laugh, while I forsake the paternal home; she shall not see that I suffer. The clouds shall fly rapidly across the heaven of her joy."

The Countess at parting was ice-cold toward Edla. "A pleasant journey," said she, with indifference. "I have given orders that everything that you require shall be made ready for your journey."

"I thank you! I have already prepared all myself," answered Edla as coldly. "Farewell, my father! my father!"—Her voice faltered.

"I shall see you again before you go," said the President, as he drew on, with a great bustle and much noise, his over-shoes, in order to hide his starting tears.

Now came Nina. She was wonderfully beautiful in the splendid winter dress, in the princely ermine. Edla combated with the most violent emotion. As she met Nina's tearful eyes, her inquiring glance; as she felt her tremble in her embrace, and heard her repeat with conspicuous anxiety, "I shall see thee soon, very soon again!" then Edla congratulated herself on having been enabled to spare the tender feelings of her sister, and to make her departure as easy as possible. She calmed Nina, and saw with a cloudless brow her family set forth.

The next day Edla was busied with her own affairs. She wrote a long letter to Nina, full of kindness and good sense. The evening of the last day arrived. Edla had taken leave of Miss Greta, who was not in the least deceived as to what went on in the house and in Edla's mind, and testified toward her the most cordial esteem. In Miss Greta, Edla embraced a sincere admirer, and went thence down into the sitting-room, where, before the comfortable fire, silent and composedly, she awaited the farewell visit of Count Ludwig.

Twilight and snow-drifts, a fire in the chimney, and deep silence in a lonely room, are the most auspicious spirits of confidence. In the hour of twilight, Mystery, that child afraid of the light, steps forth from its hiding-place; then wheel the bats here and there, the owls utter their ominous cry, "Come with us! come with us!" The fear of spectres announces itself amid its shudderings and terrors. But then also nobler apparitions of the hidden world come forth from the depths of the human heart. How gladly does Reconciliation kindle her beaming star in the glow of the descending sun! How lovingly and refreshingly descend the dews of Consolation! I will not speak of declarations of love; between the twilight and the fire they skip forth involuntarily, and are the lighter footed the more they resemble will-o'-wispes. The Christ-child, too, appears at this hour. In a word, it is remarkable how, in the goosying hour of twilight, everything comes to the daylight.

It is also remarkable how mal-a-propos this impromptu is here brought in, and how little it agrees with the present moment in the twilight by the fireside. Here sit Edla and Count Ludwig in the easy chairs, silent as statues, and gaze with thoughtful looks into the burning embers, as they sink down into charcoal and ashes. Friendly reader, your pardon! Perhaps you will kindly recollect that probably you have already in the world heard prefaces that did not, by any means, agree with the matter that came after.

Finally Count Ludwig broke the silence, and said to Edla with an expression of deep dissatisfaction, "You depart, you withdraw yourself for a long time, and leave me behind in the most painful uncertainty. You will not allow that I express either to Nina or her father a wish which you yourself at the same time approve. How long is this restraint to continue? How long am I to appear to your parents—to the world—yes, to Nina herself—in a dubious light!"

"Not to Nina!" interrupted Edla. "She knows of your love—she knows on what account you delay your declaration."

"Good!"

"She is grateful for your kindness; grateful that you do not just yet require from her so important a decision; for which she considers herself still too young and inexperienced. She fears yet any change of her condition; she is not yet sufficiently prepared for it. She knows my anxiety on account of her health, on account of the tenderness of her soul. I believe that she must not marry till her health is more confirmed, till she is altogether better acquainted with the world, in which she must take her place as your wife. She makes now her first acquaintance with social life, let her move undisturbed in it—she is yet so young. By this you will be able to be near her, and to endeavor to win—"

"Win what?" asked Count Ludwig sharply.

"Her heart! How sincerely do I desire that this should become yours. I will not conceal it from you. Nina esteems, but does not love you."

"I know it," answered Count Ludwig coldly. Edla looked at him inquiringly and surprised.

With a tone of considerable emotion Count Ludwig continued—"Wonder not if he who from the cradle learned to do without tenderness; who, the only time that he thought himself beloved, found himself deceived; wonder not if his glance has become penetrative of the feelings of others, and if he be no longer liable to delusions on that head. I know it—I am not beloved—it is not easy to love me; and indeed, I do not require it. Who does not succeed in being beloved! Who cannot inspire passion, especially in women? Forgive me, Edla; but you cannot be so blind as others to the weakness of your sex. A singer, whose whole merit consists in a well-executed air—a good dancet—some bravura or bravado—a neat exterior—an agreeable temper—all this appears amiable, and can awaken love. I cannot do that. I have quite made up my mind on this score, and I demand from Nina no exception. Yes; I am even prepared to know that she can love another—that one of those small men whom I despise—"

"Count Ludwig!" interrupted Edla with astonishment; "do I hear aright?"

"Yes; but hear me to the end. That sweet, that bewitching feeling I cannot awaken, cannot expect it; neither can Nina feel it for me, but she may learn perhaps something of it from others. That is natural; it signifies nothing to me, and I can lose nothing thereby. I will deserve that which is better, will win that which is more important—Nina's perfect esteem, her perfect confidence, and truest friendship. In the best and deepest meaning of the word, Nina will be mine. What I love in Nina is not her beauty, not her fascination of manner, not the accomplishment which as Edla's pupil she possesses; but the woman—the woman par excellence—the kind, sweet, unassuming woman. I am stern and hard—I know it. Only through a character, only through a mind like hers, can I become milder and happier; can I indeed become happy. Nina is the pupil of Edla; she will learn to value that good which I have in me, and will also by her angel gentleness make me more human. She will see in me her best friend, her conductor; she will love her children, her house, her influence over myself. Believe me, she will be happy!"

"I fear," said Edla with a deep sigh, "that you misunderstand the peculiar nature of love. Perhaps you call the same thing only by another name. Friendship and confidence constitute certainly the firmest, sweetest heart of love. If you, therefore, are of opinion that these sentiments are requisite to the happiness of Nina and yourself, pardon me if I say that you must not exert alone your strict virtues to acquire them. Confidence, especially, is a bashful child; we must seek to win it by kindness, by good will. Flowers only open themselves to the genial rays of the sun. If you will win the love of my sister, you must be kind and tender toward her. Oh! you do not know how sensitive she is—how she needs tenderness as well as strength. Be affectionate to her, Count Ludwig, or you will not win her. Be gentle and tender—"

"Edla!" interrupted Count Ludwig, "demand not from the oak, that it stoops itself to the tender flowers; accustom rather the flowers to wind themselves round its firm stem."

"Not so, Count Ludwig!" said Edla, "your comparisons halt, and the relations between man and woman may not be regarded so one-sidedly; it is not so indeed. My flower requires a tender waiting upon, otherwise she is not for you. Be kind to Nina, Count Ludwig, I repeat it once more! Be affectionate, or you will not succeed with her. Learn to value what is so beautiful in her; her angelic goodness, her heavenly disposition, learn to value this; abuse it not; exercise no harshness toward it. How easy were it for a hard hand to destroy her whole life. How often have I not blamed myself for my own severity, which yet was only called forth by the deepest tenderness. How often has her angelic soul made me meek in spite of myself. Remember, Count Ludwig, how she suffered as a child from the toothache, and when the surgeon had drawn her a sound instead of a decayed one, remember how she bore the continued pain so long as the surgeon remained present, and then begged me not to mention it to him, as it might be unpleasant to him. This is only a trifle; but numbers of such traits stand as lovely stars in the heaven of gentleness and amiability, which expands itself above Nina's whole life. She was thus as a child, she is thus still. Tell me, Count Ludwig, deserves not such a heart that it should be spared, that we should seek to win it by kindness and tenderness."

Tears stood in Edla's eyes. Count Ludwig

also was moved, as he replied—"Give me this angel to wife! Let me be daily, hourly, beneath her influence; then shall I perhaps become what you wish, what Nina requires. Yes! perhaps it will enable me to become amiable—at least to her." A smile which made him infinitely handsome, passed over his countenance. "And this," continued he, "would enable me so much the more easily to condemn the judgment of the multitude; for these will always regard me as a pitiless egotist, as a hard, proud, heartless man. On that score I am easily comforted; yes, it even flatters my self-love to be so judged, and the more so if in the future—should I myself not live to witness this—my native land shall flourish through improvements to which I have contributed; already do I bless those who in a thoughtless manner endeavored to degrade my name. See, Edla, this is the honor, the reward which I seek, and which I know how to win. If in aspirations after the actual, the enduring, I handle sometimes the superficial somewhat roughly, terrify a dove-like nature, or wholly pull down half-decayed fabrics—yes, if in pressing, important demands, sometimes forget sufficiently to spare; let not Edla therefore condemn, let not Nina therefore fear me."

"Count Ludwig!" said Edla, "I honour most highly the purity of your intentions, the firmness of your character; I fear only your extreme manner of thinking. More mildness, more philanthropy, more respect for personal feeling, if I may say so, would render your whole activity still more beneficent."

"Give me Nina to wife!" cried Count Ludwig with warmth; "constitute her my good angel, and the hardness of my nature will melt. If she walk by my side, I shall become less stern. She has a talisman in her hand, which can cause much power over me. Let her use it; let me daily, hourly hear her voice, see her sweet countenance, then—but not till then, Edla—expect not too much from me, not even for her. I will every day venture my life for her; but to be gentle, tender, amiable with her, to play the Caledon amid the throng that always are about her, that do not hope; do not require it, Edla! I should only make myself ridiculous. And I must repeat it, that I can make nothing out of what is called the amiable, the agreeable; nothing even out of what is called goodness. This is one ambiguous quality, which assumes the most miserable weakness for its shield. I have only too well experienced that the greatest amiability may be united with the greatest depravity of heart. I think you once saw Edward D. with me—tell me what impression he made upon you."

"I acknowledge," replied Edla, "that he struck me as extremely amiable; that the soul which spoke through his features, seemed utterly incapable of the crime which he committed."

"You only saw him," continued Count Ludwig, smiling bitterly, "but what is that to his conversation, to daily intercourse with him! It would have disarmed his bitterest enemy. I loved him," said Count Ludwig, with an expression of unusual softness; "never have I so loved any one, never so wholly and sincerely confided in any one! And he deceived me!"

He brought death and deprivation to my very heart! Certainly, I should at that time have become a man-hater; I should have steeled my bosom for ever against every better feeling, had it not been for you, Edla! With manly strength, with womanly gentleness, you again restored my soul to fortitude, and healed the wounds of my heart."

Edla turned away her face, on which deep emotion was visible.

"Have I really been able to do that, Count Ludwig?" demanded she, with a voice that was choked with tears.

"Healed—" continued Count Ludwig, as if conversing with himself; "healed is too much to say. These wounds heal never. There are moments in which it seems to me as if his blood could be the only balsam. The wounds healed not, but you have alleviated their burning pain. Edla and Nina have reconducted me to humanity."

After a short silence he proceeded painfully. "We met as boys at the academy. He surpassed me in every thing. That vexed me. I would always be first. I began to hate him. Then he fought and bled for me, in a most unequal contest into which I had fallen. My hate now changed itself into love. He returned it, at least as I believed. He tolerated me and my gloomy mind. He made me every day better, he was so amiable. And he was proud with all his gentleness; he permitted no protection; he accepted not the smallest support. This vexed and charmed me at the same time. He seemed to be the best, the most distinguished of men. I built upon him more than upon the whole world; yes, more than upon myself. He had a power over me which no one had besides—"

Count Ludwig was silent, as overpowered by his feelings; then went on, while a mild paleness clothed his features. "The serpent had a too seductive tongue, as the Bible says. How do I disdain this amiability, behind which so much crime, so much depravity can be concealed! The deceiver! the seducer! how I hate him. I know not whether he is gone; but I rue it, that I have not branded him before the world, so that he could no more deceive, no more seduce! Edla! if you ever meet him on this earth, trust not your sagacity—trust not the abhorrence with which his crimes have filled you—flee him! flee him! His amiability, his apparent excellence, his heavenly-speaking eyes, would misguide you! Do not see him! do not hear him! His tongue is false as seducing. He could win over the purest being. Flee him! Has he not dishonoured, murdered the sister of his friend? And goes about in the world unpunished; perhaps beloved, perhaps honored—in order to make yet many more unhappy victims! Why have I spared him? But Thou, Heaven! wilt punish him—Thou, the just Avenger! wilt consign him—"

"Ludwig cease!" exclaimed Edla, with sternness and dignity.

Count Ludwig was suddenly silent, but he combated in himself with only the greater violence; his lips trembled, and his eyes flashed forth flames of wrath. It was long before he became fully himself again. He then sighed deeply and said—"Pardon me!"

"These outbreaks, Count Ludwig, are unworthy of you," said Edla. "How much would they disturb Nina's peace."

"She shall never experience them. I will be worthy of you and your sister." Count Ludwig pressed Edla's hand to his lips, and hastily withdrew.

Edla remained behind with excited feelings. Her wishes, her thoughts, compared Ludwig and Nina; and there came continually over her mind, a doubt, a pain, which softly whispered the question—"Will he make her happy!" But she rejected this question as a spectre of her imagination.

Perhaps it may seem to my fair readers inconsistent that Edla should so warmly have favoured the suit of Count Ludwig; inconsistent with her clear sense that she did not perceive how unfitting must be such a character for the soft, love-requiring mind of her sister. I would willingly defend her against this charge, and therefore we will examine the matter closer.

There existed a similarity between Edla and Count Ludwig which drew them involuntarily to each other. Both of them in their childhood and youth had been treated with neglect; both were by nature denied the early faculty of winning the hearts of men, and of finding pleasure to themselves in intercourse with others. Both had a pure, moral, and upright character; although Count Ludwig, in consequence of inborn pride and bitter experience, had acquired a stern hardness; Edla, on the contrary, from the exercise of noble duties, had derived more kindness and gentleness. Count Ludwig's stern virtue had excited Edla's admiration; his unhappy story had called forth her sincerest sympathy; admiration and sympathy beget love, and this feeling threw a veil over all the failings of Count Ludwig. Edla would willingly have sacrificed her life for his happiness; but she judged too justly of herself for it to have occurred to her to make him happy through her own attachment. But Nina! Count Ludwig loved her; and the maternal tenderness which more and more developed itself in her heart for Nina became at length stronger than her feelings for Count Ludwig. There lay an infinite happiness for her in the thought of consigning her Nina to the most honoured and the most beloved man in the world. If a fear sometimes fell upon her that Count Ludwig could not make her sister happy, this became in turn expelled by the doubt that probably Nina was not fully worthy of the Count. These doubts were again reconciled by the internal conviction that the two beloved beings would certainly perfect each other; and Edla saw therein, not only her own happiness, but her heart beat warmly in the beautiful hope that out of this union would spring much good for others. So felt and thought Edla. Do you yet understand or not!

We will now seek Edla again at the fireside.

The last ember was extinguished, and Edla returned to her bed-chamber. Here she found all prepared for the journey, and an indescribable weight fell upon her heart. She felt like a stranger in her father's house. It was only by the compulsion of circumstances that she abandoned these rooms, in which she had been the quiet, ruling spirit, in which formerly she had been beloved and cherished. Now she was solitary, forsaken, and shunned—and all without fault of hers! The atmosphere of the room, the aspect of the furniture, especially that belonging to her sister, a little shawl which she had carelessly flung over an easy chair—all awoke in Edla's heart the feeling of unpeakable sadness. An angry bitterness rose in her soul against her who had occasioned all these painful changes: but a feeling of hatred in her own soul was to her intolerable, and she resisted and combated with it earnestly. With what weapons? He who had seen Edla pale, sorrowful and speechless, seated on her travelling trunk, would not probably have believed that she at that moment fought out a fight more even, and achieved a victory more glorious, —an ever did Napoleon. With what weapons? Call them heavenly, my dear reader—thou knowest them as well as I.

Edla had parted with unusual coldness from her step-mother. She resolved to write some lines to her, in order to leave behind her a more favourable impression, and to press more earnestly upon her mind care for Nina's health. As she approached her writing-desk her eyes fell on a casket of red-morocco, which appeared to be placed with such a degree of care that it should not be overlooked. She opened it, and found a costly necklace of genuine pearls, and with it these words in the hand of her father—"To the best of daughters, from her loving father. Very early in the morning I shall be with thee."

Now first flowed tears down Edla's cheeks; but they were sweet, salutary tears. She felt that her father understood her, secretly thanked her, and all became light and bright about her. The parting had lost its bitterness, and how willingly now did she obey the divine command—"Thou shalt ever bless thy enemies."

Edla travelled away with a heart which had beaten warmly in the paternal embrace. There came in no one to talk over her journey, nor to assign reasons and suppositions for it; so well and quietly had she ordered this matter. Deep and powerful souls adjust everything in silence, and make no noise with their doings and themselves. They go on their way like the works of God. In deep silence the sun ascends the heaven; silently sinks the night down upon the earth. What prepares itself in greater stillness than the re-awaking of nature, and what is more glorious than the spring?

CHAPTER XVII.

SECRETS.

Thou shalt tell it to neither friend nor foe.

JESUS SHACH.

Two months were now flown since the fresco-painting of the little Filius, and since Miss Greta's accident. The broken arm could already tolerably perform again its office, and Miss Greta might very soon quit her sick chamber; but to say the truth, she cared very little about it. She had become acquainted with a happiness that was of more value to her than all the attractions of her former life. Ah! it is when the heart cleaves to another that life first becomes rich, and the spirit is satisfied.

Between Miss Greta and Clara an affectionate relationship had sprung up—Miss Greta herself knew not how—which, however, made them both thoroughly happy. They had neither of them imparted to the other their own concerns, neither had related the romance of her life, nor had sighed forth the Oh! and Ah! of the heart; and yet they knew each other sufficiently; yet cherished they a mutual confidence, which only waited the occasion by and by to convert itself into the most genuine friendship. Perhaps a tender friend will find this expression too weak and far-fetched; I for my part know no stronger and better.

Miss Greta was already carrying in head and heart a plan which was not yet fully matured, when one evening the Countess hastily entered her room, and exclaimed in great excitement, "Well! what say you to it?"

"What shall I say?" replied Miss Greta merrily; "I say first good evening, and then, like Clara, be seated, and let us be quiet."

"Yes, but it is precisely Clara who gives us occasion not to say this," continued the Countess. "Margaret! your Clara is a worthless, hypocritical person, who does not deserve the kindness which you bestow upon her. She is a serpent which you have warmed on your bosom!"

"Well, well, what is it then?" demanded Miss Greta seriously, but quietly.

"She has not kept her promise; she is to-day again for the third time gone out secretly."

"Well," replied Miss Greta, endeavoring vainly to conceal her vexation; "we need not on that account cry fire and murder! She has probably gone out to breathe a little fresh air; for on my account she has been obliged to suffer sitting enough."

"Very good! But must she in the fresh air enjoy the company of a young man? I have had her watched. Rosalie has procured intelligence of the house to which she goes. These visits have certainly been made frequently."

Miss Greta turned pale, for the tulde-vourer stood vividly before her eyes. After a short pause she asked—"And who is he? what is he? where does he live?"

The Countess named the house, but could only give confused information regarding the person in question. "They say," related she, "that he has committed some crime, coined false money, or something of the kind; that he hides from the police, and lives in the extreme poverty—in a word a most scandalous story."

"Poverty!" interrupted Miss Greta.

"Yes," continued the Countess, "and it is only all too probable that Clara supports him—not that I will criminate her—but her conduct is ground enough for the worst suspicions. The obstinate refusal to give any explanation regarding her promenades testifies how unworthy the object of them must be—"

"Of that I strongly doubt," said Miss Greta.

"I wish it may be otherwise," replied the Countess, "but it is scarcely to be hoped. Abandon Clara I will not, but I can no longer suffer her to remain in my house. The domestics are already aware of the circumstance, and I dare not, for the example's sake, take such a proceeding under my protection. Clara must be placed under stricter surveillance. I will, for the present put her under the care of Mrs. F."

"Of the soldier's wife! Well selected! and when will you send her off?"

"Without delay! In the morning if it be possible I confess that the daily sight of such ingratitude and meanness is intolerable to me. Besides this, her proceeding demands speedy measures. I have already informed her brothers of it."

"That have you done?" interrupted Miss Greta warmly. "You have communicated to her brothers dark suspicions."

"I have done it," answered the Countess, "that in the first place they may know what they are to think of their sister; and in the next place, to justify my own demeanor toward her. They made a call just as Rosalie had communicated to me her discoveries. In my first exasperation I poured out my complaints against her, and trust moreover that their severity will better restrain the disobedient girl than my warnings could. She does not deserve to be further spared."

"You have acted precipitately and unkindly, Natalie!" said Miss Greta, much displeased. "Why did you not first speak with me upon it, and in concert with me first consider what was to be done? Who knows but that Clara will come clear out of all these suspicions? What then did the brothers say?"

"Oh, they were beside themselves; they were quite desperate, the poor men! at last they begged me to act in this affair according to my own pleasure."

"That is more than I could have done in their place! I cannot approve what you have done; and can as little give my consent to what you propose."

"Margaret!" exclaimed the Countess with pride and emphasis, "to my oversight and my protection was Clara consigned."

"I have nothing to say against that," replied Miss Greta somewhat shortly. "The only thing which I beseech of you is not to speak farther with Clara this evening: not to admit the brothers to her; and the moment she retires to send her up to me."

The Countess was obliged to promise this; and as a message came now from the President to apprise her that the carriage had already been waiting half-an-hour, and as it was the latest moment for proceeding to the great court dinner, the Countess left Miss Greta to her own reflections.

Miss Greta sat long silently in the dark, and wept. So soon as she was become calmer, and her thoughts had regained their accustomed clearness, she rung the bell, ordered the lamp to be brought, and in her sofa-corner awaited Clara's return with a composure which a fixed and firm resolve can give.

Clara came. Her step was lighter, the expression of her countenance more cheerful than usual; and her voice alone betrayed some haste and uneasiness as she inquired how Miss Greta found herself. Struck with the unexpected short answer, Clara went directly up to her friend, looked her true-heartedly in the eyes, and asked tenderly—"Are you not well? do you want anything?"

Her look and tone gave Miss Greta pain.

She turned herself away, and said short and sternly—"Clara, you have broken your vow; you have again gone out alone, and that in the evening."

Clara was silent. Miss Greta had not the courage to look at her, and went on—"You have been followed; you have been with a young man."

Clara was silent. Miss Greta looked at her. She was pale, and leaned with her hand on the table, as if seeking to collect herself. A long silence followed.

"Clara!" at length exclaimed Miss Greta, with a tone which revealed her inward trouble, "Clara! have you then nothing to say?"

Clara's pale lips murmured a soft but distinct "No!"

"Then," said Miss Greta seriously but dejectedly, "then Clara, I must tell you what fate awaits you, and what consequences your behavior and your obstinacy draw after them. The Countess, justly incensed at your ingratitude, has informed your brothers of what has occurred and of her suspicions. In the morning you must leave the house—leave it with disgrace, for the domestics know of your wanderings; they will not cease to relate them to every one who is ready to listen. Your character is lost!"

Deathly pale but composedly, Clara answered with a choked voice—"That has happened to many an innocent person: God sees it: can Him must I hope?"

"Speak not so, Clara!" cried Miss Greta warmly; "misuse not the name of God. I cannot bear to hear people talking of innocences, where the proceedings testify to the contrary. I do not believe in circumstances which are so unfortunately entangled that individuals cannot avoid appearing to their fellow-creatures as guilty; I do not understand how people can involve themselves in secret practices, and then call on the name of God to testify to the innocence of these practices. Have you not read in the Scriptures that good deeds do not shut the light? Such mysteries and such circumstances we find in romances—"

"Only in romances!" interrupted Clara with a sorrowful smile.

"Yes, only in romances," continued Miss Greta with unceasing zeal. "To them belong intrigues and secret passages; in them people conceal their doings from sympathizing friends. In actual life, Clara, people help themselves with somewhat sounder reason and an honorable confession. I ask you yet once more, Clara, will you confide in me! Clara, I beseech, I implore you, confide in me!"

"I cannot; it is impossible!" exclaimed Clara, combating with her tears.

"Clara," said Miss Greta, "I will not hear that! It is human to err, but one must not be stupid: that is not human, since man is endowed with reason. Your behavior at this moment is wholly irrational, and your obstinacy now sets the only person against you that could or would save you."

"I cannot help it," answered Clara; "it cannot be otherwise."

"You are intolerable!" cried Miss Greta, but collected herself again, and proceeded very seriously. "Do not be too hasty. Reflect on the consequences! It may be hard to confess a transgression, but it is still harder to pass a whole life in poverty and contempt. Reflect, Clara! the countess may be softened: thy future yet rescued—thy failings shall be forgiven, but all on one only condition—concesses!"

"I cannot! I will not!" said Clara with a firm tone. "My life is pure, but I cannot lay open my motive to the day."

"One moment more!" exclaimed Miss Greta with icy determination, "and then I abandon all farther concern with you. Your brothers are instructed of your proceedings. You have to expect their reproaches, perhaps their persecutions; the countess exerts—"

"I shall know how to withdraw myself from them!" interposed Clara somewhat excited, and made a movement as if to go out. Miss Greta laid her hand on her arm, and said, as she looked keenly and inquisitively into her eyes, "run off, perhaps! Traverse the country with your lover, and play traged—"

"No! not no!" cried Clara vehemently.

"Choose the better part, Clara!" continued Miss Greta with cold seriousness. "I will liberate you; I will do everything for you; I demand, I implore only confidence. You can choose between my protection and public disgrace. Decide!"

"I have decided," answered with a low voice the death-pale Clara; "I am innocent—but I cannot, I will not prove it!"

"Go then!" exclaimed Miss Greta angrily. "go! I believe not your innocence, and will do nothing for you. In the morning you will be expelled from the house with shame!"

"I will not wait for it!" said Clara with so faint a voice that Miss Greta's fine ear could scarcely catch it. Clara approached the door, but in the moment in which she laid her hand upon the lock, she felt herself seized by two arms, and held back. It was Miss Greta, who conducted her back almost by force to the sofa, seated herself by her side, embraced her affectionately, while she addressed her in a tone which one must have heard in order to understand its effect.

"Are you not sane? Do you think that I spoke seriously? Do you believe that I could forsake you? Listen, child! These arms which now inclose thee thou hast cherished and healed. They will therefore embrace you your life long! Do not think that I shall let you go—you may be as contrary as you will. Hear Clara! my poor child, you have done wrong: you have been foolish; fear not, I will keep you if it be possible; I will turn all to your good. I am rich, and no one to care for; you shall be my child. Poor girl!" exclaimed she, while she pressed Clara affectionately to her heart. "you have been imprudent, have acted with a high hand; but that anything bad is concealed behind it, I cannot and will not believe. Fear nothing, trust to me; we will set all right again. I should hate myself if I could believe anything bad, anything blamable of you. I will take all upon myself, and bring all again into the right course. And you shall assign to me the right to do it: hear you Clara? you shall! For from this time forward you belong to me, and I shall exercise a merciless tyranny over you. You shall come to me, and share my house, my table, all that I have. You shall tell me your wishes that I may fulfil them; and impart to me your cares, that I may dissipate them. Will you do that, Clara? Will you be my child?"

Clara could not answer; Miss Greta saw it, and held the sobbing maiden fast pressed to her bosom. "Hear, child!" she continued, in order to give her time to collect herself, "I do not desire that you should love me entirely on that account; don't trouble yourself about that; but we will see whether you will be able to avoid it, when once I have my hand in play in the direction of your destiny. I demand now no friendship, only a degree of confidence, some sound sense, and a little more obedience. You really owe me some acquiescence, for I assure you that you have made me quite ill with your secrets, and the lover who devours tulle and necklaces as another mortal fieldfare; and it would be much worse with me, if I could believe of yourself still more unnatural things. You may believe that all this has gone sufficiently into my arms to delay very considerably my recovery. In all this it requires only a word from you to put me in a position to combat successfully not only against your lover and patroness, but also against your own folly. And I tell you, I intend to do it without this word; yes! you may allow it or not, I have resolved one for all no more to set you at liberty, but to consider all that belongs to you as my affair. You may do as you will, you are henceforth my incomprehensible, beloved child!"

Clara had at first become speechless with astonishment and wonder; but at these words, at this tone of the most cordial kindness, at the certainty of possessing a real friend, her soul dissolved itself in a feeling of ineffable joy, but at the same time of infinite sadness. She laid her head on Miss Greta's shoulder, and gave free course to her tears. After she was somewhat more composed, Miss Greta said with a tender expression, "Give me, however, your promise not to run away from me, since I feel that my arms are yet too weak to detain you."

"I promise it!" answered Clara with tears.

"Good! and yet one more question. Whither do you think of going? What are you intending to do?"

"To go away—far, far away—into service—"

"Into service! with the lover—or with your husband?"

"No, no! I have neither."

"Dear Clara! do I deserve to be thus put off?"

"And will you, cannot you believe my word? Then you do not really esteem me!" cried Clara warmly, as she rose.

"Well, well, only don't run away from me!" said Miss Greta holding her by the dress. "We can at least speak calmly of the matter. You have no lover; you have no—the man that you visit then, must be your brother!"

"Ask me not, ask me not!" implored Clara violently agitated. As truly as I live, as truly as I hope to be saved, I cannot, and may not answer!"

"And may you not be ashamed of it! Can you calmly think of the ten commandments Can you lay your hand on your heart, and protest that you are innocent!" demanded Miss Greta, while she gazed inquiringly at Clara.

"I can! I am!" said Clara laying both her hands on her bosom.

"Well then," said Miss Greta, I will henceforward torment you with no more questions. I will not do like Thomas, I will believe without seeing. I believe thee, my friend," and she regarded Clara with an expression of the deepest peace and joy.

There is per ahs no more beautiful feeling than that of unaditional, blind confidence. It may be the most foolish, but it is at the same time the most divine in the heart of man.

"For you see," continued Clara, while she drew to her both the hands of her friend, and gazed into her eyes with an almost wild aspect, "I have taken an oath—a sacred oath! I have sworn on the Bible to preserve eternal silence! It was a horrible oath—a horrible moment! perdition—death—passed over in it—" Clara shuddered.

"Gracious heavens!" thought Miss Greta, here is probably some high-treason at work! God protect the king!"

"But now," continued Clara, while she lifted her clasped hands on high, and raised her eyes toward heaven with an expression of the most intense thankfulness, "now, from this day forth I am free from all participation, from all secret concerns; now can I walk openly before men! God be praised! God be praised for ever!"

A crimson flush suffused Clara's cheeks; her eyes beamed; Miss Greta regarded her in this moment as nearly beautiful, but was terrified at this extraordinary excitement, and at her words. Softly she laid her hand on the agitated maiden's arm, and said earnestly: "Clara, I must yet put one more question, and you must answer it: Is there not some strange suffering in thy secret? Perhaps some one suffers wrong; or there is danger at hand?"

"No, no!" cried Clara, "none, none in the world! All is good! all is over! and I repeat it, I can henceforth act freely and openly before the world. God be praised and thanked!"

"Well then, now calm and content yourself," begged Miss Greta. But the violent sensation had shaken Clara's otherwise so quiet spirit. Her whole being was thrown out of equilibrium, and she fell into violent convulsions. Miss Greta sprinkled her with eau de Cologne, poured out a little for her, and wished, for the first time, that she was less feeling, less excitable. By degrees Clara became composed; her head rested finally in a half slumber on the bosom of her anxious friend. As it, however, belonged to Miss Greta's peculiarities to give a humorous close to all scenes in which she played a chief part, both the friends, before the evening was over, were heard heartily laughing.

In the first place Miss Greta succeeded in convincing Clara that she would be far more useful to herself and her fellow-creatures in the position which she offered her, than in any other; that she in this manner would most beautifully fulfil the will of God, which consists, especially, in people making each other happy. When all this was arranged and settled, Miss Greta—who felt herself as Clara's, motherly friend authorized to labour at Clara's education—gave her, half in sport and half in earnest, a little lecture on her former behaviour, on her indifference, her eternal sewing, her uncourteousness, all which she painted in the most repulsive features. She warned Clara for the future most earnestly to refrain from these things, and threatened to throw all luckless sewing apparatus into the fire which prevented her listening to people. Clara laughed, promised amendment; and Miss Greta promised on the other hand no longer to torment her with the subject of marriage. At the same time she wished that Clara would think seriously as it respected Baron H. But even here she had turned the page, and she no longer asked whether Clara were worthy of the Baron, but whether the Baron were worthy of her—whether he loved her sincerely from his heart, and did not merely wish to possess in her a housewife. The origin of the little Filius became again of importance to her, and she resolved thoroughly to search out what spirit's child he was. All this she proposed to prosecute at the most favourable opportunities. Finally, she made comparison of her present and former sentiments towards Clara, and, in conclusion, asked:

"But tell me, how could ye be so deaf and dumb towards me?"

"Because then I did not love you," was Clara's answer.

"And now?"

"Now—no, long, long ago with my whole soul—for my whole life!"

It is charming when young damsels attach themselves to each other, live with one another, and play like the waves on the shore, like the wind with the young leaves. But beautiful is it when ladies with a noble character, confirmed by life, prove each other, and value each other, and form genuine friendships. Such bonds of friendship take place more frequently in life than is commonly believed; and when I see two lady friends living under one roof, it does my heart good; for I know that there is found that which makes life pleasant, the days light and happy.

And what indeed require we more for happiness than a lawful freedom, daily bread, a friend, and—now and then a refreshing thought, a light breath from the sphere of a higher life—a little listening to the conversation which the good and the wise from antiquity to the present time hold with each other—a little attention to the great drama of the world, and the words of the poets—yes, a little intercourse with the things which expand the breast and amend the heart, so that we do not shrink together too much into the little narrow self, into the impoverishment of mere housekeeping existence.

CHAPTER XVIII.

ONWARD.

"O very well, then—go on!"

THE YAWNING GENTLEMAN.

THERE are dead calms not only on the sea, but on land and in life. History has its periods of dead calm, man finds them in his life; even days and hours have their calms. This is a lazy, yawning time. The dead calm is not repose. It is a stand-still, a half-sleep, a dead lock, without progress or activity. If we write a story out of every-day life, we must indeed treat of everything; only save us from having to paint the periods of dead calm—the quiescence of so many existences. These we must rush rapidly over, otherwise we run the hazard of not being read, or of occasioning a sea-sickness to the faithfully waiting reader. But with secret horror do I perceive that it is highly necessary to steer rapidly onward, for the wind in my story has for some time fallen conspicuously. The winter life in the capital, of which I sketched a little, has smothered and impeded it: therefore onward, onward, and forth from this time. While the wind, however, yet blows but faintly, it might not be amiss, for the entertainment of my passengers, here to lift a veil, here to draw back a curtain, here to peep behind a jealousy, and to look about a little in general after friends.

We cannot omit, in the next place, to depict with great delight, the consternation of the Countess Natalie, the joy of the three wild brothers, the long face of the lady's maid Rosalie, and the joy-beaming one of the cook, who was heartily devoted to Clara, at the moment when Miss Greta with her decided tone and manner declared that Clara and her affairs belonged now to her. By this decisive step, she smothered all tittle-tattle, and gave to the glory of innocence which surrounded the head of Clara a new splendor.

As little can we deny ourselves the pleasure of casting a glance into Clara's new home, and seeing how, in the genial sunshine of friendship and kindness, to Miss Greta's great joy, all the slumbering powers of her soul, and also many a forgotten talent developed itself. She possessed extraordinary skill in flower painting. Miss Greta read to her, while she painted, the Memoirs of the Duchess of Abrantes, and other books of the kind, which opened Clara's eyes to the living and brilliant play of the colors of existence, and at once amused and surprised her. Her ideas of life could not be disturbed, for these were grounded on firm and true views. It was the same with Miss Greta; and if the two had hitherto taken different directions in their opinions of things, this was now most beautifully and reconcilingly balanced. Miss Greta often laid the book down and watched Clara's painting, still oftener did she look into her quiet contented eyes, and laid her hand on Clara's shoulder while the souls of the two friends met in an affectionate glance; then Miss Greta returned to her book, Clara painted on at her flowers, and life seemed to both light and lovely. Clara's quiet, beneficial activity, enlarged also the view of her friend in the household sphere of life, gave to her a more attractive earnestness, and a multiplied interest.

We must also cast a passing glance on Clara's lovers: Mr. Frederiks did not love waiting, and aimed on all occasions at speedy results. After a second discourse with Clara, he pressed her hand respectfully, and said affectionately "God bless you!" Three months afterward the blessings of the church were pronounced over him and a new spouse.

Baron H., on the contrary, continued steadfast. He showed Clara constantly the most marked attention; which yet even more and more assumed the expression of fatherly affection. He divided his time and interest between Clara and Miss Greta, who again recommended her inquiries respecting Filius, but which the Baron continued with equal ingenuity to elude. Miss Greta had got it into her head—I know not how —that Filius was the son of an opera-dancer. Miss Greta cherished, as we must admit, many prejudices. She scorned that existence, "with the legs in the air," and this suspected liaison, which moreover wounded her feeling of moral propriety, appended to the good qualities of the Baron a dubious—but. It was given him to understand that if Clara consented to a union with him, he could only receive her hand through the consent of Miss Greta. Baron H. replied with his wonted gallantry, that the beloved hand would only through this medium become dearer to him. Clara continued to behave in the spirit of her first negative answer; Baron H. continued not to trouble himself about it, and the cordiality of his disposition, the fatherly kindness of his demeanor, worked by degrees in Clara a pleasure in his attentions, and a sincerely friendly feeling toward him. Filius sketched her portrait in a vast variety of styles.

Nina was and continued the object of all eyes and all homages. Count Ludwig was perpetually about her; their behaviour to each other was friendly, but without confidence. All around her was glittering and attractive, yet her eye betrayed even more and more an internal joyousness. From day to day sunk she deeper in a dreamy inactivity, which the Countess constantly promoted. Languid and lovely, reposing on soft silken cushions, surrounded by splendid flowers, she read the newest French novels, with which the Countess continually supplied her. The talented but immoral Balzac, the highly imaginative but chaotic Victor Hugo, and the whole swarm of their imitators, were never out of her hands. By degrees a certain change in her seemed to take place. Her dress was gayer, and bore no longer the stamp of strict modesty; she lent her ear willingly to the manifold flatteries which became only the bolder and closer in their approach. She lost by degrees something of her noble simplicity, and descended more to the level of ordinary mortals. O Nina, Nina! instead of drawing up—as Edla hoped—those about thee, even deeper sankest thou down toward them! Poor Edla!

But not to judge too severely of Nina, we will observe her a little nearer. Let us cast a look into the depth of her soul; let us do this if possible amid all its needs—our blame will then often be converted into pity. We will observe her in one of those moments in which she endeavors to collect herself in solitude, and to reduce her thoughts to paper; an excellent usage, which I cannot sufficiently recommend to any fair young readers. Nina writes—

"Edla bade me write down my thoughts, my sensations, that I might thus be able to judge of the impressions of life upon me. Why do I it not? Why do I so reluctantly take up the pen? I have nothing to write. My impressions are weak; I cannot arrange my thoughts. All is so dark within and around me. All is so confused. Life—men—what are they in reality?

"Thou lettest them pass away as a stream, and they are as a sleep; like as the grass, which yet speedily withereth.

"We haste away like water, which we cannot detain.

"Edla gave me another and a higher doctrine. Why will it not become living in me? Edla! I admire thee! I admire thy strength; but I myself shall never possess it. Ah! my life is like the wind, which makes on, and knows not whither; it is like the waves of the sea, which rise and fall, and leave no trace behind; it is like the fog, which damp and joyless floats over flowery meadows, and disappears.

"But, O my God! thou who didst create me, thou wilt not reject me on account of my weakness. The feeble seed which could develop itself in this earth, thou wilt one day call into life beneath another sun. Yes, yes, yes, that I do believe.

"It is certainly great and noble in life to desire only one thing, to advance unchangeably toward one fixed goal; to do the right without weakness and wavering! But must this virtue be wholly bound up with hardness and severity? Was 'He hard, the Divine one, who walked the earth as a model for mankind? Ludwig is hard—Ludwig gives me pain.

"O kindness! O love!

"Love! What was it which I lately felt in the innermost depths of my soul? It was as if a ray of light broke through it. What a heavenly sensation! Ah! to experience that in long draughts, which I now only have a glimpse of, and then—to die! It was like lightning—but it is past. All is again dark. My soul is faint.

"I permit myself to be led by other people. I become common among the common. Foolish speech! They whom I style common are probably better than I. Happier they certainly are. When Edla was near me, it was better with me.

"Ludwig does not love me. He loves only himself. Edla? Edla has given me up. She needs me not. To whom am I necessary? Mina! my little sister! why went you so early away to the angels of God, and left me alone? Had Mina lived, I had been different. But now—the darkness, the deathly-cold, which formerly enveloped me, I fear will never wholly leave me—I fear they have completely become masters of my life. Oh that night!—the coffin—the silence of death—the icy-cold—these I shall never, never forget.

"Life! what is life? To breathe lightly and joyfully? I do not live—and I fear to die. The grave is my image of horror, on which I cannot think! I would often so gladly, so very gladly wake out of the slumber which oppresses my soul. I see my fellow-creatures so joyous around me, I would so far be as they are. I endeavor to make myself like them, and to do as they do. I will yet seek what it means—to live! to enjoy!"

In our hasty transit to fresh occurrences, we will not however forget Edla, nor to withdraw the curtain from the scene of her present obscurity.

Beautiful and refreshing is the call to console innocent suffering. The highest duty which heaven demands, the noblest which earth offers, has this object. Even the potent tongue of flattery canst thou here employ, for the work is holy. But unspeakably heavy and irksome is the call, to raise again those who have sunk through their own faults. And this was Edla's employment.

Frivolity, folly, a glittering life, debts, bankruptcy, want and contempt, constituted the history of the married pair with whom Edla now found herself. Husband and wife had faithfully copied one another to bring to nothing a considerable fortune. Now they stood deserted: children and necessity grew up together in the house; the world pointed with the finger at them, and the fearful pressure of life came over them; a pressure so well known, both to the innocent and the guilty: but to the latter—and justly—the most insupportable. To them morning comes, but brings no refreshment; the dawning day brings no light: spring displays all its enchantments, its transports thrill through all the veins of nature, but the soul of the unhappy is not exhilarated, is not made happy. Gloomy and thick as a December fog, it lies on their senses. The sight of their fellow-men gives them pain; they fly from their presence. The glorious pictures of nature and of art are lost to them, are without value, and all that is beautiful and delightful awakes only—bitterness. Ever more oppressively, more wearily roll the years away. Ever fainter, in more indifference and exclusion do they pass their days. They speak of death, of the grave, but only as of a long death-sleep, only as a respite from long enduring pain.

Such was the house and such the people to whom Edla came. She came with her firm soul, with her clear, circumspect mind, and her strengthening presence produced an auspicious change. The wife raised herself from her sick bed, on which the weariness of life had thrown her. The husband remained away from the noisy stupefying company in which he sought to drown the sense of his suffering. The children collected instinctively about the friendly considerate stranger. Edla did not permit the first impression which she made to go over. Her relatives were capable of instruction; people who possessed good, but neglected talents, and who valued themselves less, the more they perceived the value of their wasted life. She opened their eyes to the truths of life, to order and beauty; she revived in them the courage to raise themselves again, showed them the way, and called forth in them a noble desire of honour. Not like Job's comforters, did Edla comfort and exhort; she said with the Chinese philosopher, "Where are there men without faults? But we must make ourselves acquainted with these faults, and expunge them; and this change renews the heart. Repentance is the spring-time of virtue. Repentance and amendment make men great. Great and little faults, great and small trespasses, will then be forgiven. He who thus purifies his own heart, flings purity and a precious glory over all that surrounds and approaches him."

Edla's relatives listened eagerly to her doctrines, and took the path she pointed out to them. Not alone with good counsel and good teaching did Edla help them, but also—pardon me, Edla! methinks I see thy displeased glance! Thou needest not, and desirest not acknowledgment and the praise of men.

When spring came, and Edla saw courage and activity prevailing in the house which she found so deeply shaken, she was seized with an inconceivable longing for home and Nina, the dearest object of all her wishes, all her thoughts and feelings. Nina wrote but seldom, always affectionately, but briefly and on unimportant subjects. From her childhood writing had been her aversion. This dreamy life deprived her of the power of expressing herself. When Edla learned that Nina went to the Baths, she resolved also to journey thither and to surprise her beloved sister.

If we have no official intelligence of this journey to the Baths, it is because we forgot to make a formal visit to the President and his lady. The Countess was nervous—of course, and as Miss Greta's strength did not progress quite satisfactorily, a journey to the baths was therefore prescribed, and the Countess knew how to time her physician, so that he found the very same remedy necessary for the President and Nina, whose pale cheeks reproached the life of the past winter. And as a general bath journey was resolved on, we, my readers, will follow the stream, and seek out refreshment too.

CHAPTER XIX.

THE WATERING-PLACE.

Oh! I would clasp the whole of human kind
Up to my warm and love-suffusing heart;
Would with its blood appease all human pain,
And with its pulses kindle only joy.

SEEST thou, my reader, those long avenues of lofty lime-trees and maples, whose thick foliage is transpierced by the golden beams of the sun? SEEST thou how, right and left, they are surrounded by green meadows, on which neat houses are scattered? The doors of these are open, and on all sides you see people stream past with the water-glasses in their hands. SEEST thou how these greet one another, and begin their common promenade toward the fountain and the saloon? Poor and rich, high and low, invalids in body and soul, all move thitherward, in order to drink life from the bosom of nature. The kind mother! her rich wells flow for all, all! She makes no selections among her children; she knows nothing of a step-child, and offers to all her life and strength.

The morning is fresh and even a little cool. The dew lies silvery on the grass, and the beads bow themselves heavily beneath its pearly ornament. The fresh, sharp air causes many forgotten roses to bloom again on different cheeks. The swallows circle hither and thither, and the chorus of chaffinches and titlarks shout from the tops of the trees, a thousand-fold vivats!

The President's family distinguishes itself among the guests of the bath by a tasteful toilette, and a genteel carriage, the certain sign of aristocratic rank. Nina's beauty sets all the lorgnettes in motion. The gentlemen of the highest class among the visitors of the bath speedily surround this group. Many are old acquaintances, others would be so. Wealth, beauty, and rank assert their pretensions in the world, let people demonstrate as much as they please that all is but dust and ashes. No one noticed Clara, but Clara enjoyed more than they all. She had never before been at a watering-place; had never yet heard the song of the birds on a fresh, clear morning, had never seen the pearls of dew glitter in the grass, knew not the fragrance of plants, and the balm of the wide, free air. Now she perceived the glory of the earth, her heart was full, yes, overflowing; it swelled to thank the Creator for all his wonders; and she feared to burst into tears. Miss Greta observed the deep emotion of her soul, and sought with friendly sportiveness to moderate it. The two soon separated themselves from the rest, and advanced down the avenue. And who came toward them, tall, stately, and well-fed; the head somewhat thrown back, with a full, friendly, smiling countenance, and followed by a little boy, whose florid head nearly buried itself in his jacket collar, as if he would bend his ears from the morning air? Who but Baron H. and his Filius? In a direct line he marched up to Miss Greta and Clara, who received him with some degree of surprise, but with great cordiality. Filius even is caressed by Miss Greta—who is not affectionate in free nature? They seated themselves on a bench under the trees. The avenue became every moment fuller of promenaders, whom the sunshine allured from the daisy saloon of the fountain.

Baron H. distributed on all sides salutations, hand-shakes, and friendly nods, for he knew the whole world. Miss Greta took the lorgnette to her aid, and Baron H. made known to her the passers-by, in his peculiar lively manner.

"There, my most gracious, goes a man who once alone in his life played the fool, and since then has certainly shown himself a brave fellow. This, on the contrary, achieved once an exploit à la Titus, set himself therefore to drink to the glory of it, and drank and drank himself down to the lowest step of humanity. One may see by this—"

"That one swallow makes no summer," said Miss Greta.

"Excellent! that is just what I mean. This oldish, venerable lady in the gay shawl is my gracious aunt S. In my youth I was much in her house. They were happy days for me when I saw her about to read a romance; on the contrary, anxiety pressed my heart together when she took up a sermon. Good-humor, acquiescence, and absolution for all faults, were the effect of the romance. A gloomily furrowed brow, severity, morals, and all sorts of interdictions, were the fruit of the sermon; from which one might obviously draw the conclusion, that we ought only to read romances, and no sermons."

"See!" said Clara, with an expression of the deepest sympathy, "see this unfortunate young woman who seems quite lame, and looks so ill. Do you know her?"

"Quite well. It is Fanny M., a poor girl without parents or relatives, and who does not know a single day of health."

"Good heavens!" sighed Clara with tearful eyes, "that is a sorrowful life."

"Not so much so as it appears. She has an amusement which lifts her above the troubles of life, and allows her to make many heavenly pilgrimages."

"And this is—"

"The reading of the best and most celebrated poets and authors. As it is her destiny on earth to be a worm-eaten flower, she drinks the dew of life out of a higher world, whose prophets are the poets. Who shall blame her for this, and not much rather from their hearts wish her happiness through it? Talk to her of Klopstock, and you will see how the languid eye will kindle."

And Clara's eye kindled at the thought of a comforted unfortunate. Miss Greta's attention was distracted by the passers-by.

"Tell me above all things, best Baron, who are this extraordinarily ugly and so faithfully-adhering-together family? Father and mother, five daughters, and three sons—did one ever see anything so owl-like? What people are they? I think they must be a great burden to each other."

"The best and happiest people in the world! Good, cheerful, witty, accomplished, well informed, and so affectionate to one another, that they are completely contented, and ask very little what the rest of the world thinks of them."

"I thank you for the conclusion! But tell me, I pray, who is the lady on the seat opposite to us? She greeted you a while ago. She makes a painful impression on me. Her features are noble, but not pleasing; there is something sinister in her expression. She is silent and gloomy as a mummy; has something happened to her? Can she be as others are? Can she speak a cheerful word and laugh?"

"That can she not; she can only pray. In these downcast eyes, this gloomy countenance, which belong rather to death than to life, we see that prayer only can save her from a deep thought which might degenerate into madness. I have been told that she had formerly a lover that was unworthy of her, and who died an evil death, that is, by his own hand. So much I know of Sophia T. that she is not happy in her paternal home. Father, mother, brothers, and sisters, are characters totally unlike herself, and therefore live in perpetual discord with her. Noisy contention and strife are the music of the house, and all exert themselves to outbawl each other."

"The intolerable creatures! and she the poor girl?"

"She keeps silence. She fleets away like a shadow, and lingers in this world only to pray for the unworthy one whom she loved, and for those who make her life a torment. Her expression reminds one of the martyr of Domichini. It is a silent, but living Miserere."

"Gracious heaven! an incessant prayer, and this unblest expression of countenance! It would make one despair."

"We ought never to do that. However long she may pray, she will finally gain an entrance into heaven; but everything has its time. Do not look so much at her; it is not good, and can do nothing for her. She must bear her burthen like many others."

"And if she become insane?"

"That has many a one been before her, and it is not the worst that can happen. The night of the crazed has also its morning. But let us notice something more agreeable. Can you imagine now on what that gentleman lives? What gives him strength and courage to bear his existence? It is FORGETFULNESS! He forgets everything but his dinner; care and joy, friendship and enmity. At night he has forgotten yesterday, and therefore he awakes in the morning a new man; or rather a new creature, if that seems to you more appropriate. And he there with the quiet manner, the serious brow, whose figure reminds you somewhat of a trunk—do you know what gives him joy of heart, activity, and freshness of life? It is MEMORY! His whole life is thankfulness. He lives, thinks, and strives only to acquire a fortune for the children of his benefactor."

"That is brave!" exclaimed Miss Greta.

"So say I too, and—ah! your most humble servant, Lady Presi—, a charming, dear lady. She has a delightful way of chatting on for whole hours; only it somewhat wearies one that she speaks always of herself, of her experiences and merits, and especially of her rule never to speak or think of herself. To listen to her, you would think that she lived from morning till night in a perpetual state of self-denial only for the sake of others, reckoning her own will and pleasure as nothing, but only taking thought for the comfort of her husband, the children, and the sister-in-law. (N.B.—I know many other ladies who live in the same sweet conviction.)

Quite touched by her own excellence, she receives with modest assurance all that the poets and other people of that kind say of the excellences of ladies, and looks upon herself as an actual angel. (See the N.B. above.) But a good friend has whispered me that her husband one day, on an acquaintance exclaiming, 'Your angel of a wife,' in the fulness of his heart replied, 'Yes, really a lovely angel!'

Miss Greta laughed and said, "You seem to find no angels among the ladies."

"Yes, my gracious one, I see more angels among them than is good for my head and heart; but my angels do not praise themselves."

"And in this they are right; for nothing is more fatal. But who is this? The gentleman looks like an author of great works, which I, however, have no desire to read."

"I must admire your good taste. He is actually an author, and indeed the writer of a book on the destination of the ladies; the contents of which may be said to be this: 'The wife shall be educated for the husband. Thou shalt be obedient to thy husband. Thou shalt endeavor to please him in every imaginable manner. He has faults; seek in deep humility to correct them, and that without his knowing of it. If they cannot be eradicated, seek then to hide them from the world, and love him only the more tenderly. In short, thou shalt only exist for thy husband, be submissive and perfect for all time. Amen!'"

"Do you know, Baron," said Miss Greta, "I often wish that you would turn author. I am persuaded you would give us many a good and profitable book."

"Do you know, my gracious lady, that I for a long time cherished the same conviction, and was already in the act of entering this path. I had already begun to write a philosophical romance, and was quite amazed at the wisdom and benevolence that flowed from my pen, and should pass thence into the hearts of men. It seemed to me that the world could not exist without my book, and I could scarcely conceive how it had been carried on without it till this time. I was already in the midst of my 'Opus,' when one day I took up the catechism in order to examine a little boy. I soon began to read for myself, and I can give you no idea of the impression which this perusal made upon me. Yea, I was as much moved as charmed and ashamed, when I saw as clear as the sun that the world was already in possession of all that it needed for eternity. I immediately arose and burned my manuscript, whose best thoughts I now saw were but an extract from the catechism; and from that time the voice of my understanding, whenever I have got a longing to instruct mankind, has invariably shouted to me in a tone of thunder—'They have Moses and the Prophets! if they hear them not, neither will they listen though one should rise from the dead!'"

"Very fine, dear Baron. But pardon me if I am disposed to believe that the 'divine laziness' has also a small part in the honour with which Moses and the Prophets inspired you against your work; and I confess that I am far from participating in your opinion of the sufficiency of a single book. Besides this, I need books to amuse me."

"You wished to be amused! Well then, my most gracious, do observe that gentleman with the heavy, and that lady with the light gait, who wander inseparably together in quest of pleasure, like two dogs in couples who continually snarl and bite each other. Never did heaven, perhaps, create such a brother and sister. He finds difficulties in everything, in life, in death—in the latter of which he is probably right—in standing, going, sitting, and lying; enough, one cannot conceive how he gets through the world. She, on the contrary, belongs to the good-natured but obscure optimists, who, without knowing why, continually exclaim and protest 'that everything in the world is for the best.' She says of the earthquake in Lisbon, and of the horrors of the French revolution, that they were certainly for some good purpose. Is it bad weather? then she declares it will be all the finer for it to-morrow; and if the last day was arrived, and the destruction of the world, I am certain she would find a moment to assure some perishing fellow-christian that 'it will all turn out for the best.' And certain I am that this view of things au fond is quite correct, christian, and sensible, yet I cannot deny but that the good lady often reminds me of the parrot which, while a turkey-cock was pecking out its eyes, continued crying—'That is beautiful! that is beautiful!' I once had a mind to fall in love with her, for I would fain myself get on the best side of life, and it seemed to me that life must pass lightly with one who takes it so easily; but when she consoled me in a cursed attack of gout which tormented me for a whole year, also with her 'all for the best,' the affair broke suddenly off. For the rest, I can only from my heart wish her luck with her views of life, and must admire her patience with the heavy-blooded brother, who cannot live without her, and yet is in a continual fever of contradiction with her. The singularly dressed lady who follows her—"

"Ah! Madame K.: I know her," interposed Miss Greta. "This person has more than once tempted me to commit some folly or stupidity, or to defend them. When she spoke or listened, I became invariably thoughtless or giddy."

"You astonish me, since she is precisely the opposite of giddy."

"And that is the very reason; or rather, because she is so in a heavy, pompous way. She will be philosophical, I take it; and reasons, demonstrates, and refutes to eternity. A thousand times in her company occur to me the words of the Bible—'Let thy conversation be yea, yea, nay, nay; for whatever is more than this cometh of evil.' You smile, Clara; I see you think with me."

"And yet," observed the Baron, "this inquiry and disquisition may have a very honourable foundation; it is the necessity of explaining the world to her own satisfaction."

"You open up to me there a new view," said Miss Greta after a woman's reflection; "but in no case will I be one of those who receive the exposition from her, since she seems to me to have a wrong bent in her inquiries. I had a thousand times rather hear the good Madame N., who talks incessantly, but with all her soul, of her children and domestics."

"I admit that you are right, and am of your taste; this matter may also have its excellences, and the mind is much influenced by it—"

Here Miss Greta laid her hand on the Baron's arm, and said softly, but zealously, "In the name of heaven who is that?—who is that?—the lady there in the black dress, who just now goes round the elder-hedge? She looks like a wandering shade, and casts such a curious keen glance at us."

G

Scarcely had Baron H. set his eyes on the black-clad lady, who at this moment disappeared behind the elder-hedge, than, as if struck with an electric shock, he sprang up and darted like an arrow after her. Miss Greta gazed after him with wonder and curiosity. They met first again in the fountain saloon, and the Baron, quite out of breath, flurried, and in perspiration, said only that he had fancied that he saw an acquaintance in the lady, but could not find her.

The little critical company now went on in silence, and filled and drank the prescribed pitcher religiously. While they are drinking and prom-enading, however, we will continue this criticism a little, hover with our eyes and thoughts over the swarming multitude, and confide to the reader our observations. For the doings and sufferings, life and action, of men, are a subject which does not soon weary the attention; to see how variously the world reflects itself in the many, and yet how we constantly recognize again the same men. All have the spirit of God and the prospect of death.

And death? Can we read anything of this in yon charming little head, which glances so gladly and full of life's enjoyment round it on the world? Its young possessor knows at least little about it. She loves the dance, music, a glad word and glad faces, the sun and the flowers. Her soul is turned completely toward the sunny side of life; she dreads the other like sin. She dances through life, innocent, singing and playing. Let no surly fellow shake his head at her; among men too there must be larks—

Sing, sing,	And thy mirth
Spread the wing,	Drive from earth
In the sunshine soar;	All its weariness;
Let the priests,
Fat with feasts,	Still the worse
Hum their masses o'er.	Virtue knows;
	Let its path be trod,
Grief avast!	With glad chime
Let thy chaunt	Till it climb
Life's delights express;	To the throne of God!

LIFE'S WEARINESS!—Yes, if thou canst, refresh the spirit of life. See how yon bound heart steals to the fountain, not daring to hope, and knowing not joy. On the green tree on which I had already hung my lyre I will also sing for it a little air—

Is for thee earth's wide horizon
Void of hope and full of gloom?
Hopes thou to find no quiet
But the slumber of the tomb?
Oh! one means there yet is given
For all suffering void of shame,
One whose conquering force no'er faileth—
Patience is its heavenly name.
Yes, it is the tranquil haven
Where the seaman drops his oar;
Joy unto earth's weary wanderer,
When his eye hath caught that shore.
Patience stills all earthly sorrow,
Calls forth day from midnight's gloom,
And the thorn-crown of the sufferer
Deth the victor's wreath become.

But where was I just now? Ah, rightly, at the watering-place. I sang joy and patience. Good!

But the poetical vein springs up with the lightest pressure, and its playful outpourings mingle with the waters of eternal life, which incessantly flow in the human soul from immortal fountains. I will pursue it, and observe the souls whom it will bless. Here are the good, the loving, they who breathe in mutual affection; how much good they do to my heart! How light and serene the air is in their neighborhood!

Here are the powerful, they who carve out their own fate with a mighty will, whose every respiration sends forth great thoughts; who observe life and themselves from the highest point of view. The sight of them is strengthening. Their eye is clear—is it to be wondered at? Have they not sought for and found the truth, the beautiful, the glorious, the love-deserving truth.

But they also to whom nature has not given great strength, has not endowed with the rich joys of life, who on the contrary receive with contentedness the crumbs which fall from the table of life, without wearying heaven with desiring wishes and prayers; the little insignificant ones, unnoticed by the world; how beautifully, how properly do these also make a part of the ordination of heaven? How much tranquil life does the flower enjoy upon the little window-sill, the little bird that sings upon it, the gentle sunbeam that falls upon the window; and while these care-free children of nature are supported by human exertion, somewhat of their tranquillity and their freshness of life pass from them into the breast of their human cherishers. It is beneficial and delightful to reflect how manifold are the fountains of joy and of pleasure which the all-good Father has provided for his children—and how he reveals himself in them. We become sensible of his presence not alone in the hours of religious observation; the divine spark lives in all the atoms of life: and wherever a pure human effort calls it out, it bursts forth in clear flames of joy. Love, nature, science, art, philosophy—are they not all thoughts of Him, emanations of God? Does not one or other of these regions offer to man a fatherland, in which he can build himself a home and dwell happily? The same heaven, the eternal sunbeam of the same love, expands itself over us all. How often does it not suddenly penetrate man as he goes on his way, amid his own activity, with an inexpressible clearness, with an infinite happiness; the beam of a higher, incomprehensible life passes over him, and he is compelled to exclaim, "There is a God!"

And yet there are so many poor forlorn-ones who are in want of everything which gives worth to life. It will not continue to be so! The prophets have had their time; the heroes their great days—now comes the Man. But mankind is legion; and every individual of this great mass steps forward in these days with his own authority before heaven, and demands room upon earth for his freedom, for his love, for his activity, and his happiness. That there should be at first much thronging, much cuffling and pushing is only natural. All press toward the healing, fresh-bubbling fountain—all will fill their cups. Many get thrust back and trodden down; but patience! it will be better: for the leaders of the people have spoken to the rocks, and these have opened their bosoms, and have poured forth a higher and a richer stream. In time all will be satisfied, all will have drank.

One fountain is there whose deep-lying vein has only just begun to throw up its silvery drops among mankind—a fountain which will allay the thirst of millions, and will give to those who drink from it peace and joy.

It is Knowledge, the fountain of intellectual cultivation, which gives health to mankind, makes clear his vision, brings joy to his life, and breathes over his soul's destiny a deep repose. Go and drink therefrom, thou whom fortune has not favored, and thou wilt soon feel thyself rich! Thou mayest go forth into the world and find thyself everywhere at home; thou canst cultivate thyself in thy own little chamber; thy friends are ever around thee, and carry on wise conversations with thee; nature, antiquity, heaven, are accessible to thee! The industrious kingdom of the ant, the works of man, the rainbow and runic-records, offer to thy soul equal hospitality. The magnificence of creation illuminates not only thy eye, it glorifies thy thoughts, it enlightens thy understanding; oh, with such observations, with such impressions, feelings and adorations, has not earthly life enough? Enough! O inexpressibly, infinitely much!

But how is it enough—how is it so much? Eternal fountain of light and life! Because by that means we approach Thee, because by that means we press nearer to Thy being—learn to know Thee better! If, as a great author says, "The Pagan forgot the Creator in the creature," it befits certainly the true Christian everywhere to seek for the Creator in the created, to comprehend him, and to adore him.

CHAPTER XX.

THE FIRE AND WATER ORDEAL.

Brother mine, keep thou good heart,
Dance now! hark! they're playing!—BELLMAN.

And of a certainty we must make merry and be glad—nature will have it so, and so will the Creator. Music and dancing furnish the fundamental idea in the great opera of creation. The worlds dance, singing their circuit round the sun; the waves of the sea and the leaves of the trees dance in the wind, and the wind itself plays to their dancing; the will-o'-the-wisp dance on the moor; and heaven itself dances the shawl-dance, and rapidly, now in one way, now in another, drapes itself with clouds.

Savages dance in joy and pain; and the educated, who have brought those rude attempts to the highest degree of perfection, sing and dance, so that the animals listen, and the angels in heaven smile.

Upon a smooth green plot dance all the company at Ramlosa. Baron H. is kindly and zealously busied in introducing, right and left, dance-loving ladies and dance-loving gentlemen to each other. He compels, in all goodness, the dance-loving to advance, keeping time, into the circle, for Baron H. loved that people should be merry and sociable. He had, by a silent but universally accorded agreement, become the "maitre de plaisir" of the bath company. He knew all the world, and was in favour with all the world; and knew so well how to manage the world, that people willingly put themselves into his hands, and found themselves all the better for his guidance. This part was exactly suited to his lively, inoffensive humor, although much less for the corpulence of his person, which did not find itself most comfortable therefrom. He appeared, however, to have resolved to subject this to particular suffering; nay, he evidently was bent on getting released from his burden. Miss Greta joked with Clara on this proof of love, and prophesied that one of these beautiful days he would fall upon one knee before her, slender and genteel as Cousin Pasteureau, and would get possession of her heart.

Cruel Miss Greta! While Baron H. was labouring to make life to everybody around him light and agreeable, she was devising in her head the most dangerous machinations against his peace—nay, even against his life. She had warmly determined, on the very next opportunity, to put the love of the Baron for Clara to several very hard probations. If she convinced herself that he sought Clara's hand out of pure, upright love, and that this courtship was not the result of a transient liking, or desire for a pleasant, comfortable life, with a quiet, patient, pretty young lady, then she would constitute herself his intercessor; if she found it otherwise, then she determined, with seriousness and energy, to put an end to all this love-making, which now had lasted more than three months, and made people already begin to talk. With this, she united the plan of getting at the knowledge, either by good means or bad, of whence Filius properly descended, and what relationship he had with his foster-father.

I must tell thee, dear reader, that Miss Greta was not a person, by any means, to play when she had once taken anything seriously into her head.

But where were we just now? O, at the dance on the grass-plot. The evening is beautiful. The wind has ceased to rock the leaves and flowers; he slumbers now in the wood; yet the little birds sing an evening song to the sun. Nina's bewitching sylph-like form floats around in the waltz. Her partner is a young man, handsome as a statue, with the features of an Apollo and the smiles of Cupid. What is his name? We will call him Don Juan. What is there remarkable in Don Juan? He is the hero of Lord Byron's longest poem; a cousin of Richardson's Loveland, and is renowned on account of his conquests over the weak of the fair sex, and consequently, according to the judgment of a certain thinker, an unquestionable favorite of all the ladies.

Holy Clarissa! Aurora Raby, thou the most lovely star-image which Byron conjured forth from his dark heaven! In your names protest we against this contracted judgment, and declare that that thinker only knew the ladies of great cities, already corrupted by the world, and not woman as she is properly and in truth!

Don Juan, in fact, was dangerous; for who could have foreboded treachery in that open, clear glance; in that cordial laughter; in that amiable unconstrained demeanor! Who believe that licentiousness dwelt in a soul which appeared to warm for all that was good and beautiful; in a soul that sighed, in the hours of confidential intercourse, because he had not found that in life after which he sought, and because he had not become that which he wished to be!

Nina foreboded nothing, and allowed herself to be carried away by a feeling of delight which operated pleasantly upon her. The Countess saw sufficiently into this state of feeling, and therefore interested herself in the highest degree for the fascinating foreigner and his extraordinary musical talent. He was one of the most familiar members of her circle. Miss Greta saw very clearly into this affair, yet she was silent, and spoke shortly and coldly to Don Juan. Clara avoided him from a kind of repugnance, for which she could assign no cause, and which resembled that wise infallible instinct by which animals avoid an injurious plant; he, on the contrary, sought her—he very well knew why—and testified by so doing to the truth of the remark so frequently made, that the voluptuary seeks after the pure especially, but not in order to elevate himself to them, but only to draw them down to him in the dust. Clara, however, in the mean time, appeared to be only a secondary thought to him, and from day to day he devoted more exclusively his attentions and his homage to the affectionate Nina.

But now back to the dance—no, the dance is at an end. Baron H., who had taken for his partner a lady whom nobody else had engaged, lay panting in the grass after an exhausting Mazurka. Miss Greta with her own hand presented him with a glass of lemonade. The President waited for his Countess, who, somewhat uneasy, looked about her for Nina, but who very soon forgot her anxiety in a most interesting conversation with a handsome colonel. Nina, in company with several young lady friends and acquaintance, had undertaken a walk to a distant and shadowy part of the park. Don Juan followed her, and endeavored to fix her attention. Unobserved he separated her from the rest, and then, as they all seated themselves to rest a while, he selected a place for Nina sufficiently apart to speak with her unheard, and yet sufficiently near not to excite any anxiety in herself. The tranquillity of the warm evening, the shade of the leafy trees, all conspired to excite the melancholy tone of mind peculiar to Nina. Her beautiful brow rested dreamily on her hand, and she gazed into the twilight distance. The state of her feelings did not escape him; it was what he wanted. With a low, melodious voice, he spoke of the emptiness of ordinary life, of its fetters and its coldness. He spoke so warmly, and with such inspiration of Nature; in her, he said, was revealed the wisdom and the goodness of God. He spoke of a life conformable with nature; a life, therefore, beautiful and rich; a life like that which the patriarch led, or as man even now leads in beautiful, warm countries, and in which every man has legitimate pretensions. He extolled the power of love to govern all things; he called it the blessed dream of life that alone improved and ennobled. He quoted texts from the Gospel of St. John. His words were clear; his voice charming; his conversation poetical. Nina saw not the serpent which lurked under the flowers. She listened almost without thought; an enchantment seemed to have come over her. Strange, confused, but agreeable feelings swelled in her breast; she gave herself up to them with a sort of enjoyment. Nature, as it were, unfolded her; she had sunk into her bosom, had lost herself in her flower-odors, shadows, and dew-drops, and melted away into the vondrous life around her. A sea of pleasure rocked in her soul—tears gushed to her eyes, that were cast down before the burning glances of Don Juan, which were riveted immovably upon her, and as with magic power.

The other groups were set in motion, and people rose in order to return. Nina rose also; she raised her eyes up to heaven and looked at the twinkling stars. These made a painful impression upon her. They seemed to look sternly and coldly down upon her. Edla's penetrating glance came to her remembrance. Nina sank her eyes with an involuntary desire to remove herself from Don Juan: this escaped not his experienced eye, and hastily, but in a low and troubled voice, he said, "Thanks for this hour, after long joyless years. The remembrance of it will be my good angel, and will teach me to bear more easily the weariness of life. Perhaps I appear to you inconstant and frivolous; yet a deep sentiment breathes in my heart. I was solitary—nobody understood me—nobody rightly knew me—and I—never have been fortunate!"

The last words he spoke with an expression of the deepest feeling. He ceased, and offered his arm to Nina. She took it. He was indeed unhappy—nobody understood him. Silently they returned through the still shadowy trees to the company, whose noise was unpleasant to them. Nina walked along with drooped eyelids, a riddle to herself; but she felt the looks which people directed to her.

The company was still assembled upon the dancing ground. They listened to a flute-player, who blew the last quavers as the walking party rejoined them. Don Juan was surrounded, and besought to set the crown to the pleasures of the evening by his universally acknowledged talent. He did not require long solicitation, but taking a guitar from the hands of the Countess, seated himself upon a mossy stone and preluded.

It was beautiful to see him as he sat there; the lovely head, with whose locks the evening wind played, sunk in thought, while the skilful white hand touched the strings. He sang, and all were ear. People had never heard anything more beautiful. It was a wild romance, which painted the pangs of unhappy love. Passion, crime, wild happiness, madness, and death, were depicted. The singer grew pale before his own tones; the listeners with him. A shudder of horror thrilled through the company, and the leaf of the tree trembled sympathetically. All was silent, as if almost stunned, while the last incoherent melancholy accords, like death-sighs floated away. He then riveted a long, burning glance on Nina, and his voice became liquid and loving; the singer seemed as if drunken with enchantment. He sang now happy, free, paradisaical love, as Albano and Correggio have painted it. In Nina's heart chords were touched which never had resounded till then. Foreboding, desire, an infinite woe, and a nameless joy seized upon her. Was it an abyss—was it a heaven, which was about to open itself before her! She knew not. She would that she might have died at that moment, and yet never before had she such a foretaste of the fulgour and the affluence of life as then.

That which seized, however, so strongly on Nina's heart, was not without its operation on others; and many a heart overflowed, and many an eye, while it filled with tears, cast a glance into a lost Eden. Many a rosy remembrance awoke in the breast of the gray-headed man and the elderly lady—no, that goes too far! We cannot spend our time reckoning up all the impressions which every song makes. Great is the power of song, but great also is that of sleep, at least in our good north. Miss Greta was the first who made this remark, as turning herself to Baron H., she said—"The song is very beautiful, but not beautiful enough to keep us here the whole night. Let us do something that is better than sitting here—namely, let us go home."

The Baron replied in a language which Miss Greta could not understand till she had observed him nearer; he lay in the grass, and—snored.

Miss Greta beckoned to Clara, and smiling, showed her the sleeper.

"He will take cold," said Clara with an anxious mien; took a shawl and laid over him.

Was it the consequence of a dream, or did the wicked man wake? Enough, as Clara bent herself in order to lay the shawl over him, he raised his arms. Clara drew herself up hastily, and he only caught hold of her hand, which he kissed heartily. Miss Greta looked on. Filius went on in the mean time with business on his own account. He had on this evening got up a little passion for a certain Caroline, a pretty fifteen-years-old German girl, and was making love to her by drawing arabesques upon her shoes and the hem of her dress with a piece of chalk. It was in vain that the young girl repeated—"Let that alone, dear Filius! let me be quiet, dear youth! you are insufferable!" In vain—he was now in full inspiration, and seemed neither to hear nor to feel. Miss Greta, who sat near the persecuted girl, and had watched the goings on of Filius addressed him in an authoritative tone. Filius turned himself silently round, and nearly in the same moment Miss Greta saw a great white Roman nose upon her own dark green silk dress. That was too much. While Miss Greta noticed the scene between Baron H. and Clara, her fine lips compressed themselves almost imperceptibly together; a certain bitterness showed itself in her countenance, and her white fingers found their way to the blond locks of Filius, and "au! au! au!" resounded his shrill cry of pain.

Baron H. sprang up with the agility of a squirrel, and exclaimed "Filius!"

Filius, with violent sobs, hastened to his protector, and could only bring forth the words—"She lugged—lugged—lugged me!"

A merry astonishment diffused itself in the company, as Baron H. looked at Miss Greta with a countenance that seemed to demand an explanation. Miss Greta raised herself with some dignity, and said—"My good Baron, I am not going in the first place really to assert that he deserved the chastisement. All that I have to say is, that in future you yourself may undertake the office which I have found myself obliged to assume, and truly wholly in the way in which I have administered justice; otherwise the buy will be insupportable."

Baron H. answered not a syllable, but took Filius, who was already pacified by Clara, by the hand, and looked as if he were about to depart.

The remainder of the company dispersed at the same time. Clara hoped to receive her shawl again, but found that it was not the case. The Baron wrapped it very calmly about himself, praised its warmth, its softness, and its "gentle character."

Miss Greta gave Clara one of her shawls, for she had several with her, and went silently homeward. When they were about to separate, Clara besought in the politest manner for her shawl. Baron H., however, put it into his pocket, and declared that he should preserve it as a keepsake.

Nina was accompanied by Don Juan to her own door. Again he fixed upon her one of his fiery glances, and then left her; and as she was going to bed she was enchanted by a serenade which was sung delightfully from behind the hedge under her window. The moon shone bright; it shone upon her bed; the shadow of the dark cross of the window-frame lay directly upon her breast. Nina observed it. She lay under the emblem of suffering and renunciation, yet was she surrounded by a heavenly glory. Without lived love and song. Her heart beat uneasily; her thoughts were wildly tempest; her tears began to flow; and while she lay with arms crossed upon her bosom, she surrendered herself in still prayer to Him who read her heart better than herself, and who decided her fate.

That same evening Miss Greta called Clara to account for the words, "He will take cold," and gravely inquired whether she intended to keep him warm with only her shawl, or with her heart also. Clara negatived this question, at first laughingly, and then with much seriousness.

"Good," thought Miss Greta.

Notwithstanding this, Clara this evening had much to endure from her friend, who could be occasionally tolerably unmerciful, and who inquired often after the shawl which Clara had lost. Miss Greta declared also that she wished to see other proofs of the Baron's love to Clara than those of stealing her clothes. Then again she would exclaim with a roguish glance, "I am quite curious to know what will be the end of the affair." But Clara exhibited no sensibility about these jests; she remained quite calm, and permitted nothing to mislead her. The good understanding, however, between Miss Greta and the Baron was really somewhat disturbed. A certain constraint, a kind of cold politeness, for several days took the place of their former easy friendship.

But does it not really seem as if we had forgotten the President? We have truly not forgotten him; but near his brilliant wife, of whom he was very proud, and also somewhat jealous, he stepped always more and more into the shade. He drank every day with the utmost scrupulosity his twelve glasses, and complained somewhat of his stomach and his temper; about which the Countess did not trouble herself. She practised music for hours with Don Juan and Nina. Alone with them, and especially with Nina, Don Juan developed his most admirable talents. He swam, as it were, in music, and became intoxicated with his own melody. Nina felt herself as if bewitched, and every day fell more and more into a state of mystical melancholy. Don Juan's passion for her betrayed itself every day more violently and more intelligibly. He surrounded her with his homage, with his songs, with his glowing poetical beings; her life swung itself upon a sea of sweet sound and poetical delight.

As strong flower odors operate, so operated this musical breath of incense upon her; it was a delicious but a stupefying sensation; a pleasant intoxication, a sweet poison—in which one may die, my reader—at least in the soul!

"But the pure angels in God's heaven they sing truly also! Song is of a truth, something so beautiful, so divine! How could the soul die of it?"

"The noblest work may, in the hands of the evil disposed, become a means of ruin. There is fire which illumines and warms, but there is fire also which destroys."

"But—"

"But! and but—thou affectionate angel, whose pure soprano I hope one day to hear in the chorus of the singers in heaven—I have not time to-day to spend upon thee. Besides which, Clara, who is more pious, who is purer and better than I, will answer thy doubts."

"Why do you almost always leave the room, Clara," asked Miss Greta, "when Don Juan seats himself at the piano, and sings so that Nina almost dissolves away, and Natalie looks inspired, and turns her eyes on every side, excepting to that on which the President sits, who, however, does all that is possible to look inspired also! Tell me, why do you always go out then?"

Clara blushed, and answered smiling, "Because I will neither be dissolved by Don Juan's tones, nor will I be inspired by them;" she paused for a few moments, and then added, blushing still deeper, "I love music infinitely, and I have not a harder heart than Nina—but there is something in Don Juan's music which does not please me. It excites and enervates, without again tranquillizing. There is a something in it which tells me that his intentions are not pure and honest."

"But your heart and your understanding are so!" said Miss Greta, embracing her friend; "I only wish that that 'beautiful and perfect Nina,' as Natalie calls her, had but half your sense."

"Speak to her! warn her!" besought Clara, with heartfelt warmth; "she is so young and so good!"

"With that I have nothing to do," returned Miss Greta with decision, "I do not properly understand that girl; and, besides that, there very soon comes somebody who will speedily put an end to this commotion about Don Juan. We expect Count Ludwig one of these days, and I think then that these hot music lessons may be discontinued. I have spoken, indeed, to Natalie, but that is the same as saying I have preached to deaf ears. Besides this, she has the talent of making white out of black and — But the hour of noon strikes. Put on your tulle pelerine, Clara—that is, if you have one left, it is extremely odd of Baron H. that he —"

Clara stopped the jesting lips with a kiss, and hastened to accompany her friend to the table d'hôte.

Miss Greta seated herself at table by Baron

H. It seemed as if they would become friendly the one with the other. The Baron, whose most brilliant time of the whole day was dinner-time, and who was possessed of the uncommon power of eating and talking at the same time, and of doing both with much zeal and taste—the Baron H. was quite “charmant.” He conversed a great deal with Miss Greta on the education of children, and she imparted to him, half in jest and half in earnest, several very palpable pieces of advice, which might be more wholesome than agreeable to Filius. Miss Greta spoke even of his future, and inquired whether it would not be better that he followed his mother’s profession on the boards—yet, remarked she at the same time, Filius appeared to have very little turn for dancing, and walked with his toes rather turned inward.

The Baron looked at Miss Greta with the greatest astonishment, coughed, drank a glass of wine, and replied that the boy might learn just what he liked.

Miss Greta then advised the Baron to let him become a decorating painter, and related with much liveliness the history of the Roman nose, and the lugging upon the dancing-ground. Both laughed at it. The Baron acknowledged that he had more than deserved the little correction, and besought Miss Greta’s advice in the business of education, but he said nothing of actual participation in it. Miss Greta promised to do all that lay in her power, and therefore took care that the Baron, at least, should be served twice with all the delicacies which appeared on the table. They agreed so excellently on all points and in everything, that Clara, who sat opposite to them, smiled to herself at it, but did not observe how they agreed most of all in their good opinion of her and her praise. The eyes of the Baron sparkled like two crystal balls on which the sun shone.

The great friendship of the antagonists even extended itself to the afternoon; and as Baron H., conformably to what Miss Greta called his “reducing system,” proposed a long walk after dinner, she assented with the greatest willingness, although otherwise no great friend to walks. Clara pleased herself with the magnificent scenery which Baron H. promised to show, and walked tranquilly and happily by the side of her friends. Filius, who was still angry with Miss Greta, and looked at her now and then with a distrustful side-glance, showed himself nevertheless very lively, and plucked the loveliest flowers for Clara and his father. Miss Greta remarked, that if the boy were rude, he was on the other side true to those from whom he had experienced kindness. She almost resolved to attempt for once the gentle method with him, in order to obtain some power over him.

The difficult gentleman and the careless lady were the only two of all the company who walked with them—we do not rightly know why. After they had left behind them a considerable piece of way, a thunder cloud which made its appearance in the sky occasioned the difficult gentleman to assume a most woful countenance, and Miss Greta to ask inwardly whether a storm, with lightning, thunder, and rain, might not perhaps belong to the magnificent scenery which the Baron had promised her friend. Yet, either out of wantonness or good humor, she said nothing of her doleful presentiments. Baron H. looked up for once to the ever-threatening and blackening clouds, and still continued the ramble in the very best of humors. Not so the difficult gentleman. He lingered a few paces behind with his sister, and Miss Greta heard the following dialogue between them.

“It seems to me that this will be a pretty affair! We shall have a thunder-storm, as sure as I am alive! The foolish Baron! We shall get pretty well soaked!”

“I assure you there is no danger. The thunder-storm will go over—the wind is just opposite to it.”

“Opposite, opposite! Gracious Heaven! what a thing it is! If the wind and the thunder-clouds are opposed to one another, how can the wind help otherwise than by filling all the sooner our eyes with dust and blowing away our hats! The wind is perfectly horrible! I should only like to know how the wind is good for anything in the world!”

“Certainly it is good for something. It pleases me very much: one goes forward as swiftly when one has the wind behind one’s back. Besides this, an air-bath is now and then very agreeable to me—it is also healthy.”

“Bathe as much as you have any wish for, in air or in dust. I, for my own part, only desire to be excused. A drop of rain! Now we have it! It will not leave off again for eight days. Oh! I already perceive a return of my old rheumatic pain. Only see there—all the cursed water-masses are drawing together as if the Creator intended a second deluge.”

“You’ll see that we shall get under shelter before it pours down. These black stripes are nothing in themselves, and besides they are so far apart. Soon we shall be at the end of our ramble, and Baron H. has promised us good coffee then.”

“Coffee! Yes, yes, I’ll answer for it, we shall drink coffee out of a rain-water puddle!”

“That we shall escape.”

“Escape! I’ll tell you what, escape is not to be spoken of. We shall all be drowned. This walk will be the death of me!”

“Should we not perhaps turn back! We shall certainly reach the bath without—”

“We shall reach nothing but a proper bath, and a thunder-storm into the bargain.”

“But we can make the attempt, and hope for the best.”

“No, say I! No, no, no!”

“But then what shall we do! It is certainly better to go somewhere—either forward or backward—than stay here.”

“There we have it! What shall we do, is always said whenever people are about to commit some folly, and then people stand with their mouths wide open. Baron H.! Baron H.! we shall have a storm; we shall be drowned in a waterspout. I think that man is deaf! He hears no more than a stone. Baron H.—H. H.—Baron!”

Baron H. made as if he were deaf, and stepped onward quicker than ever. At last, however, he received such a violent pluck by the coat-laps that he stumbled backward a few steps, and fell with the whole weight of his away into the arms of the difficult gentleman, who screamed out with the whole strength of his lungs, "We shall have a storm! we shall have a storm!"

"Ah, bah!" said the Baron, phlegmatically, and at some trouble to suppress his laughter.

"Ah, bah here, and ah bah there! We shall have a storm, I say, and shall all of us be wet to the skin, and that entirely because of your wilfulness."

"We shall have no storm, I say; but if you are so fearful, look only about—there stands a barn. There is a roof under which, and hay upon which, you can rest till the danger is over."

"That is charming, indeed," cried the sister.

"Charming! My sister finds everything charming; as if the people did not know that the lightning always strikes barns. Besides which, the hay smells abominably—charming!"

Miss Greta could no longer contain herself: the peal of hearty laughter into which she burst annoyed the difficult gentleman to that degree that he took the arm of his sister, left the company, and posted off by the directest way to the barn. After Miss Greta had satisfied herself with laughter, in which the Baron, and even Clara, joined company, she said somewhat gravely—

"For the rest, my dear Baron, I must tell you that a shower of rain, of natural scenes, is that one for which my curiosity, is least of all excited; and if you think that we shall soon have such a one, I beseech permission, at least for me and Clara, that we may enjoy it from the barn."

Baron H., who, perhaps on account of the coffee, was especially desirous of reaching the end of their ramble, would not hear anything about the barn; he pledged himself for the passing over of the storm—the few rain-drops would signify nothing—the sun certainly would be enticed forth again by a lively song; on which account he immediately struck up a song about spring, and that truly, as Miss Greta expressed it, "with the most infamous voice in the world." And see! the sun actually showed himself, the storm dispersed, and the company set forward on their way, after they had lavished in vain calls, signs, and beckonings of every kind, on the brother and sister in the barn. The wind, which impelled the clouds now ever more violently before it, and every minute increased in strength, was troublesome only to the ramblers. Miss Greta was very soon heated and weary, which they in part might perceive by her becoming silent, and in part by her warning Clara to wrap her shawl closer about her, to hold her bonnet fast, and not to walk on the mown grass, which Clara had not been able to avoid, as she helped the little Filius to collect plants.

Baron H., on the contrary, became more and more lively, and praised his beautiful weather, and his beautiful sunshine. They were walking along the side of a brook, across which, from one high bank to the other, people had laid planks by way of a bridge. This crossing, however, seemed to be of so fragile a nature that one might have feared, with reason, that it was not capable of sustaining a human being.

At this very moment a gust of wind carried away Clara's bonnet and veil, and lodged them in a fir-tree on the opposite bank. The astonishment and confusion of the company were great.

Now I assure thee, dear reader, that I do not at all know what mischief-loving demon put it into Miss Greta's head at this very moment to put the Baron's love to Clara to the test.

Baron H. stood and looked at the bonnet in the fir-tree in a sort of astonishment, without giving the least evidence in the world of any design of venturing over the dangerous bridge.

Miss Greta looked at him with the words—"Now dear Baron!"

"Yes, my most gracious, that is a most disagreeable affair."

"A disagreeable! In your place I should call it a fortunate one. Here have we precisely one of those accidents so rare in our stiff, formal world, in which it is permitted a lover to serve his fair one, and to exhibit the chivalrous feeling despite of danger. Certainly you will not allow this opportunity to pass over unused."

"Your most obedient servant. But, in the mean time, we will wait a little; a gust of wind carried the bonnet away, a gust of wind may bring it back again. We will yet see; let us only wait a little."

"I admire your patience," said Miss Greta. "Now I foresee that to-morrow, at this very time, we shall be standing in this very same place; in the mean time Clara's pretty bonnet will be dragged about famously, and the wind will occasion her headache and toothache."

"May I not offer you my hat, Mamselle Clara!"

"No, no, Baron; she does not take it, make yourself sure of that. She knows quite too well how to value the head of a fellow-creature for her to deprive it of its covering. No; if you would benefit Clara, you must think of some other way."

Baron H. had eaten a great dinner; he was warm with his ramble; only a knight like Don Quixote would wonder that with his eight-and-forty years he delayed to expose himself to a cold bath. Clara asserted repeatedly that she was quite able to go home without a bonnet, and that if anybody was to venture over the bridge it should be herself. In vain endeavored she to release herself from the arms of Miss Greta, who held her fast.

The three stood for some time in the wind looking across at the fluttering bonnet, and waiting for the fortunate gust of wind which the Baron had prophesied. At length losing all patience, Miss Greta exclaimed—"No, I can endure it no longer! And as Baron H. thinks so little about Clara, and fears so very much to do anything for her, I shall go myself. Be quiet, Clara."

"That you shall not," said the Baron very determinately, and held her back; "for although I do not like to find myself unnecessarily in danger, yet I fear a cold bath not at all, and least of all if it were taken for the good of Clara."

And with this, without any more ado, he mounted upon the wooden bridge, from under which a flock of ducks comfortably quacked and hissed.

Clara's arm, sent the Baron a half-loud observation on his word "unnecessarily;" yet very soon, however, did she follow with inward disquiet his steps over the wooden bridge, which bent more than she had expected. What feeling at this moment had sovereignty in her breast, whether fear or remorse, we cannot say, because she had not confessed it to any one.

In the mean time the Baron was almost within reach of his object, without having met with any adventure, when that happened which it was impossible that any one could have foreseen. The fatal bridge consisted of three planks, the middle one of which was decayed. Baron H. had hitherto avoided the "juste milieu," and had gone with one foot upon the left and the other upon the right plank, then by fashioning his legs into a sort of door, which excited the fancy of Filius to prepare a surprise for his father by making use of the same. He would, he thought, rapidly pass him by this means, and fetch the bonnet from the tree before him. Unfortunately the Baron was no Colossus of Rhodes, neither was Filius particularly agile; as he therefore suddenly threw himself like an arrow in the pass, instead of clearing his father at once, he got entangled between his legs. The father uttered a cry of surprise and horror, for he was very near losing his balance, and only recovered it by involuntarily raising his arm, which he let fall upon Filius. At the same moment Miss Greta ascended the bridge; in order, by separating the parties, to make an end of this extraordinary combat. This three-fold burden was too much for the wooden bridge; it bent—it cracked—it broke! and with a great noise the Baron, Miss Greta, and Filius fell into the brook, directly down upon the peaceful ducks, which flew away with loud cries.

The waves closed over Baron H. When his head appeared again above water, he sent forth such extraordinary notes and sounds, that people—I think with King David—might have said of him, "he cried like a crane, twittered like a swallow, and cooed like a dove." As soon, however, as he had sputtered out the water and wiped his eyes, he swam thence also like a swan, and hastened to the assistance of his unfortunate companions. Miss Greta in the mean time had not for one moment lost her customary decision. With one hand she had caught hold of the plank of the bridge, and with the other of the blond locks of Filius—this time, however, for a purpose quite different to the first—and during this she had called to Clara, "not to be anxious, for that she was already safe." We know not, however, for all that, how she could ever have been so, had not Baron H. shoved along with great dexterity, first Filius and then herself, to where the shore of the brook was less steep and offered a more easy landing-place. If the swimmers had had artistical thought enough to have grouped themselves somewhat more skillfully, they would have conferred a great pleasure on an artist; alas! however, there was not one there.

Baron H., with his lively, good-humored countenance, was a blameless river-god; Miss Greta, with her fair complexion, and her regular features, a stately Naid, and so on.

Baron H. had laid down his dear burden on the grass of the shore, where she was received by the pale and terrified Clara. He himself, however, who appeared to have found swimming to his taste, ascended only on shore to take off his coat, after which he again plunged into the water, swam over to the other side, and soon returned thence, bearing Clara's bonnet back in triumph. He held it forth with one hand, as he worked his way through the water with the other. Miss Greta was enchanted with this chivalric behavior; her taste for the comic had in this accident found welcome food, and the whole procession of the immersed gave occasion to the liveliest sallies. She was in the best humor in the world; the shores resounded with incessant peals of laughter; and the little lately occurred mischance—as so often happens among good people—only served to draw them nearer to each other, to make of them more cordial friends.

The unlucky company was conducted by Baron H. into a little cove, which was shaded from the wind by the high shore and an elder-thicket, and here they dried their clothes a little in the evening sun. Yet, as Miss Greta said, they could not end their days in the cove.

"What is now to be done?" was the general question. They found themselves in fact in an inconvenient condition. Clara offered herself to run to Ramlösa and fetch a carriage. This Miss Greta emphatically forbade, because, as she asserted, Clara would run herself into a consumption: should they, wet through as they were, in this wind, in this dust, tread back their way on foot! To Miss Greta this drying method appeared more than doubtful; the company was in the greatest embarrassment. We, however, are not in the least so, for we hear from afar the sound of horses' hoofs and the rattling of an ever-approaching carriage. Before long our friends perceived also this welcome noise. Baron H. sprang forward several paces, and cried with a loud voice, "Hallo! hobo! heda! hallo!"

The traveller was no other than Count Ludwig R. in his own particular person. How astonished he looked! how politely he offered his magnificent landau; how the wet company and Clara seated themselves therein: how displeased the post-horses were with this additional four-fold burden; how the postillion consoled himself with the promise of a double amount of drink money—all this leave I for the reader to picture to himself at pleasure.

The Countess Natalie was assiduously taking one of her singing lessons, and Don Juan was transporting Nina and her with one of his wild ballads, as the unlucky company, attended by their deliverer, entered the room. Great was the excitement produced by the arrivals. At first astonishment, exclamations, questions, and general confusion; then general constraint, when Count Ludwig came forward. Nina turned pale as the Count, with more than his customary friendliness, approached her. A slight crimson of embarrassment tinged the cheeks of the Countess as she presented Don Juan to the new comer. Don Juan alone looked indifferent as somewhat negligently he returned the inquiring glance to the stiff bow of the Count.

We cannot, however, yet lose sight of our wet-through friends, for an extraordinary fate stands yet before them. How they were dried—how they drank elder-tea, and went early to bed—how Filius, spite of all this, had a bad cold in his head, we will make so free as to pass over. On the contrary, we must mention that Miss Greta, on the day after the water ordeal—which, upon the whole, had only given a doubtful result—received an invitation from her aunt the Dowager Countess Nordstjerna, who lived at the distance of four-and-twenty hours, to visit her at her estate lying six English miles from Ramlösa. The card of invitation contained also the inquiry whether Miss Greta wished to be received in an "agreeable or a disagreeable manner:" to which Miss Greta immediately replied, "in a disagreeable manner."

It grieves me not to have time enough to make my reader better acquainted with the Countess Nordstjerna, for I am convinced—let them be as anti-aristocratic as they may—that they would have great pleasure in it. A better bred old lady one could not easily meet with; I mean by this, not so much well-bred and distinguished in regard to birth and behavior, but much more that je ne sais quoi which makes people the opposite of whatever is common, disagreeable, and rude, and speaks the more of nobility of soul, of purity of manners, and undeviating goodness of heart. How amiable the old lady was! To have seen and known her belongs to my dearest recollections. She was amiable to high and low—I use these words in their customary signification—toward old and young—and enchanted young people especially by tasteful, merry exhibitions and intellectual inventions—by her benevolence and—and—I cannot find any word to express that anxiety which she had for the entertainment of others, and which caused her always to diffuse life and gaiety around her. She was also rich, and therefore in a condition to carry out and accomplish her ideas and wishes, and to collect around her all that she blessed. I see, my dear reader, that you fancy her already surrounded with artists and works of art—with brilliant young people, and all the objects of luxury. No, no, dear reader—behold exactly the reverse! all, namely, that is ugly, poor, defenceless, and despaired—

O ye genii, zephyrs, graces, loves! If you had but seen the ugly young ladies and three lame widows—every one of them poor and forlorn—which she had assembled around her, I think you would have run away—run away for terror and horror! Harmony and Christian love, however, did not run away, they felt themselves extremely well placed in this select circle; and the ten planets circulated, after the example of the heavenly bodies, with order and clearness around their sun, the angelically good and serene Countess. In this sphere of uncommon ugliness and uncommon excellence, strangers were very gladly received, and it was also entered very gladly by them.

Miss Greta felicitated herself on this visit, and set off on the day appointed in the best humour in the world, accompanied by Clara. Several unforeseen hindrances had prevented her setting out from Ramlösa earlier than afternoon; and she felt—as we do also—a little dissatisfaction in knowing that the Countess would have been expecting her in vain for several hours. Baron H. drove his two friends with a deal of skill, and sang the while, in coachman fashion—but with little skill—a ballad, which somewhat annoyed Miss Greta. Baron H., however, possessed the little weakness of being pleased with his own false bad singing.

The journey was prosperous; they arrived and alighted from the carriage. Miss Greta was received in the magnificent hall by the Nine Muses, who, with Medusa-heads and extraordinary head-gear, stood between the Corinthian pillars, and made, with fire-tongs upon copper pans and kettles, such fearful music, brawling all the while a chorus, of which our reader may well dispense with the repetition. We can only assert that the party and the singing perfectly answered the accompaniment.

Miss Greta considered the music transportingly "disagreeable," yet still the whole scene was tolerably flat, as much wanting in wit as novelty. She wondered that her wise aunt had hit upon such an unwise reception of her, and sighed with compassion over the old lady's declining powers of understanding.

In the mean time the hostess appeared so very much pleased to see her, so amiable and agreeable to those who accompanied her, and seemed herself so indescribably enchanted with the grotesque reception-solemnity which she had devised, that it was quite impossible not to be as lively as she was. Several strangers from the neighborhood, both old and young, were assembled there, and made the company yet more lively. They spent the evening in telling ghost-stories, and those the most horrid that they could possibly think of. The Countess, herself, described with the fullest amplification the ghosts which from time to time she had seen in her own castle. The history of a beautiful girl, who two hundred years ago was married here in the night-time to the Lord of the castle, and was then murdered by her revengeful mother, made a most shuddering impression upon all, especially when they were told that this midnight marriage-scene was always repeated on certain nights, and had been seen by various inhabitants of the castle.

"It seems," said the Countess, "as if the lovers, by this means, would make known their defiance of and protestations against the fearful treatment which had separated them on earth."

Baron H. declared that he had always very much wished, for once, to see a ghost, and he should not have any objection, on that very night, to make some supernatural acquaintance. Miss Greta was silent.

At supper the farce was continued; and as Miss Greta, who had brought an excellent appetite with her, met with a variety of dishes, which in truth were no dishes at all, she laughed more and more constrainedly; when, however, an egg which she struck with her knife did not crack—because it was made of white marble—she ceased laughing altogether, gave up the attempt, and assumed a very serious countenance. They saw she felt hurt.

Clara and the Baron, on the contrary, continued in the beat of humors; they made a thousand jokes about the extraordinary dishes; Miss Greta only was annoyed; the hostess and the Nine Muses kept up one peal of laughter.

Miss Greta, however, was yet tried more severely, when on going to bed in the evening, she lay on three real eggs, which had been hidden between the sheets, and in this manner made a most unpleasant dish of buttered eggs. She was actually angry, and poured forth a violent philippic on such-like "old-fashion stupidities," into which she could not conceive how her aunt had fallen, and whose sense and taste she vowed to amend.

In the mean time Baron H. had to give battle with the cray-fish in his bed, which pinched him on hands and feet, and left it by no means a mistake of his to call them "infamous canaille." After he had manœuvred them, with unspeakable trouble, into his pocket-handkerchief, his first thought was to throw them down into the court. As he however opened the window, a soft wind came in toward him, which found its way as it were to his very heart. It blew away his indignation against the ugly but innocent creatures, and grieved him that they should die miserably in a dry sand, while he himself slept comfortably in an easy bed. Softly he shut the window, as softly as if he had been about some crime, slipped on his great coat, and sneaked through his door down stairs into the garden. Here he paused, standing beside a brook with his little bundle in his hand. The cray-fish moved themselves significantly, not anticipating the hour of deliverance, because, from ancient times, with them man's hand and the hand of the executioner mean the same thing. It was not without pleasure that the Baron heard his bedfellows fall into the water, and as he saw how the full moon mirrored herself in the clear waves, it was to him as if he saw the countenance of a good mother watching over her children. The pious wish rose in his heart, that peace reigned upon earth, and that not even a worm might be tormented.

Extraordinary! Did an angel hear his wish, and go to bear it to the Father of all being? For exactly at that very moment, a white veiled female figure glided thence among the trees and vanished. Baron H. wished to observe her more nearly; he hastened after her, saw her one moment, lost sight of her the next, and plunged into a morass. Here he almost fell upon his nose, and determined therefore to return to his chamber. Arrived there, he found himself heated and without the least inclination to sleep. The moonlight invited him to a midnight walk, and yet the company, which it was possible he might encounter, did not quite satisfy him. He closed his chamber window, and lighted his candles.

Baron H. belonged to that class of character which is not willingly alone. His joyous, philanthropic temperament required sympathy. A confidential evening talk with good friends was preferable to him to comfortable sleep. This necessity for companionship he felt to-night more vividly than ever. He missed his Filius, who had remained behind under the protection of the Countess. Miss Greta's want of good-humor during the past evening depressed him. He would have given a good deal, at this moment, to have chatted with her, and to have been able to hear her hearty laughter, which, as well as the sight of her white teeth, always did him so much good—to have looked only for a minute into Clara's bright eyes would have made him happy. Thinking how impossible all this was, at that present time, the Baron heaved two deep sighs. An extraordinary echo answered them immediately behind him. He turned himself quickly round, but all was still and vacant in the chamber. The thing seemed very strange, and yet not altogether disagreeable, because it had something sociable in it. He now sighed intentionally; no answer—he coughed, sneezed—in vain. All remained silent, to his great annoyance. Out of humor, he laid himself in bed, and extinguished the light.

No l'été-à-l'été in the world could be so interesting to the listener as that between a man and his pillow. He confides to it his most secret thoughts, his silent wishes, his untold love, his hidden follies. Happy he whose last thought is of a beloved being, on whose faithful breast he slumbers; happy he whose last waking thought raises itself to God, because he reposes in his bosom.

We need not have any fear of imparting to the reader the thoughts of the Baron, in this l'été-à-l'été with his pillow; they were worthy of a good man. After they had elevated themselves for some moments to heaven, they turned again to earth, in order to seek out the best companionship. N.B. That is to say, if she be good—a companionship which the Baron had desired for a long time, that of a wife. Baron H. thought so zealously at this time on such a one, she stood so lovingly before him, that he could not resist heaving a deep sigh, and uttering the exclamation:

"Ah! my beloved, my beloved, beloved Gre—"

He was suddenly interrupted by a spectral voice, which exclaimed—

"Gustav H. ! Gustav H. ! Gustav H. !"

"What's amies?" demanded the Baron somewhat indignantly, starting up at the same time with a very uncomfortable feeling.

"Come and see!" answered the voice.

A slight shudder passed through the Baron, as, by the feeble light which a round opening in his window-shutter admitted into his chamber, he saw the white-veiled female figure at a few paces from his bed. Of fear the Baron knew nothing, and a ghost in the form of a lady had nothing terrible in it for him. He bethought himself for a moment, and again the apparition exclaimed slowly, "Come and see! follow me!"

"I will have the honour of doing so," said the Baron.

He sprang hastily from his bed, dressed himself quickly, and followed his guide, who silently and shadow-like floated before him through desolate chambers and long galleries. The ramble appeared somewhat long to him; he thought it necessary, therefore, to inquire rather boldly, but at the same time in a polite manner, what might be the object of it.

"Have no fear—question me not!" replied the shade with a deep low voice.

We must just now leave these wanderers for a moment, in order to look after Miss Greta.

We left her at the time when she had become angry. It commonly happened on such occasions that perhaps an angry word was forced from her, at which she herself was obliged to laugh. Now, as everybody knows laughter and ill humor are sworn foes, and whenever the first took hold of Miss Greta the second always drove it away; so happened it at this time. After several witty outbreaks, she became reconciled to the world and its "stupidities," and went to bed in the hope of forgetting in sound sleep the foolish supper and the marble eggs, etc., etc. Clara, whose bed stood opposite to hers on the other side of the chamber, was already fast asleep when Miss Greta closed her eyes. Quickly, however, did she open them again; for a dull noise, with certain whiskings-about and flutterings, together with low clatterings, approached her ear.

An alarm-drum had excited far less terror than this unearthly whisking and clattering. She started up quickly in her bed; the whisking-about and sweeping sounds continued. She was quite hot.

"Clara!" exclaimed she with an almost inarticulate voice. "Clara, do you hear nothing?"

But Clara heard nothing; she slept soundly, and her uncommonly deep breathing proved that. Miss Greta was courageous as far as men and animals were concerned, and she would have faced at all times any actual danger boldly and with self-possession; the most unpleasant moments of life would not have been able to make her pusillanimous; but night—darkness—silence—emptiness—and the invisible shapes of dread—ah! dear reader, all these, we must confess, were quite enough to make Miss Greta almost a coward. Notwithstanding all this she felt, as she heard these odd whiskings-about and clatterings, more vexation than fear.

"The bewitched old nest!" said she, "sweep it out however by daylight! It is quite horrible! Never in all my life will I come here again!"

Scarcely had she said these words, when a tumbling noise in one corner of the room drew her eyes thither. O horror! Miss Greta saw three little black figures, one after another, ascend from the floor. Drops stood on her forehead for terror. "Clara!" cried she with an almost stifled voice—but Clara slept on. The little black figures began now to bow themselves, as if they would salute her; then hopped toward the bed and exclaimed with hoarse voices, "Good-day! good-day! good-day!"

Quite out of breath, and yet in order not to be uncivil, Miss Greta replied, "Good-day, good-day, good-day! that means good-night! adieu! Clara!"

Clara was fast asleep—Clara heard nothing. Miss Greta was desperate; she rang the bell violently. With that the black Kobolds hopped about all the brisker, set themselves in a row, bowed and whispered, "All is ready! follow us!"

"No, I thank you!" replied Miss Greta, "I have not time—not now. I come to-morrow! adieu, adieu!"

"You must follow us!" answered the fiends, and approached the bed.

"What would you?" cried Miss Greta in the highest excitement; "go your way! In the name of heaven be off with you!"

The black fiends stood now by the bed, and looked as if they were about to mount upon it.

Les extrêmes se touchent. Great fear has more than once produced real heroism. It is a shame that the great Generals do not write their confessions. Their first battles would make us acquainted with odd things. Despair gives birth to the courage of heroes. Miss Greta gave a proof of this. Driven to the utmost, and as angry as she was terrified, her benumbed energies awoke at once. In the necessity of self-preservation she felt about her for some weapon of offence or defence, and caught the handle of a short warming-pan. Wo to you, ye black ones! Such sturdy blows on the head never had been dealt about—never did ghost cry out more dolefully; never was a flight quicker, especially before a weapon of tin! Miss Greta followed the flying, and struck about her with blind fury. The black ones speedily collected themselves in the corner, where they had risen from the floor, and began again to descend. Here again also Miss Greta struck them on the head, and they vanished with an outcry and tumbling sound, which had nothing at all of the spirit-world in it. Miss Greta in her zeal certainly would have pursued the fiends into their lower region, had not her victorious footsteps been suddenly stayed by discovering that the place at which they had vanished was nothing more than an open entrance into a kitchen, and that the narrow steps by which they had stumbled down, were not at all inviting. Besides which, there ascended from the hole not the slightest vapour of brimstone and infernal fire, but such a savoury smell of potatoes, that she gave up all thoughts of ghosts and shades of the lower world. Her ideas took quite another direction, and she pulled the bell so violently that the cord came down into her hand. This, and the circumstance that, spite of all her ringing, the house continued as quiet as death, increased her anger still more. She hastened to Clara's bed with her warming-pan on her shoulder, shook her, anything but gently, and exclaimed:

"Clara, are you dead! Are you bewitched! Will you sleep to the day of judgment! Clara, wake! Now—thank heaven!—get up, I pray you, and dress yourself quickly. Don't ask me many questions, but be quick!"

Clara did immediately as her friend desired; and while Miss Greta dressed herself she replied to Clara's questions only by incoherent, violent exclamations.

"Stupidities! They shall of a truth give me account for all this!—they positively shall not disturb me again in my sleep—I will soon let them see—idiotical jokes!"

The two friends were soon dressed. They left their chamber ready to rouse the whole house, and to receive every ghost that should approach them with blows of the warming-pan.

O Fate, how remarkably dost thou bring things together; how odd thy ways are! In thy midnight blindman's-buff gambols how one is thrown about between friend and foe, without being able to recognize anything. One stumbles about blindly; to escape the rain gets into the gutter: flies from Scylla to fall into Charybdis.

Scarcely had Miss Greta and Clara entered the long corridor into which their chamber opened, than a white shadow floated toward them. Miss Greta elevated her fearful weapon. With a loud cry of horror the shade fled; but now—Q all ye demons!—a dark gigantic mass advanced, which seemed to fill the whole corridor, and inevitably barred the way against them. Miss Greta thought on the Minotaur, and aimed a blow at the monster with her elevated weapon. A low groan, to which was added a curse in a deep bass voice, followed: "Who dares to give me such a cursed blow!" added the voice.

Miss Greta shuddered, and in the same moment felt herself disarmed and taken captive. A powerful hand grasped her arm, and the same threatening voice continued—

"Hear you, my dear! the joke goes beyond all bounds. A goblin that deals such blows as that, and with heaven knows what kind of weapon, must not be at all ashamed if it be handled roughly, and like a captive of war—adieu! march to trial."

Miss Greta was silent, perhaps intentionally, in order to give some éclat to the affair; but Clara exclaimed quite beside herself—

"Baron H., Baron H., it is Miss Greta!"

"Miss Greta!" returned the Baron in inexpressible astonishment as he slowly let go the arm which he had grasped, "my gracious lady, I must confess—hem, hem—I must confess I never could have supposed that you would have the design of knocking me to pieces. And Clara—but how in heaven's name!—explain it to me!—I acknowledge ladies—"

"Let us defer acknowledgments and explanations, Baron," said Miss Greta, somewhat warmly; "and if you really are Baron H., and not a spectre, conduct us to lights and people, or do you at least bring people and lights here, if there be such in this bewitching house."

"A spectre!" exclaimed the Baron, some little offended—"a spectre! I wish I had been one just now, and then I might have escaped the blow with this cursed thing! What! I really believe it is a bed-warmer. Whenever, in heaven's name I pray you, did it happen that people struck about them with warming-pans!"

Miss Greta's disposition to laughter was put to a hard trial by this speech of the Baron; but annoyed by the adventures of the night, she repressed her gayety, and said seriously, "I beseech of you, Baron, let us for the present forget all this, and conduct us to somebody. I must see lights and people, otherwise I shall become quite ill."

At that very moment a door slowly opened at the further end of the corridor, through which they saw the glimmer of a bluish light. Indescribably sweet music was heard; and beautiful voices, accompanied by softened tones of an organ, sang a solemn anthem. Astonishment and delight overcame the three.

"If that be a goblin, it is at least an agreeable one," said Miss Greta; "we will go nearer."

Baron H. discovered immediately, that his entire politeness had returned; he offered his arm to the ladies, and conducted them toward the spot whence proceeded the light and the music. At the end of the corridor they un-wares found themselves in a sort of troilosed loge, from which, with surprise, they witnessed the following scene. They looked down into a large vaulted chapel, dimly but beautifully lighted, the walls of which were hung with dark red velvet, from whose rich folds gleamed forth old arms and old pictures, representing scenes from the sufferings of Christ. The seats in the chapel were empty; but before the altar, which was ornamented with two tall silver branch-lights, stood a venerable priest in an old-fashioned surplice. He stood so immovably that he resembled rather a statue than a living man. The organ sounded low; the invisible singers poured forth a harmonious Gloria.

The whole was wonderfully beautiful, yet unearthly; it resembled the worship of shades. Presently the scene became more animated, without losing however thereby any of its ghostlike appearances. Slowly and silently an extraordinary procession entered the church. Pale and beautiful, in the picturesque dress of the noble ladies of the sixteenth century, and conducted by an elderly stiff-jewelled dame—as one sees them in old family pictures of that time—floated in a young maiden. Two richly-adorned bridesmaids followed her; then came two stately knights, the one young, the other old, both of them in magnificent marriage dresses; and behind them came two young cavaliers. The young maiden and the young knight separated themselves from the procession, and stopped before the altar; around which the others, slowly, noiselessly, and with silent gravity, formed themselves into a half-circle. They all looked as if they had lain for many long years in their graves; yet still in the eyes of the bridal pair there burned that fire which death was not able to extinguish, nor the grave to cool. As the lovers stood before the altar, the old priest seemed suddenly to become animated; and when the singing ceased, performed, with a deep solemn voice, the marriage ceremony.

Miss Greta listened with breathless attention to catch the names of the bridal couple, but in vain: they were spoken so low that they did not reach her ear. It seemed to her, nevertheless, as if their features were not unknown to her. When the marriage ceremony was ended, the beautiful music again sounded. Baron H. and Clara, both connoisseurs in music, were in the third heaven. Miss Greta also was affected, and felt herself ever more and more transported by this lovely spectacle, which appeared to her every moment to have less and less of the ghostly about it.

The three were so completely occupied by what had gone on before them, that they never thought of speaking to each other of the scene in the corridor. But now the procession, silently and slowly, left the church, as they had entered it; the music pealed forth its sweet harmonies. Soon all was still and desolate—the very light itself of the lamps seemed to pale. A feeling of the supernatural came over Miss Greta.

"Do not let us stop here, dear Baron," said she, "till the lamps are extinguished. I consider it no pleasure at all to sit here in darkness among these old knights."

"We have weapons with us," replied he, le-conically, and lifted up the warming-pan, which he had held between his legs.

"My dearest Baron," answered Miss Greta, turning toward him her pretty, merry face, "I must—"

But Miss Greta must suddenly break off, for all at once dancing-music caught her ear.

"What the thousand!" cried Baron H., full of animation, and tried to open the door of the corridor, but—it was locked, vain attempt to open it—it yielded not.

"I do not see," said Miss Greta, "why we should make such violent assaults on that door—here is yet another;" and as she said this a door, which had hitherto been concealed by the folds of the red silk curtain, yielded to her hand.

Our friends saw themselves suddenly transported into a magnificently-lighted saloon, at the lower end of which, and under a canopy of velvet, sat the bride and bridegroom, while round them stood in a half-circle the other members of the procession. In the middle of the hall splendid ladies and gentlemen performed the torch-dance—not of that kind, however, over which one gapes for whole hours in the palace at Stockholm, but the true, primeval dance, as it is danced in the Indian sacrificial nights, full of life and variety, and consecrated to Siva.*

In the dimly-lighted part of the hall in which our friends found themselves, they perceived three arm-chairs. They seated themselves and looked on the brilliant show. Miss Greta very soon discovered in the torch-dance several of the Nine Muses, whose talent for singing she had duly estimated on the past evening. She believed also that she detected her aunt in the old lady who conducted the bride to the altar; and very soon she had no longer any doubt as to the company in which she found herself.

Baron H. felt himself, in the mean time, as if electrified; he started up, seized the torch from the hand of one of the cavaliers, and began to dance himself, while with great zeal and comic gravity he strove to keep the others in order; in this, however, he did not succeed, for the astonishment he excited occasioned very soon indescribable laughter, which dissipated all order and attention. Before long, however, these both returned, and how astonished was Baron H. as he suddenly saw Miss Greta with a torch in her hand dancing opposite to him as his partner! It excited in both of them the greatest delight to observe their hasty midnight toilet, which made such a whimsical contrast with that of all those who surrounded them. The hearty and unrestrained laughter of the others animated them only the more. They were carried away by a wild rage of dancing, swung themselves round in circles, and made rounds, chains, mill-wheels, and the most extravagant vagaries; the other dancers followed their example; the ball became more and more lively; more and more general. Bride and bridegroom stood up to dance; the old knight and the old noble lady stood up to dance; all danced and laughed. It was a passion, a rapture, a frenzy, a confusion. Even the music was as if seized by witchcraft—it played as if possessed. Oberon winded his horn.

Clara only partook not the general joy. Neither accustomed to the life of the great world, nor to the facility with which its habitudes act their part in it, she could not comprehend the dancing-frenzy of her two friends. Notwithstanding the tranquillizing words which Miss Greta whispered to her at the moment when she rose to mingle in the dance, Clara felt so distressed and so confounded by this extraordinary scene, that she was unable to restrain her tears. The early part of the night lay disturbingly and bewildered in her mind: she did not understand it; she did not understand the world and the people that surrounded her. She could not reconcile herself to the sight of her friend dancing there in her nightcap with a torch in her hand. It seemed to her like folly, like insanity, and, as if driven by an irresistible impulse, she herself mingled among the dancers with the intention of taking Miss Greta's hand and drawing her away from the whirlpool. Yet now was Clara herself drawn into it; and they seized her by the hand, drew her into the dance, and she, like all the rest, made rounds, chains, mill-wheels, and so on. Clara danced, wept, laughed, lost her head and—her shoe. The torches blazed and sparkled before her eyes; she sees Baron H.; he too blazes and sparkles, for his coat-laps are on fire! Dear reader, do not cast reproachful glances on the light in Clara's hand, for I protest to thee that this conflagration had not its origin in her!

On first perceiving a heat in his back, the Baron took a great leap in the air; his second movement was to throw himself on the threatened and already suffering part on the floor with such force as to make the walls shake.

"Fire! fire!" cried several.

"Water! water!" cried others.

"Clara!" cried Miss Greta with a loud voice, as she now saw her danger.

The flames from the baron had seized upon Clara, and now were consuming her light dress. But others also shared in the same fate; the fire caught in all directions, and one ribbon, one gauze handkerchief, one ball-dress after another, became its prey. Clara sank senseless in the arms of her friend, who resolutely embraced her, and held her, burning, closely pressed to her. The burning dancers sprang screaming about the hall. The torches were thrown away: the fire seized on the window curtains, and then on the drapery of the walls.

Death and the devil! what a sight! what a cry! Fire! fire! water! water! Moment of despair! moment of noble revenge! Baron H. started up; seized the warming-pan, which he had disposed of in a corner of the hall, and emptied it over Miss Greta, who had already succeeded in extinguishing the flames which menaced Clara. Indignant at the unnecessary shower-bath, Miss Greta could not avoid saying, even in the moment of universal confusion, "Before you sprinkle people, do look and see if it be necessary!"

Miss Greta had justice on her side—there was no longer necessity for it in her case; but Baron H. had been deceived by his terror and his noble zeal. And the unfortunate, screaming, and burning people—are they to perish unaided! Good Providence! Two folding doors sprang open, and exhibited a sideboard on which stood bowls, bottles, glasses, and plates. O punch, bishop, cardinal, and almond-milk, hard is your fate! Instead of being tasted by knowing palates, and duly prized by them, must you serve to quench other flames than those of thirst! But necessity demands—the liquor streams forth, the bowls are emptied. Ladies become faint—streams of eau de Cologne, universal remedy! animate and console; ices are brought in—people cool and refresh themselves; people ask questions, and get information; they offer congratulations, and laugh; the goblin visitation and the wedding are both explained—that was fiction, this reality. Bride and bridegroom are introduced; people recognize them, and offer felicitations; in one word, there is nothing but joy and joviality. Only between the Baron H. and Miss Greta the double scene with the warm-water pan produced on atmosphere à la grace, which threatened to expand itself into an icy sea between them.

After all these scenes, the sleep of our friends was not the most tranquil, and repeatedly exclaimed they in their dreams—"Fire! fire! water! water!"

CHAPTER XXI.

THE LAST ORDEAL.

After debauch, headache; after study, weariness; after bride, wife.—THE WARREN-TOWER IN KOATYEN.

AFTER storm, calm; after the deluge, the olive-branch; after trial, certainty; after a dinner, digestion; after noon-day, evening. Here pause we. It is evening. Miss Greta sat in a bower of blossoming lindens. She was alone, and was busied peeling oranges, which she was going to steep in sugar for Clara, who was gone with a party to Hôganäs, and was expected back. The greater part of the company at the bath were of the party; Miss Greta in the mean time, who thought the day too hot, remained behind at home. The descending sun shone with its last rays upon the beautiful fruit and the white hands which were busied with it. Miss Greta enjoyed the fine evening, and praised the Lord who had made all things so well. Recollections of the lately-occurred adventures passed now and then through her mind. Now she contracted her eyebrows together, and now a merry and good-humored smile played about her finely-cut mouth.

Quite unexpectedly Baron H. stepped into the arbor, yet with such an uncommonly grave countenance that all the roguishness vanished from Miss Greta's face. Baron H. seated himself upon the bench on which she sat, but as far as possible from her, and kept an obstinate silence. This placed her in some degree of embarrassment; she asked several indifferent questions, which were answered short, on which once more silence ensued.

"I leave to-morrow," said he.

"Indeed!" replied Miss Greta.

"I have endeavored for the last time," continued he, "to prevail upon Clara to alter her views of life and marriage. But it is in vain—at least I am not the one who has the power to persuade her, and I confess I have seen this for a long time."

"Nobody has had any presentiment of that," thought Miss Greta.

"And now that I have obtained perfect certainty on this point," said he, "I wish as soon as possible to leave a place in which not only old acquaintance themselves, but the very elements also seem to have sworn to torment me with trials which I have no longer any desire to undergo, and which perhaps as I conjecture were no otherwise designed from the beginning than to remove me."

Baron H. riveted with these words a keen glance on Miss Greta, who industriously strewed a piece of orange with sugar and offered it to him. He declined it with a movement of the head, and continued:

"In the mean time, I have in fact such a true friendship for Clara—such a fatherly sentiment—if I may so express it—that it is impossible for me to give up the design of a near relationship with this good, pure being."

"How will that be," thought Miss Greta, "shall Filius then perhaps marry her?"

"I have—I wish—" continued the Baron with bashful confusion—"I intended to invest a capital for Clara, the interest of which she should enjoy yearly from this time, and which should enable her henceforward to live independently. After my death she shall have the right of disposing of it according to her own judgment; till then I wish to be her guardian, and I can assure her she would have difficulty in finding a truer or better. I now beg of you to persuade Clara to permit me to gratify in this way a sentiment for her which I so heartily cherish. Beg of her to bless that wealth which Heaven has sent to me, and that indeed by permitting me to devote it with her. Beg of her, for mine or for God's sake, whichever will operate best—to accept it from me! Beg of her that she will think of me with friendship—that she will feel a little kindness toward me; or not to do not speak to her of that—that must be as it may or can—but beg of her—"

"It will be impossible for me to remember all your desires, dear Baron," said Miss Greta suddenly interrupting him—"they are longer than the Lord's Prayer."

"Now, good! say to her only that she must not refuse to show a kindness to a sincere friend; tell her if she rejects my prayer I must believe that she hates me."

Baron H. took his pocket handkerchief. Miss Greta's tearful eyes and their expression contrasted strangely with the tone in which she said—

"Do you fear in fact, Baron H., that I would let her die of hunger?"

"God forbid!" exclaimed he, horrified. "I am convinced that Clara is as well off with you as in the house of her mother. But who can foresee all chances which may happen—marriage, death, and such like? And then—"

"You speak of my marriage, my death, dear Baron—is it not so, of my death?"

"God defend you and all of us from such misfortune! but, but—"

"Good, Baron. But then have you not at the same time confidence in my sound reason? I have long since provided for Clara's future."

"That may be the case; but it is no reason why I should give up my intention. A double security is better than a single one."

Miss Greta paused for a moment, and then replied kindly, but gravely—

"To speak sincerely, Baron," said she, "I consider your generosity superfluous, and think it better that Clara depend alone upon me."

"That is egotistical of you, Miss Greta," said he.

"It may be so, Baron H.; I feel the subject in this way—and I tell you quite candidly I can neither promise to convey your wishes to Clara, nor say to her that prudently she could fulfil them."

"That is somewhat hard and extraordinary," exclaimed Baron H., reddening with displeasure; "you have for a long time called me your friend; and yet for long have you, as my enemy, done everything to prevent my happiness."

"This accusation is hard, Baron H.," said Miss Greta affected, "and would touch me nearer if I felt it were true."

"You have," continued he with yet greater warmth, "prevented my union with the only being whom I ever truly loved—"

"And this being?" interrupted she in a constrained voice.

"Is yourself," returned the Baron with increasing emotion. "You have—I am convinced of this, labored, on the contrary, to bring about my union with a young person whom I highly esteem, and whose hand might have made me happy. You oppose yourself at this moment to the fulfilling of my dearest wishes—that of being able to do something for her benefit. You have for ten years shown yourself on every opportunity my actual enemy—have set yourself against all my plans and all my happiness, and will still certainly not—"

"Go on, Baron—" "and will still certainly not—"

"Certainly not, to weaken my reproach for enmity—certainly will not take the care for my happiness into your own hands—"

"Yes!" answered Miss Greta, while she peeled an orange.

"What?"

"Yes, I say."

"Do I hear aright?"

"Yes!"

"You will?"

"Yes!"

"Accept my hand?"

"Yes!"

"Become my wife?"

"Yes!"

"Is it earnest?"

"If you continue to doubt it any longer, I shall begin to say no!"

"Good heavens!" exclaimed the Baron, pale, and with tears in his eyes as he seized her hands, "is it not a dream? Shall I really be so happy? Can you love me?"

"Baron!" said Miss Greta, mildly, and deeply moved, "I have been a longer time kindly disposed to you than—than I have any desire to confess."

"And you will become my wife!" cried the enraptured Baron, rising and giving a leap for joy; "you will be my wife, my friend for my whole life; but quickly—in a month?"

"Not so quickly, Baron. Besides this, all is not yet said. Hear and consider. My consent is knit up with two conditions."

"Speak! speak!"

"I will always keep Clara with me as now, or at least so long as she herself desires it."

"Certainly, certainly—that of course. She shall be our child. I will love her—"

"Only not too well, I must beg! Now for my second condition."

"Well?"

"I will know who are the parents of Filina." Baron H. looked astonished and almost in despair.

"Never!" stammered he.

"I will know it, Baron!"

"That cannot possibly be your serious intention. You cannot lay so much stress upon so trifling a thing."

"I will know it, Baron."

"Greta!"

"Gustav, I will know!"

"Never!" exclaimed the Baron, in the highest excitement, and darted from the arbor.

Miss Greta sat for a long time immovable, her hand upon her forehead, and sunk in deep thought. A low rustling was heard behind that arbor—a motion which seemed to bring with it a cold wind; a dark body, which stood between Miss Greta and the entrance of the arbor, occasioned her to lift up her eyes. She was astonished and terrified as she saw before her that ghost-like lady, dressed in deep mourning, who had at a former time come before her and had excited her attention, but much more that of the Baron. She stood now immovable; two large and almost extinguished eyes gleamed in their dark sockets; pale roses of the grave, tinted the hollow cheeks, and traces of long suffering exhibited themselves around the faded mouth. The whole figure seemed about to sink into the grave.

Miss Greta thought involuntarily on the Ancestress in Grillpazer's tragedy of that name, and was very near saying, "Why dost thou fix that stony gaze upon me?"

With the almost transparent emaciated hand laid upon the sunken breast, the dark form approached Miss Greta.

"Do you know me yet?" inquired she.

"No," replied Miss Greta.

"You once knew me," said the dark form, "but it is many years since. I am the daughter of Baron H.'s sister. Leo is—my son—yet—he ought not to have been so!"

Miss Greta observed her in silence, and endeavored to recall her features.

The stranger proceeded in broken sentences, which she spoke only with difficulty.

"The father of the boy sleeps in the grave—I shall soon follow him. My uncle has done every possible thing to conceal my error, and to stand in the place of father to my son. I wished to see my child and my uncle yet once more before my death; and for this purpose I am come here from a foreign country. His care has provided an asylum there for me, and thither I shall return without clasping them to my heart—I do not deserve to do it. He, the excellent one, shall not suffer through me. Therefore I now stand here and acknowledge my shame. Farewell! make him happy, and be silent on what you have heard and seen. Let him never dream that the unfortunate Cecilia has been so near to him; let him never know that my secret is known to you—it would disturb his peace. Farewell for ever!"

She made a parting movement with her hand, and withdrew.

Miss Greta rose hastily and went after her.

"Shall not I see you again?" asked she.

"Not on earth!" replied the bowed one. "In an hour's time I shall be far hence. Do not follow me. Farewell!"

With this an elderly lady came forth from among the shrubs, gave her her arm, and both walked off slowly.

Miss Greta followed them with her eyes till they vanished behind the trees. She felt as if she had seen an apparition; but the unearthly sorrowful impression was strongly mingled with a comfortable feeling, and she saw the glory of a saint around the head of the Baron. She could not, however, resign herself long to her observations, because she was again disturbed. It was the little Filius, who came to inquire after his father. She called the boy to her. He glanced at her distrustfully; but Miss Greta looked so kind that at last he took courage and went to her. She placed him on her knee, and stroked his cheeks and his bright locks, while she resigned herself to the most agreeable thoughts of the boy and his foster-father. Filius looked askance at the oranges.

At the same moment the Baron returned, seated himself by Miss Greta and the boy, and said with great emotion—

"It is impossible that it can be your serious meaning. It is impossible that you will sacrifice my happiness, and as I know, to a certain degree, your own also, to a whim, to childishness, to an outbreak of curiosity—"

"Whim, childishness, curiosity or not, all as one," said Miss Greta, "tell me if it be your serious intention, rather to renounce my hand than satisfy my curiosity, and tell me who are the parents of the boy!"

"I cannot, I will not tell it, let it cost what it may," said the Baron, depressed, yet with determination.

"Very well then," returned Miss Greta with a dignified cordiality that became her uncommonly well, "if you positively cannot tell me who his mother was, I at least will show who for the future she shall be."

With these words she embraced Filius, lifted him up, and kissed him with a warmth which the boy immediately returned. The Baron, who wept for joy, threw his arms around them both.

"The curtain falls," is commonly said in dreams when the author has succeeded in uniting all his characters in the last scene in a general embrace; and it is said so here also; for the highest joy of man, as well as his deepest sorrow, is only for the eyes of angels. But if we let the curtain fall, it must only be for a moment. We shall draw it up again directly, in order to present a little afterpiece, which is called—how, our next chapter will show.

CHAPTER XXII.

MISS GRETA'S ANXIETIES.

THE piece opens on the evening of the same day. Scene—Miss Greta's bedroom. Miss Greta feels herself, against her own will, in great disquiet. She wishes to confess to Clara what has happened, but does not rightly know how to do this, and what the effect of it may be. That word "to confess," as regards any affairs of her own, does not please her. For the first time in her life, she feels embarrassed and almost without courage. She sniffs the candles, coughs, puts things in their places, is hasty and uncertain in all her movements. Clara seems to remark nothing; an uncommon liveliness animates her whole being. She seems determined to talk incessantly of Baron H., which occasions Miss Greta great anxiety of heart, because she thinks that Clara has begun to incline to him and marriage.

CLARA. So much is certain, and I think one is convinced of it every day more and more, that there is an infinite deal of good in the world.

MISS GRETA. O yes!—but—certainly there are both good and bad.

CLARA. Yes; but the good far outweighs the bad. The better one comes to know mankind, the more one sees that every one has his advantages which make him worthy of esteem. Every one in fact has his pound of heaven's wealth. This pound, this goodness in man, seems to me like his good angel, which continually draws him toward goodness. Baron H. has taught me not to judge by the surface. For a long time I considered him bad; as one who only troubled himself to find out the faults of his fellow-creatures to ridicule them. Now, I know that he is witty; but, at the same time, much more good-humored than witty. He loves mankind, although he knows their failings. He would like best to do good to all. Besides, he laughs just as much at himself as at others; and then what a beautiful earnestness is there not with this in his soul!

MISS GRETA. Hem!

CLARA. I am convinced that Baron H. unites with his joyous temper the most estimable qualities. He seems to me to be one of the few with whom one might boldly venture on a journey through life.

MISS GRETA. Hem! hem!

CLARA. He certainly would make the wife happy who knew rightly how to take him.

MISS GRETA. Uf! uf! It is astonishingly sultry here.

CLARA. And what a joy it must be, to contribute anything to the happiness of so good and amiable a man.

MISS GRETA, aside. O heavens! that goes too far. Aloud. Yes, certainly; but how can any one be certain of making the happiness of any one?

CLARA. Oh, that is easily felt. If I had a friend who loved the Baron, I would counsel her with pleasure as quick as possible to have the marriage, and her happiness should be mine.

MISS GRETA, who can no longer contain herself. Clara! tell me boldly out—are you in love with any one?

CLARA. I am not, but—

MISS GRETA. But—but?—Will you speak quickly, child?

CLARA, embracing her. But I am convinced that you are a little, and—

MISS GRETA. Don't strangle me for it! Clara, forgive me! I am irritable—I am anxious—and you—you make a jest of it.

CLARA. Allow me to finish my sentence, and embrace you.

MISS GRETA, with tears in her eyes. Do as you will, Clara.

CLARA. Now, good then! I finish thus. I am convinced—but now I say I know—that Baron H. loves you again; that he has loved you for a long time.

MISS GRETA. That was well said, Clara! And you are convinced of it, Clara? You are glad of it, Clara?

CLARA. I'm right heartily glad; because you are worthy of each other, and will make each other mutually happy. I only wish I could give you both a clear idea of that which you feel.

MISS GRETA. I cannot possibly receive the accusation of having no clear idea of that which feel. And in order to convince you of the contrary, and to show you how wrong you are, offer me your congratulations, Clara—I am betrothed to Baron H. I pray you, do not look so confounded; do not let your arms hang as if they were of lead. Throw them round my neck; your embrace is more in place now than before, and it is the dearest necklace that I ever possessed or will possess. There! that is right, there! Now see you, my Clara, my naughty girl, if it should so happen that you feel less kindly toward me on account of this marriage, or that you think you shall be less comfortable in my house—then, do you see, I'll end it all at once on the spot.

CLARA. No, no! never! Have no fear! I shall be happy in your happiness. I shall love the Baron—

MISS GRETA, interrupting her. Softly, softly. I give to both the Baron and you a dispensation from all vows of mutual love. I shall be perfectly well pleased if you are agreed in this, loving me. I, for my part, will do all that I can to hold you to the fulfilling of this duty. Tell me, Clara, that you do not consider it too difficult.

CLARA, with a full heart. It is the pleasantest, the dearest, which will be laid upon me in life.

PICTURES.

She went in the grove, to the red-rose bush;
The nightingale sang in the evening's hush.
SWEDISH POPULAR SONG.

THESE pictures are not fine—are not beautiful; they bear no resemblance to those which in the past winter delighted court and city. Besides this I have not the heart to jest—nay, dear reader, thou mayest believe me; on the contrary, I kindle my lamp with the greatest unwillingness, and only to honor Truth, for my soul is troubled.

It is even so with Nature. It is a hot summer's day. A gray, cloudy heaven oppresses the yellow, dry earth. Silence reigns in the trees; silence in the air; silence in the region of the clouds. All is solanguid—solanguid. Languidly hum the gnats; languidly hang the flowers; languidly and pantingly do the animals hang their heads; languidly lie the cockchafers on the sapless leaves; languidly glances the sun through the vapor, and burns even in setting.

The company at the bath are out on a rural excursion. Nina alone has remained at home. She has a headache, and at her own desire has she been left alone. Toward evening she felt better, and went out, to seek for coolness. A sort of melancholy insensibility clouds her mind, and her steps are languid through the vaporous neighborhood. She followed the rushing of a little waterfall, and went toward it instinctively in the hope of being refreshed by it.

Freshly sparkled the silver waves; green and flowery were the banks. Nina laid herself down upon the velvet-soft turf; her hand played with the waters; her eye followed their course; she saw how they flowed, idly, restlessly, without knowing whence they came or whither they went. Dark feelings and thoughts on the mysteries of Nature passed through her soul, which shook like a flower in the evening wind. She let it be shaken; she felt herself better; the air had here something refreshing in it. The deadness of her spirit seemed passing away; tears of melancholy pleasure shone in her eyes, and the longing after happiness and life swelled in her breast.

She perceived then not far from her the tones of a guitar. The leaves concealed the singer, but Nina recognized the melodious voice of Don Juan.

Nina, fly, fly! Wherefore dost thou not fly, inconsiderate one?

Nina's first feeling was to rise and leave the spot, but an incomprehensible magic fettered her mind, and she had not power enough to overcome it. She lingered, and he sang in loving, melting tones—

Love, it is the soul of nature,
And the breath of life is love;
Flowers their fleeting odors mingle
In the field and in the grove.

Birds pour forth from leafy branches
Many a love-ecstatic song:
Little brooks of true love babbling—
Steal the flowery vales along.

Scant thou how one tender leaflet
On its heart another warms!
O how lovingly embracing Rest they in each other's arms!

Thus refresh themselves all natures;
Thus themselves in love rejoice:
Canst thou then, thou fairest maiden,
Pause, ere thou make love thy choice!

Come and taste and know what love is:
Love will by his word abide;
Follow then thy bosom's impulse,
Maiden, do not turn aside!

The song ceased. Why did not Nina fly? The singer lies at her feet. Here he made known his love in glowing sighs. He said to her the tenderest things, and made the most passionate declarations to her. Deeply and powerfully was Nina's soul seized upon. She saw herself worshipped; she believed herself beloved; yet she feared that which she felt; she wished to fly, but Don Juan held her back.

"Let us love! let us be happy!" whispered he in the most passionate tones; "let us be happy! Life is short and dark! Let us die in the arms of pleasure and joy!"

He had expressed the word that slumbered in the depths of her soul. An unspeakable tremor and weakness seized her heart; God and the future vanished—she desired only to love and—to die.

Yet her good angel still lived within her; she called to her her deliverer from danger—her lips stammered forth the name of Edla!

Saw she that pale, Nemesis-like countenance which suddenly rose up behind them both? With a cry of joy and of horror Nina exclaimed "Edla!" She sank at her feet, embraced her knees, and sympathizing nature threw a veil over her soul. She sank down fainting. Edla raised her; threw an annihilating glance upon the seducer, who seemed like one struck by lightning, and bore away her insensible sister.

With raging fury in his heart, cursing his fate, Don Juan stood there. His foot stamped the ground as he raised his clinched fist. He was about to leave the rushing waterfall, when he perceived a footstep. It was Clara, who, astonished by his look, merely remarked, "They told me that I should find Nina here!"

There was something in Clara's countenance and whole being which resembled a calm, clear, summer night. The voluptuary Don Juan had long been attracted by it, and at this moment he felt this with double force. His excited mind and the thirst for revenge suggested to him a devilish plan.

"The saints," thought he, "are as easy to catch as the children of the world, only one must make their news out of their own yarn."

But he craftily concealed his design. On Clara's assertion respecting Nina he replied:

"She will soon return. Ah, pardon for one moment! The evening is so mild, can your heart be less so? Will you vouchsafe no word, no look of comfort, to one whose breast is torn by unquiet?"

Clara remained standing, and said with a voice in which was some touch of sympathy, "What can I do for you? Tell me quickly, I have but little time."

Juan approached her and attempted to take her hand, which she withdrew.

"Tell me only," said he, "that you do not hate me—that you feel some kindness for one who would give up his whole life to be as pure and good as you, and to be guided to heaven by your hand. Stay—ah, do not hasten away! Your presence sanctifies even the air around me, and fills my heart with a pure desire. Beloved one! Holy one! Tell me that the heaven which you know will not cast me out!"

"Heaven casts out no one that seeks with earnestness," replied Clara mildly and tranquilly. "Seek heaven thus, and you will find it. Farewell!"

"Stay, heavenly Clara! Are you afraid of me?"

"Why should I be afraid of you?" asked Clara, stopping, and looking at him with quiet astonishment.

"Stay thus! Ah stay with him to whom your presence gives life!"

"I cannot. You can speak with me at Countess H.'s, if you wish it. Adieu!"

"O Clara! that is hard. You say that heaven casts out no one—do not be severer yourself. Strike not back the erring. Show me the way to happiness, dear angel! Save a soul! O Clara! let me hold this hand, press it to my heart, this hand which—"

But he had only taken hold of air. Clara was warned by her good angel; she had listened to his voice, and had followed his beckoning; for in her soul there dwelt no vanity, either spiritual or worldly. She vanished like a shadow in the darkness of night.

With an exclamation of extreme vexation, Don Juan followed her; friendly stars, however, watched over Clara, and she found her way; and when she heard the steps ever approaching nearer, when she could scarcely fly for anxiety and weariness, she sank saved in the arms of her friend, who came out to seek for her.

Don Juan had quickly withdrawn behind a tree. On its topmost boughs there was a magpie nest, in which the young once smacked and jabbered while he cursed and swore.

And now—shall we betake ourselves to the bed on which Nina reposed, and by which Edla watched? Shall we wait for the awakening of the sleeper? We will not. We will turn our glance from the meeting of the sisters.

O truly it is a bitter, bitter thing to see eyes which once followed us lovingly, now looking upon us sternly and with displeasure, or indeed turning wholly aside from us with painfully experienced contempt—nay, perhaps shedding tears over our weakness! Truly is it better, truly is it annihilating, and yet—blessed be the tears, blessed the severity in beloved eyes! Burn burn into the soul of the fallen one! Burn to purify! Love, friendship, who will not bow himself before your chastising hand—who will not obediently open his inmost soul to your proving glance? Unhappy he whodoes it not! he is lost for ever!

Nina lay for three days in violent fever: Edla remained by her bed, a faithful attendant; but tenderness and confidence were vanished. Edla was quiet, but her pale cheek evidenced that which she suffered. One evening, when Edla thought Nina slept, she softly stroked back the curls which concealed the forehead, on which she so gladly looked. Nina perceived this, seized the thin hand of her sister, and placed it to her lips. Edla did not withdraw it. Nina covered it with kisses and bathed it in tears.

"Speak to me!" prayed she—"say one kind word to me!"

Edla bent over her and said with tenderness, "My poor child, I am always kind to you."

A hot tear fell on Nina's arm, which she kissed away.

"Now," said she with a comforted heart, "I shall soon be better."

A few days after this she was so much better as to be able to get up; and Edla no longer avoided an explanation, which both desired. Nina opened to her sister her whole soul. Edla searched sharply, but tenderly, into all, even into its most secret folds. Nina concealed nothing: she experienced an alleviation of heart in her confession; she felt herself under the hands of a skilful physician. Divine confidence—refreshing drawing together of affection! Strengthening sympathy—sweet bitterness—ease after pain! How beautifully Jean Paul says on this subject "When a person is no longer his own friend, he goes to his brother who is so; this one talks gently with him, and is able to give him life again."

And not the gentle word only; no, the severe also, nay, even the sentence of punishment, one hears willingly from beloved lips. The sentence of punishment! Art thou astonished? No! look deeper down into thine own heart, and thou wilt find it is so. Holy mystery of the soul, God dwells in thy innermost.

Edla found Nina's wishes pure; her own heart beat higher with joy because of this; but she was shocked at the state of her mind, at her weakness, at the slumbering of all nobler powers, whereby she had been nearly brought to the very verge of destruction.

With the whole strength of her clear vision and of her deliberate understanding, Edla now spoke to her sister, and showed to her her condition and her faults in the clear light which humbles, and yet at the same time raises up. She made her acquainted with herself; she made her feel deeply she had sunk under the worth of true womanhood; and awakened in her the longing desire to raise herself again to her former position. First a tear of remorse, then a prayer, then action—that is the course of amendment.

"You must give up this dreamy, frivolous way of life," said Edla; "you must be active, must be employed, and you will feel yourself happy, and be able to do good to your fellow-creatures. Nina, you must endeavor to make a noble man happy, and to look for a support and a guide for yourself in him. Can you now calmly hear what I have to say to you, or shall I speak of it another time?"

"No, directly, directly, Edla! It is better that I know all at first. Spare me not, Edla! Do I indeed deserve that?"

"Now, right!" returned Edla. "An unpleasant report has been spread about an intimacy between you and Don Juan. Do not turn pale on that account, Nina; turn pale rather because you gave any occasion for it. A jest on the part of Don Juan, upon you and me, gave some probability to the report. Count Ludwig has compelled him to retract his lightminded assertions; and that truly by a duel. Don Juan has received his deserved reward in a sabre-cut across the forehead."

"Good God!" exclaimed Nina; "and I, unfortunate me, am guilty of all this mischief? And is that all? Has there not yet greater misfortune befallen? Perhaps the life of some one is in danger?" questioned Nina, beside herself with terror.

"No; be calm. Don Juan has left the place. His wound is not in the least dangerous, and will only leave a scar behind it. Count Ludwig has been fortunate enough to chastise him and defend you without any harm to himself. He has made use of this opportunity to declare the sentiments which he cherishes toward you. He has solicited your hand from your father."

"He is noble minded—oh, he is good!" said Nina, deathly pale and highly excited. "Oh, how little I deserve that! If I were but in a state to thank him rightly. Here is my hand, Edla. Take it in yours—dispose of it as you think well. I have so misused my freedom, I resign it to you. Speak only, and I will do, willingly do, that which you desire."

"Your own wish, Nina, your own re-awakened knowledge of that which is right and best, must determine us. But you shall not decide in this unquiet moment. To-morrow, when a calm night has strengthened body and mind, we will speak farther on this subject."

That same evening, as Nina perceived more tenderness in Edla's attentions to her—as she read in her countenance traces of a lightened heart—in the evening when her sister, as in the days of her childhood, sat a watchful angel by her bed, and spread out the flowers which she had gathered for her darling upon the coverlet, Nina felt that Edla must decide her fate; felt that she could do anything in order to win back her esteem and confidence, and a peace, long absent from her soul, returned again to it.

On the morrow, when the fanning winds awakened with their light wings the sweet flowers, and a flood of light odour, and the singing of birds pressed in through the open window, Nina awoke also to a new and strengthened life. Pale, but self-collected and decided, she arose. Never, perhaps, had she been more lovely than at this moment, in which humility and strength had sanctified at the same time her whole being, and resignation had diffused over her beautiful brow an angelic charm.

Between the two sisters a conversation now took place, such as between mothers and daughters have often occurred, and will occur for ever on earth. The daughter agrees to that which the mother wishes. She considers her will the best and the most prudent in the world; only she complains softly of the wooer's want of love: she feels esteem, perhaps friendship for him, but—

The mother talks of the stability of a union which is based on the rocks of esteem; of the happiness of an active, useful life for those who are dear to us; of the necessity of having an object, an interest in the world; of the peace which is the result of duties fulfilled—and a great deal more.

Edla's words were by no means the suggestions of a cold heart and deficient understanding; they came forth from conviction. Count Ludwig, she said, was the noblest of men, and Nina alone by a union with him could develop that strength without the employment of which one could only lead a useless life.

Nina only repeated that which she had said on the preceding evening.

"Judge, determine for me, Edla!" was her prayer; "I trust myself no longer. That which you think, I think also—that which you wish, I wish. According to my best ability I will thank Count Ludwig for that which he has done for me, and for his faithful devotion to me. I will endeavor to be a wife worthy of him. I will, if I am able, regain the esteem of all, and make all happy; then I shall certainly learn to know true and real happiness."

Edla embraced Nina; and so happy was Nina in the regained affection of her sister that she allowed herself, with a feeling of satisfaction, to be conducted by her in search of their father, that he might dispose of her hand.

But before we draw up the curtain, and exhibit to the reader the scene which delayed the two sisters in the room of the President, we must present to him a picture which was seen on the preceding evening by more people than ourselves.

We saw on this sad evening the President, with uncovered head, as he endeavored with the greatest possible care to shield his wife from a violent shower; we saw him as he took off his overshoes in order to put them on his Countess, and then walk home beside her through water up to his ankles.

This may explain how it happened that the two sisters found their father sitting in an arm chair speechless, with distorted countenance, and unable to move. The President had had a stroke; the Countess Natalie the while was pacing up and down the bath-saloon, surrounded by her friends and her numerous acquaintances.

By the use of active and prudent means the President, in the course of a week, was so far recovered that he was able to speak and slightly to move; his memory, however, was weakened, his countenance still contracted, and the whole of his left side paralyzed. Several physicians unanimously agreed that the influence of a southern climate might perhaps re-establish his health; and a journey to Nizza was advised.

Whenever any great danger threatens, when on any occasion life is shaken, then the power of any fleeting bias gives way, and the strong feelings which are rooted in the better nature of the human being throw off the veil and step forth; then strikes the hour of victory for really faithful and loving souls.

Thus was it also with the President. When he felt the powerful hand of sickness laid upon him—when the necessity for a long sojourn in a distant, foreign country was announced to him, he turned from his brilliant wife and her made-up tenderness, and extending his arm to his daughter exclaimed, "Edla!" He seemed unable longer to live without her, and was tranquil when he only saw her. Edla's determination to accompany her father was resolutely taken at the very moment in which the physicians advised the journey, and the Countess esteemed it an actual favour of destiny that a seriously sprained foot prevented her, "to her perfect despair," as she asserted, from following her husband.

Edla wished greatly to have seen Nina betrothed before she was compelled to leave her. Nina permitted herself to be wholly guided by her sister. The Countess, who had suddenly become cool to Nina merely out of aversion to Edla, maintained neutral ground, and made use more frequently now than ever of the word "bien-séance."

Count Ludwig urged, and that not without some arrogance, the accomplishment of his wishes. But who was it then that prevented it? No other than the poor, sick, weak-minded President! He seemed to imagine that betrothal and marriage were one and the same thing; whenever Edla spoke with him of Nina's betrothal, he answered, "In a year's time, when I come back again!" In vain Edla endeavored to make the matter clear and comprehensible, he still returned the same answer. At length he became angry and said, "Do you think that a gay wedding and my condition agree at all? No, in a year's time, when I come back again!"

Edla gave up therefore speaking with him any further on this subject, and resigned the hope of seeing Nina betrothed, before her journey, with the man whom she so highly esteemed.

"Take me with you," besought Nina from her inmost heart; "let me share with you the care of our father!"

Edla could not grant the wish of her sister. She feared for Nina's health, and besides this wished to dedicate herself solely to the care of her father, without being diverted from it by anxiety for her sister. She feared also, under existing circumstances, to separate Count Ludwig and Nina. It was determined to wait, and if in the course of a year, the power of mind and body of the President was not re-established, the formal betrothal of the young couple should then take place. Till that time Nina was to remain with her step-mother, who declared, that during the absence of her husband she should live wholly retired from the world, on one of her estates which lay far up in the province of Nordland. Thither also in the next year Count Ludwig himself should come, she said, in order to spend the spring and summer with Nina. Edla was convinced that a nearer acquaintance with the Count would awaken in her sister the inclination which she so very much desired.

Nina felt herself inwardly happy by this delay to the deciding of her fate, yet she dared scarcely to confess to herself this contest against the accomplishment of Edla's wishes.

It was evening. Edla was to commence the journey with her father on the following day. Nina had passed several days in the sick room with her sister, and now went out, at her desire, to breathe a little fresh air. Miss Greta was gone on this day with her betrothed, with Clara, and the rest of the company, on a country excursion, and the walks around the Wells were almost empty. Here and there only crept along an invalid, whose feeble limbs but not enabled him to become one of the party. Nina remained on the turf before her father's house, and inhaled the fresh pleasant air. The sun descended gloriously; small red and yellow flowers grew creepingly at her feet. The trees were tinged with the gold of the setting sun, and from their tops sounded forth a thousand-voiced song. Nina looked around her full of enjoyment; it was a beautiful picture, and she herself the most beautiful feature in it. She glanced lovingly toward the sun; she kissed carelessly its beams as they fell upon her marble white hands; and the sun threw upon its daughter a glance of affectionate tenderness.

Nina now saw that a family, apparently of the working class, came slowly along in the shade of the trees, and at length seated themselves not far from her upon a bench. Husband and wife had good honest countenances, yet still marked with care. The children were pale and quiet; one saw in them poverty. A liveried servant with a basketful of the most beautiful fruit passed by them, and was asked by the man with some embarrassment—"Whether he could sell him some of that fruit?" The servant answered that he could not; that the fruit was a present to Nina H. At that moment he perceived Nina, advanced toward her, and gave her the basket with a deep bow. After she had commissioned the messenger with many thanks to the Countess Nordstjerna, and had laid aside some beautiful grapes for her father and Edla, she took the basket, and stepped, blushing deeply, to the poor family, and prayed them, in the most obliging manner, to divide the beautiful gift with her.

Nina's indescribable grace, the beneficence, and the touching goodness which was painted in her countenance, made perhaps a deeper impression upon the poor family than the gift itself. She took even the youngest child upon her knee and gave it of the fruit, which, amid renewed invitations to eat, she spread upon the table. As she saw all around her so satisfied, and felt the little one on her knee struggling for very delight of the beautiful feast, she was conscious of a purer satisfaction than she had often known.

The good people were soon communicative, and Nina listened with sympathy to a relation of sufferings that visit most abundantly the dwellings of the poor. Yet there was no lamentation, no discontent; but hope covering with its green leaves life which want and sickness had almost exhausted.

Nina was happy in this little circle, where inbred tenderness was at home; she also felt herself at home with these people, and kissed the child on her knee with hearty good-will. Suddenly she saw Count Ludwig before her; who, with an expression of displeasure on his stern countenance, observed this scene. Nina's delight had vanished at once, and a certain restraint came over the artisan family. The children pressed nearer to their parents; the parents left off eating.

Count Ludwig turned to Nina, and said with a sharp intonation—"Would it not better become Miss Nina to take a turn through the walks than to sit here? The evening begins to get cool."

Nina had hitherto felt nothing of coolness, but now she perceived it in fact. She acceded to the Count's wishes, and rose after she had kissed the little one, who parted from her unwillingly. The parents rose at the same time, in order again to express to Nina their warmest thanks. Count Ludwig scarcely permitted her to remain, or answer them with her usual amiability; he tore her almost away as he said carelessly—"Enough, enough, people! the children can take the remainder of the fruit with them."

"Do you know the people that you were there with en famille?" asked he of Nina, as he went off with her.

"No," replied Nina, with an unquiet look on the Count.

"Neither do I," said he heedlessly; "they may perhaps be honest people, perhaps thieves."

"We will believe the best," said Nina mildly; "and I more than believe it. I am, after what I have seen and heard, quite convinced that they are good and honest people."

"They may be so," continued he; "but it is always most advisable to avoid such like intimate acquaintanceships, especially with people of that class. It is better for us, and better for them also."

Nina did not allow herself to be confounded by the condemnatory tone of Count Ludwig, but related quite simply and in good-humor how this little acquaintance had come about.

"I acknowledge," said the Count, curling his lip to a sarcastic smile, "that the affair, as well as the coloring of it, has something romantic in it; nay, you may even hope to see them next figuring in a novel."

"Believe me, I never thought of that," replied Nina, a little hurt.

"The affair would have passed off in quite another way, and as a mere trifle, if you had acted simply and rationally; that is, if you had sent the fruit to the artisan family by a servant. I would answer for it, that it would have tasted quite as good to them."

"That is in no way proved," replied Nina with animation; "how easily might not the tender feelings of these people have been wounded by my so doing. And then—why should not my way of acting, under existing circumstances, have been the simplest and most rational? Is it not, on the contrary, highly unnatural to keep oneself perpetually in a state of defence against one's fellow-creatures? In heaven, where, without doubt, all will happen according to God's will, people will certainly have intercourse one with another in a totally different manner to what is commonly the case here."

"Let us therefore defer this kind of intercourse till we are in heaven," said Count Ludwig shortly. "Now, however, we are living on the earth; and what disagreeable consequences result from inconsiderately formed acquaintance, we have frequent opportunities of seeing."

O my young reader! I see in spirit how thy eyes flash lightning here, and how thou, in Nina's place, wouldst have raised thy head proudly, and wouldst have made answer—

"If the Count fear that my inconsiderateness may occasion disagreeable consequences, I desire sincerely that the count should not have to suffer by them, and it is best that we here separate for ever!"

This answer pleases me most uncommonly from thee, thou good one; for it proves that thy heart and thy actions are pure, and thou hast nothing to reproach thyself with.

But it was not so with Nina. She had to reproach herself with much weakness, much inconsiderateness, and therefore she did not answer in this manner. She was silent, although her eyes filled with tears at the severity of the Count. Her natural humility, the consciousness of her past errors, the remembrance of Count Ludwig's chivalrous behavior, all these things did not allow indignation to rise in her mind. She was silent and depressed in the extreme, as with her arm on the count's she paced up and down the dusty walks. Count Ludwig broke silence by saying: "If I have been too warm, or too severe, then forgive me. Nature has given me no flattering tongue, and I know, it will be difficult for me to win the favor of ladies. That is my misfortune. But believe me I mean kindly by you."

"I believe it, I know it," said Nina warmly, touched by the tone in which he spoke the last words: and she slightly pressed his hand as he raised hers to his lips. They continued their walk, and Nina felt, as she so often did in Count Ludwig's presence, visited by the spirit of silence. She found not one word to say; her thoughts and her feelings seemed alike fettered.

This state may arise from two very dissimilar feelings—love and fear. Nina's feelings were not love.

As they returned it had become dark. The air was damp, a cold mist lay between her and her home. A shudder passed through Nina's tender frame.

"Are you unwell?" asked the Count with sympathy.

"No," replied Nina, "but I am cold."

They walked somewhat quicker. This walk by the side of Count Ludwig was unpleasant to her. It seemed to her an image of her future life—all so cold, so silent, and so dark. Their way led them past the table where the artisan family had sat: it was exactly as they had left it; the remainder of the fruit they had not taken with them. Count Ludwig muttered something between his teeth about "idiotic pride." Nina, in the mean time, thought of another world, but said nothing. She hastened to forget, with Edla, the unfriendly impression she had received.

It was a misfortune that Edla had scarcely ever seen in Count Ludwig those humors and traits of character which show what the man in his every-day life is properly to those around him. Perhaps Edla looked too exclusively upon that which distinguishes the statesman in the eyes of his fellow-countrymen. Nina, on the contrary, was much more sensitive to the virtues which make the happiness of family life. She had however renounced her own will to that degree, that she would not permit her thoughts long to dwell on anything which was displeasing to her in Count Ludwig. She guided herself according to his wishes; she thought on his distinguished qualities and esteemed them; nay, she endeavored in deep earnestness to love him. Endeavor to love any one—Sisyphus-labor!

Edla set off with her father, who gave himself up like a child to her guidance. Deeply agitating was this separation for Nina, whose mind from so many causes had been so strongly excited. As to Edla, she appeared calm; the light trembling of her limbs alone betrayed the painful warfare which raged within her. She held Nina long pressed to her breast, as if she would impart to her the strength that dwelt there; she then laid the hand of her sister in that of Count Ludwig, and looked on both with an indescribable expression without being able to say one word.

It would be impossible to give all the histories, all the conjectures, and all the anecdotes, which the company at the Baths related respecting these occurrences in the President's family. They furnished an inexhaustible fountain of conversation, whose quintessence for the greatest part consisted in the exclamation of—"The poor Countess! O, it has cost her dear!" and in the moral observation—

"How fragile we are! to-day full of health and vigor—to-morrow on the brink of the grave! The best thing is to be always ready!"

After Edla's departure, it seemed as if that earlier indifference to everything would again take possession of Nina, but she herself struggled against it. A still gentle seriousness, an indescribable amiability toward every one, gave to her an irresistible charm. This operated even upon Count Ludwig, who became even gentler in her presence. He felt that she alone was destined for his wife; he felt himself from day to day more fettered by her—she became more and more necessary to him; and he considered it almost as a misfortune, that by the death of a distant and unknown relation a great inheritance, of which he was become possessed, required his personal presence.

A short time after Edla's journey, he thus was also obliged to part from Nina. He did this with sincere and deep regret, and so much the more as he could not fix the time when he could see her again. How much easier Nina breathed after his departure, Count Ludwig had no idea. He thought that she had attached herself to him as the future support of her life, and we will not deny that the thought of having a firm support is sufficient with many weak female natures to induce them to give their hand to a man of stern and cold feeling. But it was not so with Nina. That which she required was an inwardly-animating power, was—sun. Count Ludwig believed that she looked up to him as to a higher being, and this was precisely the kind of devotion which his power-loving soul alone desired.

"It often happens when we are distant from those whom we love, that we remember a word or an action which causes us to reproach ourselves: 'thou wast not gentle enough, hadst not forbearance enough! I also, Nina, have such recollections, and would so gladly extinguish many moments of the last time we were together.

"I am far from you and cannot speak with you—I write therefore. My good sister, preserve the following counsel in your heart.

"Be not too severe against yourself; judge not yourself too sternly; and above all things, do not let the occurrence which cast a shade upon your name degrade you to yourself. It is the actually accomplished deed which sinks us in the eyes of the world, because we have already fallen in its commission. The first thoughts, the first impure feelings, these are they which we must fear, against these that we must combat. Watch over the feelings of your heart, my sister, for these are they, if pure, which sanctify and give to you worth, properly speaking; but which, if they be impure, drag you down to the dust and make you despised, even without the commission first of the bad action. Our outward connections, the laws of society, the rules of prudence, prevent many an open irregularity. But how few people there are virtuous for the sake of virtue; and who take pains to be not only pure before men, but pure before God also. And yet this is only the true purity. When the endeavor after this in the human soul remits, then it sinks; when it wakes again, it becomes again elevated, and approaches nearer to God, even if it do not stand high in the esteem of man.

"But, Nina, no transformation is sudden.

The elements operate slowly and wearily on the chrysalis which at length develops the butterfly. Our daily occupations, our associates, conversation, thoughts, feelings, all are the threads which unobscuredly but intrinsically weave together the web of our life. Eternity is composed out of moments. If we waste these, how would we win that? Minutes make hours; hours, days; days, months; months, years; and years the whole human life! If we thought frequently on this, how different would our actions frequently be!

"My dear child, above all things, make intelligible to yourself that which you have now to do; think especially on the past time, in order to obtain light for the present; think on the path upward which you have to tread, and if your soul be pure before God, your will will resign itself to Him; then your heart will be tranquil, and yourself will be worthy of the noblest of men, and will make happy your

CHAPTER XXIV.

NOW-A-DAYS all the world travels. A great part of life is passed on turnpike roads and in steam carriages. Nations visit one another with as much ease as next-door neighbors. Travelling is become a fashion; and as the characters in my novel are people of fashion, no wonder is it that they are perpetually travelling. Many of my readers, at all events I hope so, will not unwillingly follow where I shall conduct them—namely to the East, toward

PARADISE.

"And the gold of that land was good."

FIRST BOOK OF MOSES

Paradise is the name of the small estate which Baron H. inherited from his ancestors; it lies in the sunny, hospitable Schonen.

"Knowest thou that land?"

It is a glorious land! Rich harvests wave upon its plains. The heart is warmed there by the southern sun, and by the good-nature and joyousness that live in the breast of the inhabitants. Time spent among them passes lightly. The stranger preserves in his heart the grateful remembrance of all the kindness and hospitality which he has experienced there.

Paradise lies in this country, and thither Baron H. travelled after his marriage had been celebrated with the utmost quietness. The good and happy Clara went with them; and there they expected in a short time Countess Natalie, Nina, and several friends and acquaintances, for the celebration of the after-nuptials.

Miss Gret—the Baroness H. we should say, was on the journey in the highest degree inquisitive about the estate, whose name she was very solicitous to connect with swine, hens, and other unparadisical animals,* over which she jeasted without ever succeeding in calling up even the least cloud upon the brow of her husband.

* I take the liberty, with the permission at least of learned gentlemen, of considering these animals unparadisical. Bishop Spegel, it is true, in his erudite work on "The Creation of God," etc., named among the animals of Paradise "the unclean swine." But as many learned inquirers into antiquity have asserted it to be very difficult to decide on such subjects, we give ourselves permission to consider these words of Bishop Spegel on this important subject as a poetical license.

We must, however, confess that his estate of Paradise, taken in connexion with that unclean beast which furnishes bacon, did not appear to him altogether unparadisical; the two were not as much opposed to one another in his mind, as in that of his wife—nay, bacon and paradise seemed ever to be connected ideas with him.

And now let me tell thee, my dear reader, that a gayer nuptial festival than that which was to be celebrated in Paradise could scarcely be thought of. It is a pure impossibility to imagine a more magnificent feast, a better or happier husband, a more good-humoured or excellent wife, a better-beloved or more amiable lady-friend—we mean Clara.

But we must not forget to state that Filius through the whole of this important epoch conducted himself in a highly becoming manner, and dashed off several sketches of family scenes, in which his foster-father and his new foster-mother were always the principal characters.

After people had dined, laughed, and made their eyes acquainted with the beauties of Paradise—among which the Baroness did not omit to reckon also the farm-yard—after they had played and danced together; finally also, after they had yawned a little together, the guests began by degrees to journey away. The Countess took Nina with her to the North, obtaining the promise that the Baron, together with his family, would follow them in the winter to Nordland, in order to enjoy the Christmas festivities at her house.

How the Baron and his wife now cultivated their Paradise; how they there, with the help of God, like every young couple, renewed in their own way the golden legend of happiness and love of the first paradise; how the Baroness, the very reverse of the former Eve, unremittently warned her husband and her beloved Filius against the eating of apples; and how she, in the most cheerful humour, went examining about in her new world; how beasts and men stood and gaped at her; and how she diffused order and cheerfulness around her—all this, were it written down, would make a very interesting and instructive history. Above all things, I would willingly relate how active Clara was; how she was beloved by her friends; how she enlivened herself in the beautiful meadows and shadowy woods of Paradise—of all this I would willingly give intelligence, but—the happy are sufficient for themselves. I long to visit pale Nina, and to inquire whether life does not somewhere possess an elixir through which her own life may be strengthened and beautified—a life that, we acknowledge it, has hitherto resembled very little that of a heroine, and must have excited more compassion than interest. I leap over therefore, with the kind permission of all good housewives—the Baroness H included—the busy times of preserving, salting, and such like.

The November wind howls already before the windows; the heaven is gray, the earth is gray, the air is gray, the bird is silent, the leaf withers. Now the nose of the inhabitant of the north dyes itself blue and red; now the Englishman hangs himself; now people remain sticking in bad roads; now the soul of the poet and the last little flower of the valley are benumbed; now people require warm rooms and friendly souls—fire, everywhere fire! November, thou art an ugly, melancholy old fellow, full of storm and frost! But thou goest, and December comes, who is yet darker and sterner than thou! Now the the misty hosts of heaven assemble themselves, and in order to conceal the unsightliness of the earth, and to defend the hopes of summer, he brings the light flaky snow, and spreads its covering over land and sea. Now I harness Baron H.'s sledge, and amid the joyous ringing of the horses' bells, I travel post with him and his family towards Nordland.

CHAPTER XXV.

SHADOW AND LIGHT.

"It is Christmas! It is Christmas!"
THE CHILDREN.

How cold, how gloomy it is! The window-panes are covered with ice; the morning twilight extends its hand to the evening twilight, and the dark night entombs the day. In Nordland, however, the midday has a few bright moments; the sun sheds still a few feeble beams, then he quickly disappears and it becomes dark. Farther up in the country people know nothing more of day—the night endures for months.

They say in the North, that "Nature sleeps," but this sleep resembles death; like death, it is cold and ghastly, and would obscure the heart of man, did not another light descend at the same time—if it did not open to the heart a warmer bosom and animate it with its life. In Sweden they know this very well, and while everything sleeps and dies in nature, all is set in motion in all hearts and homes for the celebration of a festival. Ye know it well, ye industrious daughters of home, ye who strain your hands and eyes by lamplight quite late into the night to prepare presents. You know it well, you sons of the house, you who bite your nails in order to puzzle out "what in all the world" you shall choose for Christmas presents. Thou knowest it well, thou fair child, who hast no other anxiety than lest the Christman should lose his way and pass by thy door. You know it well, you fathers and mothers, with empty purses and full hearts; ye aunts and cousins of the great and immortal race of needlewomen and workers in wool—ye welcome and unwelcome uncles and male cousins, ye know it well, this time of mysterious countenances and treacherous laughter! In the houses of the rich, fat roasts are prepared and dried fish; sausages pour forth their fat, and tarts puff themselves up; nor is there any hut so poor as not to have at this time a sucking-pig squeaking in it, which must endeavour, for the greater part, to grow fat with its own good-humour.

It is quite otherwise with the elements at this season. The cold reigns despotically; it holds all life fettered in nature; restrains the heaving of the sea's bosom; destroys every sprouting grass blade; forbids the birds to sing and the gnats to sport; and only its minister, the powerful north wind, rolls freely forth into gray space, and takes heed that everything keeps itself immovable and silent. The sparrows only—those optimists of the air—remain merry, and appear by their twittering to announce better times.

At length comes the darkest moments of the year, the midnight hour of nature; and suddenly light streams forth from all habitations, and emulates the stars of heaven. The church opens its bosom full of brightness and thanksgiving, and the children shout, full of gladness, "It is Christmas! it is Christmas!" Earth sends her hallelujah on high!

And wherefore this light, this joy, this thanksgiving! "A Child is born!" A child! In the hour of night, in a lowly manger, He has been born; and angels have also sung, "Peace on earth!" This is the festival which shall be celebrated—and well may ye, you dear children, sound forth your cries of joy! Welcome, even though unconsciously, the hour in which this Friend, this Brother, was born to you; who shall guide you through life, who shall lighten the hour of death to you, and who one day shall verify the dreams of your childhood; who shall stand beside you in necessity and care, and shall help to answer the great questions of life. Rejoice, ye happy children, whom He blesses! Rejoice, and follow after Him! He is come to lead you and all of us to God!

There are inexhaustible, love-inspiring, wonderful, entrancing thoughts, in which man is never weary of plunging. The sick soul bathes in them as in a Bethesda, and is made whole; and in them the healthy find an elevating life's refreshment. Of this kind are the thoughts on that Child—His poverty, His lowliness, His glory!

It is a beautiful and wise ordination, that the life of the church unfolds itself most richly at that moment in which nature lies dead. For this receive thanks, Thou all-good Father!

So thought the quiet Clara, as with her friends she slowly wound along the hill covered with dark pine wood, and ascended to the top, from which gleamed the illuminated windows of the present residence of Countess Natalie, which we call Umenas. Clara looked out into the gray mist which embraced every object. In the midst of this darkness the lights seen from the height appeared doubly agreeable, and Clara's eyes riveted themselves involuntarily upon them, while pleasant sensations filled her heart. She rejoiced in the thought of seeing Nina again, for whom she always felt the most cordial sympathy, and she questioned within herself—

"Is there also at last a light for thee, which warms and illumines thy life! Thou pale, beautiful, good, and richly-gifted maiden, wherefore should thou be less happy than the insignificant Clara?"

"Coffee!" exclaimed Baron H., sleeping.

"Presently," answered the Baroness, who did not sleep.

"What?" inquired the Baron, waking up.

"We shall soon be there."

"Impossible!"

"Certainly!"

"Impossible!"

"But, my best friend, I assure you."

"But, my best friend, I do not believe you."

"We see lights already."

"I don't."

"Yes, so I believe; when one sleeps—"

"One does not sleep! Only one cannot see it; only some folks have sharper eyes than others."

"It is inconceivable," said the Baroness, a little warmly, "that you, a person half asleep, should contend against that which two persons wide awake have seen. The window on your side is closed; now just see!" and so saying she extended her hand to open the coach-window; the Baron seized her hand, kissed it heartily, and laying it over his eyes, assured her that then he saw clear snow-light.

The Baroness contended no longer, and in tender peace or war—since it is extraordinary how often these two opposites are one—the travellers soon drew up at the door of the building, which the Baroness called house, and the Countess castle.

We had it in mind to give to our readers a detail of the existing circumstances there; but we see a pen in the hand of the Baroness, and we think it, therefore, much to our interest to present the following extract from a letter which, a few days after her arrival at Umenas, she wrote to her confidential friend—

"But enough of the journey and its languid adventures. The reception was most friendly. It did not look in any respect Laplandish at Natalie's. A beautiful drawing-room well lighted, new furniture, carpets, and an open fire! It would be difficult for Natalie to persuade herself, or others, that she leads here the life of a self-denying hermit. And the people in this hermitage! You know that always and everywhere I see people first. Natalie—magnificent! she seems as if she would enact the part of the fairy in her castle upon the mountain. She has grown younger; dresses herself in velvet and silk; plays the harp, and wishes to enchant the whole world; and I am convinced that she succeeds. It has given me actual pleasure to see Nina again; she has strikingly improved in beauty, and begins to look like a creature of flesh and blood. 'The air here occasions that,' says Natalie. Thus there must actually be a magic in the air of Nordland which has the power of renewing youth and increasing beauty. I, therefore, am very glad to have come here. I might not, in fact, be disinclined to become a little younger and a little handsomer for the sake of my good man.

"When I last saw Nini, probably four months since, she resembled a dove lamed in the wing, she looked so deadly pale and feeble; now she has recovered life and complexion—God knows if that be occasioned by the air. You know that it is not my custom to look upon people as ideal, to take them for angels and gods; but I see them commonly only as that which they really are. You will therefore be, perhaps, a little astonished at the description which I have in my mind to give you; but you must not, on that account, charge me with enthusiasm, for I cannot endure this; and besides that, it would be quite unjust. But now to business.

"The evening we arrived at Umenas we found several gentlemen in the drawing-room. By chance my eyes fell on one of them, and I found it almost impossible to withdraw them from him. Not that he was so remarkably handsome, or played any brilliant part; no, but he was so altogether original. I never remember to have ever seen in a man anything so simple and amiable. You might have painted his forehead and his eyes. His complexion extremely dark, but clear and fresh. In his whole being is the most agreeable union of repose and animation, of strength and gentleness. There was a something both of the apostles John and Paul in him at the same time. I never before felt myself so soon acquainted with any one, and never rejoiced so much in having made an acquaintance. Natalie spoke much in his praise, and added, that he played the harp like King David. I see that you begin to be somewhat impatient over my description, and inquire, 'Who then is this Phoenix? what is he? what is his name?' This extraordinary man is the minister of the community here, and is called Edward Hervey. Is not that the name of a true hero of romance? How much his eyes, his words, his playing on the harp—to say nothing of the country air—may have contributed to the raising of Nina from the dead, I leave undecided.

"Do not, however, imagine that in the remotest degree I would surmise anything wrong. That one person can enliven and arouse another, is of the mercy and blessing of God. There is no need immediately to think of abduction and secret marriage. All that does not belong to our times; besides which, Pastor Hervey does not seem in any way like a hero of romance. He has the exterior of a very serious and serene-tempered man. I must, however, inform you, that if his eyes frequently rest upon her like two observant watchers, that they also very often rest upon my quiet Clara, which does not displease me at all. Never have I seen black eyes with such a gentle expression; sometimes they are rather melancholy, although commonly they beam with a wonderful clearness; but I really and truly believe that these eyes have almost turned my head. I must divert my thoughts. I will cast my eyes about, and tell you what I discover outside the house; for I sit at the window, and can look over the country both far and near. Horribly ugly!—coal-black woods—high mountains—all wild and waste! Farther off lies the sea, whose roaring one hears in stormy weather. On the right is the Ume river, which pours itself into the sea—down there, there is a beautiful valley. I have not seen it; nor have I any desire even to set my eyes upon it, for I do not think of going out the whole of the winter. This house lies upon a hill, and is stormed by every wind that blows. It is really extraordinary how it can be made so comfortable in the house. But then we make incredible fires, and thus it happens that the prospect over the wood is not so uninteresting. Remarkable cliffs rise up from the sea, every one of which bears an extraordinary name; one of them is called the 'Peasant, or Black Man,' and looks supernaturally awful.

"Now, assuredly, you will want to know something about a certain lately-married couple! Good! Husband and wife are both quite well, and on the whole get on tolerably well together. The wife sometimes is a little bitter, and has the greatest desire to take upon herself the entire government of things; yet she fears daily more and more, that her husband, with his extraordinary good temper and great good sense, will nullify her power, and make her as tame as any other wife. In the mean time the married pair have a guardian angel whom they bear in their arms, and they agree in no one thing more perfectly than in the love which they bear to the holy Clara. They hope, with her help, not to miss of the way of heaven. For the present, however, we remain on earth, in order to celebrate the Christmas festivities. I really rejoice in the thought of hearing Edward Hervey preach on this occasion. He must look like an apostle. I must tell you that my good H. is as much taken with him as I am.

"Perhaps we remain here longer than at first was our intention. Natalie wishes very much that we should remain over the winter with her; my husband is obtaining the most exact information he can on the usages of hunting in these parts; and I, like a good wife, would willingly contribute all in my power to the pleasures of my husband. I should, however, be guilty of falsehood if I were to assert that I make any sacrifice thereto—yet with all that our little Paradise was in all respects a more perfect abode.

"I now must leave you, for my husband calls."

So far from the letter of the Baroness H.

The joyful song of the Christmas-night resounded; and now then is joy on earth, and dance, and sport, and light in the habitations of men. They dance in the castle by wax-light, and to pealing music; they dance in cottages and barns by the blaze of the pinewood torch, to the unpretending music of the fiddle; long processions of sledges, filled with ladies and gentlemen, fly through the cities to the jingling of the horses' bells; and ragged boys speed little girls in hand-sledges down the hill, and not unfrequently overturning their barefooted fair ones.

All goes on gayly at Umenas this year than ever before in the memory of man. The Countess's rooms were all illuminated, and music sounded to the dance, so that it was a very delight. She would with her gifts have overflowed the huts of the poor with luxury had not Hervey earnestly and decidedly opposed it.

"They have not the means," said he "to obtain better lights and better music. It is not well to awaken in them desires after things the want of which they do not at present feel, and without which they are perfectly happy. These lights may be preserved for the use of night-watching by the sick—where they will chase away many a gloomy shadow."

In the mean time the winter passed away amid social pleasures and domestic amenities. The Countess and the Baroness confessed never to have spent a more joyous winter. To Nina it appeared that only at Umenas had she first began to breathe.

For the life which reigned in the castle, for the agreeable manner in which the time was spent there, and the pleasant tone of feeling which was imparted to every member of the family—all had, in an especial manner, to thank Edward Hervey. We will observe him a little nearer.

CHAPTER XXVI.

EDWARD HERVEY.

A clear and vigorous understanding; a strong and good heart; health and happiness—that is the worth of man.—THEOLOGY.

WILT thou see the preacher amid the peasant people of his community? There is nothing more beautiful! He went very much among them; he loved to see them cheerful; he mingled sometimes in their dances, and conducted their games. No festivity was complete for the country-people if Hervey did not participate of it. His presence occasioned not the slightest constraint, although it prevented every intemperance. On the least tendency to rudeness or violence, the faulty one felt Hervey's hand upon his shoulder; and before his glance, and his warning but friendly words, "Softly, my child!" every unruly thought bowed itself immediately.

Hervey was the favourite of the parish. One person esteemed his upright intentions and his activity for the good of the community; another, his glorious preaching; a third, his reverence before the altar and his care for the education of the young; a fourth, his knowledge and the willingness with which he imparted it; a fifth, his agreeable demeanour, his gentleness, and his animation. People said of him everywhere as was earlier said of Ansgarius, "That one never had seen such a good man."

The natural consequence of this was, that one had never seen anybody who was so beloved and so revered as he. All, high and low, rich and poor, received from him counsel and consolation; and he had counsel and love for all. He never turned away from any one; he never cast down the weak, never repelled the heart that was willing to advance. His rich soul could comprehend all, could direct all. He drew mankind involuntarily toward him, for his glance was clear, his way of life blameless, his will firm, and his heart that of an angel.

In the six years during which Hervey had lived and worked in this country, both man and the earth had been very much changed. An active spirit of culture occasioned grass and corn to spring from the bosom of the one, and sound thoughts and feelings to shoot up from the heart of the other. Thankless fields and depressing discouragements, morasses and rudeness, vanished ever more and more. Taste for literature and feeling for art, lucerne and clover, struck, by little and little, deeper and deeper root. What Fenelon taught, what Oberlin did, that taught and did Edward Hervey. The first in virtue, knowledge, and industry, he was in the most beautiful signification of the word the shepherd of his flock.

What made him especially dear to all was the worth, the importance, which man as man possessed for him. Pre-eminently the purely human in the life of every human being riveted his attention. With what love did he not regard the operations of religion in the still-life which, unobserved by the great world, his quiet days developed; and thus he felt the same interest in obscure and insignificant life as in the most splendid; he loved to compare these in his conversations, and to place each in its proper light. How many striking traits, how many Christian sentiments, thus became conspicuous!

How great, therefore, at times appeared life even in its own little, unobserved spheres! Hervey belonged to the romantic school—to that school which arose in that moment when Christ was born in a stable. History and romance has followed out this subject in endless variations. If from this cause a few strange marvels come to light, it cannot be considered as a human failing. Hervey, however, was free from all this; his soul was bright, and he loved to be just.

What was indescribably attractive in him was the unspeakable gentleness and benevolence of his glance, his beautiful smile—a decision, a clearness and freshness in his whole being—all these contributed to increase yet more his influence. His superiority might have been overbearing had not his goodness gained all hearts. And yet for all that he was feared—feared as a minister ought to be. People considered an angry glance, a severe word from him, as a misfortune.

Hast thou ever met with any one in whose presence the soul has strengthened itself by an unspeakable satisfaction, and from whom a blessed feeling of security has poured itself through thy whole being? Hast thou met with any one who made thee at peace with thyself, with God, with life, and with thy fellow-men? any one toward whom thou turnedst involuntarily as the sun to the light, or as man to a quiet, angelic nature? if so, then hast thou experienced what most men felt in the presence of Hervey. It was as if a mild sunshine diffused itself from his heart.

Who can tell the influence of Hervey's life and being upon Nina. A great change began to take place in her. She was no longer the feeble, almost lifeless beauty; no longer that dreamless shape. A vein of life and joy seemed aroused in her being. Like a child awakened from sleep, she looked clear and smiling into life. She beamed like the rosy light of morning.

But upon Hervey also Nina operated with irresistible magic. A secret power of attraction drew the one to the other, and made them conscious of a high happiness if they only saw each other. There was no need of words. And yet how delicious was the intercourse between them. How clearly she understood him—how rightly he drew her out. He was the sun over her earth; she the mild dew upon his. They acted upon each other indescribably well, yet she received most richly. It was more than life—or, rather, it was life itself.

Thus happily lived she—thus tranquilly; for no one thought of disturbing her, not even the monitor within herself. Even the sharp-sighted Baroness H. became by degrees assured; for Hervey and Nina were in the highest degree frank and undisguised toward each other, and the still Clara was almost always with them, and received also Hervey's attentions. That he admired Nina, and was willingly in company with her, was nothing but what was natural and necessary. Besides this, the baroness considered it rational that Pastor Hervey would much prefer forming a marriage with Clara than with the beautiful daughter of the countess, and therefore she did him not the injustice to believe the contrary. The baroness had very early acknowledged Hervey's worth; and the more she learned to value him, the livelier was the wish in her that Clara and Hervey might exchange hearts; she herself would willingly have contributed something to the mutual happiness.

The Countess was at first astonished by Hervey's uncommon character and accomplishments, and then completely fascinated by them. She endeavored, on her part, to attract him, and exclusively to fether his regards. But she very soon remarked that he preferred Nina's company—nay, even that of the original Baroness and the quiet Clara, to hers—and then, somewhat wounded by the discovery, she withdrew from him her observation, and turned it upon a handsome Colonel who gave somewhat more to his handsome neighbor than barren admiration.

Hervey often spent his winter evenings at Umanas. His presence gave an increased liveliness to all. Moments of melancholy which at times passed over his brow, like clouds over the clear heavens, did not disturb his influence. They quickly vanished—a glance on Nina, the tone of her voice, dissipated them, and he appeared doubly amiable from the shadow of melancholy which these fleeting moments left behind. Often also was he as happy and as playful as a child, and then no one could resist his merriment.

When Nina saw the preacher among the strangers who often were assembled in the Countess's drawing-room, she could enjoy but a small share of his society. Then he was surrounded by all; all hands were stretched towards him, in order to press his; all glances seemed to enliven themselves in him; every one had something to say to him—something on which to have his counsel.

Then for the most part sat the young Captain Philip S. beside her, whose title of Count, and whose great property gave rise to many and many a prophesying—of what my readers may well conceive. (Nina's half-betrothal with Count Ludwig had been kept a family secret, of which nobody in that place had the least suspicion)—nor did Nina's behavior appear at all to contradict these prophesyings. She listened to the young Captain so willingly, so kindly, so attentively; his fine figure and his handsome countenance made all that easily natural, especially for those who could not hear upon what the conversation turned. And upon what indeed did it turn? What indeed would the reader believe was it that the young man spoke of to the young girl? Why of his friend, of Edward Hervey, of his character, of his mode of conduct, of his excellence. He spoke out of the fullness of his heart, without surmising why it was that he was listened to so willingly. Young S. belonged to the most amiable class of characters, which forgets its own peculiar I in whatever is excellent, and are happy in so doing.

And now, after all this praise-exhalation of one man, let us add yet a little word on mankind in general.

It has already been often said, but it is so agreeable to repeat what one knows is really so—that it is the peculiar impulse of man to glance upward, to admire, and what is admired to love; and if there be moments in which a general feeling of brotherhood pervades mankind, they are those in which a great action or a mighty genius is revealed to the world. Then the whole world arises as one man and pays homage. This homage is a brotherhood in which all with all drink out of the same living well, and through which they all acknowledge themselves children of one Father.

My enemy, wherefore strive we one with another so bitterly? We must indeed all of us become of one mind, if we would see God.

CHAPTER XXVII.

THE WOOD AND THE COLONIST.

It rushes and roars over stock and stone,
And the witch she danced o'er the moorland.

THE COLLIER BOY.

The frost-flowers melted from the window-panes. The sun made its appearance in the parlor, even when the company had assembled themselves to breakfast; the sugar melted in the gilded cups; the butter on the warm-toasted slices. Delighted guests, who found everything well tasted, sat round the table. The fire glimmered on the hearth; it had lost evidently in size and brightness, and seemed to look back because the sun made his appearance in the room. The Countess's two little dogs nibbled rushes on the mat, and the parrot as he sat on his perch shouted "good morning!" And the morning was good, fresh and clear as a thought of Geijer's.

Nina stepped to the window. Rose-colored and golden-yellow clouds floated over the heavens; the wood put forth green points from its winter covering; the ice glittered in a million diamonds; and little sparrows hopped and played about upon the snow.

"A beautiful day!" exclaimed Nina, delighted; "Clara, we must go out! We will surprise the mountain-king and the magic-spirits in their morning sleep. We will go deep into the woods and lose ourselves!"

Nina now had thoughts like other young girls, beautiful, fresh, foolish thoughts. She began to be young.

Clara willingly consented. The elder ladies only besought them not to go too far. The Baroness in particular warned the young girls of the craft of the king of the mountain, and prophesied that their audacity would be punished, and that some really unpleasant adventure might befall them. The prophecy only inflamed the courage of the young ladies. They dressed themselves speedily, and set out on their wandering. The snow crunched under their feet. The cold was severe, and yet the air was so fresh that the cold only lent more animation to their motions. Active, light, and merry, with rosy cheeks and beaming eyes, they hastened forward. They were soon warm. Exercise, the fresh air, the magnificent winter landscape which lay before them in dazzling sunshine, made them enjoy the pleasure of existence. Nina's beautiful countenance beamed with delight and youthful life. Clara looked upon her with the admiration and joy which an angel's heart ever experiences when it sees the smile of happiness on the lips of a good man.

"Tell me, Nina," said Clara, "are we not happier here than they who to-day pace up and down the promenades of Stockholm to see and to be seen? They take out their vanity to be seen, and that prevents their seeing God's sun itself."

"Certainly, my dear little preacher," answered Nina merrily, "for everywhere where there are pretensions there is no want of unrest. If we cast our glances too much on ourselves, we cannot send them out into the world. But we ought not to extend these observations to the greater number of the walking citizens; many of them go also into the air on account of health."

"Unquestionably," answered Clara. "You, for example, have enjoyed the pleasure which gratified vanity can give to the highest extent. When you went into Queen-street, or when you drove about in your father's splendid equipage in green velvet and a rose-coloured bonnet with beautiful feathers, was there a single eye which did not follow you with pleasure? Still you never looked then so happy as now."

"Nor was I ever," replied Nina. "The attention which people showed me, and the idle applause which I gained, delighted me at times, but never made me happy."

"How could they make any one happy excepting for a moment!" said Clara; "and to these moments there succeeds only a void. O, I wish that mankind only understood how to be happy! Then they would leave cities, and live in the country in nature. In order however to enjoy nature with one's whole heart, one must be divested of self-seeking; all littleness, all miserable self-love, and all narrow-heartedness, must be rooted out, and with clear eyes and a pure heart we must look upward to God's creation. Here also may it be said, 'he who will lose his own life for the will of God, shall gain instead eternal life.'"

Nina answered not—she thought of one good man. She looked upward to heaven, and made Clara observant of its wonderful brilliancy. A tear of devotion trembled in Clara's eye. "How beautiful—how glorious!" said the young girls. They did not remark that a dark stretch of cloud rose ever higher and higher on the horizon; they turned into the wood by a side-path. The hare sprang forth from her form, yet remained standing at some little distance, and seated herself tolerably boldly on her hind-legs, to watch the peaceful wanderers. The cock of the wood flew about under the trees and threw the snow from the branches. Strange but agreeable tones resounded through the air, and in the mean time the very snow itself upon the rocks seemed to become animated—to take "shape and wing," and the ptarmigan flew whirling away. The young girls rejoiced themselves in the peculiar life of the solitude; it was so new to them—so astonishing. They went from one footpath to another, and entered with a feeling of awe a wild and lofty pine-forest.

Nina and Clara seated themselves on the fallen trunk in order to rest a little. The tall tapering trees were clothed in a snow-gauze which inclosed them in glistening folds, and high above the heads of our friends the wind whistled in the dark tree-tops.

"How magnificent—how solemn!" said Clara, as her eyes gratefully glanced around her. "It seems to me as if I understood here the life of the northern antiquity. The earth was uncultivated—nature dark and mysterious. Man grown up in her bosom was dark and powerful in action like her; yet was he great and glorious in his strength. I know not what a feeling of supernatural pleasure seems to seize upon me, when I think on these times and their strange existence; on their giants, dwarfs, and magic spirits—on their power of prophecy and conjuration. I would give a great deal if I could only for one moment conjure forth again this legend-world, and make acquaintance with its giants and mountain-spirits."

"Not I—not I!" exclaimed Nina with a repelling motion of her hand. "I feel only fear of these awful incomprehensible beings; we will not entice them forth with our wishes. Let us be thankful that we live in a time in which human industry has let light in upon earth; where law and good order have changed it into a place of agreeable habitation. We will not lament the vanishing of that Titanic time—its power was more rude than great and pure: let us rejoice that the hour of humanity has struck. When I hear people depreciating the present times in comparison with the past, the words or rather the thought of the poet Shelley comes into my mind—

"The spirit of religion and poetry has poured itself forth over the heart of the whole world; it penetrates even through the granite mass. Man is less powerful, but he is softer and milder. Every-day business becomes beautified through love."

"And truly," continued Nina, as she took Clara's hand in hers, "truly the pure, affectionate man and the world which he creates around him is the true and beautiful image of God. Do not you remember that on the last evening these were Hervey's words?"

"I remember it," replied Clara; "and I am entirely of your mind. Believe me," added she, smiling, "I don't wish in the least to have lived in the times of the Gygiornen and the Starkodarnen; I would only amuse myself for a moment with a few of our heathen ancestors, in order to know what people thought of life in those days. If they only had a right perception of God, and rightly understood him, I think they must have been happier than most people now-a-days."

"Happier, and why?" asked Nina astonished. "Because," replied Clara, "they were more alone with nature and with themselves. The earth had more woods than now: there was no want of space to move in, and a fresh breath blew through life. The world of society was not then created, with its petty pleasures and its great plagues, which are more burdensome and numerous than Pharaoh's locusts. Man then could not be very unhappy. He died often, it is true, a violent death, but he did not waste away so slowly as now. He was freer—had more space for action."

"More space for action?" interrupted Nina; "but no air, no atmosphere of gentleness and love. O Clara, without love, without a human heart wherein to rest, wherein to live, the most extended space is nothing but a void—the freedom nothing but a burden ! Nature itself, Clara, heaven itself, come not nearer to us—remain silent to us—before—”

Here she was suddenly interrupted by a shrill whistle, which appeared to proceed from somewhere in their immediate neighbourhood. The young girls sprang up terrified. The whistle was repeated many times, and each time shriller and louder.

“We have awakened a wood-spirit,” said Nina jestingly.

“Or perhaps a heathen dwarf,” suggested Clara, “who now whistles to scorn our remarks on the times in which he was mighty.”

“Is it the mountain thrush, or the misfortune bird as they call him here in the country ?” said Nina. “I have already once before heard his shrill cry. See there he flies over us ! let us go home, dear Clara ; it is quite awful here in the wood. Hark how strangely it thunders and growls !”

A fearful rushing and roaring, in fact, filled the old mountain forest ; it was the sign of an approaching tempest. Almost in the same moment gray clouds overspread the whole heaven, and it began to snow. The young girls set out with hasty steps on their homeward way ; but the spirits of the wood and the mountain had got loose, and began to play their unceasing pranks. The wanderers had lost their way in the wood ; they perceived that it was so, and first tried one path and then another, but these all by degrees lost themselves again and only conducted the girls deeper into the wood, while the snow wrapped them in thick clouds and concealed every path. The violence of the storm increased each moment : many trees fell before its fury—in short it was a perfect hurricane.

At first the girls began to laugh over the adventure—then they were silent—then anxious, and at last they deplored their want of foresight. They wandered about for a long time in the hope of finding a cottage, or of bringing some one to their help by their cries. Without complaint, but with ever decreasing power, the delicate Nina followed her stronger companion ; thus wandered they for hours. Fortunately for them the rigor of the cold abated during the snow-fall, otherwise we should certainly have accompanied our young friends for the last time.

It began to get dark as they came to a lofty bare hill, which it was their intention to ascend in order that they might, if possible, make observations from its summit. Scarcely, however, had they gone a few paces for this purpose, when Nina sunk down almost fainting. Spite of her own and Clara's efforts, she was neither in a condition to raise herself, nor to make any motion. The storm in the meantime had reached its height. It was a wild music of dissonant tones—a wild dance of trees and clouds—a wild running about and flying of terrified creatures of all kinds. All nature seemed in uproar.

Nina was strong neither in body nor mind. An indescribable terror seized her. She laid her head on Clara's breast, and whispered with tears : “Shall we perish here ?”

“No,” replied Clara, prudently ; “God will send us help !” So saying she clasped Nina in her arms, and endeavoured to warm her on her breast.

“But indeed,” said Nina, with a faint voice, “there have been people frozen to death in the woods, or become the prey of wild beasts. Why should Providence do more for us than for other people.”

“Good, then,” said Clara, with heavenly submission, “if we must actually die here, we shall also rest here in the bosom of the good Father !”

Nina wept. “I am yet so young,” whispered she : “I have had so little pleasure—Edla ! Herv—” the name died upon her lips.

“You shall live ! you shall be happy !” said Clara, warmly and consolingly, yet, at the same time, full of anxiety. “I will call.”

“Who can hear your voice ! the storm, the storm !”

At this moment an extraordinary song reached the ears of the two friends. A voice rough and strong, without melody, but full of wild power, sang the following words, which appeared to control the tempest, for its raging abated during the song, and changed itself, as it were, into a threatening murmur. Thus sang the voice of the mountain :

“Mid the gloom of the night-hour,
Mid the gathering storm-bands,
On the heights of the snow-hills,
A wanderer stands ;
Sees vast trees uprooted,
Sees rocks splintered fall,
Yet stands he unflinching,
Unfearing through all !

“In the woods there's a roaring
It howls through the air ;
There comes from the mountains
A cry of despair !
Yet calm is the wanderer,
He goeth aright ;
Neither joy, neither sorrow,
His soul can excite.

“Loud crying, escape they,
The terrified deer ;
Before the fierce hurricane,
All crouch in fear !
The wanderer stands tranquil—
In spirit he sees,
A power more mighty—
Lands other than these !

“Thou Father Almighty !
I' th' stormy night-hour,
I sing for thanksgiving,
A hymn to thy power !
Thou need but command it,
The tempest takes flight,
And forth from the tumult,
Come sounds of delight.

“Acknowledge thy master—
Thy rage be it stayed—
Before Him bow Titan,
Of Him be afraid !
Be strong, feeble spirit,
In need, God is near !
And he who will trust Him,
No tempest may fear !”

At the first tone of the song Clara sprang up. A break in the clouds enabled her to discover, in the midst of the snow-storm which whirled around the summit of the mountain, a figure which resembled rather a shaggy mountain-spirit than a human being. It was the singer. He stood upon the highest peak of the mountain, was clothed with the skins of animals, and accompanied his wild song with extraordinary gestures.

Clara shouted loudly, the singer, however, appeared not to hear her. She had not a moment to deliberate; but after she had whispered a few encouraging words to her friend, began to climb the mountain as quickly as possible. Nina, at first, without rightly knowing what she did, had attempted to hold back Clara; but when she saw herself alone, her soul was seized upon by an irrepressible anxiety. The song ceased; suddenly she became aware of a cry of terror. The storm rose again at the same time, and as if with renewed strength. Several trees near her were immediately broken before the fury of the tempest; she heard no longer the sound of human voices; she was conscious of nothing but the cries of the wild creatures. Unearthly shapes seemed to dance before her bewildered glances; at last, all seemed to whirl round—she felt as if a hundred weight had fallen upon her breast, and she lost all consciousness. Death had already hovered with his pale wings over Nina; but an angel stepped between him and her. It seemed to Nina as if she began to dream, somewhat confusedly to be sure, but sweetly and agreeably. She heard melodious tones and words. She did not understand their sense, yet they did her good. She felt herself raised from the earth, and borne thence as if on angels' wings. A pleasant warmth diffused itself through her breast, and recalled the beating of her heart. She felt no more depression, storm, nor winter. Paradisiacal landscapes seemed as if they would open themselves to her view; ever more blessed became the state of her mind; she feared nothing, except the waking too soon from this state of bliss.

We turn now for a moment back to Clara. The words of the song which she had heard animated her courage, and she actively climbed the mountain amid continued cries for help. But the shaggy singer was too much busied with his own voice to be able to listen to that of a stranger. It was not till Clara, nearly fainting with fatigue, had almost reached the summit of the mountain, that he became aware of her call, and turned himself towards her. He was, however, all at once so bewildered, and made such wild gestures as he sprang towards her, that she thought he must be insane. At that very moment, however, another man darted forward and struck powerfully back the shaggy one, stretching forth his arms to support the almost sinking girl. With a cry of joy and astonishment Clara recognised—Hervey.

The shaggy man wished to separate him from Clara. Hervey stood on the defensive, and a wild contest ensued between the two.

Like two strong bears they wrestled,
Upon their hill of snow;
They contended like eagles,
With a raging sea below.

At length Hervey succeeded in overthrowing his antagonist, who cried out immediately—"Hold! it is enough!"

"Knut!" exclaimed Hervey astonished, as he recognised the voice of his opponent.

"Pastor Hervey!" said the other, "is it you that so firmly beset me?" And the contest ended with a shake of the hands.

"Where—where is Miss Nina?" asked Hervey with evident anxiety from the astonished Clara, who could only reply to him with difficulty.

"My cottage is in the neighbourhood," said the other, and pointed with his hand in the direction opposite to that in which Clara had come.

"Stop quietly here," said Hervey to Clara; "and you," said he, addressing the shaggy man, "do you remain in defence of her. I shall return in a moment."

In a few seconds he was out of their sight. The shaggy man looked after him. "He leaps and clammers among the mountains," remarked he, with a glance of pleasure, "like a goat."

He now riveted his eyes upon Clara, and as he gazed his expression became more serious, more heartfelt, and more tranquil; he then folded his arms, and tears filled his eyes. He resembled a fawn which worships a hamadryad. The hamadryad, however, was anxious, and would willingly have gone with Hervey to Nina, had not her feet been so weary.

Lying upon the snow, and as white and cold as it, Hervey found the one he sought. The sight of her went like a stab to the heart. He took her in his arms; he warmed her on his breast. With the precious burden on his beating heart, he approached Clara and her admiring worshipper. There rested he for a moment, and here was it that Nina awoke. She saw Hervey's eyes upon her—she found herself borne in his arms—her head rested upon his breast. She fancied she had seen an angel, and powerless, but happy, she closed again her eyes. Why did the color tinge her pale cheek? Did any one see the tear which fell from that manly eye? Night concealed it, but Nina felt it upon her lip—that warm tear of love and joy—and never did loving dew operate more refreshingly on a faded flower.

The path down the other side of the mountain was not so steep. Clara, spite of her refusal, was obliged to permit her shaggy worshipper to carry her; for she was completely overcome, and she was not able, in the increasing darkness, to find firm footing anywhere. Knut went foremost with her; Hervey followed with Nina: both of them happy in the dark stormy night.

After a short journey they arrived at a small colony. A friendly bright fire glimmered through the window of the cottage. The shaggy man raised his voice, and his call was answered by animals of various kinds. Dogs barked, cows lowed, sheep bleated, hens cackled; yet above all a certain shrill tone was heard, which no one, however, could tell whether to ascribe to man or beast. The shaggy man called "Becassine," and a dwarf immediately appeared at the cottage door with a pine-wood torch in his hand, whose crippled troubled figure, and bleared and deep-sunk eyes, did not at all remind one of an image of God. He saw the arrivals with a half-witted expression of countenance; yet a gleam of pleasure exhibited itself in his eyes as the shaggy man laid his hand upon his head and said to him, "Becassine, thou must fly. Strike a light and get ready."

In the clean and spacious cottage Nina was laid upon a couch of reindeer skins, over which a counterpane was spread. In the mean time Hervey, with the help of Becassine, had prepared a strong draught, which he placed at Nina's lips.

"It is bitter, but beneficial," said he.

"It is not bitter," answered she smilingly, when she had drank.

Hervey set the vessel to his mouth in the very place where Nina's lips had rested, and drank the remainder. Love himself may explain to us how it happened that the bitter draught had changed itself, with both of them, into sweet nectar.

Clara had to receive her life-elixir from the hands of the shaggy man. There was in this man's demeanor a singular mixture of bashfulness and boldness; of embarrassment and decision; of dignity and want of manner; and these two last opposites were especially observable in him. His features were handsome, his figure powerful. He produced at the same, an extraordinary, yet an uncomfortable impression.

After Nina had taken the strengthening draught she was consigned to Clara's charge, who, again perfectly recovered, rubbed the limbs of her friend with snow.

The Colonist had thrown off his shaggy covering, and now exhibited himself in the coarse dress of the peasants of the country. He set himself about to prepare the evening meal, while Hervey went out and fired off a gun at short intervals, three several times, which was the signal agreed upon for the people who were gone out in all directions in search of the young ladies. This signal, repeated at intervals of ten minutes soon brought all seeking parties to the colony. The Baroness herself made her appearance with a torch in her hand and a thorn in her heart, at the head of a great crowd of people, before the door of the cottage. The thorn, however, lost its smart as Clara clasped her in her arms; and instead of angry words came tears of joy; nor could she the whole night through regain her customary jesting humor.

Under the conduct of Becassine, people were sent to the Countess to give her information of the state of affairs. The Baroness would remain through the night with her dear young friends, and the next morning, with Hervey, would conduct the lost sheep back to Umenas. Hervey also dispatched a messenger to his mother; and after all this was done, a comfortable repose diffused itself over the little company, which but a short time before was so uneasy. The Baroness sat on Nina's bed, and Clara went out in order to assist the Colonist in the preparation of supper. He was somewhat embarrassed by Clara's entrance. There seemed to be considerable danger that the eggs would be altogether lost, and that the ox-tongue might get up a nearer acquaintance with the milk than would be entirely advantageous to either. Clara's tranquil and self-possessed behavior, as well as her acquaintance with all the affairs of the kitchen, however, soon reduced all again to order and to the usual routine of things. It was not long before she jested with the cook on his bewilderment; and it speedily followed that the two were perfectly contented with each other. But when, ere long, Clara saw the roguish and observant glances of Hervey fixed upon her, then came her turn for embarrassment and bewilderment.

The supper was carried in, and found to be excellent. The attention of Hervey made amends for the want of servants. Nina's eyes filled with tears of gratitude as she heard the tempest roaring without, and saw all her friends assembled here round the friendly fire, herself the object of their care and sympathy. Her heart was filled with grateful sentiments. Under other circumstances this supper, with its lack of knives and forks, and the therefrom-ensuing laughable results, could not have failed being lively in the highest degree; but the late anxiety and danger seemed as if it had lamed the risible muscles. The Baroness sat silent; and Clara could not look on her and think of the danger to which she had exposed herself on her account without her eyes filling with tears, for the Baroness, in speaking to her, had candidly said, "You must not imagine that it was alone on Nina's account that I was so foolish as to go driving about in the stormy, cold, pitch-black night. I am only glad that H. was not at home, or he would certainly have kept me back, and then that would have occasioned the first married quarrel!"

Immediately after the evening meal, the ladies were left to the enjoyment of that rest of which they stood in such urgent need. The Colonist spread out straw in an adjoining chamber, as a couch for himself and Hervey. Hervey, who was interested in his chamber companion, when they were alone together, addressed to him various questions on his past and present life.

"I cannot give you any verbal information," replied the Colonist; "if, however, you wish it, I will make you acquainted with me by writing."

Hervey represented to him the life of separation which he led. Man ought, he said, to endeavour to make himself useful to his fellow-men. To this the Colonist replied only by a melancholy shake of the head, and these words, "I have served my fellow men most effectually by going out of their way. My life, however, is not entirely useless; I make the animals happy that surround me, poor Becassine included."

"A paradise for animals!" said Hervey, smiling and pointing to many hams and pieces of dried meat which, hardly less numerously than in a butcher's shop, hung from the ceiling.

"I will answer you that question early to-morrow morning," replied the Colonist.

When the morning dawned, the Colonist conducted Hervey to his cattle-yard. Here, to his great astonishment, Hervey saw, in a place separated from the rest, two guillotines—one for the larger and one for the lesser animals.

"Animals must die," said the Colonist; "yet nature herself will seldom provide them with so gentle and un suffering a death as they meet with here. When their little hour has struck, they come here, receive once more their favourite food, and then falls the axe, which separates them, without combat and pain, from a life which they have as perfectly enjoyed as is possible to animals in particular; and during which they have received food, shelter from the severe weather, space for exercise and sport, and caresses from the hand of their master."

A smile of approbation diffused itself over Hervey's countenance. "That is good," said he; "I will for the future follow your example. We are still unsparingly severe and barbarous in our treatment of the animals which serve and feed us. Of how much importance should not man make it, to free that from suffering to which, after its earthly life, no immortality follows—at least not to the individuals of the species."

"You believe, then, in the immortality of the species?" inquired the Colonist with animation.

"Yes," replied Hervey; "I believe on a new heaven and a new earth—on the life of glorified man in a more glorified nature. I believe with Paul on the redemption of the creation. Man and nature are fallen together, and together also will they be redeemed."

"I rejoice on that account," said the Colonist, with his eyes full of tears. "I love the animals, the flowers, the mountains! I have found myself better in their society than in that of mankind. I acknowledge my being in theirs—their being in mine. They are parts of my life!" Here he extended his arms towards the wild country which surrounded him.

Wind and clouds seemed about to separate after their mighty contest; that sighed and murmured still at times in the wood, agitating ever its tree-tops more gently; these withdrew their gray, snow-laden masses toward the west. The Colonist released his domestic animals—tame, lively, and caressing, they surrounded him. Hervey observed this scene with his own peculiar smile. The Colonist soon talked to his animals as to children, and soon answered the question of his guest respecting their physical and moral treatment. In this particular Hervey resembled the Count in Titan, everywhere he botanized among the grasses and flowers of knowledge; no field was for him entirely barren.

As the sun came forth from the gate of the east, and threw his firebeams over the landscape, Hervey involuntarily turned his glance to the cottage—and behold, there stood at the door, more lovely than the sun—the lovely Nina, fresh and charming as a May morning. Hervey was quickly before her. She extended to him her hand—he pressed it to his lips and held it in his, and round about her there moved life and joy. The trees bowed their gold-coloured heads. The blue roof of heaven shone pure and bright. Hervey glanced on Nina—then around her—and lastly up to heaven. Her glance followed him. In both it was morning devotion—a silent espousal of the soul with each other, with nature, and with God.

Happy are the hearts which are united in purity and in piety—their covenant cannot be released by earthly fate!

And who other than Clara stands beside the Colonist! She emulates him in feeding and caressing the animals, or, rather, has it all to herself, for he, at that moment in watching her, forgot everything else. Hervey and Nina joined them, and rejoiced over the tame animals, that seemed living here one with another as in the concord of the Golden Age. The Baroness also came forth, and that with a brow as cheerful as the day itself.

Becassine's coffee found the company in the best of humours, and was praised by the Baroness, as was only reasonable.

A crowd of people, who had been sent by the Countess to cut a carriage-way through the snow to the Colony, now, between woods and rocks, made their noisy entrance into this peaceful nook. By this means the Countess conveyed to them carriages, furs, and all imaginable conveniences.

The company now must separate from their kind host, after many prayers, especially on Hervey's part, for a mutual visiting. The Colonist made no reply to these invitations, but as his guests departed he merely cast a glance upon Clara, which seemed to say, "I remain alone behind!"

The late adventure, however, was not without its bad consequences on the young ladies; Nina in particular suffered for many weeks, and the Baroness preached violently against all that kind of crusading.

Did Hervey remind the Colonist of his promise regarding the written communication? Did the Colonist keep it? And is the reader as curious as Hervey was to know something respecting his life and fate?

We take the liberty of answering, yes, to all these questions. If, however, any reader should protest to the contrary, he is perfectly at liberty to skip over the leaves which relate to this subject.

At the moment, however, in which I seize the pen to draw forth long-concealed sufferings to the light, which many persons will not comprehend what can be the good of—at this moment I hear a spirit voice softly warning me.

"A proud and powerful man would hardly, after thirty years' war, days of judgment, changes of nations, rent-to-pieces sun-systems, tear open his clothes to exhibit to the world the wounds in his breast."

Shade of a great man, glorious Jean Paul! forgive, if a little worm of the earth dare to answer thee.

"The combat does not become wild because it is fought between great masses; misfortune is not great because it has reference to world-systems. It is very possible that the Thirty Years' War with all its horrors could not show such a dark perfected tragedy as may be borne in the breast of one man, even in peaceful times, and in the midst of the most attractive surrounding scenes! There is a God who operates in the times of war—it is a God also who bleeds in the breast of suffering men.

"Nought is mean, nought is great in the eyes of the Father Eternal,
For he sees through the shell, 'tis only the kernel he heedeth,
And nothing escapes him: be it little or great he regards it."—MELIN.

Therefore unfortunate one, whoever thou mayest be, present thyself before the universe; not all the songs of the spheres shall overpower thy voice. Yet I expect thee not in the hour of wild pain and sorrow! And if no other hours should dawn for thee then, lament not—suffer silently—praise God and die!

But hast thou found deliverance! Has light sprung up for thee in darkness! O then come, relate to us, how thou hast suffered, how thou hast lived, and thus impart to us a few drops from the spring which has healed thy wounds!

CHAPTER XXVIII.

THE UNFORTUNATE.

"ONE beautiful June morning I found myself in the open fields. I found myself, yes! for I had lost myself, my feeling, my consciousness, my thoughts and all! Driven forth by an untold unrest, and by the desire to fly from an unspeakable anguish, I had left my home in the city on the foregoing evening, and had wandered about the whole night, till a fresh morning wind—a flower odor—a pang at my heart—I know not what, recalled me to myself again. I looked up, looked around me, and was conscious of what I saw. Ah, it was glorious around me! The meadows glittered with flowers and dew-drops—the sun mirrored itself in them. The wood, still wrapped in shadow, shook, as it were, sleep from its twigs. The lark, raising itself on light wings to the rosy clouds, sang in jubilant melody the pleasure of life which all existence in nature seemed to feel. Yes, all—all but me. Dark and unhappy, I stood alone in the joyful bright world! And my misfortune? Happy he who understands it not! Happy he who can say, I know it not! He never has felt what it is not to be able to lift his eyes to look into the face of his friend, and never has seen how the friend in consequence of that has turned his face from him. He knows not how it is, if the tongue refuses its service, and his heart contracts itself backward at the moment when men come toward him full of sympathy and kindness; and then, when in consequence of that, they by degrees look shy and withdraw themselves. He knows not what it is to love—to love passionately, and to find no word by which to express his love, to be undetermined and trembling when by manly determination one should act and succeed. He knows not what it is to see her whom we love blush for us—to see how she turns herself from the closed heaven of love, and gives heart and hand to a bolder one, who loves not better, but who knows how bolder to speak. He has never experienced what it is to excite only laughter or opposition by his passion, and, with a pure heart, to win only scorn. Happy he who has no idea of all these pains!

"I love mankind, and I shunned them because my intercourse with them was a torment to me. I never could give expression to the sympathy which I felt, and never take part in the joys which they had. Never, when I saw others weep, came tears to refresh my burning eyelids; my tongue never found a word of consolation. With a world of feeling in my breast, I was doomed to silence. I lay, a Prometheus chained to the rock, while the vulture gnawed my heart. The ridicule which my temperament involuntarily excited, sounded like the hissing of snakes in my ear. I knew that I deserved it; and yet, O my God! I was an innocent, a kind-hearted man. There were no mean sentiments in my breast. I would have died joyfully on the cross for the well-being of mankind, and I was sentenced to martyrdom and—social life. Happy art thou, thrice happy thou, who dost not know what that embarrassment is which sets itself in the breast of man, and with a cramp contracts the free play of his nerves, tearing and rending with sharp claws, and dissipating all rest and comfort! There are very few who have not once in their lives had a blow from the pinion of this night-owl; yet there are, God be thanked! still fewer in whose breast it has constantly made its nest.

"Yet I was not always so. As a child I was untroubled, and my eye bore without embarrassment the eye of another. I remember myself then with pleasure, almost with admiration.

"At my entrance into the great world, something occurred to me in itself insignificant. I was guilty of an impropriety in a great company—of such a one as too often happens to novices in the polite world, which is laughed at and then forgotten. The laughter, however, which excited aroused in my breast a feeling hitherto unknown to it. From that moment I never again forgot my awkwardness, and this feeling never more left me. It cast a spell, as it were, over my demeanor and my actions. My days became a chain of the most ridiculous incidents and the bitterest sufferings. All attempts to overcome this demon, or remove it, only served to deliver me ever more into his power. I wrestled with it, I cursed it, and it only clasped me the closer. The higher my rage rose, the more violently my combat against this invisible enemy was inflamed, the more unlimited was his power. O how with the weapons of reason and philosophy have I not combated in the still sleepless nights with this fearful spectre, and then when day and light and my fellow-men came, he has only held me faster than ever in his iron arms. He did not govern only my limbs and my actions, but also my thoughts and feelings. I passed one year after another in this fruitless struggle. My inmost feeling became darker and darker. 'I said to joy, 'What wilt thou?' and to Laughter, 'It is folly!' I wished to become blind. Happy are the blind! Their misfortune speaks to the hearts of all men. Their embarrassment, their little awkwardnesses, are not ridiculed. Their eyes never meet a scornful glance. O! if the eternal night sealed my eyes—if it had extinguished for all time their embarrassment, uncertain glance—then—then certainly should I have rest!

"There are the strangest sufferings on earth; one only of these is intolerable, nay, almost insupportable, for it consumes the marrow of human strength—and this is that falling out of man with himself which makes him burdensome to himself and to his fellow-man. Leprosy with unabated strength of soul, is hardly to be called a misfortune, nay, had I suffered from loathsome disease, surrounded by Job's comforters; or had found myself solitary in the desert, with birds of prey hovering around me, waiting for my corpse, I should not have felt myself so unfortunate as I was, had only my nerves and my glance been under the control of my own will. But give me riches, health, beauty, and with these this weakness, this nervous unrest, this embarrassment, and I must be discontented, hopeless, unfortunate. Unfortunate in so far not—yet of that later.

"I had read of some one who always saw a human skeleton before him, and who, consumed by the vision, sank slowly into the grave. This appeared to me a trifle in comparison with the curse which seemed laid upon me. A greater misfortune had been a refreshment to me. Sometimes I fancied that a crime, a murder, would do me good; and that scenes of blood and cruelty would arouse me out of my dream. Horrible! horrible!"

"Had I lived in times of war, when men stand in need of sacrifice and of martyrs, I should have given myself up as one of them; and in striving after the crown of martyrdom, I should have destroyed the demon of my life, and have regained myself. But all was peace and joy around me.

"A form of light stepped toward me on my path. A good and beautiful being spoke to me with the tongue of an angel. The heavenly peace in her eyes gave to me again my lost tranquillity. I could look upon her; I could sun myself in the glance of a human being. Heavens, what delight! I lost her whom I loved through my own fault, or rather through the power which governed me—and like some one possessed by furies, I left my home and hers!

"Now in the fresh morning hour my eyes withdrew from mankind. I cast a long glance into my heart, and upon my past life. Several of my friends had told me that haughtiness, or a too easily wounded self-love, was the cause of the condition in which I found myself.

"Was I then haughty? Was my self-love so great? Ah, my God, the little flower at my feet which opened its eye to the day and waves itself with unconscious delight in the wind, appeared to me to be much more than myself—I envied its life. And the tree which lifted itself majestically above me, so proud, so tranquil, as if it were conscious of the strength which defied winter and its storms, and now put forth millions of leaves to afford shade to the wanderer, and shelter to the birds—this glorious tree! O how little I felt beside it!

"I went farther, while a crowd of ever returning thoughts mounted up in my soul. I had seen many now whose life was stained with crimes and vices, and their glance was clear and unblenching; their demeanor full of decision. They rejoiced themselves in the good wishes of their fellow-men—ah, they enjoyed the heavenly joys of love; they were beloved—nay, worshipped by affectionate and angelically pure beings. I had seen others—I myself was one of them—pure in heart and conduct; yet who, at the same time, could obtain no one little crumb of that heavenly bread, which the fortunate in life enjoy in full measure. Why is this so, thought I, in a world where God governs? God, who in his Word has placed the good on the right hand and the wicked on the left? The contradictions of life—and many a wherefore? that remained unanswered, raised itself like a chaos in my soul, and a restless wily one with another.

"In one of these moments I stood upon a rock. Below me roiled a waterfall. Vast masses of water were tumbled incessantly into the gulf, where, foaming and hissing in untamable fury, they struggled one with another.

"I saw the powers of nature rage; I listened to the wild, deafening thundering. Extraordinary emotions awoke in me, my breast expanded itself; a restless desire for combat arose within it. An indescribable longing after the deep took hold of me! It was not death which I sought. I had a dark, but violent wish to drown the unfathomable demon which possessed me in that depth; to free myself from him, and to come forth new-born! Here, in the thundering deep, would I struggle with him and overcome him—would come to myself and breathe freely. Ha! how deeply—how freely would I breathe! I was sensible of frenzy—I felt joy—madness! and with a despairing cry of exultation I sprang with outstretched arms into the depth below. It raved and hissed around me, my thought grew dizzy. The thundering flood seized upon me. It raged—raved and whirled within itself—my soul was benumbed—it was still.

"When consciousness returned to me, I lay upon the earth at the entrance of a grotto. A singular little old man, clothed in gray, stood beside me, and observed me attentively. He was almost as broad as he was high, with a head disproportionately large. He had riveted his large gray eyes upon me. His high forehead was bald, and the snow-white hair that surrounded it dripped with water.

"This extraordinary figure, the place where I found myself, and the rushing of the waterfall which raged in my ears, gave rise to extraordinary thoughts in me. It was to me as if a river-god had taken possession of me, and I was now in his power. While I was giving myself some trouble to arrange my thoughts, a sarcastic smile spread itself over the coarse features of the old man, and he said in a deep bass voice—

"Ha, ha! he begins to move himself. A pretty play to force old folks to take a cold bath! Yes, yes! uff! uff! and he began to wring the water out from his coat-laps.

"I wished to stammer out an excuse, for I now saw plainly that I had not to deal with a river-god, but with a human creature, who, perhaps, had ventured his own life to save mine; but in this he interrupted me, scolding the while with the deepest of voices.

"Uff! will he be silent? That will come later. It is now no more necessary that water should come out of your mouth than words. Uff, uff!"

"And without further ceremony he seized me by the legs with herculean strength, and made me perform various pendulum motions. Unable to make the slightest opposition, I lost all consciousness a second time, and I believed for a moment that the demon which governed me had taken bodily shape upon himself, in order palpably to revenge himself for all my attempts to withdraw myself from him.

"Other thoughts came to me afterward as I lay in a state of perfect debility on a heap of straw in the grotto, nursed and waited upon by the old man. His voice to be sure was gruff, and his words were not even the softest, but in his behavior toward me he exhibited as much kindness as prudence.

"He appeared to inhabit the grotto, which was dry and conveniently furnished. He prepared our simple meals himself. In the evening he read aloud to me out of the ancient classics, and selected particularly such passages from them as were calculated to strengthen a weak soul, especially examples of stoical resignation; still oftener, however, he made choice of the Gospels.

"He spoke with me of the Saviour of the world. I had already turned to him. I was unfortunate. The comforter of those who mourn could not be unwelcome to me. Yet his image was not quite significant to me; now it was made clear to me. I learned to understand him; I learned to love him. I wished I had lived in the times in which he was on earth. I thought continually how I would have thrust myself among the crowd of the blind, the lame, and the sick, and more unhappy than they would have called, 'Jesus, Son of God, have mercy on me! Lord, if thou wilt thou canst deliver me!' I heard my own exclamation. I saw him stand still and turn himself to me. I looked at his glance; it was full of mildness, gentleness, and love. It penetrated me. I felt how it loosed the bands which held my eye and my soul fettered. A shudder seized me. My God and my Saviour! It was not the idle play of the imagination! Thus, thus hast thou looked upon me! Thus, thus have I experienced in the emancipated soul, as thou drovest the troubling spirit out of it, and as, healed and happy, it sank down at thy feet.

"But, ah! this emancipation could not be my part on earth. I was come into the world two thousand years too late for a miraculous age—miracles are no longer worked.

"I was recovered. The old man besought me to remain with him. I consented willingly. The life which I led with him, but still more he himself, began to please me greatly. I wrote a letter to my parents, to make their minds easy regarding my sudden disappearance, and assigned as the pretext for my lengthened absence a residence with a friend in the country.

"My dangerous baptism had brought about a kind of revolution in me. My past life lay behind me like a dream filled with painful confused pictures. The demon which tortured me lived, it is true, still in me; but removed from the social intercourse of mankind, I still felt his power less, and I rejoiced myself heartily to see mankind no more, and no more to be seen by them.

"The old man was to me properly no man; his whole life and his exterior reminded me much more of a spirit of the mountain than of a man; and his firm, decided action, and his care for me, as well as his surpassing wisdom, of which I saw proofs every hour, gave him a power over me which was good for me.

"The new life which I led refreshed me, both body and soul. I helped the old man at his fishing, accompanied him on his long wanderings through the surrounding country, and was perpetually occupied.

"I wished most fervently to know who the old man really was; he never spoke however of himself, and I did not venture to question him. I called him 'old man,' and he called me 'young fellow,' and the relation between us resembled each day more and more that of father and son. I had for a long time determined to speak with the old man of my soul's malady, and of the cause which occasioned me to leap into the gulf. One day at length I gained courage, and had advanced to the introduction of my purpose, when at the very beginning of my description of my state of mind, my gray-headed friend interrupted me.

"'Yes,' said he, 'I know; I have already remarked it.'

"Hereupon he began himself to question; and inquired into my thoughts, my feelings, to the most secret folds of my heart. I endured pangs of martyrdom during this conversation, and yet patiently bore the anatomical knife, whose edge I felt at work in my innermost being. I knew that it was best for me, and I conquered my feelings of false shame.

"'Young fellow,' said the old man at length, after he had questioned and I had answered, 'thou describest with deep truth the experience of a state which is not unknown to me. Something similar to this led me to the life which I now—yet it is needless to talk of it. It is a strange thing, a very strange thing, this malady,' continued he, as he covered his eyes with his hands, 'strange to see from what various causes it is produced, and in what various individuals it can take root. Addison and Cowper, the most beautiful spirits of their age, suffered from this Alp, as well as many a dunderhead; mighty monarchs as well as poor bunglers like you and me. Nay, how many do we not find in everyday life who secretly suffer therefrom? In how many persons that seems to be hauter, which in fact is only bashfulness—in how many foolhardiness, what is only a mask to conceal the want of repose and self-possession? How often should one sympathize when one accuses?'

"'I will not say to you, young fellow, as many a one has done—everything may be conquered, if people have only the will and courage for it, and so on. There are certainly many maladies of the soul which may be cured by courage, determined will, and prudence; but there are others also which defy all our endeavors, and accompany us to the grave. Yet that ought not to cast us down, and make us ungrateful to God for his most beautiful gift—life. If we are not able to eradicate our sickness, there are still means of mitigating its pain—means which place us in a condition to enjoy the manifold delights of earth in the same degree as they whom nature has abundantly supplied with her best gifts. We will take a review of these means. But, uff! young fellow, we will first take a review of our supper; afterward, when the stars sparkle above our heads, we will speak farther upon our afflictions.'

"When the stars had lighted their lamps and the song of the birds was hushed, we seated ourselves upon the mossy piece of rock before the grotto. The still glimmering fire of the grotto threw an uncertain light upon the moorland around; the cricket sang its descent to the bassong of the waterfall, and the deep firm voice of the old man overpowered them both.

"'In former times,' said he, 'it was the fashion to become hermits, and flee from mankind in order to prepare for heaven; in our times people appear to know no other way to happiness but through social life, especially if one has some property or is come of what is called a good family, then one is as good as doomed to slavery with one's intercourse with mankind. And now! how many people there are—one may begin with them where one will—who are not suited to it! And why do they set such narrow limits to human activity? Here also on earth are there many habitations, and various modes of life and various employments for the variety of individuals.

"Philoctetes, with his disgusting wound on his leg, found among the solitary cliffs of Lemnos animals that loved him, and by winning his bread in the sweat of his brow, an enjoyment of life which had been denied to him among men. Alone with himself and nature, but above all things, with the great Spirit of the world, whose breath poured itself through all he saw, the fresh fountain of life flowed even for him, and he loved life! And who indeed can deny, that for those who have a wound—be it of body or of mind—it is not best to escape from the eyes and condolence of mankind, and to seek consolation in eternal nature?'

"The old man looked with quiet emotion to the beaming world above us, and folded his arms.

"There lies,' said he, after a short silence, 'in the starry heaven above us, in the immeasurable prospect which its immortality lends to us, a certain something before which our own cares and afflictions appear very small—and that is good!' exclaimed he, lifting up his tearful eyes to the friendly lights of heaven.

"'To live with nature in her simple accompaniments,' continued the old man, 'that is a balsam for soul and body—that is a happy life! Neither is it of necessity that such a life should pass uselessly to others. Assemble animals around you like Philoctetes, which will love you and become attached to you. Are you rich either in money or mind, be an unknown benefactor to mankind. And if you have lived only upon earth to purify and ennoble your own heart, then certainly you have not lived in vain—at least not for heaven.

"'If you cannot live in the society of men, live at least with them in their books. It is a glorious thing to think with and have intercourse with the first spirits of the earth, to be able to accompany them on their wandering through life, and on their road to heaven.

"'It is beautiful to illuminate the night of earth by their beams, kindled in their own peculiar light; and to be able to contemplate the world from a higher point of view.

"'That which for the most part opposes our earthly happiness, is that we seek for it in that which is impossible to us. Whatever we cast our desires upon—even if it be as unattainable as the Northern Lights—that we will have—that we strive after, and the world can offer us nothing worth even a wish except this one thing alone. We leap toward the sting till it wounds us. The bold and happy strength which can defy and conquer, may with justice maintain the contest; but the greater number act wisely in resigning in time, and seeking to reach their goal—happiness and freedom—by some other way. We must bear in mind that we are not combating against an enemy, but generally speaking, against the wise will of God, when we are bent upon obtaining that in which neither our social position nor our natural abilities can succeed. Much wiser would it be to see in these circumstances an ordination of the Almighty, and to follow whither His hand leads us, even were it ever so much opposed to our wishes and inclinations. There is a haven, a lonely untempested haven, where—uff! would he have a wife and child! Drop that entirely, young fellow, and don't think about a wife if a wife will not have you! There is no true pleasure without resignation. If a man have not courage to renounce something—uff! then he is, and must remain, a poor unfortunate!

"I covered my face with both my hands, and the old man continued in a gentler tone—

"'I confess that renunciation is not easy; it is difficult to make a sacrifice. It demands strength and determination. It is beautiful, a wife who leaned herself on my breast—with rosy cheeks and loving voice—a wife, with a child in her arms—my wife and my child!—'

"The old man had spoken these words so completely as if carried away by sweet and bitter remembrances, that he had forgotten my presence; he quickly however endeavored to master his feelings, and exclaimed—'Uff! I fancy, young fellow, you are weeping—Fy! Come let us go to rest. It is already late!' and, thus grumbling, he returned into the grotto.

"After this conversation, the old man was unusually still and serious for several days. The month of August was drawing to its close, and bringing with it cold nights and shorter days.

"'It is time for me to be setting out,' said the old man one day; 'but, young fellow, you must not ask me whither! Come, however, next summer, and seek me again here, yet not in such a way as that I shall have occasion to wring out my great coat again in receiving you—come and visit me again like a reasonable person. If I am yet living on the earth, you will again find me here.

"We sat upon a piece of rock above the waterfall. The descending sun changed waves and foam into glittering silver. I had sunk down at the feet of the old man. My heart was this evening light and easy, and I observed with pleasure and reverence the strong, broad countenance of the old man, and his high forehead garlanded with silver hair, as with an expression of piety he looked in the direction of the setting sun. He laid his brown hand upon my head, and said half gayly and half with emotion, 'Uff! young fellow, you have been a vagrant long enough; to-morrow you must leave me, and return soberly home again. Uff! young fellow, keep your mouth shut, and don't say a word about the old man, or else the devil fetch him!'

"The old man spoke these words with such a thundering voice, and such wildly glancing eyes, that I looked at him in astonishment.

"'Now, now!' continued he mildly, and with his customary smile, 'it is not so dangerous if you only keep silent—nothing so bad will befall him.'

"After this he gave me much fatherly counsel for the future. He advised me to renounce the social life of cities for a considerable time; to live in the country; to make use of much exercise; to occupy myself incessantly, and so on.

"'The best way,' continued he, 'to stifle the demons of embarrassment and false shame is to treat them with the greatest contempt, and to permit them on no condition to disturb our soul's peace. There are many ghosts—believe in this respect, a friend who has had experience—which govern us despotically, till we look them sharply in the face, illumine them with the light of our reason, and ask from them Who are you?—Then we see nothing but shapes of vapor, phantoms that have no endurance; dissonances which cease as soon as the human soul casts off the earthly fetters.'

"These were the last words of the old man. The next day we separated. After an interval of a year I sought him in the same spot. Snakes crept about in the grotto; its friendly genius was not there.

"After taking leave of the old man, I returned to my family, without having formed any determined plan for my future life. I felt myself better; I fancied myself stronger. I loved domestic life; I loved mankind; I was attached to my family, and would not willingly separate from them; I wished to make one trial of myself in the world. But scarcely did I find myself in my former circumstances, than my former malady returned with all its sufferings. Once again I was a torment to myself and to those with whom I had intercourse. My nights were without sleep, and my short slumbers were disturbed by wild dreams. I fell off visibly. Horrible visions floated around me, and chased me as if it were through fire and water. They fashioned themselves at length to one fixed idea; waking or sleeping, working or resting, I saw perpetually two flaming, penetrating spectral eyes incessantly riveted upon me, with all that power which is ascribed to the eyes of the snake when it looks upon its prey. I feared to become raving mad—feared, however, is not the word—I was too unhappy to fear anything, least of all absence of mind.

"I recollected very well the words and prescription of the old man, but I wanted strength to comply with them. I feared that at every step an abyss would open at my feet. I had a younger brother; he was good and beautiful as an angel. He loved me. I had been his instructor; I could be so no longer; but he attached himself to me nevertheless. I infected him, and his demeanor by degrees acquired all the instability of mine. I wished to die—I could not! I wished to go—I had not the power! That demon had taken possession of me which Goethe makes to speak thus—

He who is in my possessing,
In the world has no more blessing;
Endless night, o'er him impending,
No sun rising nor descending;
And in mind accomplished fully
Only darkness breadth dully;
And he knows, of all life's gaining,
Nothing is for his obtaining.
Good and ill are but ideal,
What he knows mid plenty real:
Be it joy, or be it sorrow,
He defers it till to-morrow;
To the future only steady,
Thus he can be never ready.
Is it going? or abiding?
Power he has not of deciding!
On the beaten track he keepeth;
Tottering on, he feebly creepeth.
Still a deeper maze pursuing:
Every thing obliquely viewing:
Others and himself oppressing,
Breathing, yet scarce life possessing;
Life and death thus strangely twined,
Not despairing, nor resigned.
Thus a painless roll and ranging,
Painful suffrance, wilful changing.
Now released, and now oppressed,
Sleep but half—refreshless rest—
Rivet him in his position,
And prepare him for perdition.

"Unblessed spirits! I could exclaim with Faust. Alas! that I could not also say with him in the moment when, breathed upon by Care, he becomes blind—

The night seems doubly dark to press upon me,
But in my inmost soul a clear light shines,
And what I thought I hasten to perfect.

"One evening, as I sat in my chamber sunk in gloomy melancholy, there fell into my hand—I do not remember in what manner—a legend of St. Rochus. I will repeat it in a few words.

"St. Rochus was born at Montpellier. He signalized himself very early by fear of God, purity of life, and industry in study. After the death of his parents, he made a gift of his great wealth to a poor relation; and taking the pilgrim's staff in his hand, went to Florence, where the plague then raged. Here he exhibited miraculous activity, and performed many cures by prayer and the laying on of hands. At length he himself was attacked by the plague, and endured such horrible suffering that he could not resist crying and lamenting aloud. As he saw, however, that his cries disturbed the sick in the hospital, he stole out unobserved, and placed himself before the door. The people who passed by considered him to be insane, and drove him from the city. Wearied and miserable he sank down under a tree; a fountain sprang out of the earth here, and quenched his thirst.

"The people who lived at a country-house not far off noticed one day that the yard-dog stole a piece of bread, and ran away with it. It was punished for this theft, but spite of that, he repeated the theft the next day, and the day following. This displeased the people, and they informed the master of the house of what had happened. He determined to examine closely into the affair, and one day, accompanied by several of his people, he followed the steps of the dog, and in so doing came to the tree under which St. Rochus lay. When he saw them approaching him, he called to them with a loud voice that they should not come near to him, as he had the plague and might infect them. Gianozzo, the master of the place, however, no way terrified thereby, had the holy Rochus conveyed to his house, and waited upon him till he had recovered. St. Rochus then, accompanied by Gianozzo, returned to Florence; and continued healing the sick. Gianozzo was consecrated by him to the severity of an anchorite life.

"After many years of temptation, and the exercise of good works, he felt the desire of seeing his home once more, and turned his steps thither. War raged there; and being taken for a spy, he was thrown into a dark dungeon. But St. Rochus thanked God for his sufferings, and was tranquil and joyful in the midst of them. After having passed five years in this dark subterranean hall he felt the approach of death, and wished to speak with a priest. When the priest entered the prison where St. Rochus lay, he found it illuminated with a bright light, and the countenance of the saint beamed with a celestial glory, which so astonished the priest that he fell with his face to the ground. After this he hastened out speedily to make the princes by whom he had been so cruelly treated aware of the sanctity of their prisoner. The report of this spread itself rapidly among the people, and an innumerable crowd streamed toward the prison where St. Rochus lay. He had, however, in the mean time, given up the ghost.

"That which particularly impressed me in this simple narrative was the behavior of the holy man during his illness. He left his couch, the comforts, the attendance which he enjoyed, and went out of the hospital in order not to disturb the other sick people by his lamentations. Forsaken, and tormented with violent pains, still he endeavored to keep at a distance those who hastened to his help, from the fear of injuring them. I read his words again and again—and what? was I not like him, visited by an unfortunate malady? Did not I also operate injuriously upon those who surrounded me? He left the hospital, he endured want, in order to spare others—he went out of the way in order to procure them repose. Why should not I do as he had done? How acted the lepers in former times? must they not also avoid mankind? and were not they still only sick, only unfortunate? I too was sick—I infected others—I must fly! Yes—and I would do so. The persuasion that by so doing I could do good to those whom I loved, gave me strength for a resolution which prudence otherwise might have forbidden to adopt. I would depart—ah! that is to say, I would bless those who belonged to me: I would relieve my beloved ones, let God do with me what he would!

"I wrote to my parents, described to them my condition, my intention, and promised some day to return to them. Before they received my letter, I was at a considerable distance. I changed my name, and kept secret the direction in which I had gone. Thus I came into this country. It pleased me because it was solitary and wild.

Here I built for myself a cottage. What I have done and what I propose, that you have seen. All is my work; Becassine alone has assisted me. He was my only friend and servant. I lived by the work of my hands. This strengthened me, and compelled me to turn my thoughts from myself. My mode of life and my solitude became dear to me. I understood or heard the powerful voice of the storm as a tone from the breast of the Almighty. My own breast replied to it. I saw the blue eye of heaven so large, so beautiful, looking down upon me. I read the Word of God in the flowers, in the blades of grass—they questioned not, they wounded me not. Silent and lofty stood the cliffs around me. I penetrated the shadowy woods, and there nestling rocked my soul to repose. All was great, fresh, and untroubled around me; all lived its own undisturbed, powerful life. I was inwardly sound. My soul raised itself, and I breathed again. I went to the church to hear the excellent Hervey. Accidentally I even made a personal acquaintance with him. He has often done me good. I found myself better beside him, and all embarrassment fled. I felt the necessity of loving and being loved. I obtained animals. Their glance disturbed me not, and they were not disquieted by mine. They received their food from my hand, and licked it thankfully. They leapt when they heard my voice; their caresses animated my heart. I made them sociable one with another, and endeavored that both their life and their death should be easy. I devoted the half of my time to them, and the other half to my labors. It was not long before my soul became so tranquil that I began again to read. By degrees I felt—happy feeling!—that the demon which had so long afflicted me had departed from me; and in its place came an affectionate, friendly spirit, which enhanced to me the beauty of nature, and enriched my solitude with her treasures. In the bosom of nature, drinking from her fresh fountains, and penetrated by her powerful life, I felt myself inspired to poetry. In the storm in the song of the birds, in the humming of the insects, feelings, thoughts, and images arose within me which clothed themselves in words, and from the depth of the wilderness arose the voice, of that lately one so unfortunate, which poured forth thanksgiving to the Creator for the life which He had bestowed. Never loved I God so much, never adored Him so worthily as in this solitude. * * * *

"Seven winters and summers have passed since the day on which I took possession of my beloved solitude. My soul was strengthened: I had enriched it during this time with a variety of knowledge. An agreeable repose had come over me. Amid this I became conscious of a desire for the society of educated people. I had a presentiment within me, that some time I might return to them without being a troubling spirit. There beamed to me a glimmering of hope that I also, in time to come, might be possessed of a wife and friends. Accident, a short time since, conducted a female form to me; since that moment I think only on her. She demanded not adoration, like a queen of heaven; she came rather with repose and peace in her whole being; she entranced every thought, without beauty; my heart beat light and tranquilly before her glance; she seemed to make all that she touched holy, all her looks were so gentle, all her words so kind; she was friendly toward me; she assisted me to prepare the evening meal; she disclaimed not to repose upon the mat which I had spread out for her. I am conscious of an inexpressible tenderness for her. Oh, if she could become my wife! With her hand I should not fear returning into the world. She would be my good angel. With her the world would no longer appear a desert to me. I should feel at home and happy by her side. She gives me repose; repose which makes me uneasy distant from her; which makes my cottage appear to me poor and empty, my animals burdensome and unsightly to me. Yet how beautiful, how amiable, does mankind seem near her!

"I am not poor. I can offer my wife a good position in society. I know what I will do. Tomorrow I will leave my cottage; I will return to my family, and make another trial among mankind; I will prove my own strength. Should I again find myself as unhappy as before, I will return to my solitude, tend my animals, praise God, and die. If I find that my malady is subdued, or that I have power to master it, O then I will go to her whom I love, and say to her—

"Clara—I have heard thee called so, and how beautifully accords this name with thy being! Dear, good Clara, be my wife! I will dedicate my life to thy happiness!"

How deeply did Clara blush as she read this conclusion, which astonished and at the same time affected her. Hervey had left this manuscript behind at Umenäs; and, after Clara, no one read it with so much attention as the Baroness H.

"Now, Clara," said she, laying down the manuscript, "what do you say to this conclusion?"

Clara was silent for a moment, and then said smilingly—

"We will think it over together, as soon as Hervey returns. If it turns upon making a good man happy, one may not so slightly dismiss the subject."

"Yet we will very maturely consider the affair, and in no case be precipitate," said the Baroness, who had altogether other intentions for Clara, and who felt herself not a little annoyed by the Colonel's declarations of love. "What then is become of your disinclinations for marriage," continued she somewhat excited, "perhaps you have left them up there among the rocks and woods?"

"No," returned Clara; "you yourself have removed them. Why have you presented to me for a whole year so beautiful a side of earthly life, if it were not to remove my fears of settling down at home in it?"

"Clara, my good, dear Clara! promise me only," said the Baroness, "that if you ever should marry, to remain in my neighborhood, otherwise I shall run away from my husband that I tell you, and shall tell him."

CHAPTER XXIX.

MAY DAYS.

The Lord of heaven created all things, and revealed himself in the full spring.—CONFRONTUS.

AND the winter passed over and the spring came—perhaps somebody very justly remarks, that this extraordinary circumstance occurs in every one of these little books of every-day life. But is it at all strange, that we should admire spring? Spring is so deserting of love! The earth never can weary of its visits, may my reader only not weary of my description of them.

The saps circulate in the bosom of the earth. The spirits of the elements pass over it, and nod, beckon, and call to one another. They desire to bloom in an earthly shape, and each one to express their souls in their own way. The eternal sun overflows all existence with a gush of light and warmth; toward which all buds shoot forth in order to be formed and fashioned by the spirits of the elements. Quickly do these move their glorious shapes—silently, without labor, without bustle; thus does genius form its most beautiful productions. The moment is come, and nature spreads abroad its marvels. There shoots the foliage, perfect in its minutest parts, a marvel as great as the greatest in the world. Out of the bosom of the rocks springs the tender moss, and clothes them with softness. A thousand blossoms open their chalice, a mystery of beauty, for mankind as incomprehensible as their Maker. The humming insects unfold in wide space their purple wings—they are the free-born of nature—therefore do they hum, drum, file, and sing. All is beautiful, great and small! Every individual part so perfect, and the whole—who is able to comprehend the harmony, the affluence, and the manifold forms of life?

The spring in the north is not what it is in the south, a slow wakening of nature out of a long sleep. It bursts forth at once, like a youthful, joyous laughter. Yesterday there lay yet a mantle of snow on the earth—to-day it is gone, and the trees are in leaf. How the snow-fowl crows in the woods, how play the grouse, how sings the thrush, how odorous are the birches! Mountain and valley adorn themselves with gay flowers—the heaven swims in a sea of light! The sun will not go down; the night shows its countenance only for some minutes, and then again disappears. In these moments of twilight, the snowy summits of the mountains all burn in flame, and fill the valleys with a fairy light.*

A deep transport vibrates through the heart of nature. Everywhere breathes life, warmth, and fragrance—an activity in every creature, from man to the smallest insect—a voluptuous joy. In this aromatic world, in this air full of song, under this heaven full of transparency and light, stood Nina. She stood lost in wonder and delight in this fresh, marvellous life, and her being opened itself like the chalice of a flower in order to receive it.

By her side stood Hervey. O how beautiful for her were these hours of existence! They loved so deeply, so sincerely, so warmly; and silent nature participated in their love. All was in pure, harmonious accord. They did not speak of that which they felt for each other; they took themselves no account of it. One word might have annihilated their heaven of pure felicity. They were together—that was sufficient. Oft did they walk on in silence, and intoxicated with the strength of their feelings; and oft did Hervey give free course to his natural eloquence, which yet became more exalted through the presence of Nina. How vividly did Hervey grasp everything. How important were the subjects which he handled! The rocks revealed their secret treasures, the rocking of the sea received a meaning; the paths of the stars, the ways of men, the still working of the coral insects, all streamed forth from his mouth full of light and order. His glance fell like sunshine on everything, and Hervey saw how God gazes through all things; all things proceeded from Him, all returned to Him. By Nina's side, and by her inspired, he became a Skald, the ennobled one of nature.

And she! she went by his side, and listened to his voice—his words. How beautifully changed the lights in her eye, the shadows in her world! How clear, how friendly were they! She felt at heart so warm, so infinitely happy! It throbbed with gladness, and full of a gayety hitherto unknown. Her being unfolded in such moments its richest blossoms. Roses glowed on her cheeks; her eyes exchanged their dark glance for a clear vernal light; her form, every limb, became fuller, her motions more lively—she was a speaking image of felicity!

And if this season of life's bloom lasted but for a morning, it is still beautiful to have enjoyed it; with the bosom bathed in love and spring to have tasted of the glory of life. This ruddiness of morning casts a bewitching splendor on the whole of after-life. One bears the heavy days of earth much more readily when the heart has once revelled in the fullness of happiness. But perhaps thou thinkest differently—thou who, after a life full of self-denial, wanderest onward in the silent gleam of the stars of the evening heaven, and lookest forward to a morning whose light shall never fail? Perhaps thou art right. I am not disposed to doubt it.

In the south, a passion like that between Nina and Hervey would speedily have burst out into a flame. It would have snapped asunder all bonds, have surmounted all impediments, and have kindled the marriage-torch or the funeral-pile. In the quiet, serious north, where love arose and developed itself between the two, it took, however, another shape. Hast thou ever seen two stems of trees, which, sprung from different roots, yet drawn as it were by an irresistible attraction, pressed ever closer toward each other, and united themselves continually more intimately, till one rimd inclosed both, and till it became almost impossible to indicate the spot where they grew together. The two stems are become one, and it is no longer in the power of man to rend them asunder without destroying the life of both. They draw in common their strength from the earth; their boughs are woven into one common crown; the same mantle of snow surrounds them in the night of winter; the same sun cherishes them; the same wind shakes their boughs, and the same birds find shelter under their roof of leaves.

Do happy consorts recognize themselves in this picture? May they be many! May they live long on the earth. They present a sight which is grateful both to God and man.

So deep, so still, so perfect was that feeling which united Hervey and Nina—and precisely because it was so deep and complete did it remain long a secret to both. It did not present itself to them as a strange feeling, which suddenly arises and establishes itself in the heart; but it harmonized with their innermost being.

Nina resigned herself without hesitation to a feeling which perfected her whole life, and opened heaven to her. The memory of earlier connections became, as it were, extinguished in her heart. She knew nothing more of them; she thought no more of them. Hervey constituted her world, her life, her fate, her all. But that word love never came into her thoughts; and as it occurred to Hervey, as it became clear to him what the feeling was which filled his heart, he then only formed the firmer resolve never to disturb her peace. He felt strength enough to keep the rein in his possession, if he could only be near her and ennoble her life; for he did not deceive himself regarding the influence which he possessed over her. But he did not call this feeling love. He desired not to excite love in her; he could not wish to unite her life with his, over which hung a gloomy shadow, an impenetrable, immovable shadow, which would inevitably present itself at the moment that he should propose to unite Nina's fate to his own. He cast this thought far, far from him; but he felt compelled to seek her welfare, to bless her with the best that he possessed, with his knowledge, with his heart. He would give her everything, and sought nothing for it. Her devotion to him was a necessity, perhaps more so than he admitted to himself. In Hervey's soul lay so deep a necessity of making others happy, that the satisfaction of this feeling had hitherto alone contented him. It is on this account that he thought so little on the return which people made him; it was through this that he did not at all read the word love, which the lips of Nina expressed so plainly in her smile at his approach—the word love, which painted itself in her beaming glance, and in the happiness which his entrance diffused over her whole being.

But he came every evening to see her, as the pilgrim of earth turns himself toward heaven when his day of labor draws toward its close. With a good-humored impatience he pressed his sister Maria to make herself ready, and with hasty steps led the way from Tarna toward Umenäs. At the sight of Nina he became quieter. Clara and she were then almost always prepared for a ramble through the wild but romantic country, in which Hervey knew every track and nook. They set out; the little party soon separated; Nina's arm rested within that of Hervey. They went on in advance, for Clara usually soon slackened her pace. She remained with Hervey's sister, listening with a soft melancholy smile to the theme which Maria generally adopted in her conversation; this was scarcely ever other than her beloved brother, his tenderness and care for his family, his words and deeds, and the love and confidence which were universally conferred on him.

Nina talked with Hervey with most especial pleasure of Edla. She described her as a lofty being, whom the sorrows and joys of earth could not reach; stern, yet mild; deep, but clear; concealing her good deeds as others concealed their evil ones; simple, yet uncommon, resembling no one but herself. She spoke of her own happy childhood by the side of her little beloved sister; of her long state of continued weakness after her death, and of Edla's influence over her. But her lips hesitated to express that which, with a thousand voices, sounded in her heart, namely, that she now first understood the beauty of life; was now for the first time young and happy, and now first praised the all-beneficent Creator, the giver of every good and beautiful thing. Hervey listened to her with quiet joy. He refreshed himself in her lovely spirit, which lay before him clear as a mirror. He listened with an enraptured heart to the melodious voice, to the pure and simple speech. O how he loved her!

Often did he conduct Nina to the new improvement which he was making himself, or to which he had stimulated others. It seemed as if that newly-ploughed land, that freshly-laid-down pasture, the nursery-garden, needed the glance of Nina, even as they did the rain and the sunshine, to make them flourish. Many men recognize the greatness of life and the power of God only in the grand events of history; the glory of Nature only in her sublime scenes, in her dazzling phenomena. Hervey saw in human life nothing more than what every cottage is capable of presenting; and in like manner he discerned in the development of the crystal, in the growing and ripening grain of corn, the power and order of all nature, her depth and her divine life. He called the attention of Nina to these things; he taught her to perceive how great, how clear, and at the same time how unfathomable, is the Creator even in the smallest of his creations.

He imparted to Nina his plans in reference to the improvement of the country, and the social management of its inhabitants, he solicited her opinions and her advice. Nina's eye for practical life extended its vision daily, and daily advanced in steadiness. She was inspired by the activity of Hervey; she instructed herself in his undertakings, and in all those which, through his recommendation and guidance, were commenced in the country. God be praised! Virtue and Diligence are even more infectious than Plague and Crime. One pure stem can engraft with its germs a hundred wild trees, and ennoble them all. From Hervey, Nina acquired a lively interest in the good of humanity, an interest which is the noblest characteristic of man.

The young friends often pleased themselves with making little plans for the ornament of the wild environs of Umenäs. A footpath was led winding down into a lovely valley, and again at the foot of a rock not far from the sea was raised a seat of turf. A lofty tree lent its shade, a spring murmured near it, a luxuriant hedge of wild roses extended on either hand from the precipice. This little spot, which Nina particularly loved, was named Nina's Rest.

Nina in the mean time remarked that a question or observation, as it would seem insignificant in itself, disturbed Hervey's repose. An expression of pain then painted itself in his face; he continued long silent, and appeared to wrestle with himself in order to regain his previous mood of mind. Nina endeavored to be guarded in her words; but as she yet awoke that painful change exactly when she least expected it, she finally resolved to speak quite frankly with him upon it.

"It often happens to me," said she one day to him, "that I say something which gives you pain, and seems to excite the most agonizing recollections in you. I beseech you, teach me to avoid this."

He gazed on her affectionately. "That you cannot do," said he; "no one can do it. In this respect I lie under an influence which I am not able to escape from. Grant me but one request," and he glanced at her with the deepest earnestness; "never speak with me of my past life; never put to me one question in reference to it. You might easily conjure up a shadow which itself is able to darken for me God's glorious sunshine."

"Gracious heaven!" exclaimed Nina with blanching cheek, and involuntarily raising her clasped hands.

"Compose yourself!" said Hervey again with his usual gentleness.

"It is indeed a pain, but not a bitter one, and I know how this shadow can be exorcised. But grant my request."

"That I promise you," answered Nina complyingly; but her heart asked, "What dark shadow can it be which can trouble his days? Oh that I could expel it; that I could place myself betwixt it and Hervey, I would sacrifice my life for his happiness."

And what in the mean time said the Countess Natalie and the Baroness H. to all these walks and conversations?

The Countess Natalie had two great engrossments. The first was the laying-out of a large park; the second the Colonel Kugel, who was her assistant therein, and rolled stones out of the earth and sighs out of his heart, all out of love to the Countess. The Colonel was a tall and handsome man, strong as a lion—naïve, bad and good like nature: neither reasoning nor listening to reasoning; a sort of Hercules, who, after he had crushed the Nemean lion in his powerful arms, could cast himself down at the feet of a fair one and spin with her. The Countess regarded him at first in an artistic point of view, and afterward bestowed on him a warmer interest. "These great children," said she, "are so refreshing. In an artificial and over-accomplished world, they stand as something original and natural."

The Countess let the Colonel understand that she found him "refreshing;" he was thoroughly transported with her good taste, and so ended by falling seriously in love with her. She proposed to herself to educate him. She persuaded him that he had great talents for philosophy, and recommended him to read various books with which she supplied him. The Colonel rose every morning at half-past three, studied and wrote, and spun long yarns out of ideas. The flax-spinning of Hercules was far easier to him. In the mean time the Countess knew how to reward the Colonel for his labors. She belonged to those who shrink from an actually criminal digression, but still allow themselves much which borders on it. Flattered at being able at her age to excite a passion, she exerted herself to make it lively and entertaining; but she did this with such zeal, that very soon her own heart was involved in the game. The Colonel became more interesting to her than all the park arrangements in the world; but at the same time she was not without her cunning. The Colonel, on his side, employed his stratagems of war in his intercourse with ladies. Each of them wished to assure himself of the feeling of the other without committing himself, and thus they passed their days in laying plots and counterplots to this end. In such circumstances the Countess was desirous of removing all witnesses as far as possible, and therefore right willingly gave permission to the young people to carry on their rambles.

But we must now compel ourselves to acknowledge that even the Baroness H. had her engrossments; though these were by no means like those of the Countess. The first was her husband. I ask who has anything to say against it, that the two were now far more in love with one another than before their marriage? The other was a yet unborn creature—a future heir of Paradise, whose approaching existence enraptured the Baron, and led the Baroness to anticipate a mother's joys. "Oh! these engrossments will draw away her soul from Clara, from her friend!" I hear one of my lady readers exclaim in dissatisfaction. No, thou good one, certainly not! But they hindered her from accompanying Clara as before—they drew away her attention a little from that which was passing around her. Besides this, Clara was quieter and tenderer than ever, and expected the child of her friend as if it were her own. Clara found herself on excursions of discovery in the neighborhood: the Baroness believed that all went on as it should. With the Countess and her fresh improvements she was less satisfied, and spared no admonitions in this quarter! but all these upon "stony ground."

FRANKER.

It is a lovely Saturday afternoon, light breathes the wind, joyously sing the birds, sweetly the flowers exhale their odors, who can remain in the house? The Countess certainly not. She chooses this day for her first visit to the parsonage in Tarna, to Hervey's aged mother. The whole family, as well as the Colonel, shall accompany her. They will go thicker on foot, and return in the carriage. All are in excellent spirits. The Colonel heats himself with gathering flowers for the Countess, who shows him grateful glances. The Baroness throws sharp glances at her, yet has herself her attention agreeably diverted by her husband, who overwhelms her with attentions, smokes his pipe, and looks in the highest degree gay and happy. Filius . . . good heaven! what have we done with Filius? O, it is true, we have forgotten him, and beg our reader's pardon! We have neglected to say that before the Baron's departure from Paradise he was taken to an excellent school in the next town, where he at the same time had lessons in drawing, and opportunity to cultivate his talent in little and great compositions.

Nina and Clara are gay and happy as children, and feel themselves continually more like sisters. The Countess makes trial whether the philosophical plantations in the heart of the Colonel have yet taken root. She talks of Pascal—she talks of Cousin. The Colonel acquiesces in all her thoughts and ideas—finds "deep" and "sublime" what she finds "deep" and "sublime;" and makes giant strides in the—favor of his teacher.

Yonder rise the green hills of Tarna. Lovely and well lies the parsonage on one of them. A garden with trees and shrubs stretches greenly down its southern side. The whole country round is changed; everywhere have the plough, the spade, and the axe begun their labors. Hervey is in the garden with his young friend Captain Philip S.; they are busy trimming, amid friendly discourse, the trees beneath whose shade Hervey hopes ever to see his mother and sisters enjoy the summer evenings. So long as this little garden was encompassed with marshes, no newly-planted trees would make progress; but now these are for the most part drained, and converted into fruitful tillage land. In consequence of this the cold is diminished, and everywhere shoot forth leafy branches.

As Hervey desisted the approaching party, he flung down his pruning-knife, and hastened, beautiful in the zeal of labor—beautiful in his neglected dress, especially beautiful in his joy and benevolence, which pained themselves in his face to meet his friends. To Nina, the words, I believe of Sterne, occurred—"His countenance is like a blessing."

Gentle and quiet as ever, Hervey conducted his guests to his mother. In the house it looked like a tranquil festival day—all was so clean, so white, so tasteful, yet simple. A friendly directing spirit had set its seal on the whole economy of the house. In the entrance hall strewn leaves of the fir annoyed somewhat the Countess, but charmed the young ladies extremely. They passed from the hall into the sitting-room, and the Countess noticed with wonder the elegance of the furniture. Baron H. stood enraptured before bookshelves which covered the whole of a spacious and light apartment. Here stood also a pianoforte and a harp, the favorite instruments of Edward Hervey. Numerous and well-tended flowers breathed their aroma from the windows. Soon also a flower of the heliotrope, plucked by Hervey, shed its fragrance in Nina's hand. Some pigeons with lustrous feathers came flying into the house, and took food now from Hervey's and now from Nina's hand. Nina's soul was seized with an inward delight; never had she felt herself so much at home, so happy. It seemed as if a smiling angel of peace glanced at her out of every corner, and whispered to her—"It is good to be here!" Ah, she felt that it was so. Hervey's look, Hervey's spirit, had here sanctified and blessed everything.

Would you see a living festival? See there the aged lady, Hervey's mother. In the lovely, pure features dwell together seriousness and gentleness; and about the mouth shows itself yet frequently a smile, which reminds you of that of the sun. In her white dress, simple in costume and character, she is not wanting in a natural dignity, which so well becomes the handsome old lady. Her silver hair divides itself on her open brow, in order to cover her temples, and then to disappear under her cap. At the entrance of the distinguished guests she laid aside her book of devotion and her spectacles, and welcomed them with unaffected cordiality. The Countess had proposed to herself to be condescending, but it would not succeed. Virtue and misfortune, a strong and pious soul, had conferred on the mother of Hervey the nobility, the genuine good-breeding to which worldly accomplishment can add little, and from which a lofty roof and the accompaniments of poverty can take nothing away. Perhaps somewhat of this quiet character was derived from the pride which she felt in her son. She had not seen much of the world; she believed that in it one could meet with nothing better, nothing more exalted than Hervey.

By the side of this lady, and somewhat surprised that the representations which she had made to herself of Hervey's domestic economy did not altogether tally, the beautiful, rich, and world-experienced Countess was conscious of a wholly peculiar sensation. She felt herself thrown out of her own element, in a word, somewhat embarrassed, and to her great annoyance knew not how to carry on the conversation. The Baroness, on the contrary, was at once at home, so soon as with her fine tact she had felt out the presence of nature and human worth; and she was therefore speedily carried away in a fluent conversation with Hervey's mother.

The rest of the company had in the mean time entered the music-room. At the request of the Countess, Hervey placed himself at the harp, and his fingers touched the chords with spirit and life. From a mild, melancholy, but infinitely agreeable phantasy, he passed with the skill of a master to the simple, profound accords which form the introduction to the splendid romance "The Sea Hero;"* and in a fine tenor he then sung the northern song, in a strong but melancholy tone, with an entrancing, varying expression, such as the words of the poem dictated. The life of the olden time rose in its youthful, wonderful strength. Like a quickening breath it pervades the souls of the listeners. To their imaginations seemed

—Thus lovely the song of the waves,
As they rock in the wild foaming sea.

Ah!

They come from the distant—distant strand,
They know no fetter—they know no band
In the sea.

Philip's eyes lightened at Hervey's song; even Clara's pious glance kindled with an unthought feeling. Nina had cast down her eyelids; the long dark lashes concealed the expression of her gaze: she was silent, but the song seized mightily on her soul, yet not so as it did on a former occasion. There was a strange sensation in her heart, but it was good.

"Where is Maria?"

I am at this moment a little ashamed of Maria, since no one can look less festively arrayed than she. She will only prepare a banquet for those who have forgotten themselves. She stands still and hot at the oven, and bakes fine bread. The greatest consternation shows itself in her countenance, while in the deepest anxiety she gazes round her with the words—"Our maid-servants are gone out! The house full of guests. The Countess! Supper! I here! white bread must be baked, and both girls are out!"

I will venture to assert, that none of my fair readers will peruse this without the greatest sympathy for Maria, and even a little sympathetic distress. If they wish, however, to get rid of this distress, it is only necessary to accompany me a little farther. Maria, between her oven and her anxiety, would have lost her wits, if her brother, like a consoling angel, had not suddenly made his appearance, and with friendly words, active help, and pleasant jokes, put to flight her trouble. She took courage—all will go well; and from this it came to pass that the baking turned out so admirably, for in fact when the cakes in the oven rise well, the heart of the housewife rises with them. Maria felicitated herself on being able to treat her guests with the beautiful white bread, especially the lovely Nina, whom with a maiden's enthusiasm she admired. For her was an especial cake baked.

Maria speedily spread the cloth in the eating-room, and her brother spoke courage to her. He himself helped to cut bread, and to set on the table the dishes of curd, so that his sister became quite easy and cheerful. Will you see Maria? She is like a thousand others, fair, kind, blue-eyed, of features by no means remarkable, but with an expression of good-nature. Her dress was something worn, but far from being worn out; a warm heart, a good understanding, in whose joys housekeeping and heaven occupy the whole space, without much fascination; diligent, conscientious, affectionate, indefatigable—the first up, the last to bed; you see, in a word, before you one of the many who live for others—of those who will probably think for the first time of themselves when the Lord of the world says to them—"Thou good and faithful servant, thou hast been faithful in a few things, enter thou into the joy of thy Lord." But for such an one what joy can there probably be, except that of being able yet more freely to live and work for those that she loves?

But we loiter—Maria does not. She has set the cold roast meat, the steaming potatoes, and the fresh butter, on the table; she has conducted the guests into the eating-room, and has invited them kindly and somewhat embarrassed to partake, and wishes that they may enjoy the repast.

Here also the Countess found herself quite out in her expectations, and saw not the smallest thing at which she could have smiled. For here all was too pretentious and too good. The meal resembled rather an idyllic banquet than a supper "at the Countess's visit." And in truth the milk, with the excellent cream, she found, as well as the rest, so delicious after the long walk, that she bestowed a particular attention upon the dish. It did not escape her, however, that Hervey was more gay and social than usual. He looked around him as if he would bless everybody. But while all are eating, chatting, and laughing, I will make a short digression, and say a word with the

FATHERS OF FAMILIES.

Thou who sittest at thy table like a thunder-cloud charged with lightning, and scoldest the wife and the cook about the dinner, so that the morsel sticks in the throat of the mother and children—thou who makest unhappy wife and child and servants—thou who preparest for every dish a bitter sauce out of thy gall—shame and indigestion to thee!

BUT—Honour and long life to a good stomach, and especially all good to thee who sittest at thy table like bright sunshine; thou who lookest round thee to bless the enjoyment of thy family—by thy friendly glance, thy kind speech, callest forth sportiveness and appetite, and thereby lendest to the gifts of God a better strength, a finer flavor than the profoundest art of the cook is able to confer upon them—honor to thee, and joys in abundance. May good will ever spread the table for thee; may friendly faces ever sit round thy dishes. Honour and joy to thee!

And now back again to the parsonage. Baron H. felt himself so unusually exhilarated, that he suddenly, to the horror of everybody, burst forth with a terrible song, at which every one laughed except his wife, who pulled him by the ear. After he had finished it, he bowed with great gravity to the ringing peal of applause, and begged of Nina also to gratify the company with a song. Nina blushed and would decline it, but, stimulated by the Countess, who felt herself somewhat wounded that the Baron had not first made such a request from herself, and overwhelmed with solicitations, she finally consented, and sang with a somewhat tremulous voice the beautiful song of Franzén—

"Yield thyself not to the pressure of Care."

Hervey immediately fell in with his fine tenor, at first only as it seemed to support the voice of Nina. She thanked him with a gentle nod. Her voice became firmer, her cheeks flushed, her eyes beamed with joy. Hereupon Hervey raised his voice more and more, he followed hers no longer, but rather bore it on—a finer harmony no one ever heard. All hearts were enlivened. Involuntarily first one and then another voice joined the singing, and if the Baroness had not expressively pinched the arm of her husband, it would have been difficult to have restrained him from bursting out at the top of his voice with the words—

"Virtue and gladness kindle each other."

At the last verse, however, he was no longer able to withstand the temptation. All respect for the fine art was swallowed up in the vivid feeling of actuality, and at the words—

"After an evening—" the Baroness pinched the arm of her husband in vain; he only screamed the louder—

"Calmly expended:"

she therefore took her part, and also began to accompany the singing. The Colonel let his deep but good voice resound, and the whole company sang in chorus:

"Cordially ended,
Slumber we softly, and waken refreshed"

How delighted, and how heartily after this all shook hands at parting, need scarcely be remarked. But we must say a word regarding the parting of Nina from Hervey's mother, since this consisted in a wordless scene, which is better than words calculated to bring people closer to each other. We have already remarked that the old lady attached but little value to purely external advantages: toward beauty, however, especially when this was the expression of a lovely soul, she felt herself weak; and Nina's appearance, manner, and singing, had this evening made upon her the most vivid impression. When, therefore, Nina approached her to take leave, the old lady gently put her arm around her slender waist, led her nearer to the window, and regarded her with the deepest interest. Nina blushed; and as the old lady with a serious and almost motherly expression kissed her forehead, Nina was seized with a feeling of wonderful veneration. The lovely and high-born daughter of the President hastily stooped, and touched with her lips the hand of the aged dame.

It was homage which youth paid to age—ay, perhaps, which Nina paid to the mother of Hervey; and so rapidly passed this little scene, that no one but Hervey observed it. A lightning flash glowed in his dark eyes—then a dark cloud passed over them. He remained standing with a shawl of the Baroness in his hand, and forgot that he waited for him to put it upon her shoulders till she turned and jocosely said to him, "Will the Pastor wrap himself in the shawl? if so, it is very much at his service. Only in that case I must petition for a great-coat." Hervey smiled, and gave her the shawl, yet he was still and thoughtful as he accompanied his guests out.

The evening was uncommonly fine, and the Countess proposed to make her return home partly on foot. The plan met with universal approval. Hervey accompanied the party, without, as it seemed, being properly with it. The carriages came on slowly behind. The Baroness H. sought to awake the slumbering jealousy of her husband, by making him observant of Hervey's changed mood, and assuring him at the same time that this change had taken place at the moment in which he had taken her shawl in his hand.

Baron H. promised to warn him solemnly against so unfortunate a passion, and if this did not avail, to assure him that he must expect to be called out.

Nina was as silent and thoughtful as Hervey. Captain S. had given her his arm, and endeavored to engage her attention.

The company passed a little neat house, gay with flowers. "Who lives here?" inquired the Baroness.

"A canting old crackbrain of a woman," was the Countess's answer. At the same moment the inhabitant of the house appeared at the door, an ugly, strange-looking, nodding, and grinning figure.

The party greeted her and passed on.

"This woman," said the Countess, "bored me lately with an intolerable morning visit; yet she occasioned me some good thoughts. She talked with a most absurd enthusiasm of her religion, 'and of her reliance on the grace of God, without which man is nothing.' She described with the highest rapture her happiness, which consisted chiefly in this, that she had a room, and six shillings* for her daily support. She farther detailed to me the kind presents which she sometimes received from her benefactors, as well as a friendly invitation from one or other of them to their tables, and the like. She concluded with declaring herself to be 'the happiest of mortals.'

"When she had left me I could not prevent myself feeling a certain degree of compassion for this 'happiest of mortals,' and would rather endure actual misery than feel myself happy in this fashion. Never was so clear to me as in this moment, that that which the good man seeks in life is not happiness, so far as we understand by that the enjoyment of the convenient and the agreeable. The happiness which a noble soul strives after is perfection; is the development of its nobler existence; is goodness, is God.† This happiness does not exclude suffering. Pain and pleasure are the wings of the soul, on which it soars toward its ennoblement. Earthly enjoyments are for such a soul nothing; and, compared with its life, the happiness of Mrs. L. is a pure abomination."

Hervey here awoke out of his reverie; for he could not bear an injustice, let the being he ever so insignificant toward which it was shown.

"I think," said he softly, "that you are a little too severe upon her. A happiness so innocent as hers, and which, as you admit, is grounded on the fear of God, deserves in truth no contempt. Her contentment with the enjoyments of so humble a lot they only can comprehend who during the greater part of life have had to contend with want and necessity. And is it not indeed probably the will of the Almighty that we should feel ourselves even here on earth happy and at home? Yes, how is it possible that we can feel ourselves otherwise, if we in all cases follow his commands, by which we become reconciled to the heavenly and the earthly life, and are filled with peace and joy! If in that solitary room in which yonder poor woman dwells, a friendly sunbeam or a cup of coffee make a festival, her joy is not the less genuine and lively than that of those who drink the noxious juice of the grape, or weep voluptuous tears on a beloved bosom. The best and wisest of earth have not despised these enjoyments. Have I preached too long?" asked Hervey, with a smile: "if so, pardon me."

"The sermon was good," said the Baroness H., "and I for my part shall certainly bear it in mind, especially when I see Mrs. L. again. Yet, dear Pastor, permit me to make a better acquaintance with the humble-minded people you speak of. I tell you plainly that such a species of moderation is to me intolerable."

In a friendly manner Hervey gave to the Baroness, and even to her husband, various admonitions against this intolerance. The Baroness contended warmly for her opinion; she would not give up the smallest jot of it—nay, she would even renounce heaven itself if the angels were so tediously discreet.

Hervey laughed, and begged her on this head to be at rest. "The fine, sweet sportiveness," said he, "which graces the lips with so agreeable a smile, and gentle satire, are certainly nowhere so much in place as on the lips of angels."

"I am glad of that, Pastor, and I find it most sensible," said the Baroness, without being conscious that she at the same time smiled as sweetly as any child of heaven possibly could. Clara took the hand of her friend, and said smiling, "Have you always been so desperate against the wearisome?"

"Always!" answered the Baroness positively "except that once indeed I was short-sighted, and was mistaken in a certain person. Abominable girl! you know that I amuse myself with no one so well as with you—"

Baron H. coughed expressively.

"And with Gustav," continued the Baroness, as she reached cordially her hand to her husband.

The Baroness was now tired; the company paused till the carriages came up. Hervey assisted the ladies into them, and took leave.

"To feel oneself happy—to feel oneself already at home here on the earth," thought Nina—"O how divine must that be!"

Rapidly rolled the carriages onward; rapidly sped Nina over the pleasant and wild landscape. It seemed to her as if her life would roll on as rapidly—as if she never should feel herself at home on the earth.

Philip S. stooped and plucked a little flower, which had slowly raised itself again from the pressure of Nina's foot. He kissed it, and concealed it in his bosom.

The two friends now went back, and in order the sooner to reach home struck across the meadows by a footpath. Philip talked with Hervey of his future plans; of the journey to Stockholm, which was now before him, in order to take possession of the rich inheritance fallen to him from an uncle. The sound of a carriage interrupted the conversation of the friends, and occasioned them to turn their gaze toward the highway, where the traveller was driving briskly on in his caleche. The traveller seemed to be equally observant of the pedestrians. He stopped, sprang from the carriage, and hastened to meet the friends at the stile.

"Ah!" said Philip animatedly, "it is my friend Löfvenheim, the new proprietor in this country. He has promised to spend some days with me. Come, Edward, I must make you acquainted with one another."

Edward had in the mean time fixed his eyes

* Swedish; i. e. so many farthings English.

† My young fair reader! Dost thou wonder to hear the Countess talking in this strain? Such wonders wilt thou stumble upon in the world.

hoosily on the stranger, and said hastily, "Not now; another time. Good night!"

With these words he drew his arm out of Philip's, bowed, and departed. Philip, somewhat amazed at this unwonted unfriendliness, advanced toward his friend, and bade him heartily welcome. Scarcely were the first salutations exchanged, when the latter asked, "Who was the man that just now left you, and left you so suddenly? His gait, and a certain movement of his head, remind me vividly of one with whom formerly I was very well acquainted."

Philip named Edward Hervey, and proceeded as he always did, when the conversation turned on his friend, to speak of him in the most encomiastic terms. Löfvenheim listened in silence, and then said, "I was mistaken, then. I shall be glad to be better acquainted with him."

At the same instant was heard a wild cry of a child, and immediately thereupon the words, "Help! help! Save the boy! Ah! the mill-wheel! He goes under the mill-wheel!"

"That comes from the waterfall," said Philip; "a child has certainly fallen in!" Both of them ran to the waterfall. The voices of women exclaimed aloud, "Ah! he will be crushed! God help him!"

The friends arrived at the waterfall just as Hervey, battling with the flood at the danger of his life, seized a little boy who was in the very act of passing under the mill-wheel. Two minutes afterward he stood again on the shore dripping and panting, but happy. An oldish, little, meagre man stood before him. The man was beside himself with distraction and joy, and was scarcely able to articulate the words, "My child! my child!"

Hervey took the yet lifeless child on his knee, and rubbed his breast and stomach with his hand, while he watched attentively his death-like countenance. During his humane occupation Hervey himself was exposed, without knowing it, to a most keen examination. Löfvenheim, whose disposition and look were distinguished by a peculiar coldness, riveted incessantly his dark gray eyes upon him. Hervey, before he sprang into the water, had pulled off his coat. His breast was bare, and a scar showed itself upon it. Löfvenheim's gaze fell from his countenance to his breast, and riveted itself on the scar. "It is he! Yes, it is he!" said he half aloud.

In the mean time Hervey had succeeded in restoring the boy to consciousness. A stream of water poured from his mouth, his bosom heaved violently, and he opened a pair of large blue eyes. With some directions for the further treatment of the boy, he delivered him to his father. The man now turned his eyes from the child to his savior; suddenly he seemed no longer to understand what he said to him, and the thanks died on his lips. His gaze became fixed; a paleness more deathlike than before spread itself over his haggard countenance, and his mouth was distorted with convulsive twitchings.

Hervey was now called to bestow some attention on his friend Philip, who embraced him with tears in his eyes. "God be praised!" said he, "you have saved, and are saved. Permit me, Edward, to introduce you to my friend Carl Löfvenheim. He wishes to make your acquaintance."

"I am rejoiced, Sir Pastor," said Löfvenheim, bowing with a cold glance and tone, "to have been witness of your heroic deed."

"I only did what you would in my place have done," replied Hervey, in a soft and friendly manner, returning the bow and quietly drawing on his coat.

"But you must dine with me to-morrow, Edward," said Philip kindly.

"I thank you," was his answer, "to-morrow I cannot. An important business—another time—good night!"

He gave Philip the hand, greeted Löfvenheim politely, and went. He looked round for the father of the child, but he had disappeared. The man with every sign of terror, and with the words "It is he! It is he!" and hastened away.

CHAPTER XXXI

PATE.

Love is eye the purest ere it be expressed,
And loveliest is the sorrow which wasteth unconfessed.
NICANDER.

THE wind on the sea, the air on the mountain, the sea-like sound in the wood, the fresh, fresh breath of nature, which expels care and refreshes life—I praise you! Who has not felt himself invigorated by you, who has not felt himself elevated—when he has returned from the house of mourning, from the impure atmosphere of society, and from the exhaustion of business! Wonderful, powerful, care-free life in the air, in the water, and in the earth! Mighty Nature, how I love thee, and how gladly would I lead all hearts to thee! In hostility to thee, life is a burthen; in peace with thee, we have a presentiment of the repose of Paradise. Thy storms sound through the immortal harps of Ossian and Byron; in the songs of the sea-heroes—in the romances of the north, breathes thy life. The feeling heart owes to thee its best and freest sentiments. To her also who pens these lines hast thou given new life. Her soul was sick to death, and she cast herself on thy bosom. Thou didst raise her up again; she received power to lift herself up to God.

The tempest rolled its thunders over one of the wildest regions of the north. Its dark cloud-chariot careered over the pinnacles of the rocks and the abyss of the valleys. Two wanderers were seen hastening with rapid steps over the wild country. One of them was a man in his full vigor; and he was beautiful through the fresh life, and the union of gentleness and strength which strikingly displayed themselves in his countenance and his whole appearance. It seemed to give him delight to stride through the desolate country during the tempest, and to give his dark, rich locks to be tossed by the furious winds. A smile parted the well-formed lips, and his eyes glanced clearly around him. The other walked gloomily, and full of thought, by his side. The electric atmosphere seemed to oppress him; his young, blond head hung down as if it were overwhelmed with thought.

"So gloomy, Philip!" said Edward to his friend.

"So gay, Edward?" answered he.

"Yes," replied Hervey, "I am cheerful; that can I not deny. I am glad that I have been able to quell the tumult of the peasantry without force being requisite. And farther, I have cause to be cheerful, since I find myself on a long ramble. What enjoyment and vigor of life lies there not in the free air! It is the finest cordial for man. These gloomy thunder-clouds have, moreover, for me an especial charm. Do not Ossian's ghosts hover upon them! Was it not on such a wild heath where Fingal sung, and gathered the shades of fallen heroes around him!"

"You are poetical, Edward. Over me hover melancholy images. The gloomy region reminds me of the wilderness of life. How well may the human bosom be compared to yon rocky surface, when love and faith forsake it, and leave it lying desolate. Storms are the judgments of God against sinners, or the thunderbolts of fate on the head of the innocent. Happy are they who feel neither remorse nor dread."

Edward was silent. His cheerful look grew dark.

Soon after Philip said, "We have not much farther to go; I see already our hills, the hills near Umenäs." He sighed, and added, "My journey to Stockholm is fixed for to-morrow morning very early. I shall probably continue there a year at the least. I must this evening take leave of you."

"So soon?" said Edward, unpleasantly surprised; and then added, with great cordiality, "Philip, how much shall I miss you!"

"Edward, you know it, I am rich. I have friends and relatives of great influence. Tell me, is there any way in which I can serve you?"

These words were pronounced with a certain coldness, and with the same coldness Edward answered: "I thank you; I need nothing which I cannot myself acquire."

"In a higher post, with your great talents, you could more benefit your native land, would be able to gratify a laudable ambition."

"I am contented here," said Edward, abruptly. "I only wish to be able to fulfil all the duties which my present office lay upon me."

"But you lead here, in fact, a most monotonous life, and your present field of exercise is very confined. You are so richly endowed by nature—you are so beloved by all men, and might so easily live better, might have more varied interests—"

"Love, labor, religion—these are life, liberty, and joy; these are happiness," answered Edward, with warmth. "And who can say, who only fulfils his duties as a man, that his field of action is confined! The effect and the extension of every pure action are incalculable."

"But, spite of this, there are higher and lower positions, narrower and ampler circles, in the state," added Philip, impatiently. "What would a Canning or an Oxenstierna have effected had the one remained a simple advocate, and the other continued living idly on his estate! Edward, you ought not wholly to close your heart against a noble ambition."

"No, Philip, no! I also have dreamed. I too—I too have wished. There was a time . . . but let us drop this subject," said he, excitedly; and then more calmly added, "the hand of Providence leads us better than our own rash desires. It has on this spot pointed out my place, and here will I remain."

Hervey's determined tone seemed to cut off all farther attempts of this sort. The friends were for a moment silent, and then Philip said, "Then I really can do nothing for you!"

"Yes, you can possibly do something for me!" said Hervey, stepping up to Philip, and putting his arm around him. "You probably can! Give me my friend again; give me the open, cheerful, cordial Philip back again. For some time past I have known him no longer; and since last evening, all your offers of protection and the cold tone . . . in fact, Philip, they have made me shudder. What is come to you, Philip, my friend? Have we ceased to understand each other?"

"Edward," said Philip, with an expression of the greatest pain, "I acknowledge it; for some days I have been miserable."

"Philip, I am your friend, and you have kept this from me!"

"I will do so no longer, Edward. I feel that it would be impossible for me to part from you without saying all to you, and without hearing what you have to say. Edward," added he, in a tone bordering on emotion, "you know that I have loved you!"

Hervey gazed at him inquiringly, and with earnest attention.

"Yes," continued Philip, in the highest excitement, "I have loved you with my whole heart and my whole strength, for I have never known a more excellent, a more amiable . . . let me proceed, Edward! Yes, I have believed in you as in God. I was a wild youth, and took pleasure in an agitated life; you acquired power over me, I became attached to you, and learned from you the strong and peaceful virtues which constitute the happiness of human society. My faith in you has for years been my conscience, and the power which bridled me. I was happy in this faith; I would have followed you to the death—would have died for you with joy. Edward! Edward! it is a perilous thing when a beloved image in the heart of man is destroyed, since with it the best of his life is annihilated."

Philip covered his face with both hands, and seated himself on the trunk of a fallen tree. Hervey continued standing before him, regarding his friend with uneasiness and deep sympathy. After a pause, Philip continued:

"For some days all seems changed in me and around me. It seems to me as if the world staggered, as if the earth heaved beneath my feet. What, however, really staggers, Edward, is my faith in you."

Philip cast his eyes on the ground—an inexpressible agony gnawed at his heart. Edward was pale. He seated himself on a mossy stone opposite to Philip, and gazed at his friend with a penetrating, steady glance.

"Well!" said he after a pause, as Philip, sunk in bitter feeling, was silent.

"Well, Edward! there is come a man to me who says he knows you—who has dared to say of you that you bear an assumed name, and what is still more, an assumed character! A man who charges you with concealing under a mask of virtue a heart filled with vice—a man who dares to assert that in your youth you have perpetrated the lowest and the grossest crimes!"

"Philip," said Edward with painful seriousness, ness, "all this you have kept from me; you have, therefore, believed it."

"Not believed, Edward! No, by God, so miserable I was not; then you would not have seen me here. But an agonizing doubt has taken root in my soul. Edward, if my peace and my better life be dear to you, tear this doubt out of my bosom. Speak to me—open your heart to me—tell me that you are innocent—convince me that your walk is as pure as your glance. Give me the right, with the sword in my hand, as I have threatened, to compel the liar to take back his words. Edward, my friend, you can—you will do it!"

But Edward's clear gaze had sunk to the earth. An expression of the deepest pain drew together his brows, while his pale lips slowly and distinctly said—"Philip. I cannot do it!"

The young S. saw his heaven fall in. Paler than Edward, he exclaimed vehemently—"You cannot! You are then a criminal!"

With his look fixed on the earth, and his arms crossed, Edward said as to himself—"It was a fond dream which permitted me to imagine that I could be believed for my own sake; that my present conduct would condemn those phantom-lies. It was a lovely dream which whispered to me that I had a friend who really knew me; whom rumor and no mistrust could alienate from me; who would believe me rather than the accusations of a stranger. Yes, but it was only a dream, it is past!"

"Edward, was your earlier, your real name D—?"

"Yes!" answered Edward, with a firm voice.

"Were you the tutor of the youngest son of Count R., and the friend of the elder one?"

"Yes!"

"Edward—did you carry off the daughter of this house?"

"Yes, that did I."

"Edward—you are a criminal!"

"No!"

"In the name of heaven prove it—justify yourself."

Hervey fixed on his friend a long reproachful look. "I have denied the crime," said he, "not without pride; and you have known me six years—that should be enough for you."

"Have you nothing farther to say to me?"

"No!" answered Edward, coldly.

"Edward! is that your last word?"

Edward was silent.

"Edward, farewell! I believe in no man more!" Philip stood up, and turned to depart.

"Philip!" said Edward softly.

Philip turned and looked at his friend. Edward arose and extended his arms toward him. With burning tears he flung himself, as for the first parting embrace, on the bosom of his friend. He sought then to withdraw, but Edward held him fast to his bosom, while he said—"Delay a little! I was too warm; you were hasty. Delay yet a little—we must not part thus!"

"Edward!" said Philip in the highest emotion, "kill me, but give me back my faith in you!"

"I have but little to say," replied Hervey, with a sorrowful seriousness. "I cannot demonstrate my innocence. A mysterious darkness envelopes my existence. My history is simple and—incomprehensible. I will tell it you willingly. Once have I related it, and then—I was not believed, and he who has been my friend became my foe. If you have given no faith to my word and to my heart, Philip, why should you confide more in the relation of inexplicable events!"

"Edward, speak! Give me explanation; my heart tells me that all doubts will vanish; that I shall see light in this darkness, and again love you—again confide in you."

Edward was silent a moment, as though he would collect his thoughts. His eye had in the mean time fixed itself on a thunder cloud, which had drawn itself together into thick masses, and built up as it were a gate of honor, through which the kingly sun blazed forth clear and gloriously. This picture gave a striking image of the eye of the Omnipotent. The solemnity of Hervey's brow shone deeper and deeper; a beautiful gentle smile opened his lips, and as he pointed to the horizon, he said to Philip—"Do you see those clouds yonder, which but now rolled thundering over our heads? They have now divided themselves; they are illuminated by the sun, and the evening of this stormy day is beautiful and clear. This is the image of a faith which has accompanied me through life, and has irradiated my gloomiest hours. I believe in a clear evening sun, Philip; in a light which will scatter the clouds; in a rest after the tempests of the day. The most mysterious events of life have occurred to me. I have been condemned to dishonor and death by the hand of the executioner; and yon sun, yon last glorification of life, has pierced through the dark scene. This lives perpetually in my soul. Be the storms of the world's history, the dreams of human life, gloomy, tempestuous, strange as they may, there follows yet constantly a calm and splendid evening. In this I firmly believe, since it is the faith in the Great Master who, in His bosom overflowing with love, guides the development and completion of the drama, and whose hand conducts all with power and wisdom. Grateful scene!" continued Hervey, as his eyes, with beaming earnestness, hung on the glorious setting sun—"fade never from my soul! Let my earthly life be covered with shadow, so that thy serene splendor do but beam within me."

Hervey was silent for a moment sunk in thought, and then began—

"I was still very young, and had but just completed my studies, when I entered the court of Count R. The friendship of his eldest son, the Count Ludwig, drew me thither. He fancied that I might effect some good in it. In the presumption which is seldom wanting in our earlier years, I believed so too. It was a gloomy house: stormy, dark passions had long raged in it; its exterior was a true image of its interior. Dusky and dilapidated lay the old castle on the highest mountain peak of Shonen; the billows of the Sound played round the feet of its walls. I found a son, who in the bloom of his years was become nearly idiotic through terror and apprehension, the consequences of the severe treatment of his father. The mother was recently dead; the daughter, of fourteen years of age yet a child, still showing in her heart already the iron will of her father. Like a young oak, she battled against the storm, and the oppress-sions to which she was exposed seemed only the more to steel her spirit to resistance. She was a beautiful, wild, but warm-hearted child. Although still so young, she was by her father's wish already promised to a rich, old, worn-out man, who in no respect was deserving of this fresh rose-bud. She allowed herself to be betrothed, since as a thoughtless child, she saw nothing in marriage but a fine wedding, and also because she wished by any means to get out of her father's house. It is indeed a terrible sight, that of a man who has so completely smothered everything divine in his nature that nothing remains but a horrible egotism. To such an one nothing is sacred; to accomplish his will, and to satisfy his humor, he hesitates at none, no, not the most criminal means, and finds a pleasure in making himself a tormentor—such a man was the father of Count Ludwig. I speedily abhorred him, yet I continued in his house in order to protect his child. Elfrida was demanded in marriage, and the marriage day was fixed, when a vehement repugnance, and with it an invincible resistance, awoke in the heart of the young maiden.

"'I will not!' was her only answer to the representations and commands of her father. She refused bluntly to marry Baron N. 'You may murder me,' said she, 'but never compel me to become his wife.'

"Now followed dreadful scenes. One day I saw Elfrida dragged by the hair by her merciless father, and on this occasion I opposed force to force; I menaced him, and rescued the bleeding child out of his hand. Count Ludwig was on travel in a foreign land. The terrified, half-childish Emil implored his sister for God's sake to submit.

"I stood alone on the side of this courageous child, and resolved at the risk of my own life to protect her. The hour of contest was not long delayed. Count R. in concert with his worthy future son-in-law, determined on a nocturnal, forced marriage; a clergyman was won over by bribery, and Elfrida was to be sacrificed. The evening before the preparation of this abominable scheme, the plan was discovered through Elfrida's nurse, who, drawn by the Count into the secret, was not able to support the pangs of conscience which assailed her. Elfrida came to me; related to me the whole, and conjured me with the agony of despair to save her. The danger was pressing, and the time short; if it were not to become too late, I must quickly decide. Count R. had a sister who was an abbess in a convent in Seeland. I resolved to conduct Elfrida to her, and to deliver the unhappy child into her keeping. But in order to avoid the forced marriage, it was necessary that she should that very evening be conveyed across the Sound. I communicated to her my plan; she threw herself on my protection. I wrote a letter to Count R., in which I announced to him in a few words what I proposed to do, without however naming the place to which I proposed to conduct Elfrida. I left the letter on my writing-desk, in the persuasion that, though our flight should be discovered immediately, they would not be able in the night to pursue after us.

"It was a dark tempestuous September evening, as, awaiting Elfrida, I stood in the boat which I procured, and which lay under the castle wall. At the appointed hour I saw her white dress appear between the trees and vanish again. In the haste and darkness she had missed her footing, and fell with a faint cry. I hastened to her, lifted her up and bore her to the strand. I had just reached this when some one seized me by the neck behind. I set down Elfrida in order to defend myself. She sprang resolutely into the boat. I flung my assailant—who sought with curses and reproaches to secure me—violently down, got clear of him, sprang after Elfrida, and pushed off from land. In the same instant there was a flash on the shore, a shot fell, and a wild cry and confused clamor of voices struck on our ear; speedily, however, all was overpowered by the howling of the storm and the roaring of the waves. It was a dreadful night. I intended, so soon as I should have placed Elfrida in security, to return to Count R., in order to vindicate myself and my mode of proceeding; and hardly as was the attempt to make the passage in the night time and during the storm, yet I dared it, and hoped in reliance on my youth and my exact knowledge of the track and the shores, to make a successful transit. Yet, through the pitchy darkness and the tempest, I lost my course. By a current which I was not able to stem, we were carried out to the open sea; I felt it, but struggled against it in vain. Elfrida, courageous as a hero, and composed in the stormy night, thanked heaven for her rescue. Never in my life shall I forget this night. All around me the waves in furious uproar—above me the heavens black with menacing clouds—the storm howling with terrible rage—at intervals lightnings, by whose glare the nocturnal scene only appeared more horrible—and before me, in white dress, that heroic maiden, the angel who only spoke the most affectionate words of comfort, of hope, and of thanks. I steered the whole night through, and yet reached no coast. I knew not where we were, and suffered on Elfrida's account the greatest anxiety. Toward daybreak the storm became terrible. A squall threw us against a rock, our boat went to pieces, and I considered myself happy that, swimming with Elfrida in my arms, I at length reached land.

"We were cast upon a small island far out at sea. Only in one direction, and at a great distance, discovered we land. It amounted to a miracle that our little boat had been able at all to bear us so far; soon it lay broken between the crags, and the planks were strewn on the waves around.

"We were now surrounded by the foaming, raging surf; swarming sea-birds circled about us; little pale yellow flowers sprang from between the cliffs, and waved in the wind. It is at this moment as if I had them before me, and saw how Elfrida plucked them.

"The island consisted of several ridges of rock, overgrown with slender pine-trees. A fallen and deserted fisherman's hut testified that men had once dwelt here.

"We found ourselves alone in the wide, boundless ocean; dangers of many kinds surrounded us; we suffered want of all things, and yet were we almost happy; for such is youth—so strong and living are the feelings of that time.

"Elfrida seemed suddenly to have from a child become a woman. She looked to me taller; her countenance, her manner, expressed an awakened soul, and I felt in this moment for her something which I had never felt before. We were alone—in the world—we two wholly alone—in short, I felt the enchanting poetry of love and death."

"You loved her, then?" asked Philip, with great sympathy.

"Yes! as a youth of twenty in such a situation, under such circumstances, loves. Yes, I loved her. I kindled a fire in the ruined hut; Elfrida adorned it with foliage and flowers. We partook some bread and wine, which I had providently brought with us. The sweetest joyousness inspired Elfrida. Thus had I never seen her. During the oppression in her father's house, her glad sentiments had been like rapidly withering passion-flowers. Suddenly transplanted into an element of love and freedom, she revived, and displayed the purest joy, which, however, for the moment assumed that wild coloring which was, in fact, peculiar to her character. The wild scenes which surrounded us elevated her animal spirits. Familiar with the wonders of nature as a fairy-child, she sprang along the cliffs, and allowed herself with delighted boldness to be wetted with the spray of the billows, and tossed by the winds. I was obliged by force to hold her back from these dangerous sports, and to compel her to seek protection under the trees and behind the rocks. And here that wild child suddenly changed herself into a fascinating Grace. She played with the flowers, and adorned with them him whom she loved: her lips spoke the most beautiful poetry, her countenance beamed with the sweetest smiles. Now an obedient child, now a wilful ruler, always amiable and fascinating, fiery and charming—she appeared to be one of those beings from the world of fable, half goddess half offspring of nature. While, however, I gazed on Elfrida; while, lost in her contemplation, I drained the cup of pure and super-human love which she reached me—she began gradually to change. The color of her cheeks became more vivid, her eyes acquired an unnatural lustre; the sweet harmonious speech became by degrees confused; and, as I took her hand in mine, I felt that her pulses were chased by a devouring fever."

"The storm abated. I had climbed a pine-tree, and had bound upon it my white handkerchief, but no vessel was to be seen either near or far off. The sea looked dreadful. So passed three days. Then my heart was seized with despair. Elfrida sat meek as a lamb under the mighty hand of weakness; and incessantly raged the fever, undermining and consuming her young life. She thirsted, and I had not a drop of water with which to moisten her parched lips. That was an agony! She complained not, but ever and anon spoke comfort to me, and looked with the glance of an angel up toward heaven. She lay and faded away—reckoning herself still happy, while her voice already expired. On the evening of the fifteenth day I held a corpse in my arms—had opened a vein in my breast, and my blood ran warm upon her scorched lips in vain. They never moved again."

Hervy was silent. Large tears ran down his cheeks. After a pause he proceeded. "She did not suffer much, and she died happy, since she died loving and saw that she was beloved—this was, this is my consolation."

"She was gone, and nature seemed to have exhausted her mad strength. Tempest and waves laid themselves to rest. I saw a boat approach; life beckoned to me, but it was at this moment abhorred by me. Yet, the thought of my mother, of Maria—the hope of being able to do away the black suspicion which must fall upon me, stimulated me to live. With Elfrida's corpse in my arms I allowed myself to be conducted toward the land in which I had hoped to find shelter for Elfrida. I was now received with the horror which is felt for a murderer, and I became aware of the accusations with which the world loaded me. Count R., wounded dreadfully, had fallen on the strand, from which I fled with Elfrida; a pistol shot had struck him. In the same night an important sum had been stolen from him, and on me fell the suspicion of these transactions."

"Count Ludwig was returned; no longer as a friend, but as a foe he stood before me. I told him what I have now told you, and—he did not believe me! He had from his youth a strong disposition to distrust in his character. He was unable to distinguish the language of truth from that of deceit. Yet I here excuse him; he had been deeply wounded, for he loved his sister tenderly; appearances were against me; the lips of the angel whom I would have saved were for ever closed, and the murderous attack upon his father I was unable to explain. With hate and abhorrence he turned away from me. Images of the scaffold and the executioner came before my eyes, and I was innocent! In the consciousness of this innocence, and prepared to assert it before the whole world, I called loud for inquiry."

"I allowed myself quietly to be conducted to prison. The courage of youth and the feeling of innocence made me calculate on nothing else than an honorable acquittal. My hope, however, was soon overcast. All circumstances told against me; no one could witness for me. In order to clear myself of the charge of having by force carried off Elfrida, I appealed to my letter to the Count R., and this letter was not to be found. The murderer had not been discovered. A secretary of the Count, a man whom I had scarcely before seen, came forward as my accuser, and by a mixture of truth and lies succeeded in painting in the blackest colors my relation to Count R. and his daughter, during my abode in the castle. The impossibility of justifying myself, if no fortunate chance came to my aid, appeared every day more clear."

"During this time many an abyss of life opened before my eyes; but many a peak also rose cloudlessly above the dark world. Hell came near to me, but heaven also. During my imprisonment, which only continued a few months, my character developed itself, and I became that which I now am. My philosophy, my views of human life, of history, and of the eternal order of the world, then fixed themselves. I became clear of my soul, and looked calmly upon death. Of the time of my confinement I retain scarcely any but agreeable recollections. Yes, since I was become strong and tranquil in myself, the sharpest weapon which the world had for me blunted its point against my heart—thanks to thee, Divine Grace! for it. Did I not suffer for the sake of that glorified angel, of that heroic child, who departed in my arms!—Often in the long evenings and solitary nights her image stood before me. I saw that wild excited sea—I saw that white, delicate figure swimming on the waves—saw her grow pale and slowly die. Elfrida—sweet, lovely child! oft has thy image for some moments paralyzed my busy life and active strength—oft has it in the most joyous hours, and amid the most cheerful associations, cast a shade of sadness over me.

"The moment drew near in which the public hearing of my case should take place. I prepared myself for it. I would be my own defender. I resolved to make the most determined exertions to vindicate myself. Should this not succeed, I felt that I should be perfectly deranged. The respect or the contempt of men loses much of its influence from the moment in which we see that they depend more on appearances than on actuality, and that their glance cannot penetrate to the real origin of the matter. Then, however, arises with double power the conviction that a loftier eye watches over us, and earthly bonds loosen themselves, while heavenly ones knit themselves faster.

"Yet I was bound by many ties to the earth. My mother and Maria were come to me, and partook my imprisonment. They had never doubted of my innocence. They cheered my soul, and the thought of leaving them was bitter. Count Ludwig I never saw during my confinement; but two of my judges visited me frequently. It is my greatest consolation to know that these excellent men also held me to be innocent, and that I had won their hearts.

"The day of the first hearing came ever nearer. In the night before this the doors of my prison suddenly opened themselves, and it was said to me that I was at liberty—to fly! I refused in this manner to acknowledge myself guilty. Then some one announced to me that the result of my trial would be, without question, that of death, or of a life-long incarceration; but that men who held me to be innocent had made way for my flight, and that it was their purpose to advance my future in a foreign country. My mother and sister implored me not to let this opportunity escape. I reflected with myself. My respect for public opinion had already received a severe shock. The idea of a perpetual imprisonment was intolerable to me. Here stood my mother and sister, whom my death on the scaffold would not only dishonor, but plunge into misery and poverty. Whom and what could my flight prejudice? I was offered life and liberty, and both presented themselves in lovely colors before my soul. The world is large, thought I; it will certainly afford a place for me and mine, where hate and calumny cannot reach us. I am in the hand of God, and shall be able to earn my bread.

"I followed the counsel which was given me. I fled with my mother and sister. Unlooked-for aid was given me, and made my flight to England possible. I went thence to India, where I found labor and bread. A written vindication, which soon after my flight from Sweden I caused to appear, gave a bias to opinion in my favor. The belief in my innocence began by degrees to take root. The tempest which had raised itself against me gradually subsided. A year passed. New events and new crimes took the attention of the public. I and my affair were finally forgotten. Count R. recovered from his wound, but died soon after through a fall from his horse. My poor Emil had departed thither where no hard word could again reach him, and where the mild voices of angels would recall his bewildered soul to a clear consciousness.

"In the mean time my life in India took an unexpected turn. I was happy enough to rescue an old man out of the hands of robbers. From that hour he treated me as a son, and bequeathed to me his not insignificant property; on the single condition, however, that I took his family name, Hervey. I was attached to the old and amiable man. His will injured no one in his rights, for he stood alone in life, and had himself acquired his property; and I therefore did not decline his kindness; but before I accepted it, I made him acquainted with my history. The old man believed me; he, the stranger, did what the friend of my youth had not done—he believed my word. He became my father, and I his son. My mother and Maria cherished his old age; me, an unconquerable desire to travel seized upon, to see the world, and to dissipate my thoughts. I traversed as a missionary many parts of Asia; I penetrated even into China. The learning of the East opened rich wells for my soul; and not less profitable to me was the deeper knowledge of human nature, and the power of religion which I had acquired. It was a life full of labor, often full of peril, but also full of interest. After some years of this wandering life I returned to my family, in order to receive the last sigh of my benefactor.

"I wished now never again to separate from my mother and sister. I yearned after some quieter life, after some regular field of exertion. Certain scientific works had made my name known and respected, and in a charming country, and in a circle of beloved people, I might have lived on calmly; but a feeling, perhaps more irresistible than all others which move or consume the hearts of men on earth, seized upon me. I became home-sick; for the heart is always at length assailed by this longing, and dies if it be not appeased. Mighty, mysterious, wonderful feeling!—invincible power of attraction, who can describe thee, who can resist thee! The roots of the human heart rest in the soil of home; they draw thence their life. The joys and sorrows of childhood, the place where thou hast played, the wind which fanned thee, thy first steps into the world of knowledge, the first love—all bind us indissolubly to that spot.

"I had endured much in life, had contended with much in myself and in others,—and had conquered; yet to this feeling, which consumed me like a burning thirst, I succumbed. It is related of a Laplander, who had gone to the South, that spite of all the beauties of nature and the glories of art, he became affected with home-sickness, and desired nothing more than a little lump of snow to lay upon his head. I was like him. The wildness and wintriness of the North drew me with irresistible power toward it. My mother and sister concealed a similar longing: I would not disquiet them, nor expose them to the danger which threatened me in my native land; but I thereby fell away from body, and lost the vigor of my mind. Like the banished Foscari, I yearned after my native land, should I even, like him, appease this yearning at the price of life.

"I soon discovered that I alone did not consume. Maria, young and gay, lived only in the present; but my mother visibly declined, and seemed to have lost all relish for life. My tenderness, the skill of the ablest physicians, availed nothing; silent and melancholy, she hid her secret thoughts. One day as I entered her room I found her bathed in tears. I folded her in my arms, and conjured her to open her heart to me. Then said she softly and painfully, 'Sweden!' 'Sweden!' I exclaimed with indescribable tenderness. We mingled our tears, we pronounced this dear name, which for a long time we had banished from our conversation, probably a hundred times. O, it was a madness, it was an ecstasy. 'O my son!' said she, 'I must see Sweden again or die.'

"We will away, dear mother," I answered, suddenly resolved and calm; 'we will there live and die!' From this moment it seemed to me as if a great stone was rolled from my heart. I disposed of my little property. We set out and fortune favored us. We saw again our native land!"

Hervey paused. His eyes were filled with tears, and he stooped down and kissed the mossy crag. He then went on.

"I was extremely changed; as well by the flight of years as the sojourn beneath the hot sun of India. I was not recognized. I went, however, out of the way of my former acquaintances; yet I sought out one of my judges, who during my imprisonment had shown so active an interest on my behalf, and discovered myself to him. He was still the same. I found in him a friend and protector. From him I learned that there was now some prospect of my justification. People had conceived a suspicion against the same man, the secretary of the Count, who had appeared as my accuser. They desired that his person should be secured; but he had suddenly disappeared, and spite of all pursuit, had not been again discovered. I was promised that this pursuit should be prosecuted anew, and with redoubled zeal.

"I sought for myself a place of refuge far from the district in which I had passed my youth, and chose purposely this wild, solitary, and little-frequented region. My mother, who was born far in the north, was rejoiced again to breathe the air of her childhood. Maria felt herself happy in every place where we were happy.

"I purchased a little farm in this country, which attracted me exactly because there was yet much to do in it; by diligence and labor this desert was capable of being converted into arable and productive land. I gave myself out for an Englishman, and became under my assumed name a Swedish citizen.

"Circumstances, which it would lead me too far here to detail, caused me to undertake the office which I now fill. I was desirous of this kind of activity. I loved my fellow men; I knew that I had much of good to say to them, and felt that I possessed the gift of impressing my instructions upon them. I felt an active drawing to do the state which had repelled me some benefit. I wished through my present life to give evidence of the blamelessness of my past one, in case those charges should be afresh brought forward; and resolved in my last hours to assemble my flock around me, and say, 'I am Edward D.; judge, friends, ye who know me, whether I be a malefactor!'

"I had raised myself above the judgment of the multitude, because it was unjust—but I laid much value on their just recognition; moreover, the quiet laborer in the vineyard of the Lord in this remote corner of the realm could not be very much heard of. Forgotten by the rest of the world, only in that circle active and known, my location appeared to me the most desirable so long as the mysteries which darkened my life were not fully explained. The inquiries from which I entertained the greatest hopes produced no result; the suspected person could not be discovered; I myself, however, lived in the mean time quite unmolested. I became even more secure, more hopeful, more happy. Often have I during the assemblings of the good men of my parish felt again the whole joyousness of my life revive in me—I have forgotten the past, and glanced void of care into the future. Years went by. I saw my mother grow young again, Maria bloom, and friends collect themselves around us. That meeting with Löfvenheim disturbed me: I could have wished to have avoided it. He was Count Ludwig's friend, and his keen observant glance is sufficiently known to me. Nevertheless, I trusted to my altered exterior, and that because none of my former acquaintance had hitherto recognized me. Löfvenheim never was my friend; I have everything to fear from him. I shall as little escape him as the fate which seems to pursue me. I shall calmly await the threatening hour, and if it comes, fight out the fight."

"Edward—Edward!" exclaimed Philip, gloomily. "Thou art then innocent, and thou canst not justify thyself to the world! Thou art innocent, and art pursued with the blackest charges! What signifies then a Divine Providence?"

"Providence?" interposed Hervey with a mild seriousness; "his operations cannot be disturbed by the confusion of this world. In eternal clearness he watches over us, and sooner or later restores everything to eternal order. Paradoxes, violence, crimes and darkness, will be always found on earth, but after this world comes another—after the grave a resurrection! That is the solving of the riddle—the mystery of Providence; and he has already in fact revealed it to us. Has not the Holiest One bled on earth, and died between malefactors? Has He not risen again, and made the world subject to Him? Let those who walk in the dark, that path of the divine one, look on Him and not complain. Let them still praise God if the hand of the executioner binds their eyes, for Providence lives!"

"Edward, I have doubted of your innocence—can you forgive me?"

Edward extended him his hand. Philip pressed it vehemently to his heart, while he said:—"Edward, thanks—thanks for your goodness, for your confidence! What I feel for you will I show by my proceedings. From this hour I will never rest till you are justified. Fear not Løfvenheim; he will be silent—his honor as well as his own interest are guarantees for him. I have bound him by these. Løfvenheim requires my help. Edward, my heart tells me that I shall detect the culprit; you shall be cleared, and nothing shall prevent your happiness. You will win the loveliest and most amiable being on earth."

"What do you mean?" demanded Hervey in amazement.

"Edward, you must know all. I have not been able to see the union of beauty and heavenly goodness without loving and worshipping it. But I did not understand my feeling for Nina before I knew that she loved you!"

"Me! me!" cried Edward hastily, and almost with terror. "Me, unhappy one! that is not true—that is not possible!"

"I sought her one day," continued Philip—"I saw her sitting on the seat of turf—she believed herself alone. I approached, because I heard her speak; and the word which she pronounced, in a tone which the angels in heaven might envy her, was—Edward, your name!"

Hervey was excessively agitated. "No—no! that is impossible—impossible!" he exclaimed, while he covered his eyes with his hands, as if he had become blinded.

"She loves you, Edward! The sweet angel of heaven loves you, and you cannot do otherwise than return her love. You are worthy of her, and it will be easy for you to win her."

"To win her!" exclaimed Edward. Heaven and hell battled in his soul. He concealed his glowing countenance, and was silent, overpowered by his sensations. At length, with more apparent calmness, he said—"You have erred, Philip; I am firmly persuaded of it. Besides, the chance mention of my name indicates nothing at all. It would be ridiculous in me to build any hope whatever upon that. I entreat you, do not let us speak farther about it. Already the idea of having gained the smallest space in her heart awakens the most tantalizing sufferings in mine. Away with these entrancing, confusing thoughts. Tell me, Philip, has Løfvenheim expressed to any one besides you what he supposes to know of me?"

"No; and he will not. I have his promise. I can rely upon it. Besides, I shall again see him on my journey, and both by good and threatening words bind faster his tongue. Wo to him, if he loose it on this affair! You may be perfectly at rest, Edward."

The sun was gone down.

"Let us go home," said Edward, "it is late."

When they arrived at the place where the path to Philip's estate diverged, he stopped, and said softly—"Edward, I must here leave you. Tell me again that you forgive my unworthy doubt—that you will still call me your friend."

Edward opened his arms, and pressed him to his heart.

Deeply moved, Philip said—"In life and in death depend upon me. O that I could but purchase back these hours! Could I but teach you to forget my weakness—my doubt!"

"Philip," answered Edward warmly, "I know you. Believe me, if I need a friend, I shall come to you."

Yet another hearty shaking of hands, and the two friends separated. Hervey soon reached an elevation whence Umenäs was visible. The evening red burned on the windows of the castle. Involuntarily Hervey remained standing, and his eyes fixed themselves on Nina's windows. Bitter-sweet feelings filled his bosom; his heart burned with the warmest love toward her. He was vehemently agitated. Now he calmed his soul, and pronounced over her the tenderest blessings. "Peace be with thee, adored angel!" said he softly. "Peace and joy be with thee. May no disturbing, no poisonous breath, approach thy heart, thou beautiful, affectionate being! I can renounce even myself for thy sake. I have suffered without complaining; I can also love without betraying it. Divinely beautiful must it be to live by thy side for thee; oh! divine even for thee to die. Bitter is it to renounce thee. That is my lot, yet far from thee will I watch over thee. From this time I will seldom see thee. Silence, stormy heart, silence!"

CHAPTER XXXII.

PHANTASMAGORIA.

Shades on shades abounding,
Gather more and more;
Hark! Charon's pipe resounding,
The last delay is o'er.—BELLMAN.

One evening the neighbours assembled from far and near to Umenäs to one of those feasts where commonly nothing but the soul keeps fast. But against this chance the Countess was bent on providing—she would have a lively, agreeable, and gay company. The many formalities and great preparations are, said she, really almost always the causes that our parties are heavy and wearisome. If we would permit all to go on quite naturally, quite easily and simply, it would be far better. To this ease and nature she would now give the tone, and initiate her neighbors into this new mode of society. People should dance, but for the most part nothing but national dances, and to no other music than that of the pianoforte; that would bring life into society the Countess fancied. There should be but few lights, for the Countess had heard of dancing in a barn with only two tallow-candles, where it was far livelier than at any court festivity. The supper should be arranged in an easy fashion—no tedious, heavy sitting at table. For this purpose a sideboard should be set out; the company should eat standing, and the gentlemen wait on the ladies. The Countess hoped by this means to promote politeness in intercourse, and vivacity in conversation.

The Baroness H. laughed at all this lightness with heavy people, and warned the Countess of the evil issue of this attempt, especially however of that meagreness in her splendid saloon; but the Countess was quite enamoured of her idea of making herself popular. With a little secret mischievous pleasure the Baroness H. awaited the upshot of this party.

The guests arrived; they came one after the other so slowly, so heavily, so indifferent, and did nothing except fill the room and spoil the air. Nina sought with melancholy eyes the kind and affectionate glance which gave her life. She found it not, and all became gloomy to her. She had not seen Hervey for several days; she had expected him every evening, and he had not come. A disquiet, hitherto unknown to her, subdued her soul. She recollected his unusual solemnity during the last moments of the evening at Tärna, and she asked herself with anxiety what could be the cause of this change. O how did she long to know that he was again calm and happy!

The company danced; the floors shook, the windows became laden with perspiration. The sun had already gone down with unobserved glory. In the saloon it was dark and oppressive. "Now," thought the Baroness to herself, "begins the free and easy." She looked at the weary shapes, that with weary faces and without the slightest sign of pleasure moved hither and thither. The Countess and the Colonel, who hitherto had danced diligently together, became at length tired.

The Baroness, as it regarded the advancement of pleasure, would not remain idle, particularly as she had promised the Countess to undertake the conversation. She brought various subjects on the tapis among her lady neighbours; but beside apple-soufflé and plum-cakes she found nothing which would take with the good housewives, and therefore took her resolution, and began to talk of nothing besides potatoes and sucking-pigs, which, larded with some suitable anecdotes from Paradise of these interesting little animals, produced the best effect. But a still greater sensation did she make, as along with the Misses Y—— she joked with Doctor X—— of Umea.*

After Nina had danced several times, she begged pardon of her cavalier and left the dance, which at this moment indescribably oppressed her. She placed herself at the window, and observed the forms which sat around the hall. The dark, indifferent looks, the frequently peevish countenances, made an unpleasant impression upon her. She thought of him whose glances, whose words operated so auspiciously on all; on his rich heart, his fresh vigor, and the ascendancy of his spirit. Wonderful and powerful feelings sprung up in her bosom. "When shall I see him again? Shall I ever see him again?" These questions she involuntarily threw forth. She believed that it would do her good could she but catch a glimpse of the church-tower near which Hervey lived. She wiped a pane and gazed through; the evening twilight, however, already shrouded every object, and near and far all was dark. At once it seemed to Nina as if her life might thencefor-ward thus darken and become deep night; as if the recently past sweet life were nothing but a dream. She glanced at the dancing, heavy, shadow-like shapes—they sprang to and fro, repeating their movements incessantly; an unspeakable sensation of anxiety took possession of Nina. She longed to be forth from amid the leaping figures, forth out of the dark vapoury room; she longed for air—life! A dizziness and extreme faintness seized her; she passed resolutely before the dancers, and left the room.

Clara, who with much good-nature was labouring in the dance, sent after the fleeing Nina, whose mood she seemed to comprehend, a glance of tender sympathy, and kindly herself continued to forget her own peculiar feelings, and to devote herself to render others satisfied.

Nina threw a shawl over her head and shoulders, went with unsteady feet down the steps, and found herself speedily in the fresh air. Ah! it was beautiful without. Moonlight, starlight, and the ruddy flush of evening at once streamed over her. Pure as crystal the air voluptuously embraced her limbs. The silver veil of dew lay over the field and wood. All was still, full of repose, full of enjoyment; all so lovely, so paradisiacally beautiful.

Nina breathed deeply, breathed lightly, inhaled the fresh air, and looked up to the stars. New life streamed into her heart. The load which she had just now felt on her breast, was gone. "O my God, thy world is beautiful!" she whispered, and stretched forth her arms towards nature and life. Tears fell from her eyes—she wiped them away with her shawl. She thought of Hervey, and a vivid feeling of sad pleasure passed through her frame. Light as the roe she sprang down the footpath towards the valley, and here a dewy flower touched her dress, there she awoke a little bird out of its light slumber, which greeted her with an affectionate twitter. If one might compare the dancers in the hall with the shades of Erebus, Nina resembled a shade out of the Elysian fields, so white, so airy and light, so beautifully floated she away amid nature intoxicated with spring.

At Nina's Rest she paused. The tree had intercepted the dew-drops—the seat of turf was dry. Nina sat down. The rose-hedges stood in full bloom, and breathed forth the most delicious odours. A thousand insects hummed over them, while they intoxicated themselves from their chalice. The little spring murmured carelessly as a playful child—and reflecting all the lights of heaven, lay in majestic rest the infinite sea.

How oft had Nina here sat by Hervey's side, listened to his beautiful language, and felt glad and happy! She called back his look, his voice, and it seemed to her as if she perceived his melodious tones. There seemed to float harmonies through the air. At first Nina regarded this as the sport of her fancy, but as there rose a livelier breeze these tones became more plain to her listening ear. They appeared to proceed from amid the boughs of the tree under which she sat; and she speedily discovered that an Æolian harp was fastened in its top. Now she recollected to have said to Hervey one evening that she wished once to hear these to her yet unknown tones, and tears of gratitude gushed from her eyes. She thought on him, on his friendship, more delightful than the odour of roses or the tones of Æolian harps on the wind—more cheering than the freshness of the sea, than the light of heaven.

* The authoress has never been in Nordland. She holds it to be very possible that the ladies there are light as the olives, and interesting as Corinne; that the gentlemen are as perfect as Gradison. She does not describe things as they are there—she describes that only which she knows is everywhere met with.

Suddenly the image of Count Ludwig stood before her soul. A death-shudder cramped her heart—she turned her gaze away in horror. She fixed it again on Hervey, and all was beautiful and good as before. "Were he but my brother!" she sighed.

At this moment there seemed to fall a shadow on her bosom and her arms which were crossed upon it. She thought with grief on the shadow which darkened Hervey's life. She opened her arms and closed them again, as if she would seize the shadow, and said—"I will pluck thee from this life—I take thee prisoner—thou shalt no more trouble his days." The shape whose shadow Nina enfolded, bent back a bough of the rose fence, and Edward Hervey stood before her.

She sprang hastily up with a cry of joy. He stepped backward, and said—"Do I disturb you? Shall I withdraw?"

"Oh no, no!" answered Nina, while she slightly trembled, yet she gazed at him with confidence and a joy which filled his heart with purest delight. She knew not herself how it happened, but unconsciously he was at her side, and her arm rested in his as it had so often done before. They descended together to the sea-shore. He saw that her countenance was pale, and bore traces of suffering. He felt an intense desire to do her good, and his words were more cordial and tender than they had usually been. She listened to him with a smile of happiness. Oh, how happy were they in this hour—how did their hearts love one another!

They soon found themselves by the sea—they two alone in the infinite space. Silence reigned on the water, silence in the immeasurable vault above them. Silently also stood they; but their hearts beat loud. From the depths of the wood and the sea arose strange, soft, charming, and voluptuous vapours, like the fantastic forms with which the imagination once peopled them. In Hervey's soul reigned disquiet; but over the mind of Nina an affectionate repose had diffused itself, which she always experienced in the presence of Hervey. The scene which now developed itself to their gaze had always made a great impression upon her; even at this moment it weighed on her heart, but not painfully as before.

Softly and with a nearly tremulous voice, she said as she gazed up at the stars: "What an immensity! what power! It bows me down. Behold there millions of worlds above us; and behind these yet other millions, invisible to the naked eye! there, where our imaginations, our thoughts cannot reach; there, in the, to us, invisibility, they wander from one infinitude to another! Unfathomable creation! What is man before the Lord of Eternity! Does He see him! Can He observe us?" And Nina covered her dazzled eyes with her hands.

"Will you set bounds to His creation?" asked Hervey, "set bounds to His love, and His power to call forth his creatures, to elevate and make them happy! Ah! the infinitude of creation is to the heart and the understanding, the best ground of tranquillity."

"Of tranquillity!" asked Nina mildly.

"Tranquillity in God," continued Hervey with the deepest feeling. Here he paused, and then again went on. "All the worlds live for one another, and operate on each other, although in an invisible manner; silently work they all at the web of beauty and happiness, which the All-good from eternity to eternity has unfolded before all created beings. Great is the Creator, worthy of all adoration—yes! but even on this account, because he reveals himself also in the very smallest thing, and because the smallest feeling and thinking being is of as much value to him as the greatest of his heavenly bodies. The earth on which the Saviour walked he has overarched with her canopy of stars, that his children may behold that he is as mighty as he is full of love. Ah! glance freely and full of confidence up to heaven, for it is also created for thee!"

"I believe it—oh, I believe it!" said Nina while she again fixed her weeping eyes on the stars. "Edla has told me the same—yet it is sometimes difficult for me to bear this sight. There have been times when at the sight of the stars I must have fallen to the earth. Ah! long did all the objects which surround me make a most strange and melancholy impression upon me, and long did I appear to myself but as a wandering shadow. Often did I feel within me and around me an infinite void. Now it is better—much better! Life is lighter, clearer, since—" She paused.

"Since?" said Hervey, eager for the word which should follow.

"Since you have done me so much good!" said Nina with cordiality but with composure. "Since I have become acquainted with you, I am happier, better!"

"God is good!" said Hervey with deep emotion.

"Yes, infinitely beneficial have you been to me," continued Nina, carried away by the feeling which sometimes causes us to speak as if we were already free inhabitants of heaven. "Even in this hour, in which I stand here with you in the presence of Infinity, I feel that it does not affect me as usual. I feel myself stronger when you are with me. I have never had a brother, I believe it would have made me happy! Permit me to say it, I have often wished that you were my brother. I wish to be your sister, like Maria. Oft have I felt how calmly I should, then pass through life by your side, and fear nothing, before nothing tremble."*

He gazed at her with inexpressible love, and passionate feelings awoke in his bosom. She was by him, so beautiful, so sweet, so bewitching; he now believed in her love, and it seemed to him that she must become his. He burned with desire to press her to his heart as his wife; loving, protecting her, going with her hand in hand, heart to heart, from world to world. Ineffable felicity! Already he opened his arms involuntarily, already were his lips about to pronounce the sacred prayer for an everlasting union, when the consciousness of that which separated him from her seized him with a terrible pang—the recollection of the shadow which covered his past life. With an indescribable agony he turned himself away, and said only these words—"I would give my life to contribute to your happiness, if it could but promise happiness; but I am poor—condemned to renounce."

"You suffer," said Nina while she approached him—the expression of the deepest pain on her beautiful countenance; "You suffer, and are so good. Tell me, can nothing then be done? Say that it can, or say that you are not unhappy."

"That can I now not say! At this moment I feel all the bitterness of my misery. In my youth circumstances occurred which made my life wretched, and most so at this moment in which I feel that they separate me from you."

"And why from me?" asked Nina astonished, and with grief. "That may not be. Remain as before my friend, my fraternal friend. What can separate us?"

"Can you annihilate the past! Can the dead arise from the grave, and become witnesses of the truth? Can you tear out the tongues of the serpents of calumny, or forbid them to sting? No, no! No happiness is decreed for me. And yet—yet—" He was silent, overpowered by the vehemence of his feelings.

Nina understood him not; but painfully moved by his words, and by the desire to tranquillize him, she said, with feminine tact, "Perhaps I can do it. Who knows? Providence has armed many a feeble hand with wonderful power."

"Is there a hope? is there a possibility? Is there any prospect?" said Hervey to himself. "No; all is dark in the future. No, angel, thou canst not do it. I may not desire it. Never! never!"

In silence they walked on together. A radiant shooting-star spun its glittering thread from heaven to the dark earth below. This little circumstance, which Nina took for a good sign, threw her into an immoderate joyousness. "Away with doubts!" cried she. "Away with shadows from the land of shadows! They are the enemies of life. Has life no oracle now, as formerly, to determine the issues of mortal fate, and to give the solution to many a dark riddle? I will demand it, I will ask it in the silent night. I will ask it for us both. I, too, will for once glance into my future."

She sprang rapidly some step forward, took playfully a handful of stones, and turned herself gayly, with her shawl flung back, and with her heavenly countenance irradiated with the light of the stars, towards the sea. With a wonderful sweetness rung through the stillness of the night her pure silver tones, as slowly and with a comic seriousness she pronounced the following words: "Invisible Power! which givest us signs through stars, through animals, yea, sometimes through lifeless things—Mysterious Voice! which at times speakest when human wisdom is dumb—Spirit, Angel, or Demon, thou who whisperest what thou knowest of the everlasting decree—hear my prayer! Answer the question in our bosoms—give us a token of our future fate—tell us that which shall come—give us a sign of—"

Nina's voice became involuntarily more earnest, till at length she trembled before the boldness of her own words. She ceased suddenly, and flung the stones which she held in her hand into the sea. At this moment Hervey raised his arm to hold her back, but it was too late; he let it fall with the expression as if he would say, "Childishness!" The stones fell splashing into the water, and all again was silent. The stars burned tranquilly on, and no voice made itself heard in answer to Nina's queries. Yet suddenly there raised itself up from behind the rock called "The Black Man," a spectre, as out of the depths of the sea, which glided along like a human figure in a winding-sheet. Slowly it paced along the water directly toward the spot where Nina and Hervey stood. A cold breath was breathed from it. Hervey concealed the horror which this spectacle occasioned him. With arms crossed, he surveyed unchanged the strange shape, yet rather with a rigid than a tranquil gaze. Its effect on Nina was more startling. "O horrible! wo is me!" she exclaimed with suppressed voice, covering her face with both her hands.

"Believe me, said Hervey, "this apparition is not for you."

Nina did not hear him. "Ah! I know, I know what it portends," said she, trembling. "See! that is the darkness, the cold—the two foes of my life—who come again to seize me, and to chill my heart. You had banished them from my existence—I have again called them forth; yes, I shall again fall their prey. Oh, what an answer to my question!"

In the meantime, the spectre clad in the winding-sheet had changed its form, and presented itself now as a shape of mist. It led with it a whole host of indeterminate forms, which came forth constantly in denser crowds and with greater rapidity from behind the Black Man. In an instant the whole heaven was clouded, and the sea wrapped in gray fog. Hervey gazed with unaltered mien at the pale shadow-shapes, and then said, "So, only mist, only mist. Ah, childishness, childishness!"

"Say not so!" implored Nina, with anxious earnestness. "Ah, these mists, I fear me, are the most actual accompaniments of my life! And this shape—tell me—it reminds me—"

"Of what?" demanded Hervey, in wonder and disquiet, as he drew near to her.

"Of him—of that person with whom my fate is united—of him whom I do not and cannot love, and yet to whom I shall belong! Oh, that cold, terror-inspiring form!"

Hervey fixed a look of the most rigid horror upon her.

"I should have spoken of this sooner," continued Nina, trembling. "I would have done it—I was not in a condition. Ah! I would fain hide it from myself. But so it is; Edla's wish, my father's, and my own weakness, have decided my fate—I have given my word—"

Hervey seized her arm with a convulsive vehemence, while with a suppressed voice he exclaimed, "Nina betrothed! and now—now first do I hear of it!" and he cast at her a wild and stern glance.

This was the first time. His stern glance cut Nina to the heart; she was unable to restrain the exclamation, "Ah! you hurt me!" Hastily he let go her arm, and covered his eyes with his hand.

"Forgive me!" said he, confusedly; "I know not what I do."

"You have hurt me!" she exclaimed, with a mixture of painful and affectionate joy, as she showed him the mark on her arm, which he had vehemently pressed. She kissed it.

She knew not what she did—but young maiden do thou not likewise.

Hervey gazed at her while he battled with the wild storm which raged in his bosom. Suddenly he subdued it, threw an affectionate glance at her, and said with a voice whose expression it would be in vain to attempt to describe, "Farewell!" and disappeared rapidly in the darkness.

The mists surrounded Nina with their fantastic forms, and folded her in their cold arms. Was she more bodily than these? She scarcely knew. Her whole life—that which had just occurred—her whole being—all was to her dark, dim, and incomprehensible. She leaned against a rock; and while she gazed silently into the world of mist, she sighed forth softly Hervey's last words, without rightly understanding them.

Suddenly she heard herself called by name. She recognised Clara's voice, yet she acquired power to answer only when Clara had approached quite near to her. Clara devoted to her instantly the greatest tenderness and care. She wrapped her in a warmer shawl, troubled her with no questions, but received her as a sick child, and conducted her in silence back to the castle. Nina permitted her to do as she pleased—her strength was exhausted. "Lean on me; support yourself on me," said Clara, as she folded her arm round Nina's waist, and Nina reclined her head on Clara's shoulder.

"You do me good," said Nina, cordially. In fact there are beings whose quiet care, nay, whose very presence, immediately does one good.

CHAPTER XXIII.

SIDE-TABLES, AND SUCH LIKE.

Oh, more—Oh, more!—THE LOVER.

IN the castle, the company paused to rest themselves after an exhausting mazurka. The Baroness H. implored the Countess to shorten "the Pain," and to allow supper to be served. She also counselled her to crown the meal with some champagne. Although it was scarcely eleven o'clock, the Countess yet complied with the wish of the Baroness, and hoped that after supper things would grow more animated. The Baroness hoped so too. The Countess ordered the supper to be served. By degrees all the gentlemen disappeared from the saloon; the ladies sat still, in patient expectation of what should arrive. But for a long time there came nothing at all. The Countess became fidgety. Finally, she herself went out, in order to compel the gentlemen to attend the ladies with all sorts of dainties. But, O Jupiter! or, rather, O Saturn and Minotaur! what a scene presented itself to her eyes! The gentlemen were storming the side tables, and pullets, sandwiches, salads, and pastry vanished in a twinkling beneath their hands. Melancholy prospect for the ladies! In utter despair the Countess hurried to the Baroness, in order to find Baron H., whose office it should have been to acquaint the gentlemen, with good-humour and easy gallantry, with what she proposed to introduce, and with brave example to lead the way. He was not in the saloon. The sinner! where was he then! The Countess rushed nearly breathless into the Baroness's room, where she found the Baron anxiously and tenderly busied about his wife, who had exerted herself too much in the heat, and was taken unwell. The dreadful news which the Countess brought had the effect of throwing the invalid into such an immoderate paroxysm of laughter, that the Countess took it ill, and the Baron wavered betwixt the desire to join in the merriment and fear lest it should do his wife any mischief. Moved, however, by the trouble of the Countess, and almost put out of the room with force by his wife, he hastened to reduce to order what might yet possibly admit of such restoration. Baron H. said it was really no trifle thus suddenly and determinedly to assail the ancient custom of the side-table; yet he resolved to spare no labour to reduce the confusion which his delay had occasioned. He procured at the side-table, after some exertion of his to us well-known good lungs, a hearing, and made the gentlemen, in a lively manner, acquainted with the proposition of the Countess; but he very prudently restrained his laughter at the universal consternation which his harangue produced. Some of the gentlemen seemed quite disposed to protest against this measure as utterly unconstitutional; others took the affair on its amusing side. What was to be done! The question here was not simply of politeness, but of humanity; and although Eve did Adam an unlucky service in giving him the apple, yet one has never heard that he, on that account, compelled her to suffer hunger as a punishment. The gentlemen, therefore, resolved to procure something to eat for the ladies, cost what it would; and they began immediately to march out with whatever stood next to hand on the side-table. Baron H. placed himself, with a dish of untouched bread and butter, at the head of the procession; the Dike-Inspector P. followed with an assiette of citron-cream; Doctor X. had the salad, one had seized the chickens, another the sauce, and so on. So it went on, heaven knows how, but at all events not "lightly." The young Miss Y. got only salad; Madame R. must begin with a cream; Madame T. got nothing whatever of either—the Countess was on the verge of distraction. The ladies, who made their supper in a most chaotic medley—if they were so happy as to get any at all—were out of humour. The gentlemen themselves wanted to eat, and waited on the ladies with anything but "ease." The confusion increased every minute; jostling and unpleasantness, spilled sauce, broken glass, great disorder, and general discontent. But bang! puff, puff, bang! the champagne corks fly. The Baroness steps in with a foaming glass and gives the king's health. The spirits of the company revive again, and out of the deep gulf of the champagne they drink fresh courage. They joke, they laugh, they grow obliging; the music strikes up, and hey! again goes off the dance; and now con amore.

Pity that the dance is interrupted! No, not a pity! An interruption is piquant. Travelers arrive, and the company sees itself increased by a German, a Frenchman, and an English lord with his lady, who all together are on the way to Tornea, to see the midnight sun. They had letters of introduction to the Countess, who in her former travels abroad had made the acquaintance of the parents or relatives of the strangers. The Countess was delighted to receive them, and to refresh her youthful recollections. The rest of the company too were pleased, partly because two of the strangers immediately joined in the dance, and partly because they afforded them an extra spectacle, especially Lady Louisa, whose costume and manner could not be sufficiently noticed.

Although the national dance, which just then terminated, was found by the Frenchman to be "tout à fait piquante," by Lady Louisa "a very pretty dance," and by the German "herrlich;" yet the company passed on to English dances and waltzes, in which the inhabitants of the north were as much at home as the strangers; and to French ones, whose tours and evolutions the Frenchman unweariedly but in vain exerted himself to teach a heavy beauty from Pitea to execute.

Colonel Kugel only was unhappy. He was jealous of Lord Cummin, who, from the first moment of his arrival, devoted the most marked attention to the handsome hostess. He overwhelmed the elegant Lord therefore with all the bombs and grenades of his Westmanland regiment, which he launched at him, however, only from his dark flashing eyes. Lord Cummin found him "a very amusing fellow."

People were partly so much occupied with the dance, partly with the supper, and partly with the strangers, that the absence of Nina was not observed; and Clara announcing that she was not quite well, her return to the company was excused. The Countess had the pleasure of seeing her party terminate quite gayly, yet as soon as all were gone the Baroness said to her most earnestly:

"Dear Natalie, do me the favour never again to bring the heavy and light into contact. It is only to bring our lords into temptation. Everything has its time, says Solomon, and so good night."

Not that abortive "easy party," however, but wholly new plans disturbed the sleep of the Countess. She had very long desired during her banishment in the north once to witness the splendid midnight sun. She now resolved to join the strangers in their journey and accompany them to Tornea, and she would propose it to her relations whether they too would go or not. She announced her scheme at breakfast the morning after the "light party," as it came to be called ever afterward, and behold! it was received with general applause. Even the Baroness would see the midnight sun. The strangers, especially Lord Cummin, were highly delighted at this addition to their party. In two days it was fixed to set out. Colonel Kugel undertook all the economical cares of the journey, the procuration of horses, and the payment for them, and so on. The Countess and Baroness, who knew that Hervey was well acquainted with these northern regions, and had penetrated as far into them as it was possible for any one to do, were anxious to gain him for this journey, and to surrender to him its entire direction. They sent therefore a messenger to him, but he came back with the intelligence that Pastor Hervey was that morning gone from home, and no one knew when he would return. This was an unlucky chance, but the journey could not be delayed, and to the great chagrin of the Baroness they must resolve to make it without Hervey.

During the short interval before the setting out, the Countess was too much occupied, especially with her jealous Colonel, to notice Nina's unusual paleness and deep dejection, which caused her more to resemble a marble image than a living person. The Frenchman was struck with the highest admiration of her beauty, and her "immobilité." He discovered a wonderful likeness between her and the snow of the north. This he repeated perpetually; and as he learned from the mischievous Baroness that "statue de glace" was in Swedish "snögubbe," from this time forward he always called her "la belle snögubbe."*

Nina's altered tone did not escape the quick eye of the Baroness. She asked Clara what was the matter. "Tell me not, Clara," said she, "that it is a cold, a fever, or anything of that kind for which Natalie has put her on a reducing regimen, that mien and colour proceed from other causes than bodily suffering." But Clara was not able to give her friend any explanation. Perhaps she had a suspicion of what was going on in Nina's heart. She approached her with silent sympathy, making no inquiries and learning nothing, and only with a view of removing out of the way whatever might annoy or embarrass her.

Good Clara!

Nina was still, and drew herself back into her own gloomy world. At times she seemed to herself as if surrounded with burning gulfs; but she turned her gaze away from them and dreamed on. At times Edla's lofty form seemed to stand forward, and to extend toward her hand; but this image also vanished. Now it became cold as ice to her; the mists came as in the night in which she saw Hervey for the last time, and folded her in their damp arms; then burst in a beam of light, and Hervey's last glance wept before her soul; it became warm in her bosom, and she rested. Toward everything which was about her she was perfectly indifferent. Without will, and almost without a wish, she permitted herself to be guided by others; she did generally what they desired, yes, she even sang when they requested it. Yet all was lifeless, strange, and melancholy. Clara fancied that the journey would arouse her benumbed senses; she begged Nina to accompany them, and she consented.

The journey commenced in the most splendid weather, and the greater part of the company were in the very best humor. Lord and Lady Cummin were of opinion that the midnight-sun would put the climax to their reminiscences of the north. In Stockholm they had seen the royal family and the royal palace; in Upsala, the library, the cathedral, and the statue of Linneus; had cut a piece of bark out of the tree "which he himself had planted;" and had also surveyed from a distance "the hillocks of old Upsala." Now only remained for them "Laponia," and the "Midnight-sun;" and on their return to England, to cast a glance at Polheim's Sluices, and to admire the cascades of Trollhättan, and they should have had enough of Scandinavia. Lord Cummin had, indeed, a wish of his own, a warm and eager wish, to get a sight of a bear; and if it were the will of God, to shoot some of these animals. The Frenchman employed every moment in peering into the woods with his lorgnette, and then saying somewhat fearfully to Lord Cummin, "I fancy I see something gray yonder," or he exclaimed with vehemence, "Parbleu! there goes a she-bear, with at least half a dozen cubs after her;" or he said with a mysterious voice, "Hark! I hear a strange growling."

It required nothing more to set the Englishman in fire and flames; he would spring hastily out of the carriage, and call to his servants for his gun, etc., spite of Lady Louisa's incessantly shrugging her shoulders, and uttering one "My dear" after another.

The Frenchman, on his part, inquired continually after the originals of Victor Hugo's "Han d'Islande, Oglypiglap, Culbusulsum, Spiagudry," etc.: and was quite astonished to find the people also here pretty much the same as they are everywhere else, but especially without that pride of ancestry which Victor Hugo's heroes possess in so high a degree. The Col. Kugel answered only in some measure to the idea which he had formed to himself of a Nordlander, and as named him "Derstrombides;" but he was within a hair of involving himself in a duel with the Colonel, who did not at all understand this giving of names à la Victor Hugo.

The German, who proposed to publish a "Tour through Sweden and Norway," was enraptured with the people and the country, and found everything "herrlich! gross! erhaben! ausserordentlich!"

At Mattarhänge, in the parish of Tortula, not far from Tornea, the travellers had engaged rooms. From one of the hills there they had proposed to view the solemn spectacle. The whole inn was surrounded by tents. Numbers of Lapland families, half-wild hordes from Finnmark, stream at this season of mid-summer towards this country, in order to feast here three days by the light of the never-descending sun, to play, to dance, and to go to church. Here the Frenchman saw with rapture, not indeed the originals of Victor Hugo's tragedy, but wild, strange, original shapes, with little twinkling eyes and broad hairy breasts, the miserable children of want and wretchedness, whose state of culture and inward life no romance writer has truly represented; because, indeed, the romance built on the reality of this district would turn out tolerably meagre, and because love, this marrow of all romances, knows here no nobler, fairer aim, than that which Helvetius would vainly attribute to it. The spirit of the earth holds the people here in captivity, and smoke-like, they creep only in the sand and about the roots of the tree of life. Sometimes, however, in their clear winter nights, by the indescribable splendour of the snow and of the stars, when they fly forth in their snow-shoes to chase the bear and the reindeer, then awakens in their bosoms a higher life—then breathe they to pensive airs to deep and affectionate feelings in simple, beautiful love-songs.

In the mean time the German was in the third heaven at this sight, and its lively contrast with the civilized world. Lady Louisa found all this "rather curious," and noted it down in her journal.

The weather—strange enough—favoured all the undertakings of the travellers. The sky was clear, and a silent midnight saw all our travellers assembled in glad sunshine on one of the green hills. Slowly descended the sun; it extinguished one beam after another. All eyes followed it. Now it sank—lower—ever lower—lower; suddenly, however, it stood still, as if upheld by an invisible hand. Nature seemed, like them, to be in anxious suspense; not an insect moved its humming wing: all was silent: a death-like stillness reigned, while the sun, glowing red, threw a strange light over the earth. O wonderful Almighty power! It began now again slowly to ascend; it clothed itself again with beams, like a pure, glorified spirit; it became every moment more dazzling.

A breath! and Nature lives, and the birds sing again!

"Oh!" said Lord Cummin, locanically, and took out a gold snuff-box. Lady Louisa immediately sketched the sun, the country, and the groups on the hill, on one of the leaves of her album. The Frenchman protested repeatedly, that it was "tres imposant! tres majestueux!" The German, at some paces distant from the rest, was on his knees beneath a juniper-bush. The Countess Natalie enjoyed this sublime spectacle with eyes overflowing with tears and with real feeling. The Colonel stood there like the god Thor, and with his hands on his sides gazed into the sun as into a hostile battery. Baron H. had involuntarily and with pious seriousness folded his hands on the knob of his stick, on which he supported himself. Clara leaned on Nina whose arm rested within hers, and said softly to her, "See the sun does not go down! It ascends again! It will not be night; it only threatens us with it." Nina thanked her with a look, but answered not. The Baroness looked with an expression of heartfelt pleasure alternately at the sun, at her husband, and at the young lady.

As the sun ascends higher and higher and the warmth increased, the party returned to the inn, in order to enjoy some repose. The hordes of Finns and Laplanders were in the most active commotion on the field. They were cooking, dressing, and adorning themselves; their breasts and heads were covered with gold and silver ornaments. A little, strange old Laplander approached the company with the most singular gesticulations. To his peaked cap of reindeer-skin hung two tinkling bells, and his bosom and shoulders were by places loaded with tawdry and tasteless ornaments. His raven hair fell down in long masses. It was easily understood from his action that he was a fortune-teller, and was desirous to give to the strangers a specimen of his art. People offered themselves free ly; in tolerably bad rhymes, and in worse Swedish, he said to every one who extended to him a hand some commonplaces. The Baroness did not find it particularly sagacious, yet listened not unwillingly to his prophecy that she should have a son who should prove "a great man." The Countess could not refrain from blushing at what the old man said to her, though he spoke so low that no one except herself heard the prognostication. Suddenly the old man turned aside the hands that were stretched out to him, made his way through those standing around, and went directly up to Nina, who had gone a little aside. Long did he contemplate her with his little flashing eyes; seized then, almost by force, the hand withheld from him; looked into it; and spoke with much emphasis the following words, which had all the obscurity and wonder of an oracle—

When to thine eye death's realms appear,
Life's great enigmas shall be clear,
When thou art bow'd and most oppress'd,
Thy happiness shall stand confess'd;
Then life's own warmth the snow shall lend thee,
The wilderness an answer send thee.

After this prophesying, with which he seemed to have exhausted his whole art, the old man would enter upon nothing more; he himself now stretched forth his hand, and that, indeed, for money. Amid merriment over the old soothsayer, the travellers reached the inn, where every one sought his own room.

The words of the Laplander made a singular impression on Nina, and raised a peculiar disquiet in her bosom. But these also soon shrouded themselves beneath the veil of half consciousness; and a deep sleep—the usual consequence of Nina's moral languor—conducted her to the silent flood of Lethe, on whose banks we so sweetly slumber, dream, and forget.

The strong light operated disturbingly on the sleep of the rest of the company. Lady Louisa awoke with a lucky idea, which she immediately communicated to her husband, whom it flashed upon also as "a very good idea"—"a famous idea!"

"They were here so near the North pole," said Lady Louisa, "that she could not conceive why they should not force their way to the regions of the eternal snow. They had seen and heard all that the world possessed of magnificence, wonder, and glory—Paris, London, Taglioni's leaping, Talma's acting, Malibran and Pasta's singing, Paganini's fiddle, etc. But how if they should now visit the realm of death—the eternal snow of the North pole? Then first could they say that the earth had nothing farther new to them, and that they had seen more than their far-famed countrymen.

Lady Cummin had got it into her lovely head that the Snö-Fjällen form the boundary of all life, and that immediately behind them commences the eternal ice of the North pole. Though not able to participate in his wife's hope of being able so rapidly to arrive at the end of the world, Lord Cummin was, nevertheless, charmed in the highest degree with the idea of being able in the middle of summer to wade about in snow, and to see the measureless, everlasting ice-plains, in which the polar star mirrors itself.

Perfectly enchanted with this prospect, Lord and Lady Cummin hastened to communicate the plan to the Countess. The singularity of the enterprise captivated also her fancy; she consented with pleasure to accompany her guests thither too. The Baroness was not without a desire likewise to go, yet she yielded to the representation of her husband and Clara, and agreed to await in their company the return of the party to Tornea. She wished also to keep back Nina; but Nina was impelled forward by a secret disquiet, and dreaded in her present state nothing so much as inactivity.

"Then must you too make a journey my good Clara," said the Baroness. "You must be head and hand for Nina, who does not seem rightly to know what she does. I cannot answer it to Edla, to allow her young dove to fly through the wilderness so wholly unprotected. Natalie is now only occupied with her own ideas; Lady Cummin is, between ourselves, a sheep; and the gentlemen are all a little silly. You, Clara, are the only rational person of the whole party. You only can take Nina under your wing, and guide and support her. Will you, my Clara! I would go myself to look after you, if my husband, the tyrant, did not hold me back."

Clara agreed entirely with her friend in her views of their travelling companions, and consented to take charge of Nina. The affair was speedily settled. The foreign gentlemen desired nothing better, than, if possible, to travel to the end of the world in good company. There were found two men in Tornea who offered themselves as guides, to conduct the party to the boundary of the snow. The company provided themselves in the town with furs, eatables, and everything which could be required for the journey. The Countess caused two very picturesque dresses to be made for herself and Nina, richly trimmed with beaver skin. She banished bonnets, and substituted for them fantastic but tasteful caps. In this costume, on her lovely blond head the cap of red velvet, trimmed with gold-lace and ermine, Nina resembled the most fascinating beauty which ever enchanted the world of old romance. The German called her the goddess Fraya. Nina, however, continued silent, and was indifferent to her own beauty and the praise of others. The Countess and Lady Louisa, on the contrary, enjoyed perfectly their heightened charms, and the increased admiration of their worshippers. Fine masks were also procured to protect the ladies against the mosquitoes and the keenness of the air.

Besides the guides, they were accompanied by several peasants with staves and ropes. These went in advance of the party, in order to discover the best and securest route, and the company followed them mounted on little, lively, and docile ponies, which were accustomed to find their way through snow-hills and morasses. The travellers, for the most part, were in the highest spirits, and the Frenchman did l'impossible to enliven "la belle snögubbe."

The morning of the first day, however, threatened to put a tragical end at once to the journey. They had halted in order to breakfast. While the ladies dealt out with white hands bread and butter and meat, the Frenchman began again to peer around with his lorgnette after "something gray;" and he spied out "something gray," too, which he protested could be nothing else but a bear. The somewhat near-sighted Lord now saw "the fellow" too, and followed in his track with loaded gun. The Frenchman, laughing in his sleeve, went after him. His Lordship was soon lost in the wood. The Frenchman was seeking him with some uneasiness, when he heard a shot, and immediately upon it a vehement cry for help. He hurried towards the quarter whence the cry came, and saw with horror his friend lying at his length on the earth, while a bleeding bear stood with his paw on his breast, and with his open jaws threatened the head of the noble lord. Lord Cummin's end appeared inevitable, when suddenly a shot from a side direction passed through the body of bruin, and stretched him with a terrible howl on the earth. Nearly at the same moment sprang a man from the thicket, flung down his gun, hastened to the unlucky lord, and, with the help of the Frenchman, dragged him from beneath the dying bear, which had fallen half upon him. Lord Cummin did not appear to be in a much better condition than the bear, for he was covered with blood, and pale as a corpse. Not far off they found a ditch with water. The stranger fetched a cap full, and dashed it over his lordship's face, who through this shower-bath again recovered his senses. It was soon seen that the blood with which his Lordship was covered proceeded from the wounded bear. When Lord Cummin had perfectly convinced himself of this, and saw his foe lying motionless by him, he soon found his strength again, and declared that he felt no farther pain than a considerable pressure on the chest. He embraced his rescuer, and was beyond measure enraptured with his hunting booty which the stranger very willingly renounced. The stranger who, to the amazement of the foreigners, spoke quite fluently French and English, inquired the object and destination of their journey, and learned not only these, but also the names of the rest of the party. He appeared startled, and shook his head at the whole undertaking. After farther consideration, he said, "I am a friend of the Countess G., and wish to join the company, that I may be able as far as possible, to protect them from the annoyances and dangers to which people on this journey are exposed. But I wish to accompany it unknown. Will you wait here a moment for me?"

They gladly consented, and gazed in wonder after their new fellow-traveller, who entered a Lapland hut at some fifty paces distance, and came speedily forth again in Lapland costume, and so thoroughly changed that they themselves did not recognise him till he said, "Promise me to communicate to none of the company what you have seen or heard of me; say only that you have met with a wood Laplander, who is willing to join the train for the journey, which he has himself often made before. I, on the other hand, promise you to be silent on the real chapter of the bear, which moreover would only alarm the ladies."

Lord Cummin gave his hand upon it; the Frenchman was transported with the romantic nature of the adventure; and all three set themselves to work to drag the huge bear to the breakfast place. The ladies had been in extreme anxiety, and now regarded Lord Cummin as an actual hero. The Laplander was scarcely noticed by anybody, though the Frenchman gave himself great trouble to introduce him, while the man himself only the more drew back. Soon, however, his part became more prominent, and no one knew how it came to pass that the whole caravan had involuntarily put itself under his guidance. He said very little; his words came forth only in monosyllables, when it was absolutely necessary, from a great thick neckerchief which rose above his mouth: yet the gesture by which, in any dubious case, he signified the true direction of the route, was instantly obeyed by all. With the guides he sometimes conversed in a low tone; but he assumed his general position between the Countess and Nina, whose horse he often led by the bridle, in order to conduct her over dangerous spots.

The killing of the bear had yet more raised the spirits of the party; but it was remarkable that the Frenchman had wholly ceased to see "something gray," and Lord Cummin's eagerness for the bear-hunt had not the less strikingly disappeared. He talked now only of shooting grouse and ptarmigan. Lady Louisa wrote down the names of many places which were named to her, and was charmed with the good sound of the words: Valii, Almajalos, Laisan, Silbojock, Kamajocks-Dal, Karvek, Tjoris, Sutilma, etc. etc.

The journey became continually more difficult; it was necessary now to cross waters in boats, now—but it is by no means our intention to write a book of travels. In this sorrowful region the good spirits of the party ebbed rapidly, and at length entirely vanished. The higher the travellers ascended, the more they felt themselves oppressed. No one uttered a word, and every one seemed to be occupied with his own observations. From "The Reminiscences of Travel" of the Countess, or Lady Louisa, but especially from those of the German, might we easily learn the causes of this mood of mind; but I prefer to indicate them from the page on which a far more vigorous, and in Sweden well-known writer, has described in the following words the history of the animal and vegetable world in their last sighs in the contest with snow and cold:

"When we follow the Fjällen in a northern direction, we arrive first at the line where the tannen (silver fir) ceases to grow. This tree has, before reaching this line, assumed an unusual aspect. Covered from the ground upward with black boughs, and surmounted with, as it were, a burnt point, it presents to the wanderer in the waste region a melancholy spectacle. Immediately at this line cultivated berries cease to ripen; the beaver disappears from the brooks, the pike and perch from the lakes. The boundary line of the silver fir lies three thousand two hundred feet below the snow-line. The Scotch fir now only remains, which, however, is not so slender as usual, but has a low stem, and thick, far-stretching branches; ages are required to give it only a tolerable height. The morasses acquire a most desolate and dead aspect; not an insect shows itself upon them. The bilberry no longer ripens; the bear even goes no higher. Corn ceases to ripen, yet butts are still found, whose inhabitants support themselves by fishing and the pasturage of cattle, up to two thousand six hundred feet on this side of the snow-line. At two thousand eight hundred feet below the line the Scotch fir disappears, and the low birch is now the only tree in the waste country. With its short, gnarled stem, and its rigid knotty branches, it seems to set itself in a posture of resistance to the keen, furious north wind. Its light green and lovely color is ever most grateful to the eye, yet is it also an evidence of the feebleness of vegetation. Soon these two become so low that from the slightest elevation you overlook the whole wood, and they become constantly thinner and thinner; and as thereby the sun obtains more scope of action on these declivities of the Fjällen, you find frequently on these declivities an excessive growth of mountain plants. At two thousand feet from the snowy boundary the low birches themselves disappear, and from this point you find no more fish in the waters. The red salmon is the last. All hills are termed Fjällen which rise beyond the line where trees no longer grow. Four hundred feet yet higher you still meet with bushes, dwarf birch, and black creeping shrubs. The cranberry still ripens, but no farther. The high waste country is still visited by the glutton. Then ceases all shrubby vegetation; the hill slopes clothe themselves in brown and green lichens, and the only berry which will yet ripen is the rock wortleberry. Higher than eight hundred feet below the snow-line the Laplander, the nomadic inhabitant of the desert, does not willingly pitch his tent, since beyond this line even ceases pasturage for the reindeer. The eternal snows now stretch themselves ever farther around. At first they form only isolated spots, between which, here and there, the lichens emerge from the brown and spongy earth; soon the snow islands press closer on each other, vegetation totally ceases, the snow forms an unbroken surface, and the snow-finch is the only living creature which trusts itself here. Finally, the snow is no longer moistened by a single drop of rain, and resists forever the beams of the sun—

So poor, so waste, so gloomily does nature here present herself—monotonous, but great! Great, since she is eternal, without change, without disquiet. Proud and immovable in her poverty, she casts from her the industry of men, the affluence of agriculture, and renounces every joy, but at the same time every fetter. She turns away her countenance from life, draws the winding-sheet over her, and seems to rejoice herself in everlasting repose.

The travellers grew continually more melancholy at heart; many a sigh escaped from the oppressed bosom. Anxious forebodings—the only guests in this forsaken region—hovered round them, like the shades of the lower world round the being who has dared to enter their realms. Evening drew near, and with it also the end of the journey.

CHAPTER XXXIV.

THE ETERNAL SNOW.

Ha, ha, ha!

Love in the shape of a snow-fowl.

The travellers stood not far from the peak of the Fjällen. The heaven lay clear and cold above them. The icy air swept over the hill, and loaded the lungs of the wanderers. They paused to rest awhile before they ascended higher. Unobserved by the rest Nina disappeared, and went upward alone. Like a cloud chased by the wind, like a person who will encounter his fate, Nina climbed, without looking around her, higher and higher still. The Unknown only observed her perilous undertaking, and like lightning was at her side. True and silent as her shadow, he followed her step by step. They had soon left the rest far behind them. Valleys and mountains lay between them. They no longer saw each other. A superhuman power seemed to impel and bear Nina along. With the security and speed of the reindeer she climbed the rocks, and put back in silence the hand of her guide, which now supported and now extended itself to direct her. Suddenly she stood still. A boundless prospect opened itself: before her lay THE ETERNAL SNOW! Not a single mountain-peak covered with it now presented itself, or a valley filled with it, but a sea of snow, broken up at first by several gray splintered crags, and then extending far out, more and more regularly, more and more desolately, more and more immeasurable and terrific. It embraced the whole horizon—it united itself to the dark cold heaven. Not a wind breathed; no bird, no insect moved its wing. One could say with Alfieri—"A certain unutterable silence reigned in that atmosphere, in which one fancied oneself rapt away from the earth." From the Sulitelma only, which rears not far off its rocky horns into the air, is heard a dull sound resembling thunder; for the icy pyramids of the glaciers tumble perpetually into the deep ice-chasms, which seem to be openings into the lower world.

Nina contemplated this awful picture of cold and death; these mountains perpetually about to crumble in ruins; this heaven without warmth; the deep silence in the air; the fearful vacuity all around—and this eternally so! She perceived deeply in her soul the fearful actuality of life—she felt that there was a something in the human heart which bore a resemblance to this picture; a coldness, a lifelessness, which yet breathed and perceived—and that eternally so. She put aside her veil; she must breathe the fresh air, she felt as if she should be suffocated. An infinite pang, an unspeakable woe, took hold upon her. It seemed to her as if she had here discovered the watchword of her life—eternal snow! She folded her hands in deep anguish, gazed fixedly on the snow-sea, and shed tears without rightly knowing why she did so. A still, hopeless misery was painted in her pale and lovely countenance.

"This," said she, half aloud to herself, "is the image of my life upon earth—cold, empty, dead; without joy, without love."

"Without love?" inquired a voice near her, whose beloved tones sank into her heart. She turned herself round. The unknown had thrown off his disguise, and Edward Hervey stood with beaming eyes and crimsoned cheeks before her. Oh! was it indeed a wonder if he in the presence of eternal death perceived all the more forcibly the eternal life of his love—and if he surrounded with it the beloved being that how-tile powers threatened to attack? Was it to be wondered at, if he here told her that he loved her, that he would dedicate his whole life to her? Was it to be wondered at, that he poured forth like a torrent of light and life the infinite love which he felt for her?

The words which he spoke she returned. He clasped her to his heart. Their souls flowed into each other, and amid tears of bliss they exchanged words of frantic yet heavenly love. They repeated them a thousand and yet a thousand times, as if in very defiance of the coldness of death around them.

One of the oldest of the Mythes says, "That when it became light in chaos, the earth only and love arose therefrom." How charming!

Thus the fable had been realized. The earth was desolate and void, but the spirit of God floated over it—and never had a more heavenly, a more blessed love united two beings, than now united Nina and Hervey. Let me here pause. Words are poor—the most charming music, the sweetest odor of flowers, light, color—all these things may give a foretaste of the most blissful love rather than words. Words blow the dust from the wings of the gods. Perhaps the novel-writer may some time have the power, if he choose his quill from the wing of an angel, to express in words that which yet he can only have a presentiment of—then he may make the attempt.

The moments of rapture, however, were but short for lovers. Footsteps and voices which approached them led them back into reality, which for a few moments they had forgotten. The first guide followed on foot the pale and anxious Clara, who every now and then shouted Nini. She was confounded at the sight of Hervey. The Countess was not less astonished, and was quite in ecstasies to see Hervey, who no longer concealed himself by his dress, but left it to every one to think what he pleased about his sudden appearance. While he, with a presence of mind which the Baroness H. would have admired, endeavored to make the affair either clear or confused to the Countess. Nini continued her blessed dream, and hardly knew what went on around her. This recognition-scene, after the supernatural impression which the perpetual snow had made upon the greater number, caused a most highly agreeable diversion of mind. Yet it was not long before all eyes turned themselves once more to the silvery sea.

Looking on this, Lord Cummin only uttered again his laconic "Oh!" Lady Louisa found the prospect "frightful." To the Frenchman appeared "Le paysage un peu monotone!" The German was pale with cold and with sublime thoughts.

The sun had sunk behind the Fjällen. The spectacle became paler and paler, and so also the impression on the soul of the spectator. With Edward and Nina this was not the case. What was death to them? Shone not the flames of life and of love bright and heavenly in their hearts? They throw a glorifying splendor upon the outer-world.

The rest of the company began to get a little cold, and the thought that it would be most extremely pleasant to turn some of the perpetual snow into boiling tea-water suggested itself to many of them. When the Frenchman gave word to this thought, it was received with general acclamation, but most especially from Lord Cummin; they all betook themselves to the place in which it was determined to pass the night. It lay in the midst of crags; on three sides it was defended from the cold mountain-wind, the fourth afforded a free prospect over the country. Here and there grew green mountain-herbs and reindeer moss; from the peaks of the crags sounded the joyful twittering of the snow-finches.

The Countess invited the company to supper in her tent, and the cold proved itself an excellent incentive to appetite, as well as to joke and laughter. Hervey soon left the merry circle. His joy, as well as Nina's, was at this moment joy of another kind. His heart was full—he required solitude. He went out, and as he surveyed the free space around him, and felt how the night wind fanned his cheek, his mind was soon the better for it.

Singular was the picture which lay spread out before him at this moment. Like a sea in commotion that has suddenly become stiffened, the rocks extended themselves on all sides; their white, irregular, gigantic masses stretched forth toward heaven, which looked down upon them with a dark-blue tranquil eye. No life moved in the immeasurable space. The wind went forth with fettered pinions, and now and then lighted on the peak of a snow mountain.

It was this image of eternal repose, of immoveable lifelessness, which, in the youthful days of the earth, drew so irresistibly the sons of the south toward the north. In the south, the sun burnt hotly; the earth trembled under the feet of its inhabitants; fire raged in the mountains, and wild passions in the souls of men; up there, among the hyperboreans, the stars themselves stood still; there the earth was cool, the wood deep and still. In the north, a wonderful brightness illumined the nights, which seemed to testify of the presence of God and of a light which never descends. And an infinite longing took hold on the afflicted people; they left their burning home and wandered toward the north, in order to seek for a peace there which on earth was—not to be found.

Edward had seen the perpetual snow upon the Himalaya mountains; he had seen under the equator all the strength of the earth drawn upward by the sun; he had seen in the desert how the same power burned up all life; he recalled the changing scenes of earth; he thought how even the heavenly bodies had a perpetually changing place with regard to the sun; and he wonders how, in this universal change upon the changing earth, a life should yet spring up which feared not alteration and change—a life in which two happy beings became united, and spoke the blessed word—FOREVER.

Edward's heart beat warmly with this thought. Happy, and filled with the spirit of worship, he stood upon the eternal snow before the eternal Creator. The peaks of the snow-mountains grew grayer and grayer; the stars stepped forth more and more brightly from their mysterious depth; the wind laid itself; it became ever stiller and darker.

Suddenly however, a secret power seemed to retard the progress of the night. Midnight was not far off, and the country became lighter rather than darker. A wonderful brightness diffused itself over the heavens, and mirrored itself in the snow of the rocks. It seemed as if the voices and glances of the lovers had awoke the slumbering genius of this country, and as if this now returned an echo to that short drama of love—the first, perhaps, which had been represented in his kingdom. Pale flames began to dance in changing shapes on the horizon. Now they flew forth, clear as glances of light from human eyes; now they were unfolded like leaves written in rainbow colors. The rays shot upward ever toward the mid-heaven; they became brighter and brighter, stronger and stronger, and extended themselves more and more; at last they ascended from all sides, and the aurora borealis embraced heaven and earth with its majestic glory.

Hervey found himself at this moment surrounded by the whole of his travelling companions, who had been enticed from the tent by the wonderful brightness of the night, and who now collected around him with exclamations of the highest astonishment. Hervey cast a glance on Nina; it passed into her soul, warm and clear as a flame from heaven. They stood now side by side, and the fairies of light wove above them a crown of glory and splendour.

By the light of the dancing, and by degrees again extinguished flames, the company returned to the tent. The Countess, who appeared to have remarked something, watched Nina with Argus eyes. She did this also on the next day; so that, however much Hervey might have desired it from his heart, he had no opportunity of speaking alone with Nina. But he was near her; he surrounded her with those tender assiduities which, when persons love each other, are so cheerfully rendered and so cheerfully accepted; in the mean time a sort of fear consumed him, and a certain disquiet was observed in his whole demeanor. He promoted the journey with a hasty impatience, which had not been seen in him before.

The day after the northern lights, the company fixed their night encampment in a valley at the foot of the Garða Fjällen. Here Nina, hovering, as it were, between anguish and happiness, found opportunity to separate herself for a short time from the rest of the company, and to seek for solitude. She went deeper into the valley, in which a rich vegetation displayed itself. Round about her reared the gigantic pyramids, cones and jagged points of the Garða Fjällen. Their snow-covered peaks flamed in the rays of the evening sun, and stood around the dark valley like burning giant torches. Thousands of flowers adorned the earth with their splendid colouring, and the song of the beechniches resounded from the bushes. Here Nina delayed her footsteps, for here it was beautiful. She seated herself on a mossy fragment of rock: the tranquillity around her diffused also a tranquillity in her soul. Here Hervey found her; here, seated at her feet, he said, with all the earnestness and fervour of his loving heart:

"Words have passed between us which can only be succeeded by others. Thine for ever—for ever mine!" and so saying, he held her hands in his, and looked at her with the strong glance of undying love which has the power of appropriating to itself the soul of another.

"Yes, thine or death," replied Nina without effort, calmly, but with the deepest conviction.

After this he besought her to relate to him all which was connected with himself. He wished to know what were the impediments against which he should have to combat; there could be no farther impediments. He would overcome with ease everything which opposed itself to the fulfilment of their wishes. The fetters which held his own life bound should be released. She loved him, and that gave him courage for everything.

Frankly and simply Nina made him acquainted with her position. Her lips pronounced the name of Count Ludwig, and a deathly paleness spread itself over Hervey's countenance.

"He too—he!" stammered Hervey, and pressed his hand on his brow.

"Yes, he! ah, why are you so pale?"

"He was my friend—I was his. Certain circumstances separated us for ever. Yet neither he nor I was to blame. Gladly would I have spared him this new wound from my hand. But it must be," added he, with determination: "from this time forth you cannot belong to him. Nina is mine—she can only belong to me—to me for ever!"

Nina's hand rested in his, and her look seemed to set the seal to his words. She then continued her relation. Her tongue trembled, but she concealed nothing, not even when she came to speak of Don Juan; she was as little able to lock up the interior of her heart from him as from God. She related how Count Ludwig had behaved on this occasion. Hervey listened to her words with breathless uneasiness; but when she came to the deferring of her betrothal with Count Ludwig and of his journey, with the verbal promise of a future engagement, he breathed again freely, and covered her hands with kisses and tears of joy.

"Thus not bride," said he, "not bound. Thank God! How easy, how dear to me will be the contest for you! But listen to me, Nina! listen to me, adored angel! still, bands fetter me which your hands can only release. Tell me, Nina, if a stain rested upon my name—if the suspicion of a horrible crime fell upon me—if circumstances prevented me from proving my innocence—if I were pursued by the persecution of my fellow-creatures; tell me, Nina, would you then also, even love me—could you then also still consent to unite your fate to mine?"

Hervey's countenance was pale as death, but his eyes beamed.

"I love you!" answered Nina. Her whole soul, her faith, her hope, her future, her heaven, lay in these words.

"And if," continued he, "in order to defend myself against that which I do not merit—if I, in order to defy public opinion, which is not able to justify me, must ever remain hidden in this corner of the world, where nature is severe and pleasures only are few—would you then live with me here?"

"I love you!" was Nina's answer.

"And if hatred sought me out," added he, "and I should be compelled to find a place of safety in a foreign land—would you follow me?"

"I love you!" replied Nina. "O Edward—where your home is there is mine also: by your side I fear nothing!"

Heartfelt happiness of perfect love, thou breakest down all impediments, all rocks, all doubts! For thee may it be said, "O death, where is thy sting! O grave, where is thy victory!"

The feeling of being able to defy the world filled Hervey's soul with god-like joy. An indescribable feeling of joy, gratitude, emotion, and burning love, took possession of his whole being. He looked on Nina with adoring, blissful, love-intoxicated eyes. "Thou my own!" said he with a voice as heartfelt and strong as his love. He would have clasped her in his arms, and pressed her to his heart, but Nina gently put him back, joined her hands beseechingly together, and said with infinite affection, with that mild, holy dignity, peculiar to the angels of heaven—

"And now—hear my prayer! You know my love; you know my weakness. Be my good angel, Edward! Demand no promise from me; bind me not; let me be free till Edla comes. No cloud on your brow beloved! You have truly bound my heart forever! But hear my prayer—speak to me no more of your love till Edla returns! She alone can release me from the word which binds me to another—she alone shall dispose of my hand—she alone has the right to decide for me. To act in opposition to Edla would burden my whole life with repentance and ingratitude. Edward, beloved Edward, turn not from me—look at me—listen to me! I will be yours or—die! But Edla must decide for me between life or death. She gave me life, Edward—she gave me more—she formed the soul with which I love you. It must be so; O Edward, tell me that you acknowledge it also! Beloved, defend me against my own weakness. You know that against your will mine has no strength. Ah, Edward—understand your power—you must be strong for us both! But do not leave me—that I could not bear. Be my support in this time of expectation, of uncertainty. Ah, remain near me, remain with me, as before—"

"Nina, Nina—you know not what you ask," exclaimed Hervey with the most violent emotion, as pressing his hand upon his brow he turned from her.

"Oh, I know it!" said she, filled with heavenly confidence and superhuman love. "Are you not an angel! Have I not loved you because you take a high stand in life, and resolutely maintain that right and good alone rules! See, beloved—I lay the peace of my life, my conscience, my all, in your hands. O preserve me free from remorse, from shame before Edla, before my own conscience, and ah—before your eyes; for you, excellent one! could not love me if you must disapprove of my conduct. Let this hour have heard our last words of love, till the moment when Edla shall have blessed us. Oh then, then, and through the whole of my life will I thank you. Thou beloved, thou eternally beloved, fulfil my prayer!"

And with these words, with upraised and extended hands, and weeping eyes, she lay at Hervey's feet. Overcome by the sight, he sprang forward. "Lovely child!" said he with fervent lips—but these words were the last token of passion in his soul. He slowly passed his hand over his eyes, as if he would rid himself of a misleading thought; and pale, but again assured, he raised Nina as he said in a broken voice—

"Be calm, Nina; your wish, your prayer shall be sacred to me. You shall not see the pang which they prepare for me!"

He bent himself deeply—he kissed the hem of her garment. At the same moment soft footsteps approached; it was Clara, who said in a trembling voice. "They wait supper for you."

With this, all three returned silently and full of thought to the company.

A great change had taken place in Hervey. Since he had spoken to Nina, since he had seen her love for him, he was capable of everything, except only renouncing her. His strong mind had taken the firm determination to obtain her spite of all hindrances. Calmly sunk in himself, and with fervent countenance, he revolved plans for the future. The hope of publicly being justified and acquitted had now taken root in his soul. A letter from Philip gave occasion to this; they thought they had found traces of the guilty one. Were this hope fulfilled, Hervey might openly seek to obtain Nina's hand. The time when people might have declared such a union a mesalliance was past. Were his hope unsuccessful, it remained yet for him to win Edla to his side, and then he would resign his office, and with Nina and his family once more—it might be only for a time—seek out another country. Edward had learned, in a combat with the world, how much a firm will can do. As he had said before, so said he now with determination—"The world is large—I will find an asylum for me and mine—and God is above us!"

The Countess cast a sharp glance on them; they however were too much occupied by their own thoughts to notice it. "The company ate strawberries and milk—but what do our friends care, what do we ourselves care at this time about that?"

CHAPTER XXXV.

PICTURES FROM THE LIFE OF THE HEART.

I learned to love, and, at that time
Through love I learned what life is.—ATTEBOM.

Why was Clara so pale! Whence came the melancholy in her gentle eyes! Nina felt the necessity of inquiring after this. She wished, by fully communicating that which had reference to herself, to thank Clara for her tender sympathy, and by this means to open a path to her heart.

Besides this, Nina's breast was at the present time so full, that she longed for a friend, for a sister, to whom she could impart her feelings, from whom she could obtain counsel, and on whose faithful breast she could find calm for the present and help in the future struggle.

On the day of their return to Umenäs, in the evening after the company had retired, she sought out Clara. The Baroness had taken upon herself, in a grave conversation with the Countess, to warn her of her coquetry with the Colonel. Clara was alone in her chamber as Nina softly entered.

Clara sat upon her bed, with her head thoughtfully supported by her hand. Nina seated herself beside her, kissed her cheek, and softly whispered her name. The cheek was wet with tears, and tears stood in the eyes which Clara mildly raised to her friend.

"Clara," said Nina, distressed, "you are not happy—you are suffering!"

"What does it signify if a person do suffer?" returned Clara calmly, as she carefully drew together the neckkerchief which she had just thrown loose.

"Clara," said Nina, "tell me what is amiss with you. Can I help you, can I comfort you?"

"Believe me," returned Clara, as she dried her tears with the corner of her neckkerchief, "believe me, suffering is not so bad; one is better from it. One suffers, it is true; but one loves only all the more for it. One learns from it to forget oneself. It is altogether my own fault," continued she, after a short pause. "Can one help loving the excellent, the god-like? If the heart becomes so warmly interested, if it beat so violently, that it gives us pain, it does no harm; on the contrary, it is very beneficial."

A painful light spread itself over Nina's soul. She covered her face with both her hands. "Clara," whispered she, "O how much better are you than I!"

"Do not say so," besought Clara, "that is not the case; for you can make him happy—I cannot. I never have had the audacity to believe—I know my own little worth only too well. I have only wished to be able to serve him—you—you both! But do not let us speak further of me. Let us speak of you, of him; for I know that now you two have only one common interest."

The conversation of the two young friends was here suddenly interrupted. The Baroness H. entered, and her displeased mien, her hasty movements, plainly betrayed that, with regard to the Countess, her trouble had been unsuccessful. Nina remained yet a moment; but the Baroness was cool toward her, and the conversation soon became so heavy, that Nina, though against her will, and with a depressed mind, felt it necessary to withdraw. Clara on this walked to the window, in order to conceal her excited state of mind. The Baroness followed her, but with noiseless steps, took hold of her by the chin and turned her face toward her, and observing her with a sympathizing and penetrating glance inquired—

"Clara, what is amiss with you! You have never been like yourself since the perpetual snow—and you hide yourself from me! That is not right—that is not good of you, Clara."

Clara could not resist the look and the tone; she opened her whole heart to her friend.

The beautiful night saw the most beautiful and the most devoted soul combat against the weakness of physical strength—saw a resigned heart shaken by convulsions—saw the most beautiful and tender endeavours of friendship—saw how the good spirits in the end were victorious.

The next day Baron H. and his wife were prepared for their journey. They explained that important business demanded their presence in Paradise, and in the course of the forenoon they, together with Clara, set off thither. Just before they set off the Baroness sat down to write a letter to Hervey; after the first few lines, however, she stopped, saying, "Shall I teach that man the ten commandments! If I do not err, he knows them better than I do." She tore the letter in two. She reflected a moment, and then began a note to the Countess, but she interrupted herself with the word "admiring!"—I have no desire to begin such a part so late!" she tore the note in two. Next she began an epistle to Nina. Here again she interrupted herself, and tore in two that which she had written.

"Clara," said she addressing her, "I have to-day the desire to quarrel with everybody, but that leads to no purpose, and I will therefore rather let it alone. Do you write to Nina that which your own angel heart dictates, and let us quickly hence—that is the very best."

She kissed Clara, and left the room.

Clara, who after the agitations of the night felt herself too weak for a verbal communication with Nina, wrote to her the following words:

"I would serve him—serve you; that is my most inward wish. You are created for each other; you will make each other infinitely happy. If I can do anything to be useful to you, O say so, say so! Write to me, good Nina; relate to me everything about yourself, about him; tell me of your love to him—tell me very much on that subject. Impart to me your plans for the future. Miss Edla—Count Ludwig—shall I come to you when you expect them back! Say only one word.

"Do not be uneasy on my account, beloved Nina. I am calm. I have a friend who is God's best gift to me, his feeble child. O how good is he not! I shall first be perfectly happy when I am perfectly easy respecting your future fate. Do not speak of me if you write to me; grant me this prayer! I have now more than ever reason to forget myself. Ah, that is so beneficial! But speak of yourself, of your life—of everything which concerns him and you. In my thoughts I separate you no longer. I pray for you both,

'May a quiet blessedness with its pious cover you!'

CHAPTER XXXVI.

NINA TO CLARA.

"HAVE you a sister, Clara? A sister like you in age, to whom from your birth you imparted everything—the mother's breast—the cradle—sport—caresses—instructions; and was she early torn from you! and was your heart and life encompassed by a horrible desert! Oh then you know the bliss and the pain also of my childhood!

"I cannot conceive a more beautiful existence than that of twin sisters who go hand in hand through life; whose enjoyments are mutual—who participate in each other's feelings and thoughts—who weep over the same sorrow—who rejoice over the same festivity, whether it be only a midsummer merriment or the Holy Supper. They stand in life like two young tree beside each other, and each new spring twines the twigs of their crown closer together. The happy ones! How intimately known is each to the other! How well must they understand each other, and be mutually able to read in each other's eyes as in a clear mirror. Can life ever become to either of them empty and dark! And if the one suffer, then has the other indeed the key to her heart; she knows every fold therein, and can open the locked-up chamber to the beams of daylight.

"I too had a sister—a twin sister—a little amiable. Life and play we partook of with each other. We had only one heart—one will—one thought. For seven years were we happy together—then she drooped and died. Her death was my first sorrow; yet it did not operate upon me like sorrow. It was a benumbing blow. It was to me as if I had lost the half of my life. I longed for her, and wasted away. At length I followed her—yes, I died—I died according to my own feeling—I died as it appeared to others. What or who withheld me from the mysterious bounds, and commanded me to return and to finish my work, I know not; O my God, thou alone knowest it! I appeared dead; they laid me in my coffin. Warm weather was at hand, and I was placed in a cool dark chamber. Here now, Clara, that which even now I cannot relate without a shudder.

"I lay in my coffin, all was dark, vacant, and still; I slept deeply, deeply as the dead sleep. All at once I felt an iciness, a pang—it was life! My eyelids were heavy; with difficulty I raised them, and saw only night. I had always been fearful, and now also I was frightened at the darkness which brought me only the quicker to consciousness. I felt with my little hands about me, and took hold of the silver handles of the coffin. I had seen the same on the coffin of my little sister. I listened, all was still; I believed myself to be in the grave. I had not strength either to call or speak. I heard the rats gnawing on my coffin something crept over my face—I took it for the worms which were come to prey upon me. Small and feeble as I was, still I experienced in that moment a horror and a pang which neither time nor circumstances will ever be able to efface from my memory. I believed that I should thus have to continue living on in the grave, in darkness and in cold, but I did not endure this agony long, for my consciousness again left me. O Clara! listen now to an occurrence which I cannot think upon without joy and pain.

"I saw a light; it became stronger and stronger. I heard a movement—it approached nearer and nearer; I felt a warmth—it was more and more agreeable, it set my heart in motion. Hot tears fell on my face; ah, they called me back to life. I awoke; I opened my eyes—they fell upon Edla, who wept over me. I lay upon her bosom, and she gave me warmth and life.

"The next day had been fixed upon for my burial. In the night Edla had gone to her little departed sister to pay her yet one more farewell visit; she took me out of my coffin, and carried me into her chamber which I no more left.

"After this occurrence I had knowledge of but very little more. It has been told me that I lay for three years in a feeble half-conscious state upon my bed, vegetating rather than living. I had seen the coffin of my little sister, and had heard my weeping father say, 'the Lord hath given, the Lord hath taken away; blessed be the name of the Lord.' I myself had experienced the horror of death. That sight, this impression, and these words floated perpetually before my soul. In vain endeavoured they to infuse into me more joyous thoughts; in vain they tried by a little playfellow to replace my Mina; I could not endure the least noise, nor the least disquiet around me. The little stranger was a burden to me, and was obliged to be sent away. A frost of death had come over my life, and I remember only a few impressions from that time of stupefaction. I seemed to myself as a shadow, as a dream; I could not comprehend myself as anything actual; it was almost the same with regard to the objects around me. All was somnolent; so indistinct; so dark; so lifeless! It seemed to me as if all things flowed slowly down a passing stream—as if I lay in my coffin and floated away also—away to a boundless sea in which all things were lost. Those words, 'the Lord hath given, and the Lord hath taken away,' had to me a dark and gloomy meaning, and I very soon came to look upon the Creator as an unfathomable deep, out of which all things proceeded, and to which they all again returned—but not in the sense of the Christian doctrine. There hovered over the cradle of my childhood, as well as that of the human race, the image of a blind power, producing all and devouring all.

"But Edla sat by my sick-bed. I heard daily her gentle assured voice, saw her tranquil look, her quiet demeanor, her all-engaging activity; I enjoyed her care—her strengthening presence, and by degrees I experienced the benefits of them. My thoughts fortified themselves through hers, I began as it were to live through her: a drop of her strength flowed softly through my veins; I awoke, I raised myself, both body and soul. Formerly I had been a self-willed child; Edla taught me to obey, and before long I refused no toys nor nourishment which I received from her hands. Edla was never severe either in word or deed, and yet still she exercised an extraordinary power over me. It never occurred to me that any one could do other than obey her. The first manifestations of my newly awakened life were those of extreme excitability of feeling. The most trifling excitement of mind, the least joy or the least pain drew from me torrents of tears; nay, they often flowed without any apparent occasion. I think my life might have gushed away in tears; every time, however, that I wept, Edla left me alone in the chamber. No calling—no entreaties could keep her back, and this chastising absence I could not endure. In order to keep Edla with me, I repressed my tears and the convulsive agitations, which these outbreaks of feeling occasioned.

"That weakness, that warmth of heart exhibited itself in the great necessity which I felt for caresses. I put my mouth to Edla's lips—I could have kissed her hand by the whole hour, but she would not allow it—she never kissed me. Ah! why did she not? It was so bitter to my young heart to see its affection repulsed, I cannot describe how Edla operated upon me. She was law to me; she was my faith, my providance, my aff. I lived only through her—I wished only to live for her. Oh, that Edla had consented to this—had but permitted me to love her—had but needed my tenderness then, how happy should I have been! Edla was a mother to me, and yet I know not if she loved me; nay, I doubt whether she did. Amiable human weaknesses are not for Edla. Man is little to her, she loves only virtue—only immortality; her great soul encompasses the world; she embraces humanity.

“With awakened strength and the necessity for affection in my heart, I lay on my bed; Edla presented me with nourishment of another kind, and after it I eagerly grasped. I was conscious of want, and desired plenty. Edla was my teacher, she gave me knowledge; I eagerly drew in her words, and followed her beckonings. So, for years I lived at her side. ‘Let me learn, let me learn!’ was my only prayer—my best reward was Edla’s satisfaction. This occupation, intercourse with Edla, her conversation, exercise in the open air, all this strengthened by degrees, both body and soul. I had no delight in that which I learned; it always seemed to me as if I did not understand the meaning of words or things, and I never felt that fresh satisfaction which is so peculiar to youth. At times a strange feeling, like lightning, passed through me—it was a trembling presentiment of life and joy, a presentiment that some time I might enjoy the world, and might taste the happiness of all created beings. But that was only momentarily, and then again all was misty and dark. It was not unusual often for me to contemplate my hand, my foot, or my own face in the glass, and inquire if these things really belonged to myself? Ah! I understood my own heart still less. Often have I laid my hand upon my breast full of astonishment at that which below moved itself so unquietly. At times an inexpressible melancholy took hold of me, and with a longing after my little sister, which it was impossible for me to describe in words. Willingly would I have gone to her, only not through death. My extraordinary acquaintance with this pale angel had inspired me with a fear of the grave which I still feel; yet I now know how one can escape it. This melancholy was an anxious foreboding of my advancing life, accompanied by a weariness and an indifference which extended itself to everything around me.

“My state of mind disturbed Edla, and she listened, although unwillingly, to that which I told of my anxious presentiments, and my secret griefs; she seemed to despise them as the offspring of a feeble spirit, and of a sickly imagination. This gave me strength to repress them—that is to say, to conceal them; for I have never been free from them—and even now, Clara, when so much is changed in me, and a new life has sprung up in my soul, yet still these feelings, these forebodings, return at times powerfully even to this hour. At such times it seems to me as if I lived here only a counterfeit life, and a secret voice says to me, that I shall never be happy, and also that I shall never become old on earth. However, these forebodings now pass more quickly over. Hervey’s clear glance chases away all these dark thoughts.

“Religious instruction operated beneficially upon me; it enlightened my soul, and gave to me a being that I could love—God. O Clara, am I worthy to say so! Can I love, comprehend the All wise? I cannot. My feeling was a sigh breathed upward to Him and nothing more; yet that, too, was good. I looked through Edla up to Him. I learned in Edla to admire virtue, and to abhor crimes and weaknesses; all only through her. Count Ludwig made no good impressions upon me; he made virtue appear stern, and in him I almost learned to fear it. In Edla I had learned to reverence and admire it; Hervey alone has taught me to love it. I admire Edla—who would not if he had seen her quiet, uninterrupted activity; her self-denial; the beneficence which she practices in stillness, and had seen at the same time the card with which she concealed everything which would have drawn upon her the praise of her fellow men. Edla’s soul is a severe temple.

“I was nineteen when my father married the Countess Natalie. Our quiet home, in which I had so long seen Edla the influencing spirit, was changed as if by a magic stroke.

“A certain weakness, which was the result of my delicate health, had hitherto made it impossible for me to endure social life. The murmur of voices of so many people, the bright lights, the passing backward and forward of a crowd occasioned me a painful feeling, and often the most violent headache. I was most comfortable when alone with Edla.

“By degrees this weakness decreased more and more, and I was, at the time of my father’s second marriage, tolerably free from it. Ah! on this there followed not only outward changes, but inward also, which were deeply painful to me. I was no longer permitted to be much with Edla, and I fancied that Edla had become indifferent towards me. She never expressed the wish that it should be otherwise, but gave herself up with zeal to serious occupations, which I knew were dear to her. Perhaps Edla was not dissatisfied with my removal; she obtained by this means more time for herself. Ah! I know not; but she seemed to forget me in her occupations. It grieved me, but I did not dare to complain. Yet, at the same time, I will not deny that my new mode of life pleased me; and I endeavoured in it to forget Edla’s coldness and withdrawal from me. Some time after the marriage of my father Edla left us. Why did she? Why did she leave one so young, and so inexperienced, alone in a world full of temptations? Perhaps Edla wished to try me. Ah! she considered me stronger than I was. With her my strength had vanished. I was left solely under the guidance of my stepmother. You know Clara—for you yourself have experienced it—what a charm can lie in her behavior, in her care and her tenderness. She showed me the greatest attention; and not she alone, but everybody who surrounded her overwhelmed me with a sort of worship. It did me good to see myself beloved, to hear myself praised; I was, as it were, intoxicated with this new delight. My days were consecrated to vain enjoyments and idle pleasures.

“In the house of my stepmother there reined pomp and elegance. Her social circle consisted of artists and lovers of the arts; of the most brilliant and most agreeable which the capital possessed. Beauty, wit, and intelligence found there their point of union. I saw myself as the centre of this enchanting circle; I was the object of all eyes, of all flatteries. I let myself go with the stream, and be amused. I cannot say that life appeared to me more intelligible than before; yet my dream, on the contrary, was agreeable in the extreme. I gave myself up to the life of indolence which my mother, out of tenderness to me, prepared for me. I read many of the newer novels. They enchanted me, and yet they called forth in me disturbing and wild fancies. The people who surrounded me helped only the more to mislead me. When I reflected on them, I saw that the definite characteristics of virtue and vice existed in them no longer; all appeared to me mixed up together. If I had seen a Satan, and I had been tempted by him, I should have said, 'Depart from me!' But I saw myself surrounded only by good, amiable, agreeable people; truly, all of them chargeable with errors; nay, many among them I knew to be persons of most libertine lives; but then they acknowledged their failings themselves, and these did not prevent their being good: did not prevent their enjoyment of that which was beautiful, nor their being occupied in works of the highest order, nor their being amiable and beloved. They endured also the failings of others without blame; no one had therefore a right to be severe against them. There reigned especially in this circle an agreeable and, according to appearance, an innocent gayety—a lenient judgment of men and their failings. The boundaries between the good and bad became to me ever more and more uncertain.

"Edla had shown to me the good and the bad, in expressive, intelligible forms; she had taught me to know the two poles of life. The indistinct, less visible gradations she had not been able to show me; the knowledge of these is obtained only by intercourse with mankind and life itself. I had hitherto, as it were, only learned to distinguish night and day, not twilight; now I had a picture in more intermediate shades before me, and in its indistinct play of shadow and light I lost my way.

"And what principles heard I not daily expressed. They were those of a generally allowed laxity and scepticism. I heard everything made a matter of question, which hitherto I had considered as sacred and firmly established; and wit and jest thereon flew hither and thither. There was no decided spirit of disbelief; no, it was more a jesting confession, a sighing doubt, a light irony, often also a fleeting homage, and then every one lived again to the enjoyment of the moment, to pleasure or to self-love. They cherished in this circle a great horror of those whom they called fanatics; that is to say, people who erected a standard of ideal excellence, up to which it was impossible to live. I heard Edla frequently instanced as one of these enthusiastic souls, who lived in the world of fancy, and for whom actual things had no value.

"The actual world, what is it properly? So questioned I with myself. Could the actual be no other than this strange mixture of weakness and goodness, of virtues and failings, of pleasures and care, of all opinions, all possibilities, all aberrations, which I saw around me? Was there nothing determined in life? Was everything only comparatively, conditionally good? They told me so. They repeated to me, to very weariness, that every time had its good and its bad; so also had every individual. This depends on nature and chance; there is no hell, etc., etc. Mere words and ideas, as half-formed and dim as my soul.

"These views and these people made upon me a strange, perplexing impression; yet I did not comprehend it as clearly at that time as now. I could not make it intelligible; and the inborn bias in me to indolence made me shrink from any strain upon my thoughts. I turned my mind from the difficult question, and gave myself more and more up to the life which surrounded me. A certain desire after life's enjoyment, and for that purpose that I might in some way feel myself a creature, took possession of my soul more and more. I was as it were upon the Island of Calypso; and still more and more under the power of enchantment, became weaker and weaker, I myself knew not how. Edla wrote often to me, and always tenderly, prudently, and admonishingly. But a fascination had come over me, and even her words failed of their customary influence.

"How was it, Clara, that at this time I did not ally myself with you? I recollect yet so well the gentle impressions of your quiet being, like that of a saint; and how you sat so tranquil, so self-sustained, and so indifferent to the life which surrounded you. But at that time there were so many things to sunder us, that I did not deserve your friendship.

"I saw Count Ludwig daily. I knew that he desired a union with me; I knew that this union was Edla's highest wish. Ah, for her sake, I would have loved him! But to be near him occasioned me constraint and a strange coldness of heart. A bitter contempt of people, nay, even of their virtues, often betrayed itself in his words. People universally showed him distinguished esteem; yet he seemed not to be beloved. I saw many bow themselves deeply before him; never did I see any one frankly and cordially offer him the hand. He appeared to me high and cold as an alp covered with snow. I froze when I came near him. I knew much that was good of him; I knew the sincere friendship which Edla cherished for him, and for that reason I reproached myself with feelings which, against my will, forced themselves upon me.

"I come now to a time, Clara, on which I cannot think without pain and shame. We will spare us both by only slightly mentioning it. You know it mostly already. You know the kind of power which an unworthy person obtained over my weak soul—but you do not know how nearly my guilty indiscretion brought me to humiliation. I did not love him, my wishes were pure; and yet I permitted him to fascinate my soul and mind with his music and his impure love.

"I have bitterly deplored this part of my life, in which I was so unworthy of Hervey and Edla.

"Edla returned. Terrible, blessed hour! Terrible, because I was deeply sunk; blessed, because it saved me! But O how I felt at first, when I saw that pure, lusty-minded Edla despise me!—when I saw her weeping over me, and I could not lift up my eyes to her and say, 'I am innocent.' No, that I could not. But humble myself, confess and repent—that I could do, and that I did. It was my salvation that I was capable of despising my own weakness, and of acknowledging the pure and the good, from which I had fallen. With Edla my better self returned: with her my purer love, my admiration of excellence, which she had taught me to know. She seemed to me to be better and purer than ever. Virtue had surrounded her quiet being with a glory. Ah! this diffused over me, the fallen one, its pure brightness, and I longed after Edla's clear heaven. I felt the deep necessity to let myself be guided by her, and to subject myself in all things to her will, to her determination. Edla's power over me was more unlimited than ever. Had she remained with me, had I been able to live near her and under her influence, then perhaps had my soul met with no new agitation; she would have tranquilized it under her defence, and I should have had peace, if not happiness. But a higher power had otherwise determined it. You know the noble behaviour of Count Ludwig on the occurrence at Ramlosa, and how he demanded my hand at the moment when my reputation—and with justice—had somewhat suffered. You know also that which followed on his doing so: my consent, my father's illness, and the delay of my betrothal. Edla made a journey, and once more my life was a prey to its former want; nevertheless, because it was Edla's wish, and from a feeling of duty and a desire thereby to regain my lost self-esteem, I conducted myself friendly toward Count Ludwig, and felt patient with my fate. He however, also left me, I was happy that he did so. Ah! I felt that I never could love him. And this feeling made me wretched.

"I accompanied my mother into this country, where she had resolved to spend a year. I was glad of it: I wished to endeavour to collect myself in solitude, and if possible to obtain more clearness and repose of mind.

"Clearness and repose of mind I did not obtain. A deep disquiet reigned in my breast. With Edla I had lost my strength. The elasticity which she had called forth in my soul again slept. I tried to recall formerly beloved images, but the mirror of my soul was dark, it reflected nothing with distinctness. Oh, it is difficult again to purify when it has once become stained! I was weary of myself; I seemed to myself so devoid of any peculiar worth. I had lost the interest in my own life. If I had died on the morrow, who would have lost by it! I was so insignificant, and felt myself without a future. There lay, as it were, a veil upon me and upon the world.

"The gloom of the season and of nature round about me increased yet more this tone of mind. The dark, endless pine-woods, the rocks, the roaring of the sea, the north wind that whistled over it, the short days, the darkness, the cold—all occasioned me anxiety under which my health suffered. Edla loved the powerful and the great in life and in nature. I had often seen her eye beam with joy at a wide prospect, at a view of the sea, or of the starry heavens. She loved even wild scenes of nature, storms, thunder, for they gave wings to her fancy. How different, on the contrary, was my feeling! Everything great, strong, and infinite caused me a kind of pain. The sea with its restless waves which lost themselves in infinity, resembled to me an abyss; neither eye nor feeling found repose. I longed for a coast—the little boat of my life was formed to follow its agreeable windings. I loved only the mild, warm sunshine, for only in it was I able to live.

"On a cold November day I went with my mother to church. The earth and the trees were covered with hoar frost, and a thick mist lay over the whole country. The carriage rattled along; and trees, mountains, and cottages flew like shadows before me. That feeling which dwelt in the depths of my soul took hold of me stronger than ever at this moment.

"How all things travel onward, thought I—how all rush past like a stream! Days, the year, events, things! all feelings, all thoughts, flee over, swift and traceless as mist. Life is the great dream which sustains the whole; and all men, high and low, good and bad, move themselves in it—they rise, they fall with swinging waves; they were formed but of mist and are again lost in it. Who knows himself—who knows others! We go past one another—past, ah, it is so cold! Who can build upon his own heart—who upon that of another, or upon life! Who can say to the future, 'that shall be!' We see everything only through thick mist—we stumble about only in thick mist.

"An infinite and inexpressible indifference towards life had taken hold of me. The words, to-morrow, joy, life, friendship, God, existed no more for me. All wishes, all feelings appeared extinguished in my soul, and it was to me as if I should swim in mist and lose myself in infinite space. A strong faintness came over me; I laid my head in the corner of the carriage—all swam before my eyes; all objects around me lost themselves in the depth. My thoughts went from me; but a deep repose came over my soul, and my tongue attempted to pronounce the words, 'the Lord hath given, the Lord hath taken away! blessed be the name of the Lord.'

"The attentions of my mother recalled me to consciousness. I had been in a fainting fit. The air, sharp and cold, which entered through the opened carriage window, brought me back to myself. Full of anxiety about my state, my mother would have turned back in order to take me home; I wished her not to do so, we were just by the church. In a half stupified state of mind I alighted from the carriage, and we took our places in the house of God. Our seat was a few steps from the pulpit, just opposite the altar. The altar-piece represented the Resurrection; angels heaved the stone from the grave out of which the Saviour, beaming with light ascended; the rosy tint of morning tinged the horizon and fell upon Golgotha; I looked at the beautiful picture without understanding it. My thoughts were dead; the sun which had broken through the mist shone in now through the church window, and lit up the picture as if it would say 'behold!' There fell also a ray upon me, but I felt it not. They sang the hymn; I sang too, unconsciously. When, however, the confession of sins was read, a deep feeling of my own weakness, of my nothingness rushed through me. I sank upon my knees in tears. I did not pray, at least not with words; but my whole soul, my whole state of mind, at this moment, was no other than the cry, 'Lord—Lord, have mercy upon me!'

"A deep stillness ensued. The low rustling of the trees in the churchyard was heard. I seemed to feel as if a breath passed over my soul; I lifted up my eyes, Edward Hervey stood in the pulpit with serious and beaming eyes. From the very moment in which he began to speak my soul hung upon his words. I listened, I understood, as never before in my life I had listened and understood.

"He spoke of the life which is the fountain, wherein all existences find each other again in joy; of the life which makes clear the whole world and endeavours of man; of the life without which all things are dark and separated; of the life which unites all and enlightens all—he spoke of love. He looked with a glance of fire into every human heart, and spoke to one and all. He censured the laxity which tolerated, and the severity which blamed everything. He invited all to purity, to holiness, to inward serenity.

"'Think not,' said he, 'that earth is a vale of grief. Think not, my friends, that this world is only a place of trial and affliction. God wills not that it is so. Has not infinite love consecrated it even as His dwelling-place, and has revealed therein the fullness of his being? Let us have love one for another, even as he has loved us, and we shall then comprehend that fullness. Let us love God; let us love one another, and then we shall see how light will life and its cares appear to be. Let every one ask himself the occasion of his sufferings, and he will find that it is no other than want of love either in himself or in others. On the soil of unkindness grow envy, hatred, revenge—the bitterest poison-plants of life. But sanctify your endeavours in love, acknowledge one another in love; then, my friends, joy and peace will soon reign in the homes of mortality. Such is the will of our God. The God of love is also the God of joy; for love is joy, is endless happiness.

"'I repeat it; let us have love one to another, even as God has loved us, then will there be joy on earth; friend will be united to friend, and no one will stand alone in life. So let us live, so let us one with another wander through these days of earthly existence; and when the evening comes, let us bless the field upon which we played as children, and say to the Giver of all good, 'Father thou callest me from earth, I come willingly to thee; I know that thy love is eternal as thou art, and as the gifts are which proceed from Thee. My sphere of action, my innocent joys, hast thou preserved for me in heaven, where I shall yet learn better to know and love thee.'

"I have, I know, given here only very feebly the beautiful words as they remain in my memory.

"What description, indeed, would be able to give again the power of the voice and the look, as well as the expression of soul which lay in every word! Ah! this doctrine of love and joy, as Hervey delivered it, whose inmost life is love and joy, took hold of my very soul. A strange light penetrated my heart; a joy, never known till then, took possession of my soul, and from thence what life, what peace reigned therein! So, some time, will dawn the morning of the eternal life upon the again-arisen children of earth. I buried my face in my hands, and let my tears flow. Yet never had they flowed before from so pleasing a pain. There was the hope of a new life, the foretaste of a never experienced happiness; there was adoration in my tears. So sat I, given up to my feelings, till a hallelujah sounded forth, as sweetly and as strong as if it had been sung by the voices of angels. Hervey stood before the altar and praised God. The heavens looked blue and bright through the high church-window. The angels upon the altar-piece seemed to smile and to whisper to me, 'Joy, joy!' And I stood up joyfully with the community to give thanks, to sing praises. My whole soul was a hallelujah! When at last, I heard Hervey's voice blessing me, and all of us, I felt blessed in reality; I felt that the Lord had turned his countenance towards me.

"From this day a great change had taken place in me. The whole world seemed to me remodelled. It was not only the deep emotion which the moment had called forth, it was Hervey's presence, his conversation, his influence, which produced this change. Life and the world became clear to me; it was light within my soul. I awoke out of my long dream in order to love and adore. To love—yes! I loved Hervey, and through him God, nature, and life. But it was a long time before I knew that it was love to him which beautified my world, and made my inward self clear. This sentiment sprang up in me like life itself. I wished he was my brother, and I a member of his family—of that family where I saw him so beloved, so worshipped; of that family where piety, education, and gayety made life so rich—where every day had its meaning, its sunshine. Oh! it was this quiet, simple, holy, and yet cheerful life which my soul so much needed—that was the true atmosphere of home for my existence.

"I will not long tarry over the description of the changing sentiments of my soul, till the moment arrived when it became plain to me that our two existences were but one—that we belonged eternally to each other. I have trembled between the deepest despair and the highest happiness. I am calmer now, for I know one thing, and in this alone lies calmness, clearness, and happiness enough; I know that he loves me, and that no separation, no death, can rend our hearts from each other. Edla shall decide my fate. We have both of us determined to bind ourselves by no promise before her return, and without her consent. But no other than Hervey shall call me wife. Count Ludwig is nothing more to me, nor can I either be anything more to him; he would have in me only a half-dead being, only a half Nina. Hervey has called me back to life; to him my life belongs. Ah! I feel indeed that it is more his than mine. O Clara! with him and through him I could become a God-pleasing being, and one useful to my fellow-creatures. Like him would I give joy to human hearts, would sit by the suffering bed of the sick, would teach little children to be good and love God, who encompasses them all with love. The labor would be dear to me, the trouble would be light. Care and want would I strongly endure—all for him; only to hear one approving word from his lips, for one glance from his eyes. There would be an end of my dreamy life; I should acquire human worth.

"Hervey shall not leave the path which he has chosen. He chose his profession from love. To accompany him on this path is the only lot which I wish for myself. Ah! the best, the highest! No rank, no position in society, is higher than the being his worthy wife. How charming to form a portion of life! How willingly would I be only the light which shines upon him at his labor, only the breath which fans his brow. What can I want by Hervey's side? He has love and wisdom enough to make a whole world happy. His home, my home; the daily beloved cares for him and for those who are dear to him, how pleasantly will they fill up my days! Wo to me, if I, with such a life, could experience want—if my heart did not every morning and every evening send forth the warm sacrifice of thanks for my happy lot! Then may the days and years roll on. Whatever trials, whatever cares they may bring with them, I fear them not. He will be near to me, will love me, will show me heaven. Stands he by my death-bed, and lightens me with his glance, I fear no gloomy thoughts. I will look upon him and God, whom he sees. He will bless my grave, and its terror will vanish. With him is light and life, with him is heaven. Eternity, infinitude, before your depths I no longer grow dizzy; his pinions sustain me, he hides me in his bosom—

"Yet hold—hold! What have I said! Whither does this blessed dream lead me! Edla, my high, pure Edla, wilt thou awaken me from it! Wilt thou make thy child unhappy! Oh no, Edla, that canst thou not—that wilt thou not! Edla knows not yet of my love; I have not ventured to write to her of it. She has seen me weak, she would not now understand my feelings. Edla must know Hervey, and then she will love him. Their souls are made to understand each other. Edla will desire our happiness. Should she not—good God! my hand trembles, my mind grows weak, at the very thought of her not consenting. Clara, I feel at the same time a necessity of happiness and joy—a desire to enjoy life, as I know it may be enjoyed; it is indescribable. If, however, it should be so required that this must be renounced—were the question only of my own happiness—I think I could be resigned, and say with you, 'What does it signify if a person suffer?' But Hervey! Hervey! Oh, it is as if a thousand voices cried to me this beloved name! Hervey loves me. It concerns also his happiness. My heart quakes at the thought of contest against Edla's wishes—yes; but I cannot leave Edward Hervey. Almighty God, guide me, and incline Edla's heart to him who is my life. Perhaps the moment already advances with giant footsteps which shall decide all; with me it is a matter of life and death. Yet I cannot mistrust the future; at least not now, when I yet see Hervey I must hope in a life full of happiness. Who, indeed, would not love Edward Hervey! Edla will wish my happiness.

"I have fulfilled your wish, Clara. I have only spoken of him and me; I have not talked with you, nor of you. One word, however, let me say—it comes from my inmost heart. I know that you are superior, far superior, to me, and that strengthens my soul: it does me good when I think upon you. O Clara! good, affectionate Clara! if I should be hardly tried—if I should be doomed to renounce the happiness of life—then—will you stand by me! will you then come to

CHAPTER XXXVII.

MORE LETTERS.

There dwells within the human heart
Music most strange and wonderful.

About the same time that the two young friends corresponded, as we have seen, with each other, a friend of Count Ludwig's wrote to him, from whose letter we will communicate the following passage:

"I would not make you uneasy, but I must at least warn you. Endeavor to return as early as possible, otherwise you may lose your bride. A certain Edward Hervey, who before the committal of a certain crime bore the name of Edward D., threatens to contest your pretensions. I recognized him, although he is somewhat altered; you know, however, that my eye is certain. Besides this, I happened by chance to see the scar upon his breast, the cause of which you know as well as I do. This Edward D. is at this time the pastor of the community to which the Countess H— belongs. In some incomprehensible manner here all is secret, and nobody knows anything of his earlier life. He is universally beloved, and exercises a great influence on his community. People say that he has endeavored to win Miss Nina's heart, and that he has succeeded in so doing. As I live somewhat distant from the Countess, I have had only once an opportunity of seeing Miss Nina with this person. I saw nothing which could have given occasion to the report, and yet, at the same time, enough to make me counsel you to return as soon as possible. There exists no confidence between them, but yet a certain something between them which is very much like actual love. Miss Nina is beautiful as the goddess of love, and this Hervey is, in fact, an uncommonly interesting man."

We know now sufficiently of the spark which fell into the already charged mine. Edla's letters for some time had contained merely tidings of the decreasing strength of her father.

"His condition is free from pain," she wrote; "his temper is milder and kinder than ever: but he becomes every day weaker, his memory more confused, and his consciousness dimmer. I have rented a pretty little villa in the neighborhood of the city, and here my father can enjoy the fresh air, and the physician can visit him every day. He is, thank God, still capable of enjoyment. He walks in the garden, leaning on my arm, plucks oranges from the trees, and is delighted with the beautiful fruit; he smokes his pipe in the shade of the trees, and enjoys himself in the soft air. He is happy. He often mentions Nina's name, thinks she is married to Count Ludwig, and is happy in thinking—

"They give me no hope of his recovery; I, however, cannot give this up. The mild climate has already operated so revivifying upon many in a state similar to his. May it, however, please God! My love, my dearest duty is to make his days easy and agreeable, be they many or be they few."

The thought of the probable decease of her father diffused a quiet sadness over the soul of Nina. But Hervey's presence, his liveliness, his care, prevented her from giving herself up wholly to depressing thoughts; he was more than ever to her, all—law and gospel.

In the mean time it was summer; nature was gloriously adorned—the harvest ripened—life was in full bloom, and our lovers saw each other daily. I know, my dear reader, that which thou hopest: anguish and strife of love—pain—frenzy—reconciliation—rapture—storm—passion; at last, a little murder or a secret marriage, and such like. Honor be to virtue and true strength! Nothing of all this have I to relate. Hervey would not win Nina with craft, but with perfect openness would ask her hand from those who had the right to dispose of it. He knew her heart—he had heard her prayer, and on that account he would not ask from her any binding promise. He wished that she should decide her own and his fate without any interference. On that account he watched over himself with the severity of an anchorite, and over her with the heavenly love of an angel. Resolved to venture the very extremest to possess her, he awaited with the deepest impatience the moment in which he might act—the arrival of Edla and Count Ludwig. Nina, in the mean time, was happy—that was all which Hervey desired. He surrounded her with an unceasing spring, and never gloomed even the least cloud these blessed days. By his love and by his teaching he strengthened and elevated her soul; and whenever the fervor of his feelings would have burst the bonds which he had imposed upon them, then he left her, and endeavored by labor and pains to regain strength and tranquillity; and then like a blessing of heaven, he came back to her. Was he unable to conceal from her the struggle or the melancholy of his soul, and her tender, questioning glance sought his, then said he, "Nina, you know why." She knew it—she gave him her hand, and they understood each other.

The Countess, deeply occupied with the Colonel, industriously pretended ignorance regarding the connection between Hervey and Nina. She wished by that means to escape from the blushes over her own inclination—she saw also, perhaps, not unwillingly, a rock springing up in Edla's path. The coldness and dislike which she had always cherished for Edla, had degenerated by degrees into actual hatred. We will see in what way.

The Countess felt that since the affair at Ramlösa, Edla could no longer esteem her. Edla, without ever asking her opinion, had arranged for Nina's betrothal with Count Ludwig, and had treated her, since the illness of the President, with coldness both by word of deed and by letter. The Countess knew very well that she deserved no better; yet this did not prevent the arising of a certain bitterness against Edla—a bitterness which was only heightened the more from the following circumstance.

The Countess had earlier been declared the idol of every great coterie, which consisted of nearly all the intellectual of Sweden from the north to the south. At that time people only spoke of Edla, to assert her to be the ugliest and most disagreeable creature on the whole earth. Now, on the contrary, the star of the Countess was setting, Edla's had begun to ascend and was now in its zenith. Travelling Swedes, who visited the President in Nizza, could not relate enough of Edla's self-denial; and praised the prudence which she exhibited in her care and attention to her feeble, irritable father. Edla's behavior began to be a universal subject of conversation, and as a sort of antithesis to that of the Countess, was exalted and praised. People gave her the surname of Antigone, and next to her filial virtue they celebrated her "intellectuality," her modesty, and her pure and excellent character. The correspondents of the Countess—and she had very many of these—wearied her with their incessant outbreaks of praise of Edla. Antigone, often accompanied by not unintelligible hints at the part which the Countess, the wife of the President, played, in comparison with his daughter. Several floating rumors about the handsome Herculean Colonel gave a degree of causticity to these hints, which the Countess felt in their full keenness. She revenged herself by hatred against Edla; and thus represented her as a proud, power-loving being, who sought to triumph over her.

In a short time the Colonel took a journey. During his absence the Countess seemed to recover some of the former tenderness to Nina. Yet still, even in her tenderness there lay egotism; she would, as it were, adorn herself with Nina. She had for a long time been envious of the admiration which Nina cherished for Edla; and now that she calculated upon Edla's speedy return, she began to labor to turn away a heart which to Edla was so dear. She spoke often to Nina of her sister, and commended her in such a way as was secretly designed to cool Nina's heart toward her.

"She is a most uncommon person," said she sometimes: "so strong, so calm, so assured. Happy she who has not to combat against a weak and yielding heart!"

Again she would say, "Edla belongs rather to heaven than earth. She needs nothing of that which constitutes the happiness of others. She is sufficient to herself."

Or, "Edla loves humanity; the human being is nothing to her. She would be always ready to sacrifice the well-being of the few to what she considered the well-being of the whole."

"Edla ought to be king or prime minister," said she among other things, "for she has a strong and determined will. For the carrying out of a great plan she never asks who she sacrifices. There is something of Charles XII. in her."

By degrees also the Countess began to express her disinclination for Count Ludwig, as well as her astonishment at Edla's great inclination for him, and to let a suspicion gleam through, that perhaps a tenderer sentiment toward Count Ludwig made Edla blind to his failings, and with this the Countess sometimes cast a pitying glance on Nina.

In Nina's present position, and in the state of mind between hope and fear in which she was, the words of the Countess could not remain without their influence. Besides this she also came pretty near the truth, and there mingled therefore with Nina's feeling a certain bitterness. Her feelings toward Edla changed more and more into fear. Edla's image melted by degrees into that of Count Ludwig. She turned her soul away from her sister, and bound it ever more inwardly, more strongly to the mild, strong, affectionate heart of Hervey. On the side of Edla and Count Ludwig, life appeared so cold, so joyless, so pale. On that of Hervey, ah! it was life itself—warm, bright—life full of love and joy. Without Nina remarking it, she came into opposition to Edla. She thought herself capable of complying with her wishes, and in reality was so no longer.

The summer was uncommonly hot and dry. It was now the beginning of August. The Countess, who endeavored in every way to make herself popular, and if possible to be misused as a joy-dispensing divinity when she left the country in the autumn, had determined to give to her tenants and all her neighbors a highly original harvest-festival. It was her intention to have a Sunday-dance for the peasants; and for this purpose she had had, on the plain not far distant from the Ume river, a beautiful pleasure-house erected, the upper story of which furnished a large dancing room, and the ground floor several pretty apartments. This light and agreeable building, called the Rotunda by the Countess, was surrounded by birches, which lent their shade. Hither, shortly before the festival, the Countess removed with Nina; partly, as she said, in order to have everything in readiness for the same, and partly because here they found coolness, which upon the bald height where the castle stood, it was in vain to seek. The Countess, besides this, had in truth another scheme in petto; but of that we will not talk just yet.

Everything was ready for the rural festivity; nothing was spared in order that it might be as brilliant as possible—when the tidings of death came, and put an end to all. Two letters of Edla arrived at the same moment. One, that of the earliest date, contained intelligence of the death of the President. "He fell asleep softly," wrote Edla, "without pain, without bitter presentiment of his departure. It is scarcely possible to die easier, and I thank God for this tranquil release. A few hours before his death he ate fruit, and that with considerable appetite. He was to the last moment kind and amiable toward every one, and shortly before his decease he fully recovered his mind. I have tender greetings from him to all those who were dear to him, especially to Nina. I have had the indescribable joy of dividing during the last days the care of my father with Count Ludwig. My father thanked him in words for his filial attention to him.

"Nina will reward you," said he; 'may she be all which I wish for you!'"

The other letter was of a date fourteen days later. Edla spoke therein of the interment of her father, and of her speedy return to Sweden. "I long," wrote she, "to see again the dear old cliffs. I long to embrace my Nina, and to unite her to her worthy husband. I return not alone—Count Ludwig follows my footsteps."

Edla said a few words respecting herself in the postscript.

"I have," she wrote, "during the long nights by the sick bed of my father, arranged the plan of a little work, the materials for which have lain collected in my mind for some time. It treats on intellectual education, particularly as regards my own sex. Its doctrines are the offspring of my own experience—of my own sufferings; and on this ground alone, I dare to hope that, amid the many books of this kind, mine may not be without its worth. I have sent a prospectus of it to Professor A. He will tell me whether my work answers its design."

Quietly and deeply wept Nina for her father; but this long-expected sorrow was not bitter. A deeper pang, mingled with fear, took possession of Nina's soul on the receipt of these letters.

Edla returned full of schemes and thoughts, which in part were totally strange to Nina, and in part militated entirely against the happiness of her life. Nina, so full of love, so full of longing after a happiness of which Edla had no conception, felt at this moment only fear of Edla's heaven. She wished for her return, and yet trembled at it, for Edla exercised a power over her soul which no fear and no doubt of her tenderness could lessen.

CHAPTER XXXVIII.

FOREBODINGS.

There blows through human life
A waft of death.

TROEN.

THEY expected Edla, yet without knowing the day of her return. Hervey's apparent calmness and her love to him kept up Nina's strength. She felt more and more that she could dare all for him, only not give him up.

A small company was assembled one morning with the Count. The neighbors admired the charming pleasure-house; drank lemonade, sat on the benches in the shade of the birches, talked politics, jested, and found themselves in excellent spirits. Edward Hervey alone this evening was not in his usual mood. With a certain quick impatience he broke off every conversation which one or other of the guests endeavored to commence with him, and in his usually so friendly and open glance there lay a gloomy shadow. At length he turned himself to a corpulent, lively gentleman, and inquired from him abruptly—

"Are you a believer in forebodings?"

"I must acknowledge," returned the other, "that according to my own experience, or much more to that of my wife, I do believe on forebodings as well as on dreams."

"How?" inquired Hervey.

"Well! in the last summer—allow me—no! in the summer before last, my wife dreamed that three of our best cows died of the diseased spleen. She told me her dream—it was on a Wednesday morning—no—on a Thursday it was. On Friday evening all three cows were dead! What say you to that, Pastor Hervey?"

"I believe," said one of the company who had heard Hervey's question, "that one has had too many proofs of warnings and dreams wholly to doubt of their foreshadowings. It is a universally known fact, that, a short time before his death, Henry IV. heard a continual funeral cry, which filled him with anxious disquiet. The apparition which Brutus saw before the battle of Philippi, Napoleon's warning in Egypt, and many such like examples, appear to me to belong to the family of forebodings, whose mystical appearance are as inexplicable as their power is undeniable."

"I myself," said the Countess, "have gone through life without making the least acquaintance with them. Yet I have seen their influence of the most sorrowful kind upon persons extremely dear to me. One of my near relations, a young, lively, amiable lady, who was most happily married, was about a year after her marriage possessed by a most sad presentiment of impending misfortune, for which she could not assign the slightest reason. In vain she endeavored to argue herself into consolation and reason; in vain her husband sought to banish by the tenderest care this preternatural feeling from her soul; it pursued her continually. It threw a black veil over the brightest day and even the most charming scenes of nature; in the most joyous tones of the gayest waltz she heard but sounds of mourning, even joy and laughter were to her only spectral tones. Her husband, in despair at this unhappy state of mind, determined to conduct her to her nearest and dearest relations, hoping that the journey and new scenes would dissipate her melancholy. His hopes appeared to be accomplished; she thanked him for his affectionate anxiety with redoubled tenderness. Every one exerted himself to eliven her and to divert her thoughts, and before so many friendly endeavors the dark forebodings seemed as if they must depart.

"After the young couple had passed several weeks, during the Christmas and New Year's festivities, in the country amid the most agreeable circle, the amiable Rosina had evidently improved; all anxious forebodings seemed to have vanished. One day the young couple drove over the frozen lake on a visit to a kind neighbor, with whom they very pleasantly took dinner, and spent part of the evening. Late in the moonlight they set out to return. Shortly, however, before she left the house, Rosina was alone, when suddenly she heard indescribably charming music before the window. She listened attentively, and plainly distinguished a funeral hymn. Trembling, she hastened to the window and withdrew the curtain; a beautiful boy stood without, in the clear moonlight winter night, and sang thus sweetly in this mournful manner. At her appearance he withdrew, seemed to dissolve into air, and the sounds died away in sighs. Deeply shocked, and again taken possession of by her sad forebodings, Rosina, pale as death, hastened to her husband, and imparted to him the circumstance and her grievous anxiety. She conjured him not to set out this night; the kind inhabitants of the house united their wishes and prayers to hers—but in vain. Rosina's husband was quite out of humor with the return of her diseased imagination, and resolved at once to oppose with the full force of his determination these spectral ideas. For the first time in his life he was deaf to her prayers and tears. He led her to the carriage, placed himself close beside her, and held her to his breast. With sorrow and submission she clung to him, spoke a mournful farewell to those who stood round, lay silently on the breast of her husband, and waited for that which should happen.

"Thick clouds in the mean time had come over the heavens, and concealed the moon; a strongly increasing wind soon blew out the lamps. The coachman was not perfectly sober, which, on account of the disquiet of their setting out, had not been observed. In the closed carriage all was still and dark; the horses sprang forward gayly on the smooth ice, and made their bells ring merrily. Suddenly, however, all was hushed. The ice cracked—the windows flew open—the water rushed in, and all vanished in a large opening in the ice! People found afterward the corpses of the young couple, clasped still in death together!"

Nina's tears flowed. "This was not a bitter death," whispered she; "it need not have been foretold by such sad presentiments."

Hervey contemplated her with an inexpressible glance.

The company was silent for some time; for the relation of the Countess had not been made without effect. Presently they related other experiences of this kind.

"I knew very intimately," said some one, "a highly rational family, in which all incidents which occurred in it were announced by a nightly apparition."

"With this faith in apparitions and warnings," said now one of the gentlemen with great warmth, "is, however, the door opened to the most foolish superstition and the absurdest imaginings. I am convinced that no one can ever have a stronger presentiment than was that which accompanied me through the years of my boyhood. I fancied, namely, firmly and fast, that I was to be torn to pieces by a lion; and yet here stand I now healthy and vigorous, without having ever even seen a lion, excepting in copperplate engravings, and hope also to go on thus, and to die a peaceful death in my bed. My sister, who read Miss Radcliffe's romances, had a presentiment, as strong as mine, that she was to be carried off by a pirate, and to become a Sultana in Turkey. But even to the present time, when she is fifty years old, she has not even found a lover! Seriously, I believe that one may with certainty maintain that out of twenty remarkable forewarnings, one at the most is fulfilled; but even for that there is some simple and sufficient ground. For how natural is it that feelings and thoughts, which have occupied themselves for long with one object, influence the imagination, and bring before it feverish images. In our changing world it is not difficult to stumble upon circumstances which accord with this or that presentiment; and the imagination which is thus called forth, sets about to make reality yet more to suit it. Many a warning also is first noticed after the occurrence."

"Granted," replied Hervey; "and yet there is an infinite number which cannot be so easily explained. One piece of experience which goes through the whole history, shows this, that there is a dark, mystical side of human existence, which appears to follow no determined laws, but which makes man acknowledge that he is surrounded by a spiritual world, whose power exercises a certain influence upon his whole life. Impossible as it may be for us to explain these phenomena, it is just as impossible for us to deny their existence. Probably they belong to the universal wise ordination of things, which we shall first comprehend on the other side of this world. The All-merciful would certainly have spared us the pang which the unintelligibility and the inexplicability of such passing impressions occasion us, had it lain in the ordination of his eternal and holy laws."

The tone in which Hervey said this expressed such a deep depression of mind, that Nina's eyes were riveted upon him with uneasiness and tenderness.

"I fancy that we, in these days," said Mr. N. with a well-bred air and a reproving manner, "are far removed from ghost and omen; and I confess, best Pastor Hervey, that I had taken you for a far more rational man."

Hervey smiled. He smiled indeed as an angel might smile over the conceited wisdom of a human being. Nina's lovely affectionate eyes met his with the most heartfelt intelligence. He turned himself kindly to his neighbor, and said, "Above all things would it be foolish to allow these dark suggestions too great a power over us; and for this purpose means have been provided, for this purpose the sun is in heaven, and the human eye speaks kindness, truth, and beauty. What shadows are they which would not flee before these?"

At this moment a letter was given to him, which he hastily opened, and then left the company. Sunk in thought, Nina walked down to the river, whose restless waves seemed to-day to roll about more violently than common. Here it was that Hervey sought her. Great uneasiness and excitement were expressed in his features.

"I must leave you," said he; "I must take a journey." He gave to her the letter, which contained the following lines, written by a trembling hand—

"If you would mitigate the pangs of conscience of a dying man; if you would see an important secret brought to light, hasten without delay to W. Inquire to the inn there for a man of the name of Erik B. He will conduct you to the writer of these lines. But travel day and night; for I am weak, and my hours are numbered."

Nina, turning pale, gave him back the letter, while she said—

"You must hence! O quick, quick—ah, the unfortunate!"

A lively hope that the secret referred to might concern himself and might unbind the fetters of his life awoke in Hervey's soul; but the joy of this was almost crushed by the thoughts of separation. The letter came from a distant place out of another province; Hervey's absence must continue for several days. Edla might come in the mean time—Count Ludwig—Nina remained alone with them! This thought filled him with unspeakable distress. He could not conceal his disquiet—his deep pain of heart. Nina was now the gently consoling, sustaining friend, only it was a long time before he could listen to her words. He went and came; wished to speak and was silent. Suddenly he violently seized her hand, and exclaimed, "Vow to me—swear to me—no!" interrupted he himself, letting her go, "no—no oath!" He tore himself from her, walked backward and forward, then turned to her, and said slowly and firmly—

"I will not—I cannot lose you!" He held her hands in his, pressed them to his burning face, and Nina felt the hot tears upon them.

Nina also wept, but she found words to comfort her. "What shall be able to separate us?" said she with such warmth, as if she would overcome the future by its power. "Have I not freedom to speak and to act? Believe me, Edla shall not—cannot divide us. Ah, Edward! you are more to me than her, than the whole world. Since I have loved you, I am weak no longer. I have strength to withstand circumstances; nay, I feel that I could even oppose the will of my sister. But Edla will see and feel that there is no life, no joy on earth, no bliss in heaven, only in you and with you! Edward, I will pray, conjure—ah, I know it, I am sure of it, I can move her. She cannot sever me from you!"

Nina spoke long, warmly, tenderly, full of the sweetest affection. Hervey listened to her, while his eye devoured her. A violent desire to clasp her to his heart, to call her his bride, burned in his soul. He wished thereby to conjure the anxious foreboding which spoke continually of severing, and at the same time to bind Nina to him for ever. Burning with pain and love, he clasped her—she looked at him terrified, and he asked with glowing eye, "Nina?"

"Beloved!" replied the quiet, pale, touching form. "It is in your power to make me happy or miserable. Do you see the waves at my feet? Throw me into their depths; I will be still and not complain. I should tremble less at that, than that you should forget your vow, and my prayers. Edward, kill me rather! Ah, death would be sweet to me from your beloved hand!"

At these words and tones the wild passion laid itself in Hervey's breast. He bent his knee before that adored being, and pressed her hands violently to his breast and forehead.

"Nina, forgive me," exclaimed he with agitated voice; "but do not forget that my life's well-being lies in your hands."

With these words, he tore himself from her, and disappeared.

Stupefied with suffering, Nina sat down on a piece of rock on the river's shore. She had never before seen Hervey so violent, or so excited. Tears, prayers, and a thousand softly breathed forth vows of love, brought at length tranquillity back to her heart: her whole soul was only one thought—one feeling for him.

The day after this parting Nina spent with Hervey's mother. She felt an inward need of obtaining strength and calmness from the excellent old lady. She longed so heartily to hear his sister Maria speak of her beloved brother. Hervey's mother received Nina with open arms, and as a mother, pressed her to her breast. For the first time she spoke with Nina of her son's hopes. She was too proud of him for the higher birth of his beloved to occasion her any embarrassment. To her it seemed so natural, so necessary to love him, and to wish to belong to him. Besides this she expressed such warm wishes for his happiness, and such a motherly love for Nina as penetrated her heart with the sweetest hopes and feelings. Maria was gay and happy, and set before her the best and the fairest which the house contained, and this was, thanks to her own skillfulness, not a little. Nina sang enchantingly, and drew tears from her listeners. What warm, beautiful words were spoken of Edward Hervey! Nina listened to them with a happy heart. This day was friendly and charming, as days always are to kind, intelligent people who share in one deep, common interest.

In the evening Maria accompanied Nina on her way home. The heaven was gloomy, and the air sultry, yet the two young friends remarked it not. Nina sang by the way a little song which was Maria's favorite. Maria wove for Nina a garland of the large forget-me-not. The heavenly blue glory became that loving Madonna's countenance bewitchingly.

They parted at Nina's Rest. Maria kissed her tenderly and went back. Nina stood by the brook, and saw her face in its pure mirror; it looked so heavenly with its azure garland and with the green surrounding bushes. Nina thought herself lovely; she felt it with joy, for her beauty was for Hervey. With this, with everything she possessed of good, with the gifts of fortune and education, would she wind herself as a flower-tendrill in his life. It was a moment in which her soul, full of the image of her beloved, swam in the purest happiness.

At this moment she felt herself softly embraced. She looked around her, and was in Edla's arms. A slight shudder passed through her. She felt herself taken possession of by fate—by a separating fate—and Edla's grave features appeared in the deep mourning dress still sterner and paler than common. Yet no severity reigned in Edla's heart; she never had been tenderer, and soon Nina lay with child-like submission on her breast.

After the first outburst of feeling Edla stepped back, and surveyed Nina with joy and amazement. Nina's beauty had now reached its most splendid development, and was in fact bewitching. She was no more the pale, feeble girl, which a breath threatened to destroy; she was a blooming Hebe, full of health and life. Tears of the purest joy filled Edla's eyes, and she pressed her enchanting sister again to her heart. Nina's silence, her tears, and her visible constraint, distressed Edla, but she took no notice of it. She seated herself quietly beside Nina on the turf bench, and told her of her father, and of his last days, speaking all the while in so gentle a manner that Nina's emotion by degrees calmed itself. There is nothing so well calculated to still the uneasy beating of the heart for earthly weal or woe, as thoughts of the moment when all things cease to us, and all things change around us. There was also in Edla's voice and in her whole being an uncommon softness which did Nina good to her very heart. She involuntarily took courage for the future, and she breathed more lightly.

"And now," said Edla at length, "I have a prayer to you. Come into the castle with me, and I have much to say to you, and—I expect this evening still a visit; it has reference particularly to you, and it will not surprise you, Nina. Count Ludwig followed my steps. A year is passed since you separated. Nina, I bring you your father's blessing upon your approaching union. In the clear moments which he had before his death he spoke only of your marriage with Count Ludwig, and sent to his darling the prayer to make the noblest of men happy. Come, Nina, our mother will allow us to pass this first evening alone with each other—come, that I may lay your hand in that of the most excellent of men."

Nina knew no dissimulation, and it would have been impossible to her to have been false to Edla. Prudence would, it is true, have counselled her to have deferred the dreaded acknowledgment; but the surprise, her customary candor, and an inward impulse of heart to be open toward her sister, accelerated the dangerous declaration.

"Edla!—Edla!" stammered Nina trembling, and with pale lips, "I cannot follow you now!"

Edla also now turned pale, and laid her hand violently on her breast, as if she would stifle a pain which was there. Yet she collected herself, and spoke with almost beseeching voice.

"And why not now? Why not now? Ah! this now I have so long looked for—so long expected! I have so rejoiced myself over this now, in which I should again see my Nina, the child of my heart—in which I should find her willing to follow me, and to fulfil the last prayer of our father! Why not now?"

"Edla! Edla! ah, do not talk to me so," besought the deeply agitated Nina.

"And why not so?" asked Edla gravely.

"Why this emotion—these violent tears? Nina, what is amiss with you?"

"Edla, let me lie here—here at your feet. Let me open my whole heart to you!" cried Nina, as she sank before her sister on her knees, and hid her face in her hands. "Edla! be not severe toward me. Edla—my sister, my second mother!"

"Now?" asked Edla, with impatience.

"Now, Edla! I cannot see Count Ludwig again without explaining to you and him—that I cannot belong to him—that my whole soul, that my whole heart belongs to another!"

Edla turned away. "So then it is true," said she with deep pain, "that which they told me—that which I have so violently contended against—that which Nina dared not to discover to her sister! Nina! Nina, remember Don Juan!"

Nina raised herself. Humble, but full of self-respect, she said with glowing cheek—"I remember it, Edla! and with abhorrence for the weak creature that I then was: I remember that man only the more inwardly to love and to admire Edward Hervey."

"Edward Hervey!" exclaimed Edla with a cry of horror; "Edward Hervey then is his name? Thus then it is true. O my God! unfortunate, deceived sister!"

Nina looked on her sister with calm self-possession.

"Nina," continued Edla, "when I tell you that the man whom you love is an unworthy person; that he has deceived you; that his amiability is only the glistening cloak of a false soul; his goodness, sensual weakness; that he deceived his friend and benefactor, whose sister he seduced, and whose death he occasioned; that he has violated the most sacred duties,—will you then still love him?"

"Edla," replied Nina, "I know that a gloomy mystery rests upon his life; I know that a charge has been made against him of which he is not guilty. He will be able some time to justify himself; but should he not be able to do so, still he is innocent! I know it—he is innocent!"

"And if I produced a witness," said Edla, "of that which I tell you, and you will not believe? If Count Ludwig were the friend whom he deceived, and whose sister he made unfortunate—"

"Notwithstanding, I would not believe it," cried Nina. "Neither him nor any man would I believe who told me what was bad of Edward Hervey. I will pledge my life for his innocence."

Edla saw Nina's violent agitation of mind. She compelled herself to be calm, seized the hand of her sister, and drew her gently beside her on the turf seat. "Listen to me calm'y, my Nina," prayed she; "let your feeling, your own sense decide between us. I confess that your union with Count Ludwig was one of my favorite ideas. I have known him from his youth, and have never seen him other than noble, upright, and firm. It appeared to me that he was the most proper support for you; it appeared to me that you were pre-eminently made to beautify his life, and to moderate and soften the stern material of his character. I saw you pass through life happy and virtuous. Ah! I saw more than that. O Nina! I had such beautiful dreams. I must tell you. I saw Count Ludwig made gentle and happy by you, and his beneficent influence widely diffused around. I saw—ah, it was a blessed night!—through your united activity, much good brought about, much light arise for our country. It seemed to me as if I saw humanity advanced by you, supported and assisted by you in their demands for happiness and right. I hoped to hear the blessings of the world pronounced upon you—to see the mercy of heaven beam around your beloved head. Tell me, Nina, has such a life, such an activity, no worth for you? Is the time past in which your heart beat warmly for it? Is your own little happiness more dear to you than the well-being of humanity?"

"Oh no, no!" cried Nina with tears; "but Edla—"

"Listen to me further," interrupted Edla, "I have yet much to say to you. Then I will listen to you. Nina! with these thoughts, with these long-cherished dear hopes, I come now back. Count Ludwig has, by the blessing of your father, still juster pretensions to you; and you, Nina, you now step back. All these reasons are nothing to you. You love another. Your own satisfaction, the accomplishment of your own wishes, are all you think of. Everything else is nothing, Nina. If it only come to the giving up of my own dearest wishes—to the sacrificing the joy and hope of my life for your happiness—if this happiness could only last—the man whom you love were worthy of you—then I would not ask whether he be of humble birth, whether his sphere of action be narrow and unknown; the shed small and hidden in which the flower whose beauty enchanted my heart has withdrawn from the eye of the world—for everywhere will it diffuse its heavenly fragrance—yes, Nina, the deepest wishes of my heart, my life itself, would I sacrifice for your happiness. But the man whom you love is unworthy—"

"He is not!" exclaimed Nina with strong emotion. "Edla, see him, hear him, become acquainted with him, before you pass judgment on him and me. Contemplate his actions, his human love; listen, how there is only one voice respecting him; inquire in the dwellings of the poor, where he is an angel of love and compassion. Ah, Edla! my soul was without strength, my life without value, till I knew him. Through him have I gained courage and will to act. Everything which you taught me, Edla, to love and to admire, all that love I and admire in him. Part us not, Edla! My father would not have parted us had he known Hervey. Become acquainted with him, and you yourself will love and trust him. Still no sacred oath binds us. You alone shall decide our fate; such are my wishes, such are his. Sever not the flower from the stem, from its root. Hervey is my stem, my root; separated from him my life would consume, would waste away. With Count Ludwig—O Edla, do not deceive yourself!—I should never have fulfilled your expectations. Without love, without happiness, I should be only feeble and helpless as I was; I should dream away my life. Listen to me, Edla! Let me pray you—let me move you. Sever us not from each other; or I might say, Why did you place yourself between me and death, as he would have laid me in my early grave? I should then never have experienced the weariness of existence, the heaven of life and love; I should have known no combat, no longing; I need not now have stood before you to beg from you my own happiness. Oh! if you will not extinguish for ever the light of earth which you re-awoke on that night—if you will not make cold the heart which your love then warmed—Edla, oh give me life anew—condemn not my love—bless him whom I love—sever us not—sever us not!"

"You say," continued Nina, speaking more calmly, "that he has violated sacred duties. Edla, that is slander. It is possible that he never may be able to free himself from the shadow which an incomprehensible fate has thrown over his pure life. He himself has prepared me for this. It may be. What matters that, my Edla? God sees the heart; and human life is not so long. I will share his fate; I will help to bear his shame, if shame can rest on his head. Life, death, care, want, all are dear to me by his side. A higher power has for ever united our souls. Part us not from each other, Edla."

Edla's tears flowed. "So much love," said she, half aloud to herself, "and that for a deceiver!"

"He is no deceiver!" asserted Nina with the deepest conviction. "So surely as I believe on the eternal goodness and truth of God, so surely believe I on Hervey, his noblest work. If he be a criminal in your eyes, reject me also. Edla, am I so deeply sunk in your opinion, that you have no longer confidence in me? Edla, accept me as the pledge of his innocence!"

Edla turned away her face, covered her eyes with her hands, and said with a deep pain, "I do not believe you! Pitiable one! you love an unworthy man!"

Only injustice against Hervey could have wrought up Nina's beautiful spirit to rebellion to her sister. Her heart felt at this moment the deepest bitterness, and she turned violently away from Edla.

"You despise me, then," said she quite with desperation, but outward calmness, "you reject me! Well, then, I will flee to a breast that will not do so. Edla! I see now—that which I suspected—you never loved me; and that I henceforth—which I never considered possible—shall be able to live without your esteem."

She rose and was about to go.

With an outbreak of violence, such as Nina had never before seen in her sister, Edla exclaimed,

"You know not what you say, nor what you do! Passion blinds you! I must save you against your will! Follow me!"

She seized Nina's hand with the commanding look and the assured bearing which earlier had so much power over the tender child. Now Nina also felt herself incapable of withstanding her. A shudder went through her; she fancied she heard Count Ludwig approaching, she saw Edla place her hand in his; she tottered, her eyes closed, and she would inevitably have fallen to the ground had not the Countess, who at this moment came up, caught her in her arms. Nina withdrew her hand from Edla, threw herself on the neck of the Countess, and feebly whispered, "Do not leave me!"

Edla heard these words. An unspeakable sorrow passed through her soul. She saw herself deserted, mistaken, feared by the being who she loved most tenderly on earth; saw this being hanging even over the brink of an abyss.

Violent emotions of pain and envy went through Edla's heart as she saw Nina and the Countess, who with the tenderest caresses endeavored to recall the half fainting girl to consciousness.

Edla softly approached, and taking Nina's hand, besought with a mournful voice, "Nina, my sister, follow me!"

"No! no!" was Nina's short answer, as she withdrew her hand.

"Let her be quiet! let her stay this night quietly with me," said the Countess, "to-morrow we will meet again up at the castle. She requires rest; you see, she wishes, herself, to remain with me."

"Are you afraid of me?" asked Edla, as she looked searchingly into Nina's face.

Nina made no reply. She pressed her pale countenance to the breast of the Countess, and perhaps did not hear Edla's question.

Edla, however, heard in this silence, saw in this turning from her, a heavy answer. Silently, and with a heart sick to death, she withdrew.

The Countess conducted Nina to her chamber; laid her upon her bed, gave her composing drops; and when she saw that, half stupefied, she sunk into comfortable sleep, she left her, locked her door, sent off the two maid-servants, who were in the pleasure-house, to a dance in the next village, and went to the upper story to wait for the Colonel, whom that evening she expected to see there.

With slow steps Edla went to the castle. Her head was deeply bowed to her breast, her arms hung down powerlessly; her gait was unassured, her whole being had not its accustomed bearing—her heart was violently torn. Poor Edla!

A moist wind whistled through the trees, then was the air as still as death. Large rain-drops fell heavily at long intervals. Behind her was heard the dull roaring of the sea. Edla slowly ascended the hill. The cricket sang, and the glowworm shone in the grass, but Edla observed it not. Her way seemed long and difficult. Arrived in her chamber, she found the air unbearably oppressive; she opened the window, looked into the wide country, and breathed with difficulty.

Deep obscurity was round about. The sea was dark and stormy. Heavy, black-gray, shapeless clouds passed over the sky; a blood-red stripe only edged the horizon, but even this rapidly sank into deep night. Black darkness covered the whole country, and a wild spirit seemed, with invisible, mischief-bearing wings, to hover over all.

Edla stood long and contemplated the night-world, which at this moment was a true image of her inward feeling. A painful sense of weariness and bitterness—those companions of her youth—fell upon her heart. She bethought herself how the lives of so many people pass on without joy; she thought upon the long nights of the troubled and the uncomfortable. The deep night of long centuries passed over her soul, in which lived whole nations, whose lives were a night-wandering—whose sun only a blood-red ray, whose repose only the hush of the storm. She glanced upward to heaven, yet not one star was to be seen; all was veiled in blackness. She thought on Nina; her heart bled, and her soul was "troubled even to death." It seemed to her as if there were nothing good, nothing lovely, nothing constant in life; that no friendship, no love was capable of withstanding the fiery trial of time and temptation. Had not Nina's heart turned itself from her? Life looked at her from out of that dark night like a pale image of deceit, and the features of its countenance expressed only pain.

But Edla could think and feel thus only for a moment. In her breast, strength had only a short ebb. With the force of her will, with the light of her reason, she soon called back the stream, and her soul moved in its accustomed element. The words of the wise, the actions of the good, arose like bright constellations in her memory. She thought upon the transitoriness of life; on the Resurrection; on firmness of faith; she tried her own heart—a tear fell upon its wounds—and she was calm. Yet once more she let her glance pass over subjected nations and suffering humanity—over the shipwrecks of body and soul. She sunk herself into the sorrows of earth—she understood them all, pressed her hands tight upon her breast, and as if for every single one, pronounced with fervency the words, "Believe! Endure!"

And, as with this she raised her glance to heaven, behold! the clouds parted themselves directly over her head, and several stars gleamed forth like friendly eyes. Edla felt herself animated and strengthened. She stood looking upward, till the clouds again covered the stars. Then she went to arrange several things for the arrival of Count Ludwig, and never had her heart been more tranquil, her words and looks more kind.

When she returned to her chamber, she seated herself with a consoled mind, and listened to the ever increasing storm, to the heavy rain which lashed the window panes, and to the fearful roaring of the sea. Brightly burned the wax-lights on the table, though the flames were wasted to and fro; deep sorrow and a high joy dwelt at the same time in her bosom. She took her pen and wrote:

"Is the little happiness of an individual worth speaking of in infinite life? Human happiness! Hence with it! The greatest, the most virtuous, have worn crowns of thorns!

"To develop oneself, to protect oneself, for a higher light, for a higher strength. Yes! to comprehend the spirit of life—to endeavor to obtain it! That one must do.

"She shrinks before combat and trouble. Yes! It is difficult, I know it well, and she is yet young and weak; but my arm shall support her; shall combat for her. She shall not sink. With bleeding breast will I carry her, till my latest strength gives way. She shall not belong to him; no, never! Her heart will bleed; what matters that? Such blood-baths are strengthening. Mine will yet bleed stronger for her. O that I could alone suffer and endure for her! how happy should I be!"

"To be solitary—to be alone—to be loved by no one—to be necessary to the happiness of no one—to hear no sigh, to see no tear in our last hour! Why does this thought appear so terrible, so appalling to most people? The lonely are afraid of themselves.

"To be alone? Had we never inwardly loved—never given our hearts to another—then methinks, with the thoughts directed to the wonders and mysteries of creation, it would not be hard to pass lonely and alone through the world; adoring only the Eternal and Alone One who dwells above the stars; who is the origin of all thought, the unfold of all mysteries and of all enigmas—then methinks it would not be hard to pass lonely and alone through the world. But from the moment in which one person loves another exclusively, he needs mutual love—or he feels life to be barren and empty—and this is a mournful weakness!"

"Man must endure pain and emptiness. They cease. To know this, to think on this, is already repose, is already strength."

CHAPTER XXXIX.

A NIGHT.

Stars twinkling brightly,
Thy life's path decay:
Stars beckon brightly
The weary on high.—THE STAR SONG.

NINA lay on her bed. Her violently agitated feelings had given place to a sort of stupefaction, and she had sunk still deeper into an uneasy sleep, or rather dreaming unconsciousness. Suddenly it seemed to her as if the walls and ceiling of her chamber had disappeared, and an infinite desert opened before her. In the depths rocked the limitless sea, and a great black cloud hung heavily over a desolate country. A terrific form, with the aspect of an angry god, lay reposing upon the cloud, and scattered abroad wild lightning. His eyes directed themselves to Nina, and his lips spoke the agitating words—"Renounce thy love! Renounce joy, and every happiness! Renounce thy beloved!"

It appeared to Nina as if her heart powerfully raised itself in opposition, and yet an irresistible force compelled her to say "yes!" She heard herself pronounce this "yes" of renunciation, and shuddered in her deepest soul. With that the cloud, with the form of terror, rose higher and higher, and vanished at length from her eyes. All appeared changed, and the sea was gone. Upon a bald dreary height she discerned yet another form; a still, pale, advancing form. The features became more and more distinct, and she recognized him whom she so inwardly, so inexpressibly, so above all others loved. He extended his arms toward her. The height upon which that beloved image stood seemed now firmly planted, as by an invisible hand, close before her. The form laid his hands upon hers, and looked long upon her with eyes full of sorrow. A smile of the deepest pain was round the mouth. Nina cried, "O tell me, tell me, that thou believest in my love! That thou forgive me!" The apparition let the hand fall from his heart, and Nina saw in its place only a deep and widely gaping wound, while the form still fixed upon her his heart-broken and inexpressibly mournful eyes. Nina felt that she must die. Suddenly, however, a strong, hoping feeling penetrated her soul; she felt the strength of love, and cried—"With my heart will I fill up the space in thy breast; with the glances of my love will I reanimate thy eyes!" She stretched forth her arms, and felt herself, as by an invisible power, raised up to her beloved. Her glance began to brighten, and her heart dissolved in rapture. With that there stepped between them a commanding figure; it was Edla! Icy coldness passed through Nina's breast, and paralyzed her limbs. She saw Edward no more. She saw only Edla close to her bed. Her eye was stern. She held a cup in her hand, out of which she commanded Nina to drink. Nina was about to obey, yet the draught was bitter; she felt that it was the bitterness of life, and with indescribable abhorrence she thrust it from her. Edla raised Nina's head, held it firmly and fast, and compelled her to empty the cup. She felt the draught of death flow over her lips and down into her breast.

A confused sound of human voices, full of lamentation and horror—a mighty rushing and cracking—now struck upon Nina's ear, and woke her from that dream of anguish yet only to new terrors. She felt the earth under her totter. A dull frightful thundering filled the air, and a furious storm raged through it. Ah, no!—it was no imagining, no dream—a cold bitter wave struck actually on Nina's lips. Terrified, she raised herself and collected her thoughts. Flowing waters rocked her bed, and swung it hither and thither. For a moment the moon burst through the storm-lashed clouds; it showed a rocking sea, that rushed through the broken window in powerful gusts, and rose higher and higher in the room. The slightly built pleasure-house seemed about to fall, and from all sides despairing cries for help were heard.

Nina recalled to mind the sudden floods* with which she had heard this country was often visited, and comprehended at once the greatness of the danger. She collected all her powers in order to think what was best to do. Hastily she arose, and endeavored through the water to reach the door; but she found it locked. She cried for help, but could not hope, in the general confusion, that she should be heard. Holding then by the walls, she endeavored to reach the window. She leaned far out, and saw only the ruin in its entire frightfulness. Dark, powerful, and tempestuous, the flood bore down everything; trees overturned; swimming cattle raised with distressed cries of anguish their heads above the waves, as if they would call for help. The moon's still beam rested upon the fearful scene, and showed no means of salvation. The flood appeared to have taken all by surprise as well as Nina. As Nina's cries for help were answered only by others like her own, and as the waves rose higher and higher, she felt that death approached her. Bitterly, and with a shuddering distinctness, this thought, like a foretaste of the last hour, passed through her soul. She saw how the waters already rose to her breast, and soon would stifle upon her lips all her cries and prayers; she thought how they would soon wash away the tears from her eyes, and close them for ever. And no beloved hand could clasp hers; no loving glance infuse strength and consolation! Nina wept: her hot tears fell into the all-devouring flood. In order to preserve her life as long as possible, she mounted upon the window-ledge; here the waters reached but to her knee. She held fast by the cross-work of the window, and waited patiently in this situation, while the wind and waves played with her hair and her white night-dress. Nina thought on Edla. An unspeakable feeling of remorse and pain passed through her breast; she longed to kiss her hand, and in this last moment to pray for her forgiveness. She thought on Hervey; she felt how inexpressibly dear he was, and how bitter it was to part from a world in which he lived. With her angel-like face looking upward to heaven, she fervently prayed for him and for compassion upon herself.

Higher still rose the waters; the waves beat with frightful force; they bathed Nina's rich and unloosened hair, and struck coldly and murderously her breast. "It comes—it comes, bitter death!" thought the trembling sacrifice. "Oh, my second mother, couldst thou see me now, thou wouldst forgive thy child! Oh Edward—O Edla!" With this cry of longing and the anguish of death she stretched forth her arms as if she would take a last parting from those who were dearest to her on earth.

She observed at that moment a black speck upon the wild flood, which appeared not to be driven by the waves, but rather to govern them. Hoping and fearing, Nina followed it with her eye. It rose and sank with the waves, but always appeared again, and approached nearer and nearer. Amid the confused roaring, and the crashing of overturned houses, and cries for help and shrieks of terror, Nina thought she could now distinctly perceive the regular dash of oars; and as, foreboding death and almost beside herself, she exclaimed, "Edward—Edla!" the sound of her own name, dully, but yet distinctly, struck her ear. Aton and it sounded more plainly still. "Nina—Nina!" cried a well-known, beloved voice, through the storm and night. A boat struggled with the wild waters, and parted them with powerful strokes. Two persons were in it. In the forepart lay a female form upon her knees—it was Edla. Now the boat reached the window. Edla stretched out her arms, and caught hold on Nina. Nina tightly embraced her sister. In the next moment she lay saved upon a soft covering in the boat. Like a sheltering roof, Edla bowed herself over her. Yet for a moment paused the man who plied the oars before the house, whence despairing voices cried, "Save—save us!"

"Save them!—save them!" cried Edla, without looking up, for her eyes were riveted on Nina.

"Hence with us; the house is falling!" cried the man with the oars.

The roof gave way—one of the loosened stones fell upon Edla's shoulder; she sank upon her side, but still remained as defence and shield bowed over Nina. Struggling against the strongly advancing waters, the conductor of the boat only succeeded, by the most desperate efforts, to push off from the falling house. Death hovered over them. "We are lost!" said he, with a hoarse voice. Edla looked up. A spar shot down from the roof, and threatened to overwhelm that light vessel. Edla sprang up, raised her uninjured arm, and offered her breast to that blind missile of death. It fell, struck her breast, but by the force of her arm was directed sideways, and fell close to the boat in the water. The force of the fall threw the waves high up together; they mixed themselves with Edla's blood. At the same moment another boat rowed past them toward the tumbling house. The voice of Baron H. was heard calmly and firmly directing the course of the boat.

"Whom have you saved?" said he in passing them.

"Nina," answered Count Ludwig's voice intelligibly.

"Good!" cried the Baron, now driven far onward by the waves. The flood raged, the storm howled, the rain poured down in torrents; and amid horror and destruction might be heard the despairing cries of many voices. The words, "My wife—my child! Mother! Brother!" rang through the air, and went like swords to the hearts of those who heard them. From half-diminished cottages sounded forth grief and entreaties. Mothers held their weeping children from the windows: Count Ludwig remained deaf to their cries. He looked with falcon eye only upon his vessel; it shot securely thence over the wild flood, and the stillness of death reigned in it.

With manly strength Count Ludwig worked the oars, but the sweat of anxiety covered his pale forehead. Whenever an impediment stopped the course of the boat, he sprang up to his neck in water and made it free. With ever renewed strength he rowed onward, and saw how by degrees he approached the height on which the castle stood. There shown lights; there were heard calling, praying voices; there flowed tears of anguish. There at length he landed.

CHAPTER XL.

THE LAST HOUR.

Let thought exalt us!—THEOBALD.

THE sun looked feebly down through gray clouds on the day after that terrible night. Feebly shone he upon Edla's couch, and upon the features on which death had already stamped his intelligible and inexorable "Thou art mine!"

A deep silence, interrupted only by a few low words, reigned in the chamber. An old clergyman at that moment, with the silver cup in his trembling hand, withdrew from Edla's bedside. He had administered the Holy Sacrament; he had united his prayers with hers, and now stepped silently aside, because he felt that this soul needed not his consolations.

At the foot of the bed stood Professor A—, whom the wish again to see Edla had brought to Umenäs, and who arrived at the moment when her soul had raised its wings for flight toward the other world. With the pain of a human spirit, but with the resolve of a philosopher, contemplated he his friend. Near him, with quiet firmness, stood Count Ludwig; at the head of the bed, Clara and the sorrowful physician; both saw how a still holier calm—a still increasing clearness, diffused itself over the pain-distorted features of the sufferer. Nina was not absent. She had lain unconscious from the time when Edla's blood streamed over her till within a few minutes of the present time, and now, almost borne in the arms of the Baroness, she entered the room.

Pale and tottering, beautiful and unearthly as a ghost which had left its grave, entered Nina. Her hands were folded close together; her eyes bathed in tears, her breath short and convulsive. An inward shudder shook her delicate frame; the pale lips whispered half unconsciously, "Edla! Edla!"

Edla's eye beamed upon her with heavenly tranquillity, with unspeakable tenderness; and as she sank down on the bed, Edla embraced her with the uninjured arm, and laid her face close to hers.

"Child of my heart! my rescued child! my darling!" whispered Edla, with the most heartfelt tones, as her lips, for the first time, kissed Nina's mouth and eyes. Now would she permit herself to do this. The deep pain of Nina's bosom burst forth at these caresses in endless tears. Ah! at this moment both sisters felt how infinitely they loved each other. Presently, bowever, Edla interrupted this outpouring of the inmost heart, and inquired from Nina with earnestness,

"Wilt thou give to my last hour on earth repose and peace?"

"Command—govern me!" said Nina, with a sincere impulse to sacrifice herself to show obedience.

"Lay thy hand upon my breast," prayed Edla. Nina did so.

"Promise me never to become the wife of Edward Hervey."

"I promise it!" replied Nina. The thunder-bolt of fate rolled over her.

"Swear to me to avoid seeing him!"

"I swear it," answered Nina in entire submission.

"I thank thee!" said Edla. Great uneasiness worked in her features. Her eye shifted from Nina to Count Ludwig, from Count Ludwig to Nina; yet her lips spoke no word. Nina looked long at her, and at length gave her hand to Count Ludwig. She felt the most urgent necessity to sacrifice herself to Edla—to die for her.

"I promise obedience," said Nina to Count Ludwig.

He pressed her hand, and held it firmly in his.

Edla's eyes filled with tears; she saw the greatness of the sacrifice, but she accepted it. To leave Nina alone, unprotected in a world in which Hervey lived—and the Countess Natalie had the next right over her—was for Edla a thought before which she shuddered. For a long time, searchingly and penetratively, she contemplated Nina and Count Ludwig. An extraordinary strength had as it were elevated Nina's being; tranquil and self-possessed she stood like Iphigenia at the altar, ready to receive the blow which was to separate her from life. Edla did not see in this repose the strength of despair, but the power of a higher influence, the forerunner of approaching serenity, the final stability after long wavering. A ray of hope illuminated her countenance as she laid the hands of Nina and Count Ludwig in each other.

"Virtue unites you!" said she with the voice of inspiration. "God bless you! Beloved! Beloved! Live for goodness and truth, for the well-being of your country! Oh! I see better days coming! Receive my thanks!—receive my thanks, my heart-felt thanks, thou child of my heart! Thou, the dearest which I possessed on earth! Now I am calm, I can depart in peace!" She sank back wearied on the pillows. Nina seated herself on a stool by Edla's bed. The whole world was dead to her.

Edla's spirit, however, seemed to raise itself yet once more, higher and freer, upon the pinnacles of death. Is it not thus with many dying persons? I have often heard so, and have often seen it. When death approaches, many a depressed eye raises on high its glance, and beams forth in a wondrous manner once more before it is extinguished; many a silent mouth opens itself then, for the first time, and speaks beautiful, evangelical words. Many a breath for the first time, breathes forth, on the death-bed, a long-cherished love. In life it was so silent therein, so still, one fancied it was quite desolate there; but the deliverer approached, and now one hears the heavenly voice, which hitherto, like a captive bird mournfully speechless, for the first time sings therein. Yes, there are people who only first begin properly to live in the hour of death!

Edla's breast and shoulder had been shattered; the great loss of blood, the quickly prostrated strength, left no hope, nay, scarcely even any means possible for her recovery. Edla clearly felt her situation, and besought the physician to leave her as calmly as possible. He agreed to her wishes; and after her wounds were bound up, she lay more easily on her bed. She looked tranquil and easy, and only when her eye fell upon Nina was an expression of pain depicted on her countenance.

"My dear friends," said she with the deepest cordiality to those who stood around her, "mourn not for me. Strengthen me in this hour by calmness and resolution. What indeed happens here more than that which happens everywhere all the world over, and every hour? A child of the earth goes forth to his heavenly Father; it is so natural, so simple a lot which stands before every one. A——, my best friend!" and her glance besought the bystanders to retire, while it motioned the Professor to step nearer. Nina alone remained unparticipating, sitting on the bed, hearing nothing and perceiving nothing. With low voice, Edla continued—"Why, my friend, this gloomy look? Ah! trouble not the bright day, which already casts its rays upon me through the night of death. I would so willingly see you calm and joyful. Is it so dark within you, or—are you not satisfied with me? Conceal not at this moment your thoughts from your true friend."

"Edla," said Professor A——, "what would I not give—what would I not endure for the certainty that that day will actually appear to you?" That it is not merely a reflection of the earthly sunlight which now, blessing your last moment, shines only deceitfully. I confess, I cannot reconcile myself to the thoughts of your death. I have seen people die who have lived to the natural age of man in science and affection—over these I have not lamented. But you, Edla! you were only yet in the beginning, you were only yet a seeker, a thirster: why must you hence? The fountain to which your lips approached so near runs dry; life, with its pure treasures, vanishes from your glance—the grave is there. Edla! what now is science to you? What the thirst after it?"

"What are they now to me?" interrupted Edla with great animation. "Oh! what they always were—life, joy. Believe me the thirst is not quenched; it is perhaps at this moment stronger than ever, and this to me is the prophesying of higher fountains. I go hence, yes—it is a wonderful going! It rushes before your mind. But think you not that wondrous, secret joy trembles through me when I think on the certainty that the mist-enveloped limits will soon be overstepped by me, and I shall tread the unknown land of promise? Yes, my friend, my soul is impatient and full of longing; as a child I sit I before the curtain, and yearn for the time in which it may be drawn up!"

"Childish curiosity on the brink of the grave!" said Professor A——, with serious reproof. "Is such worthy of you, Edla?"

"I fancy," replied Edla with gentle emotion, "that I am animated by purer feelings. O my friend! my soul is so joyful because I shall be soon able better to comprehend Him—the Almighty!" Edla laid her hand with fervency "I shall see the enigma solved, which presses so strongly on the human mind. I shall understand His wisdom and His love more inwardly; I shall better learn to love and adore Him. The deepest mystery of human life is death. And did not the mysteries, in earlier times, consecrate to a higher knowledge, my friend? The hour of my consecration is come. I welcome it with joy. I know that it will conduct me nearer to the origin of all light and all happiness. I know that my soul will thence drink life and refreshment. In what manner, and by what organs this may be, leave I, in confidence, to the great Artist, who erected for my soul also the earthly tabernacle. He will do it well; he will make me capable of understanding and adoring him and his works. Yes, my friend, freed from earthly covering, I shall better understand myself, and learn more to love and to comprehend all."

"On what account," continued Professor A—, still discontentedly—"on what account is your path broken off, precisely at the moment in which your endeavors for yourself and others might be useful? The work you have commenced, Edla; that over which I rejoiced so much, shall now remain uncompleted and unused."

"This thought," replied Edla, "is, I confess, heavy to me. It appeared to me—yet, folly! I will not speak of it. It is past. Great works of the wisest men of antiquity have been lost—and should I, on account of my small labors complain? More powerful minds will complete that which I have begun. I know it, and rejoice on that account."

"And what makes you so certain of that, Edla?"

"Eternal reason which uninterruptedly bestows its revelation on humanity," answered Edla. "The words which my ears perceived, will also sound to those of another, and a tongue more powerful than mine shall proclaim them. The little sparks will be preserved, and be made to advance its purpose by him who kindled it at first. Perhaps"—she smiled—"I shall write on my book in the beautiful stars which already shine forth there."

"It is certainly not difficult," remarked Professor A—, "according to our own pleasure, to form fancies renecting one's state after death. The fundamental question ever remains; upon what ground rest they? Such a groundless, amusing fancy is it indeed, best Edla, if you speak of completing a work while your hand monders in the grave."

"I jested," replied Edla; "and yet I must believe that art is eternal, even as the human soul. Is there once a power in life; then must it also firm or find its creative organ. I have taken leave of my little work. I shall soon leave my hand to the earth; but my thinking, my creating power I take with me—this is part of my spirit. Here have I passed my school-days; now I am about to be advanced to the university, to higher studies. It is my belief and my joy when I think that now, for the first time, the true working-day begins."

"The angels do not inquire and perplex themselves," said Professor A—. "They live in the presence of God. Even Christianity itself shows us no other condition after death. But this state of abstract, inactive contemplation, if it were embellished also with harpings and songs of angels—would be for a soul like Edla's—allow me to speak the word—at least tedious."

"In the presence of God," repeated Edla softly, and a wonderful brightness beamed from her deep sunken eyes—"to see God! And what is all higher life, all effort of the soul, every pure suggestion, other than a seeing of God, a perception of His being; the realising of reality; the foundation of all truth and beauty? What are great deeds, pure actions, noble works, than a consequence of this seeing of God? To see God is to live in Him in word and deed. That is happiness!"

"And shall we be sensible of this happiness with the same earthly vivacity which is our wealth here below?" asked Professor A— with deep emotion. "Shall we press life to our hearts strongly and certainly as now? Edla! shall I see you again, recognize you again? Will you listen to the voice of a friend whom you possessed here? May I press your hand—" he ceased, for his voice trembled.

"What shall I say thereto!" answered Edla. "Have you not heard of one who was dead and buried; how he arose from the dead, called? His friends by name, loved them as before, gave them peace and blessing? Beyond this assurance, beyond this promise, I know nothing on earth. I feel—it will be so. First the night—the shadows approach already. Night—then glimmers the morning. The sleepers awake—they become lively—ah, how beautiful! how glorious! Friend calls to friend; friend answers friend! There dawns heaven—wherefore question—wherefore fear? All is, indeed, clear! He has conquered—"

But earthly light, during Edla's heavenly visions, began to grow dim. Her strong soul sought in vain to struggle against the decay of nature. Consciousness left her; and only late in the evening, when the stars lit the heavens with their full splendor, she awoke from her trance of mind. The wild floods had slowly withdrawn to their bed; darkness laid its veil on the ruin; the wind ceased. The evening was beautiful and calm.

Edla prayed that they would draw her bed to the window. It was done, and with great rapture she glanced up to the beloved lights of heaven. "I shall soon be nearer to you!" whispered she. She then beckoned Nina close to her, and kissed the tears from her cheeks. She saw now how the bright drops stood in the eyes of her friend. She extended her hand to him and said—

"If you knew, dear A—, what bright hopes, what friendly appearances surround me at this moment—thanks to Eternal Love, which takes away the sting from death—you would rejoice with me!"

Professor A— was silent, and Edla after a pause continued: "I have often heard say that we saw here on earth only a thousandth part of the lights that dwell above the earthly atmosphere. This thought has a wonderfully beautiful meaning to me, my friend; is the hope indeed audacious, that when we leave this sphere of vapor we shall see that book of immortal knowledge wherein we here below read with fervency irradiated with a higher light, and therefore shall better understand its signification? You turn away from me? You are displeased with me? A—, my true friend, tell me why?"

"I will tell you," answered the professor. "Every one of your thoughts, every one of your perceptions, is to me, at this hour, of inestimable weight; therefore I do not hesitate by even a hard word to demand a clearer knowledge of your views. Edla! this exultation in the hour of death, is opposed to my feelings! The doctrine which you profess demands, methinks, more humility. Upon what does the Christian—if I rightly understand his religion—build his highest, his most joyous hopes? Is it not in the certainty that there is no sin in his heart, no darkness in his soul, which could separate him from the Eternal? Edla! I wish you success—in this feeling of certainty!"

Edla was long silent, and when she replied a slight trembling passed over her lips. "Your proof is severe," said he, "but I thank you for it. Yet—I have loved him with my whole heart, the Holy One, the All-good! I have endeavored to go on the way which he pointed out to us—why should I not hope, not be joyful?"

Edla paused again; but soon afterward she exclaimed with animation, and as it were with elation:

"And were it even so! were my hopes audacious; and had I misled myself; should I then, in that higher light, see my heart and my pilgrimage in life other than enlightened. O thus welcome be the light that shows to me my darkness! Welcome holy correction which chastises my failings! Eternal, sacred, glorious truth, welcome! Even if thou humblest me, I love thee; I seek only thee! The greatest pang shall be a cordial to me if it lead me to thee! O my friend, let me be glad, let my heart be full of exultation! My hope and my joy, repose truly on the Almighty! This belief will conduct all souls to Him, and all will taste of His truth."

"Pardon me, Edla!" said the Professor, with increasing paleness, as he saw that Edla's eye ever became brighter.

But joyful images and hopes seemed to have taken possession of Edla's soul. With gentle smiles she turned to her friend and said—

"Is it not remarkable, my friend, how religion and philosophy unite in order to throw light upon our future life. The inquiries of reason show us that time and eternity are two different things, as is commonly believed; they show to us that they exist at the same time, live in and through one another. The temporal without the eternal would be empty, as the eternal without the temporal. Man belongs to both worlds. His life is, at the same time, transitory. It is a continual entrance and exit in and out of temporal life. If he live in God and strive after the kingdom of God, nothing within his soul can be taken captive and darkened. Amid all changes of infinite life he remains free, clear, and happy; a rational work-tool for that which the Eternal love will have accomplished—he stands in the most inward harmonious relationship with nature, with mankind, and with God."

"What said the Son of God! 'I am,' said he, 'the door, the sheepfold. Whoever enters by me, he shall be happy, and shall go in and out and find rich pastures.' How clear, how simple is this profound doctrine! Whatever spirit is born again through Jesus, through love and sanctification shall, amid all the developments of life, find again himself, his friends, his love, his sphere of action, the food of his life. 'He shall go in and out and find rich pastures.'"

"O thou!" continued Edla, with greater fervency she clasped her arm around her kneeling sister. "Thou, who art so dear to my heart—thus shall I again see thy beautiful, beloved face in that better home. Let me find it again as a true image of the same soul, only strengthened and more fully developed. My last prayer for thee is not earthly happiness, but the ennobling and perfecting of thy nature. And now," said she, as an expression of deep suffering passed over her features; "now I shall not be able to speak much more with thee—for I feel that death begins his work. I will leave him tranquilly alone—he may unloose the earthly bands. Leave me not! If thou canst bear it, I wish that thou shouldst witness my death-struggle. Man should not turn his eyes away from human sufferings. He should endure all, see all, understand all—should become acquainted with all—life, death! A—, give me your hand. Thanks for your true friendship! Nina, thine—on my lips—"

She lost the power of speech, and seemed to suffer severely; but her eyes preserved their calm look, and continued fixed upon Nina. Death dimmed them more and more, yet still they remained riveted on Nina, though they saw no longer.

Not every good person breathes forth his life as the flower its odor; not every wicked one ends it with agony. Often exactly the reverse of this is the case. We should never fear to fix a firm eye upon this discord between the outward and inward life. It is the most certain pledge of an accord which shall clear up all, and reconcile all, after the diapason of the grave.

Edla's death struggle was long and difficult. The power of life was yet strong in her breast. She lived still two nights and two days without sign of consciousness. On the last morning of her life, Nina stood, pale and beautiful as we imagine to ourselves the angel of death, bent over her and wiped the sweat from her brow; for the last time Edla opened her eyes, looked fixedly and strong upon Nina, and said with deep joy, "Ah! it is thou?" smiled and closed her eyes. A few minutes afterward the anguished breast ceased to heave. Nina closed her eyes with kisses.

"A beautiful, a noble strength has departed from earth," said Professor A—— in a broken voice, as he pressed Edla's cold hand to his lips. "Farewell, thou noble, thou strong-minded woman! Edla, farewell! Thou hast left me behind impoverished!"

So felt all, with deeply troubled hearts. Baron H. and Clara bore Nina away from the death-bed.

"Write to Edward Hervey!" besought poor Nina, with her last strength, from the Baroness. "Write and tell him what has happened—what I have promised. I cannot do it."

The Baroness promised. Since Edla was deceased, and the Countess was ill from terror on the night of the flood, and thought of nothing but herself, the Baroness took Nina entirely under her motherly care.

Edla died; her face to the window and directed toward heaven. The stars looked down friendly on the pale features, and watched over them in the still night.

CHAPTER XXI.

THE CRIME.

"I have deeply repented and have suffered much in this repentance. May it move you."

Our readers will inquire, how and whence came so suddenly Baron H here on the night of the flood! For explanation we need only say that they, on a little flight out of Paradise, unexpectedly met with Count Ludwig on his journey to Nordland, and immediately formed the resolution of following him there, with what views—our readers can very well divine. Thus they arrived at the same time with Count Ludwig, to save and console, yet without being able to ward off the blow which struck more than one breast.

At Nina's prayer the Baroness wrote to Hervey. With the truest, the most precise exactness, she informed him of all that which had taken place, and closed her letter with these words—

"After this, you see clearly what is to be done. That you do not again see Nina appears to me most important to her peace. It is even her own wish, her own most urgent prayer to you. A meeting with you could occasion her only the most cruel pang. The last prayer of her deceased sister was, that she should keep sacred the oath she had taken. God the Almighty strengthen her to do so! Let your strength be her example and her stay! Since Edla's death she has lain in unbroken slumber, and I thank God for it, for she needs rest after these agitating events; she needs the whole force of her powers for that which lies before her—

"I know you, and leave myself in your hands. Yet once more: you must not see her again! Believe me, I feel with you. I had wished, in fact, to prove to you how very much, with my whole soul, I am your sincerest friend, GERTA H."

At the foot of the letter Nina's trembling hand wrote—

"Oh! Edward, farewell! Forgive! farewell forever!"

Before, however, this letter reaches Hervey, we must return to him, and accompany him on his journey.

A feeling like that with which he parted from Nina, Hervey had never experienced. It would have been easier for him to have parted with life. His sanguine temperament, and his deeply religious feeling, were at this time insufficient to remove from him the incomprehensible pain which gnawed at his soul, like a herald of misfortune, during the whole of his journey. At length his journey was completed. He was directed to a small house that looked forth peacefully from amid thick-leaved trees; it looked as if virtue and goodness dwelt there. Edward's guide led him into a room which was partially darkened by drawn curtains. A man with a pen in his hand sat at a table covered with papers: a clergyman stood near him.

"Now are you ready?" inquired a hollow voice from a bed, the curtains of which were thrown back.

"It is ready!" replied the writer in a stern voice—"it wants only your signature."

"Is nobody yet arrived?" asked the same voice with uneasiness and impatience. At this moment Hervey entered. The sick man made a convulsive movement. A spectral, yellowish countenance, distorted more by passion than suffering, looked out from the curtains, and the wild, wide open eyes pryed into Edward's face.

"It is he! yes! it is he!" said the sick man half to himself, "he who saved my child! Your name is Edward Hervey?"

"Yes," replied Edward.

"Were you always called so?"

"To what purpose are these questions?" demanded Edward, who now on his part attentively observed the man.

"Do you not recognize me?" asked he.

"You are the person whose child fell into the water on Tarna heath—"

"Yes, and whom you saved at the risk of your own life; but you have seen me earlier—earlier—"

Edward contemplated him for a long time. "It seems to me," said he, "as if I had seen you, but I cannot at all remember where."

"Mr. Edward D., I was secretary to Count R. at the same time that you lived in the family. My name is Christian Malm."

Edward made a sudden movement. The sick man motioned with his hand. "Wait, you shall hear all! Do you read, Mr. Judge—read aloud!"

The Judge of the district read aloud.

"Upon my death-bed, and about to appear before the judgment-seat of the Almighty, I testify and affirm before God the Highest, and before all people on earth, that Mr. Edward D. is innocent of the crime of which he is accused, against Count Rudolph R.; I alone am the guilty one. It was I who on that evening shot the Count; it was I who stole the money. I also, was it, who turned the false suspicion upon Edward D.—who spread about false reports of him and the whole occurrence; it was not done from hatred against him, but because I needed these circumstances for my own preservation. As regards Miss Elfrida, I am convinced that Mr. Edward D. acted only from good intentions; and that only as an honorable man, he wished to save the daughter from the degrading, crafty schemes of the father. All that I heard and saw on that subject, gave me the firmest conviction of his intentions. Let it be remembered that these words are the assurance of a dying man. Greater certainty of this, without doubt, may be obtained from Mr. D.'s letter to Count R. in his own hand writing, and which in his flight he left on the table behind him, and of which I took possession. It is appended unbroken to this. That all this is truth, and that I confess it out of my own free impulse, I protest in the name of God, before whose judgment-seat I shall soon appear. This confession will I certify by my own signature."

"That is right," said the sick man, with a weak voice, "give it here to me."

They gave him the paper and pen; he subscribed it with a visible effort, and then wearied he sank back on his pillow.

Edward stepped close up to him. Upon his manly countenance might be read the deepest agitation of mind. "Christian Malm," said he, "what induced you to act in this manner toward me?"

"Nothing! nothing in this world! Only you see—I thus saved my own life. The devil whispered to me to throw all the blame on you—it was so easy, so probable."

"And what induced you to attempt the life of the Count R.?"

"Revenge, sir, revenge! He had maltreated me; he had kicked me, called me a villain, and that before all his servants. And I was that which he called me—I was a villain. I was so, because he had disgraced me, because I thirsted for revenge. But I concealed myself under the mask of humility till the right moment came; I wound about and crawled like a worm till I succeeded with my poisonous sting. Amid the darkness and confusion I had an opportunity of firing at him, and taking away the money without being discovered. I do not repent of that which I did to him. He deserved it, the furious, the mean—"

"Silence!" interrupted Hervey sternly. "Unfortunate man, think on yourself; think what awaits you. Think on pardon, not on cursing."

"The time for hypocrisy is past, sir," replied the dying man with a faint rattling voice. "I have lied much; now I will be candid. 'That which I did against Count R. I cannot repent of. God forgive it me—if he can. But that which I did against you I have repented of. So repented, that never could I enjoy my ill-acquired wealth; that I am dried up and wasted, both body and soul. Since the time in which you saved my child at the peril of your own life,—ever since that moment a hell has reigned in my breast, and I found comfort only in the thought that before my death I would justify you. I have repented deeply, and suffered much in this repentance—may it move you! If you can, give me your forgiveness. It will make my death less bitter. Ah! you look so good and gentle, sir; good and serious as an angel of God. Forgive me!"

"I forgive you," said Hervey, and laid his hand on the head of the dying man.

"Thanks, thanks," said he with incoherent voice. "Pray for me! My boy lives in your neighborhood—see the child! Saviour of my child, pray—pray—for me!"

He drew Edward's hand to his lips. His eyes grew dim. Hervey sank in supplication on his knees by the bed of the dying. The clergyman followed his example. It was dusk in the chamber; the shadow of death floated over it. The Judge, who had been present all the time, advanced near and contemplated the supplicant. He looked on the wild countenance of the dying man; he saw the deep inward devotion of Hervey's features; he listened to his inspired, half-whispered prayer, and he thought to himself—"No, it is no empty form, no unmeaning ceremony. Something glorious, something important, connects itself with this. And if the struggling lust spirit leave its covering, and all were dark both within and without, shall not the intercessions of the good be of some weight? Yea, they surround the struggling spirit like good angels; they find the way to his heart, and prepare him for reconciliation; they follow him on his way to the unknown land; they bow with him the knee before the throne of the Highest, and help him to pray—no, this is no idle deed!"

And as the stern worldly Judge saw the one so cruelly injured kneeling by the side of his enemy and praying thus fervently for his enemy's peace, he laid his hand upon his eyes, and was met there by a stranger—even by a tear.

A short time after this, Hervey was ready again for his journey. The astonishment, the agitation of these new disclosures awoke in his soul an overwhelming impression of happiness: he would be justified before the world, and the essential impediment which had been opposed to his union with Nina would be set aside. His heart burned with gratitude to God; and the vehement longing once more to see Nina, to defend her, to win her, impelled him to the utmost speed. He journeyed day and night. The late occurrence, the future; hope, love, impatient expectation—all assisted to put him in that state of feverish excitement which drove him on from place to place. He saw at length the well-known country; he was greeted by terrible rumors. He hastened to his home, and there he received—the letter of the Baroness.

CHAPTER XLII.

MOONLIGHT.

Stilly, oh stilly
Sleep after storm and snow,
Lonely child, chilly
Lie sea and dale so low;
Now thou to death must go!
Stilly, oh stilly!

Hush thee, oh hush thee!
In sighs thy soul exhale!
Silence! keep silence!
Life now bids thee farewell!
Poor one, good night, sleep well!
Hush thee, oh hush thee!

Swedish Song.—ATTENBERG.

Love makes all things possible.—LAMBRECHT.

There is also a moonlight in human life—a moonlight in the hearts of men. It ascends cheerfully after a disquieting, stormy day. It has the reconciling of light and shade; a bright twilight; a still melancholy; a soft slumbering of feeling; a wo—but it also is a benefit: then are shed quiet tears, gentle and refreshing as the dew upon the scorched-up valleys. Often, however, is it a long time before this repose, this heavenly light, descends into the heart; often is it tempested so long.

A day of suffering was past; for the first time had Nina truly experienced what a storm of the soul is. She reclined on a couch; the door of the saloon was open, and she looked with fixed eyes into the large dark chamber in which so lately had lain the corpse of Edla. The moon shone through the window. All the friends had accompanied Edla to her last resting place. Nina alone remained behind; she had requested it as a favor. Deep stillness reigned around her; the dull rushing of the sea was only heard. Nina opened the window, but the coming air cooled not the burning pain of her bosom. The thought of Hervey afflicted her with unspeakable anguish; she felt herself so guilty toward him; she accused herself of having made his life desolate and for ever darkened.

"Can he forgive me?" questioned she of herself again and again.

When she thought how his beloved glance must rest upon her with pain and quiet reproach, O how she then longed that she might throw herself at his feet! but then she saw the bleeding figure of Edla warding off death from her, and she would do all for her who was dead for her sake—but Hervey, why should he suffer for her? Thus was her soul tossed hither and thither between contending feelings—between doubts and painful questionings; she no longer knew what to do, nor what was right nor wrong. She accused herself as being the occasion of all misfortune—she detested her own life. And then—oh, dear reader! hast thou ever lost a friend who was dear to thee as life, and has thy injustice darkened your separation? Hast thou felt burning remorse, and hast known that never on earth canst thou confess that to the lost one? Hast thou had hours in which thy heart yearned after him or her so—so that thy soul was rent asunder, and it felt as a martyr—that thou wouldst give thy life, thy everlasting salvation, only to see him again for one moment, to press his beloved hand, to cling to the beloved breast, and to weep—and weep—?

Hast thou ever felt thus? Oh, then wilt thou understand Nina; thou wilt understand her sufferings, and comprehend how that involuntarily, with wildly beating heart, she extended her arms, and full of anguish, exclaimed, "Edward! Edward!"

The door of the saloon softly opened. A man habited in deep mourning stood there. At sight of him a shudder of terror and joy passed through Nina, and with a low exclamation she sprang up.

The dark-clad man approached the door of the room in which she was, and there he remained standing; he leaned against the door-post, and looked upon her with an indescribable glance. Suffering and death-like pallor lay upon his countenance. Ah! it was the look which Nina had seen in her dream; they were the beloved features; his hand lay upon his heart—was it to hide the bleeding wound? Nina heard his short, excited respiration.

Her first feeling was to throw herself in his arms, and hide her face on his breast—then she thought that she must flee away from him.

"Edward! Edward!" cried she, "why are you come? Know you not that we are separated—that I have renounced you?"

"I know all," replied Hervey.

"Forgive me!" cried Nina despairingly, and fell on her knees.

"I come with no reproaches—I come to bless you," said Hervey, with heavenly goodness in voice and look. He advanced toward her, raised her, led her to the sofa, and seated himself by her. He held her hands firmly in his, and looked at her with a serious penetrating glance.

"You did not doubt me!" asked he.

"No! no!" was all that she was able to answer.

"Neither did I doubt you," continued he; and his countenance was lit by an angelic smile. "Well then, beloved!" said he, "we are not separated—not for ever separated. For a short time here on earth are we severed from each other, then shall we meet again in heavenly love, in firm faith—our souls remain united! Eternally, inwardly beloved," continued he, "thou most lovely of God's gifts to my life! Have peace, peace—with thyself; peace with the Eternal power which disposed our fate! Thou hast—done right! Thou couldst not have done otherwise! A higher power has spoken—we must obey!"

"We must obey!" repeated Nina faintly. She bowed her head in the deepest grief, and leaned her forehead upon her closely clasped hands.

"Be calm—be happy, even on earth; then shall I be—not unhappy," said he.

"Not unhappy!" repeated Nina.

"Trust in the Eternal Goodness! It is with thee!"

"With thee!" repeated Nina, weeping vehemently.

Hervey arose. His voice trembled. "I would see thee once again," said he; "I felt that I must hear thee once more—must thank thee! Thy love has made me inexpressibly happy; the remembrance of it will brighten my whole life; it will be my joy in my last hour—my hope in that other land where we shall meet again. Peace—blessing upon thee, thou angel! thou beloved! fulfil thy duties; live—for God's sake!"

Nina rose up. She knew not how it happened, but he blessed her with such powerful, such heavenly words and tones, that a wondrous joy thrilled through her breast. She listened to his words as to the voice of God; and as he clasped her close to his heart—as he, for the first and the last time, pressed his lips to hers, then certainly stood invisible angels near them, and bowed their immortal heads in admiration of two loving and suffering mortals.

Nina woke as out of a dream. He was gone! She laid her hand on her forehead and felt his tears on her hair. She kissed them from her fingers with fervent love.

"He has blessed me!" said she, and her soul was still. And as she stood there, praying in pain and rapture, adoring and full of foreboding, she saw, as once before had been the case, that the figure of the cross fell upon her breast, while the glory of heaven streamed around her. Now were the dark passages of her life made clear to her. Courage and determination returned again into her breast, and awoke there a higher and a higher heaven.

BUT HE. After he had communicated to another tranquillity and peace, strength left his own breast. He stood still upon the threshold of his own lonely house, and looked back over the devastated country; he contemplated the ruins of his own happiness—his wholly desolated life. A wretchedness, never before experienced, came over his soul, and with the Divine sufferer on the cross, he exclaimed,

"My God! my God! why hast thou forsaken me?"

THE CHRISTIAN WARRIOR'S SONG.

Blanch thou cheek, but heart be vigorous!

Body fall, but soul have peace!

Hail to thee, Pain—searcher rigorous,

Kill me, but my faith increase!

Sin, o'er sense so sweetly stealing!

Cold, which would my strength impair!

Forth with you! from life and feeling!

Forth, my cross I gladly bear!

Up! with eye of clear sedateness,

Read Heaven's law, writ bright and broad

Up! a sacrifice to greatness,

Truth and goodness! up to God!

Up, to labor! up and shaking

Off the bundle of sloth, be brave—

Give thyself to prayer and waking,

Till I slumber in my grave!

Slumber—waken—and, ah! glory,

View entranced, face to face,

Him who pardons sinners hearty;

Him whom angels hymning praise!

But wherefore this song! the reader will say. It suits the repentant sinner; the constant nun; it becomes the martyr; but not the soft and early married Nina! Yes, also her; but not only her—it becomes all who suffer and are tried unto purification. These will recognize it—it has tones and words from their own bosoms.

CHAPTER XLIII.

MARRIAGE—THE CRADLE—THE GRAVE.

Weep not for me, although before my summer,
Although before my autumn time I die.

TOWER.

We array ourselves for marriages in flowers; and wear dark mourning-dresses for the last sorrowful festivity which attends a fellow-being to his repose. And this often might be exactly reversed. But the custom is beautiful—for the sight of a young bride invites the heart involuntarily to joy. The festal attire, the myrtle wreath upon the virgin brows; all the affectionate looks, and the anticipations of the future, which beautifully accompany her—all enrapture us. One sees in them a new home of love raised on earth; a peaceful Noah's Ark on the wild flood of life, in which the white dove of peace will dwell and build her nest; loving children, affectionate words, looks, and love-warm hearts, will dwell in the new home; friends will enjoy themselves under its hospitable roof; and much beautiful activity, and many a beautiful gift will thence go forth, and full of blessing diffuse itself over life. There stands the young bride, creator of all this—hopes and joys go forth from her. No one thinks of sufferings at a marriage festival.

And if the eyes of the bride stand full of tears; if her cheeks are pale, and her whole being—when the bridegroom approaches her, fearful and ill at ease—even then people will not think of misfortune. Cousins and aunts wink at one another and whisper, "I was just so on my wedding-day—but that passes over with time!" Does a more deeply and more heavily tried heart feel perhaps a sigh arise within, when it contemplates the pale, troubled bride, it comforts itself, in order not to disturb the marriage joy, with, "O that is the way of the world!"

Thus also comforted herself the Baroness H. on Nina's wedding-day, without being able to find the least comfort in it. A hundred times had she whispered to her disquieted heart the above-mentioned phrase—yet notwithstanding, the tears filled her eyes as soon as she saw Nina. Baron H. had already remarked it several times. He went to his wife and took her hand: "The boy sleeps," said he, "Clara sits by the cradle, and will not come away from him."

The Baroness pressed her husband's hand. "Nina may become a mother," said she to herself consolingly; and in that she found the only comfort for the quiet, pale bride. Nina lay cold and almost unconscious in her arms on the evening of the marriage-day.

"I will myself care for my daughter," said Countess Natalie, "leave her to me!"

"I will not part with her out of my arms, let whoever may come!" replied the Baroness with decision, as even at that moment the bridegroom entered. The Countess went forward to meet him.

Probably a year after this day I saw Nina again, and never shall I forget the sight. Pale from sufferings she had gone through, lay she upon a snow-white pillow. A white bandage was closely bound round her forehead, concealing her hair. The white delicate lace of her cap bent itself as caressingly around her delicate countenance. All that surrounded her was dazzling white; she herself was like a snow-drift upon which the last rays of the sun fall. At her side lay, in its first morning sleep, her little daughter. I saw that Nina felt the joy of a mother. It was a charming sight to see those beautiful eyes beaming, to hear those graceful lips say.

"Oh! no one knows what it is till they themselves have experienced it, at once freed from all pain, to see that a child is born—to stretch forth the hand, and really clasp it—to feel it near one!"

And her white, feeble hand was extended caressingly over the little one, which seemed to perceive it with pleasure. "She shall be called Edla!" continued she, tenderly; "I will give to her a guardian angel. May she resemble her—"

I left Nina with the consolatory feeling that henceforth her life would not be joyless. But the image of the young, pale mother stood sorrowfully before my soul. Never had I seen a human being so pale.

When I saw her another twelve months later she was still paler; but now it was natural, for she lay in her coffin, and was beautiful even there. Her little daughter was gone before—she followed her. I saw the stern Count Ludwig stand by the coffin. He wept like a child.

When Nina felt her death approaching she wrote the following words to Hervey:

"I have lived—because thou wishedst it. Because thou blessedst me have I had strength to live at a distance from thee; and I have not been unhappy. I have known the joys of a mother, but the pains of a mother also. I die, and thank God. If I loved thee above all things on earth, the righteous God will not condemn me. It was my strength—my virtue. In this moment, in which all becomes already dark, and in which my eye will be extinguished—in this moment art thou still the light and hope of my soul. O how like a beam of light didst thou break through the twilight of my life, and give to me warmth and color! Ah! and I darkened thee! But my time will also come to make thee happy—to make thee rejoice. Listen to me! My soul is about to depart; receive its last sighs, its last joyful hope—listen! In thy hour of death I will appear to thee. When it becomes evening to thee—when thy clear glance begins to grow dim, and the shadows of death to ascend around thee—then, then will it be permitted me to fetch thee into the world of light, where Edla is already beforehand, where she will learn to know and to love thee; where we forever inseparable shall be—I think. THOU WINE! I complain not that we are divided on earth. I was not worthy of thee. God has tried me, and has brought me nearer to thee. Edla, I come. When was I ever disobedient to thee, Edla! Edward! Beloved! O God bless thee, and be gracious to me for thy sake! God bless, God bless thee! NINA."

CHAPTER. XLIV.

A CHORUS.

Oh let it please Thee, my free-will's up offering,
 Those who dost scan the secrets of my heart:
 I take with love the cup of Thy high proffering,
 Even as with love that cup Thou dost impart.

VITALIS.

When a heart breaks under the burden of its sorrows—when sickness strikes its root in wounds opened by pain, and life consumes away slowly to death, then none of us should say that that heavily-laden heart should not have broken; that it might have exerted its strength to bear its suffering. No; we would express no word of censure on that prostrated spirit because it could not raise itself—before its resurrection from the grave.

But beautiful, strengthening, and glorious is the view of a man who presents a courageous and patient breast to the poisoned arrows of life; who without defiance and without weakness, goes upon his way untroubled; who suffers without complaint; whose fairest hopes have been borne down to the grave by fate, and who yet diffuses joy around him, and labors for the happiness of others. Ah, how beautiful is the view of such a one, to whom the crown of thorns becomes the glory of a saint!

I have seen more than one such royal sufferer, and have always felt at the sight, "Oh, could I be like this one—it is better than to be worldly fortunate!"

But I must here remark a difference. There is a misfortune in which we see a higher hand, an inevitable fate; it is like a thunder-stroke out of the clouds. But there are sufferings of another kind, of which the torture resembles a perpetual needle-pricking. These proceed from the hand of man; these arise in families, where married people, parents, children, only live one with another to make home a hell: there are the plagued and the plaguers; it were difficult to say which are most worthy of pity—the unhappy ones! The first kind of misfortune is most easy to endure. It is much, much easier to suffer under the hand of God than under that of man. Lightning from above gives death, or light and exhilaration; the prick from the hand of man wastes away life like a slow cancer; it embitters the heart—bitterness is the simoom of life; where it blows, there exists a desert. But even here is there a means of deliverance. There is an angel-patience which blunts the wounding-point, which sanctifies the sufferer under his pang, and at length improves others by his means. There is a Socratic courage which converts all Xantippean shower-baths into refreshing rain; there is a hero-mood that breaks the chains which it finds too heavy to be borne. Many a tormented one proves himself, but he proves himself before a higher eye; he may, if he will, prevent his heart becoming embittered, for that is the worst that can happen to him.

Observe this country, where otherwise thou sawest only unfruitful morasses, endless woods, desolate pastures. It is no more the same—friendly habitations extend themselves in the valley and on the heights; large corn-fields rejoice the eye; numerous herds cover the rich meadows. Everything bears evidence of a country where all goes well, in it. And who has called all this forth! A man, whose life's happiness was destroyed by fate—who knew no happiness but that which he prepared for others. Edward Hervey was the creator of this prosperity. He only rescued himself from the suffering which seized upon his life by compulsory activity of body and mind. Thus he conquered his suffering; and after he knew that Nina was no longer on earth, this victory was easier to him.

Justified in the most splendid manner before the world, Hervey soon saw himself the object of the most honorable and distinguished attention; and advancement of every kind was offered to him. Honor and respect found him in his retired corner of the country; yet they had no longer any power over him, and he calmly declined all. He preferred completing the work which he had begun, in the sphere in which he was already beloved and known. He cultivated the land, and formed the manners of his little community. He hased all on order and duty, and gave the glory of it to God. His gentle glance—his prudent counsel—his strong hand—were ready for every one. He was never seen to be gay, but calm and friendly was he at all times. He loved mankind, honored goodness, and regarded with love all of beautiful which the world had to offer. His age was like his youth; his life was a divine service.

And might we not, my suffering friends, endure life better if, with powerful resolution, we turned away our thoughts from our pains; if we directed them to that which is higher and more beautiful? Does this world indeed lack of much for this purpose? Ah! there is so much that is good—so much that is noble in mankind—so much that is elevating in nature—so much that is rich in consolation in books—so much hope above the stars, and especially so much recreating strength in all occupation, and in all occupied persons. Who indeed grafts the fruit tree and does not enjoy the vigorous shoots and the promised fruit! The reader will remind me that I have forgotten the chief fountain of consolation and of joy—the deepest, the most curative, often the only one . . . . . But why name that first which we all know so accurately, so inwardly? Besides, if there were not this fountain, who could attribute worth to the others! That which alone gives life to all, is a drop from the Eternal.

But time speeds. The day of my history draws to its end—it is evening.

The mists descend from the heights of Tarnas. Like fleeting, beckoning ghosts, they float onward. They rise up and sink down. They breathe over the earth mournful and damp. They softly spread the death-veil over the grass; wherever they pause, they leave tears behind. The wind sighs dyingly in the trees. It is evening.

The mists creep around Hervey's small dwelling; they come up and gloom his windows, and veil from him the friendly earth. They seem as if they were come to fetch him thence, and draw up their light airy chariot. They seem to know that his last hour approaches, and that he is prepared for his journey.

But will not my friendly readers be astonished that the day, which ought only to be dedicated to pleasure, passes on from one death-bed to another, just as if every-day life were a continued procession of corpses! Fear nothing! Follow me yet a little way—you shall see no gloomy picture. Joyful young maiden, fear nothing! That which I shall exhibit to thee is only joy—glorious, blessed joy! Do not let the thoughts disturb thee that this sketch is only fiction—I assure thee, it is veritas, veritas!

There sat at the window, in a comfortable arm-chair, the noble sufferer of whom our story has told. Powerless, but still and calm, he leaned with his head against the white pillows. A wonderful serenity rested upon the features of the dying man; dark looks, partially gray, fell over the clear, high forehead; he is not alone. The mother rests already in the quiet bosom of the earth; but Maria stands faithfully by his side. She alone, in this hour, will he have with him. How the flame of light yet flickers before it goes out! It sinks, and then ascends; it dims, and then brightens anew—it will not leave the covering in which it has dwelt so long. Hervey sinks in a light sleep; it seems as if death had taken hold on him, but he awakens once more, folds his hands, and exclaims with a joy which is no longer of the earth,

"Ah, what glory! Is it possible that I am still on the earth! Is there here such bliss! God—my God! What an atmosphere of heaven! Am I yet the same! Is it possible that Edward Hervey can be participant of joy like this on earth! Jesus! rich in love, that is thy life! thou dispensest overflowing measure—Eternal love!"

Night passes over, the morning dawns. Still tarries Hervey upon earth amid images of beautiful delight. A beam from the ascending sun pierces through the mist, and brightens the face of the dying man. His cheeks are illumined with a living glory—his eyes beam; he raises himself, extends his arms, and exclaims with an expression of superhuman joy and love—"Nina!"

He sinks back a corpse. His spirit is departed. Suz conducts him.

PREFACE BY THE TRANSLATOR.

In presenting the present volume of my series of Miss Bremer's works, circumstances compel me to some explanation, not only on my own account, but for the interests of translated literature. An individual has proceeded not only to thrust himself into the very midst of my series, but has made an impudent attempt to injure my edition, as if I were publishing it in too costly a style.

It is a fact which testifies most strikingly to the honourable feeling, both of the press and amongst the publishers generally, that to my knowledge not only many of the respectable journals have refused to yield to the pressing entreaties made to them to sanction and introduce these dishonourable interlopers, but publishers who are importers of American works have declined to sell these cheap American pennyworths when sent to them. There has yet been found but one man out of the vast mass of English publishers who has been mean enough to thrust himself into the series which I had introduced at my own risk, so much to the satisfaction of the Public; and what is more, there has not been found a single literary person, either in this country or America, who would put his or her name to another translation.

But THIS ONE MAN has, forsooth, done it for public good! My edition was not cheap enough for the people, and the works were too good to be withheld from the people. For public good, therefore, he pokes himself in just before me on the literary causeway. Now there never yet was an especially mean transaction perpetrated which was not immediately coloured over with the convenient ochre of public good. But what public good?

If the man really wanted nothing more than that a popular edition should appear, he had only to inquire of me, as any honest, disinterested man would have done, and he would have found that in due course this would appear, with all the advantages of deliberate correction and improvement. But, in his zeal for public good, he put no such query to me—for the very sufficient reason that that was not his intention. His object was a public good turned carefully into his private pocket. Had he wanted public good solely, there was no need of his treading on my toes to extract it; the world is wide, and there is a world of excellent matter in foreign literature, if he had the sense or the information to enable him to collect it. I have no objection to cheap editions of any good translations that he or any other man may undertake on his own original sagacity; but what right has he to make me a jackal to such a city lion? I am as great an advocate for cheap translations as he can be; but I say, in heaven's name let not translators and publishers become a crowd of cannibals, to devour each other. I do not interfere with the speculations of Smith, or Clarke, or Tomkins—let them at least be good enough to let alone mine.

If a man will, however, advocate the public good, let him at least dare and risk something for it. But this man does not risk a doit for it. He does not move till he sees that I have tested the risk, and created a public for the work; when he steps in, passes over the volumes on which I am at the moment engaged, and pounces on the next before me. This marks the Prowler and the Literary Body-snatcher.*

* In a preface to one of his surreptitious publications, this person puts on a face of the most innocent simplicity, and confesses us that he never yet meddled with anybody's copyrights. Certainly not, for the best of reasons—he

Let it be clearly understood then, that this question is not at all one of a cheap edition; that is a matter of course; but it is a question whether it be fair and honourable for a man who ventures nothing himself, who learns and acquires nothing himself, to lurk as a Literary Buccaneer in the steps of authors of established reputation, till they have opened to his greedy eyes a safe means of profiting by their taste, and tact, and experience.

It is one thing to spend years in acquiring foreign languages; to spend other years in visiting foreign countries, and poring through the vast mass of foreign productions, in order to discover and pick out what is really worthy of being introduced to your countrymen,—one thing, when you have done all this, at a most serious cost of time, labour, and money; have then taken all other risks and in fact created a public;—and another thing, for a man who has done nothing of all this, to avail himself of the fruits of your labours, and of the public favour you have raised.

Such a system, I am sure, when once exposed, will, by all honourable minds, be stamped as most unfair, and as most prejudicial to the interests of good literature. The case is not my own merely; it is that of Mrs. Austin, and of almost every translator of note; and the consequence, if it go on, will be to deter all authors of talent and repute from the risk, labour, and research necessary for the selection of what is good, and from giving the time necessary for the production of excellence; the work of translation will fall into the hands of anonymous mediocrity, and become a disgrace to our literature.

For, whatever may be said respecting cheap editions, every one who knows anything of the subject will agree with me, that no good author will be found, who can possibly remunerate himself on such works. In that form they cannot be at first introduced; for they will not be, at first, bought to a paying extent. A library edition is the first and natural step. It is in this form that a moderate edition alone can be put out to test the public taste; a cheap edition must of necessity be a larger one, and it must involve a great loss if it do not succeed. But in a library form, it will be at once purchased by the librarians, and the wealthy to a certain extent; and, if good, will acquire that speedy ecceles which will enable the publishers, as the most eminent are now doing, to bring out popular editions, at once cheap and perfect.

These people, therefore, who, like the harpies of old, pounce down on the viands which you set on the public table, so far from being the public benefactors which they pretend, are actually the destroyers of the natural and true benefaction—the issue, in due course, of authentic and perfected editions. I will presently make this very case an evidence of this.

knows the law would then lay hold of him. There are persons—very sensible persons in their way—who never take what the law would make them smart for; never carry off what is too heavy, or touch what is too hot. But the catalogue of this person's Buccaneer plunder, published by himself, shows that he sells on my author's works the first argument that the copyright technically expires. There are various works of Sir Walter Scott, Crabbe, Keats, Mrs. Hemans, etc., which he has pounced on without the smallest regard of delicacy towards the authors or their families. They who will seize copyrights immediately after the law convales at it, would as readily, but for the terror of the law, seize them before. Thank heaven, that authors have the protection of a Copyright Act, or they would certainly be brained by the Buccaneers between their own houses and the printers, and their MSS. carried off.

I myself have not, as this individual would insinuate, published with a view to large profits. I commenced the undertaking, in the face of the advice and warnings of the most experienced publishers, with the probability of a considerable loss. But I determined, at any cost, if possible, to introduce these works, and I glory that it has been a woman who has done this. My editions have been moderate, so as to allow me every opportunity of revision by comparison with the latest editions of the originals; and any one who is capable of comparing my new editions with the originals, will see how carefully they have been brought up, verderum et literatim, to them. So much so that the amiable authoress herself, while highly dissatisfied with the German translations, has expressed her warmest sense of "den sanna grannhet och den nit skärmda ni för tillväga vid Er öfersättning!"—"the conscientious accuracy and zeal with which you execute your translations."

And what have we got instead, from this advocate of public good? An importation and reprint of anonymous abridgments of these works, put up and curtailed both in style and quantity into the limits suited to the American cheap market, and abounding with Americanisms, which all well-educated persons will be careful not to introduce into their families; as "she is a going"—"vanity belittles a woman"—"sleighs, and sleds, and sleighing," for sledge and sledging—"surroundings" for environs; with such Yankee slang as "he got mad in love, and she gave him the bag," etc.; as any one may convince himself who looks into these eye-destroying small prints.

That it is not a mere assertion that these are, in fact, abridgments, or at least miserably garbled copies, I will speedily show: but, in the first place, it may be as well to give the history of these American translations. Every one who has paid the least attention to what has been going on in America, knows that the American publishers have been tearing each other limb from limb in the matter of reprints of English new works. Works which cost a guinea each here, were reprinted there immediately for a shilling each. Such became the fury of American competition, that not one such reprint of such a work appeared, but half a dozen simultaneously. The madness was soon so great that these people were seen advertising, one against another, shilling works, of which the mere paper was worth twice the money. To such a pitch was this carried, that anything like native literature was quashed. No native author could obtain a copyright remuneration. There was no profit to give it. Our authoress supplied their market, and their authors were almost universally compelled to come to this country to obtain anything for a new work; and all sensible men lamented, and still lament, that under such circumstances no national American literature can possibly arise. What the result of this competition-mania has been many a publishing-house could show in frightful accounts on the wrong sides of their ledgers. The story however, is plainly told every day in their newspapers. The New-York correspondent of the Boston Evening Gazette, a family newspaper of July 8, 1843, says:—"As to the cheap republications—the system is dead. A few houses, the Harpers, Winchester, etc., print occasionally; but from the best information I can get, nothing is gained by it, and probably, publications will go back to a medium price, and a shape suitable for preservation—a consummation devoutly to be wished."

Such is the upshot of the American cheap republication mania; but the mischief did not stop here. They began to pour these wretched and maimed reprints of our works in shoals back upon us at home. Our literature too was threatened with annihilation from this source. Fortunately we got an Act putting a stop to the entrance of these pale and wasted ghosts of our own creation from the world beyond the Atlantic: but translators are still exposed to the whole evil. Accordingly, no sooner did my translations of Miss Bremer's works begin to attract attention, than these ravenous American publishers began furiously to translate those at which I had not arrived, so as to get the start of their brother publishers, who reprinted mine. What sort of translations these were likely to be may be imagined. I had spent two years in the preparation for, and in the execution of mine—these were thrown out in a few weeks. They professed to translate from the Swedish, and to replace all the passages omitted in the German translations.

These are the translations which our London Buccaneer has avowedly reprinted. What kind of an article he had got hold of he knew no more than the man in the moon, for he had no means of knowing, being totally ignorant of both Swedish and German. But it was enough for him that there was a translation of some sort that he could rush into the field with, and a Yankee puff readily written to his hands, which he took wholly for his advertisement. The trick succeeded to a certain extent; for who was, at once, to expose it? So little have the language and the literature of the North of Europe been cared for by us, that I much question whether there be three persons connected with the London Press who are masters of the Swedish and Norwegian languages, both of which are necessary for the translation of these works. Accordingly, one or two of our respectable journals were unwarily caught in the snare, and boldly declared, in noticing these reprints, that they were excellent, and equal to mine.

The simple fact, however is, and I am now in a condition to demonstrate it most satisfactorily, as I now print my translation of one of the stories which has been reprinted from the American translation—"Strife and Peace;" and it will be in the power of any one to test the matter, and see that these American translations are not at all translated from the Swedish, but from the German; and so far, as I will directly show, from reprints of the numerous important passages omitted by the carelessness of the German translator, the Americans purposely cut away a vast number more, in order to reduce the work to as cheap a quantity as possible.

That they are translated from the German, and not from the Swedish, every page will prove, for the blunders and misconceptions of the German translator, often very ludicrous, are most regularly and carefully copied. As the Chinese, when they receive an order from England to make some pieces of china, to complete again a broken set, always make an exact fac simile of the china sent, copying most precisely every flaw and defect, as well as the regular pattern; so has the American translator done here. As I have already stated, Miss Bremer complains heavily of these ludicrous errors of the German, which have thus been so completely transferred into the cheap English reprints. It would exceed the limits of a preface to enumerate these. I will, however give a very good specimen of them, and pass on to the still more serious matter of the omissions.

Near the end of "Strife and Peace," Mrs. Astrid, writing to her friend the Bishop, tells him that all her troubles are now over, and bids him come and rejoice with her. "Kom," she says, "och mottag min anger öfver min klenmodighet, öfver min knot; kom, och hjälp mig att tacka!" "Come and receive my contrition for my pusillanimity, for my repining, come and help me to express my thanks!" This the German translates—"Kommen sie, und helfen sie mir denken!" Which the American translator, with Chinese fidelity, copies, and the Englishman as faithfully reprints—"Come and help me to think!"

As to the completeness of the translation, let us take at random a dip into "Strife and Peace." The chapter on Nordland, a chapter which, independently of the letter it contains, consists only of six paragraphs, has in Smith's edition, two out of those six omitted, besides a portion of the letter itself. These two passages are extremely descriptive of life and scenery, and make no less than fourteen lines of the original. At page 6 occurs another omission, descriptive of the domestic life; page 27 another of no less than nine lines, descriptive of the wild Halling dance, this is immediately followed by another, descriptive of the Halling costume. On the next column of the same page is another, descriptive of the music of the Hardanger viol. All these break up dreadfully the beautiful and wild picture of Norwegian life and festivity.

Take again the mountain journey to Bergen, page 32 of Smith's reprint, there are two omissions; page 33, three others. One of these alone consists of nine lines of the original, and relates to most curious and characteristic matter, to the waymarks of stones piled in that wild and desolate region, where the actors of the story fall into the utmost peril and perplexity. Pages 34 and 35 occur two or three more, and so on through the book.

What is remarkable in this volume is, that the German translation, unlike those of the other volumes, is perfect. I believe there is not a line of the original omitted; while here in this reprint from the American, declared to be from the Swedish, with the German omissions replaced, there abound omissions of the most material character.

What is still more remarkable is, that this work, "Strife and Peace," is unquestionably, in point of style, the most eloquent and beautiful composition of Miss Bremer's writings, which renders it tenfold more unpardonable thus to have mangled it.

Another curious fact is, that all the mottoes, and indeed, the greater part of the poetry, of this volume are from Norwegian poets; given purposely by Miss Bremer, as the scene is laid in that country. Much of this poetry is left out: and the rest, not being understood, retains, in some instances, only a dim shadow of the meaning of the original; in others, has no connexion with it whatever. We have verses with a sonorous, Mrs. Hemans-like flourish of trumpets, but which as translations of what they pretend to represent, might just as well be taken out of any book that the translator had at hand.

For instance, these eight lines of the poet Munch have, I may say, a rude simplicity about them, and certainly nothing in the world about "flowers of love and life; or which shed their fragrance on our bier or clay-cold sod."

Hvad er det saa moer?
Eetgaad den aar
Dug en vœlle Strømmel
Af Hjemmet lyende Himmel,
Engang da u leu
Under T-unplets toernde Baer—
En silg Sekund
Væter vel op i med Dødens Blund.

Yet these have their sounding substitute of half the number of lines.—

The flowers of love and hope we gather here,
Still yet bloom for us in the heaven of God;
They shed not their last fragrance o'er our bier,
They lie not withered on the cold grave and.

These twelve lines of Wergeland—(as given by me);—

The first time, yes the first time flings
A glory even on trivial things;
It passes soon, a moment's falling,
Then it is also past recalling.

The grass itself has such a prime:
Min prize must spring's flowery time,
When first the verdure decks earth's brow,
And the heart-leaves twinkle the blossom.

Thus God lets all, however low,
In the first time a triumph know;
Even in the hour when death impends,
And life itself to heaven a seedeth.

Are by the hydraulic press of Smith and Co. squeezed into these four:—

Fairer the first faint blushes of the dawn
Than the full splendour of the noon-day light;
Dearer the first pale flowers in early spring time born,
Than all that summer boasts of fair and bright.

Of six extracts from the bard of Rein, in "the Evening Hour in the Sitting Room," three, that is, one half of them, are suppressed. So also eleven lines of Foss, opening this chapter, and three lines from Velhaven, which occur in the middle of the chapter, are transplanted and substituted for them. A line of Tegner in this chapter, is also omitted. Eight striking lines of a Norwegian song, introduced as a motto to the chapter on the Halling dance, and illustrative of this festive occasion, are totally omitted. So also the stanza introductory to the chapter on Christmas, from Bjerregaard.

Kommer J sorpten, vingede Smæc!
Kornbaard for eder ved Laderne stæc.
Juul er i vente;
Da skil I hente
Føde fra guldgle, brødvænge Smæc.

But the number of these omissions is almost numberless: perhaps the most singular of all is that of the very passage in which the Strife ceases, and the Peace is concluded, by the side of the well, consisting of eleven lines.

These attempts to palm off the work, spite of all this mutilation, as from the Swedish by the introduction of Fru instead of Mrs.; Oefwerstinna, meant for Öfverstinna, that is simply, a colonel's lady; Herre for Herr, or plain Mr., etc., are quite ludicrous. At the same time almost every original word or proper name introduced, are erroneously introduced. The translator, not aware that the diæresis or other peculiar mark over the vowels in Swedish, does not merely change the sound, but converts the word into a totally different sense—gives us these sometimes in the English with the oddest effect. Thus we have Skäl and Skäl indiscriminately, while he all the while means Skål—the three have really the different meanings of, a hush or peal, a motive, and a health! The same obtuseness shews itself in marking the nice traits of humour and character for which Miss Bremer is so eminent. We are told that Susanna had two different natures, which are designated by contractions of her two Christian names—Barbara Susanna, into Barbra and Sanna. But this distinction is too delicate for the translator, and he regularly prints them Barbra and Sanna, whereby the indication is totally lost. But to go through a list the wilful omissions, and the ignorant misconceptions and disfigurements, would be too much.

These remarks apply not only to this but to the whole series. In them too is exactly copied the German translation, even to the very errors of the press. In the H Family, the German translator has unwarrantably altered almost every proper name both of place and person. Even the name of the narrator of the story—Miss Christina Beats Hvaldagelag—is converted into Charlotte Beats Every-day; Lönquist, into Lonberg; Bergström, into Britmund; Roelagen, into Koolapean; Bermds, into Berends, etc., etc. All these are carefully copied into the American translation. The notes of the authors in the original are omitted, and notes on totally different subjects by the German translator, are also given. The German has taken the liberty to foist in whole sentences of sentimental prating, which the American has also given. In short, he has never seen the original, and his translation is an impudent and worthless imposition.

So much for translation from the Swedish, and for the restoration of omitted passages.

Is this then the manner in which we should wish to see the best productions of foreign writers introduced into our language? Is it such works as these that any of our respectable reviewers will be found introducing to notice, and recommending as on a par with those which have been the result of long and careful study, and of the most anxious care and labour to produce perfect both in sense and substance?

Whoever has come in contact with foreign authors of eminence knows that it is a subject of some complaint that their works are translated into our language generally in a most slovenly state, and obtain circulation by the side of those of the most faithful and able character. Whoever gives circulation to such inferior or defective translation does a fourfold injury—to the author, the honest translator, the public, and the literary character of the country.

Since writing thus far, I have seen that the introducer of these American translations has announced one of Miss Bremer's new work, "A Diary." This certainly cannot be from the Swedish, which is scarcely yet cut, and of which I know that sheets have been transmitted by the authoress only to myself. It must, therefore, be from the German translation—which is by far the most defective German translation that has yet appeared of any of Miss Bremer's works, having omissions of several pages at once.

I see too that another of the Buccaneers has taken the field with announ cements of translations from Miss Bremer; and who—no other than the very man who seized bodily on the Rev. Mr. Muzzey's "American Maiden," placed another name on the title-page, dubbed it "The English Maiden," and sent it forth as an original work! stating gravely in his preface, that in this, his work, "he had been very careful to inculcate the morality of the Bible!" Mr. Muzzey, amazed to see extracts from his own work in American papers, under another title and another man's name, hastened over to London, confronted the unudent freebooter, and issued an English edition of his own work.

In such hands as these, what beautiful translations of Miss Bremer may we not expect! The Rev. Sydney Smith has ably trounced the Americans for their dishonesty; we entreat him to hold the balance even, and chastise this dishonesty towards Americans on the part of our countrymen. Swindling is the same thing on one side of the water as on the other, and nothing more disgraceful to national character can be done on the other side of the Atlantic.

But at these men I am not surprised; they are only labouring in their ordinary vocation. The real cause of surprise is that any journal can be found, holding a respectable rank, which will sanction and encourage them. Their miserable activity is the natural result of such patronage. It is for the English Press, which is the guardian of the honour and integrity of our literature, to protect us from this state of things. It is for it to say whether it shall be possible for translations of excellent works from abroad to be made with the necessary care and leisure; or whether the moment a translator of known tact and reputation announces a fresh work, he or she shall be torn to pieces by a pack of hungry wolves. It is for it to see that when we have a cheap translation, it shall at least be sound and honest.

I repeat my testimony to the honourable feeling already shown by the great body of the press in the present instance, and my confidence that all that is so obviously necessary will be effected by it. I have now stated what it was my duty to state in support of the purity and integrity of the translations of these works. In my own case I have spared no pains to ensure this; and I have had always at hand the ever-ready assistance of Mr. Howitt—an enthusiastic admirer of these Northern tongues. My plan has been when my translation was complete to read it aloud to him, while he held the original in his hand, so that no word or no misconception might escape; and I confidently, therefore, present my edition to the public as faithful and complete.

The Examiner, in a flattering notice of one of my translations, regretted that I had not given some more account of Miss Bremer herself, adding that she was in reduced circumstances. I am happy to say that wherever that information was obtained, it was totally unfounded. Miss Bremer is not only of a substantial family, but connected with the nobility of the country. It is not my intention to give a line respecting Miss Bremer more than is agreeable to herself; but in her kind interest in my translation she has voluntarily offered to write me a Sketch of her Literary Life, which, with whatever is proper to be added, will appear in my next issue—the concluding one of Miss Bremer's published stories.

Miss Bremer lately addressed to me these words: "Sweden is a poor but noble country; England is a rich and noble one; but in spirit they are sisters, and should know each other as such. Let us, dear Mrs. Howitt, contribute to that end!"

I am convinced that England and Sweden, including the fine kingdom of Norway, may become in both intellectual and commercial relations far better known to each other to the greatest mutual advantage. No one could have opened up more successfully the intellectual intercourse than Miss Bremer; and I regard it as one of the happiest and most honourable events of my life—of which nothing can deprive me—that I have introduced her beautiful and ennobling writings, not only to these islands, but to the whole vast English family. I have sent them expressly to Australia; and in America, in India, at the Cape, as well as in Australasia, Miss Bremer is now a household word—nay, more—a household possession and blessing.

A DIARY.

THIS DAY—A LIFE.

THEOREM.

Stockholm, 1st November, 18—

IN THE MORNING HOUR.

"ANOTHER day, another revolution of light and shade. Enjoy thy existence, sayest thou, holy dawn of morning, animating glance of love, beam of God! Thou walkest me once more from my darkness, givest me a day, a new existence, a whole life. Thou lookest upon me in this light and sayest, follow the moments! They scatter in their flight light and flowers; they conceal themselves in clouds, but only to shine forth again all the lovelier; follow them, and let not the shade find thee before thou hast begun to live!"

Thus thought I with a great, home-departed spirit, as in the dawn of morning I awoke and saw the beam of daylight penetrating into my chamber, and involuntarily stretched forth my arms to meet it. It was neither bright nor cheerful; it was the misty beam of a November day, but still light from the light which brightened my life's-day, and I greeted it with love.

May the light of my life's-day, like that of the morning, be—an ascending one! whether its beam shine through mist or through clear air is all one! if only the day increase, if only life brighten.

After an absence of ten years, I visit anew the home of my childhood; whether for a longer or a shorter time circumstances will determine. Independent in fortune and position in life, I can now, after a captivity of many years, enjoy freedom, and at thirty years of age follow merely my own will.

I arrived here last evening, a few days earlier than I was expected, and thus could not by any possibility flatter myself that on my account the house of my stepmother was so splendidly lighted up as I found it on stopping before it. Ah, no! On the contrary, it was terribly difficult to find anybody who would trouble themselves in the least about me and my things.

At length I stumbled upon a maid-servant, whose kind countenance and manner immediately pleased me, and who, as soon as she perceived who I was, busied herself actively about me and mine. "Ah!" exclaimed she, as she led me up a winding staircase covered with carpeting, which led to my room, "how vexatious it is! Her Grace gives to-day a little ball to celebrate Miss Selma's birthday, and now they have taken off their cloaks in your room, Miss; how it looks! But see! they did not expect you earlier than next week, and, therefore, nothing is in order."

"It does not signify!" said I, as with some consternation I looked round the room which my step-mother in her letter had praised as an 'excellent chamber,' and which was now filled with gentlemen's and ladies' cloaks, with fur boots and over-shoes. The music of one of Stranase's intoxicating waltzes came from below, producing an effect half-animating, half-depressing; and I thought, if I up here, sit myself down quietly among these empty human habiliments and listen to this music, and think, "here sit I, a forlorn stranger in the country, whilst they without are making merry with dancing, then—I shall become melancholy, and shall begin to write an appendix to Solomon's sermon, 'All is vanity!' But if I too go down among those joyful people, and entertain myself with looking at them, and whilst they whirl about in the gallopade and the waltz, make me—"

A dim idea unfolded itself suddenly in my head, like the butterfly from the chrysalis. I took hold of Karin—such was the name of my obliging maiden—and prayed her to inform nobody in the house of my arrival, but on the contrary, to assist me in putting on my black silk dress and other things, to make a hasty toilet. I wished to sneak into the company unannounced and unknown. Karin understood my idea, thought it merry, and helped me quickly and efficiently; so that in half an hour I could show myself with honour in the saloon, and hoped to remain unobserved by a part of the 'foule' which, as I knew of old, was very important in the soirées of my stepmother. And to tell the truth, I was not altogether dissatisfied to be able to look about me a little, and, as it were, to prepare myself for acquaintance with relatives whom I had now not seen for so many years.

As I entered the dancing-room a gallopade was being danced. I stole along by the wall, and soon fortunately found a place in a corner. The music, the noise, and the strong blaze of light, almost bewildered my head. When I had a little recovered my senses, I spied about curiously after the countenances of my connexions; above all, my eye sought for my young sister Selma, although almost without hope of being able to recognise in the young girl of twenty, the tender, delicate child which I had not seen for ten years.

"But the sole daughter of the house," thought I, "the heroine of the day, must still be easy to discover among the others: she must certainly precede every one in the dance, and must be put forward and honoured before all others!" and I sought inquiringly among the couples who were floating round in the gallopade. The dance seemed to me enchanting.

'Ah, les reines du bal!' said now an elderly gentleman of an animated, and at the same time somewhat faded exterior and relaxed features, who stood near me; and I saw a young officer of dragoons dancing onward with two young ladies who riveted my whole attention, so beautiful and brilliant were they. I considered it a settled thing that one of these must be my sister Selma; but which of them? They had a remarkably great sisterly resemblance, and yet on near observation it was a peculiar manner which made them unlike. The lively, refined, captivating grace which distinguished the one who was dressed in white gauze and blond, was wanting in the other, who was dressed in bright rose-coloured crape, and whose growth was somewhat larger, yet who mean time was unquestionably the handsomer. Her dancing was characterised by that joyously-bounding life, which is said to constitute the spirit of Fanny Elser's dancing, whilst the dancing of the other—the white one—had more of the noble pure grace which I myself have admired in Maria Taglioni. Either might be Selma. The more I regarded the white one, the more I wished that she might be my sister.

But is it, indeed, possible, that the somewhat self-willed doll, 'little me,' as Selma called herself in her childish years, should have changed itself into this sylph-like being, whose countenance beamed with soul and innocent joy?

The other had more of the proud self, which looked forth in the child Selma; perhaps she might be my sister Selma! Should I be able to love her much?

Whilst this contest between the red and white rose went on in my mind, and I purposefully demanded no explanation from my neighbour, but would await the answer from chance, I heard the gentleman who had exclaimed, 'les reines du bal,' congratulated by another upon being 'a rich old bachelor.'

"The life of a rich old bachelor," said he with a sigh, which awakened in me the thought that he found himself burdened with as many wives and children as Rochus Pumpernickel—"the life of a rich old bachelor is indeed a continual"—

"The life of a rich old bachelor," said the first speaker also with a sigh, "is a splendid breakfast, a tolerably flat dinner, and a most miserable supper!"

Whilst I listened to the communication of the two gentlemen, and observed 'les reines du bal,' I remarked that a man between thirty and forty, in naval uniform, of a frank and strong exterior, with a pair of serious, honest eyes—observed me. This gave me pleasure—I do not know why. I also remarked that the son of Neptune steered ever nearer and nearer to me, and—unexpectedly seated himself by my side. I cannot at this moment rightly comprehend how we came into discourse, and still less how I came to confide to him my observations on the two stars of the ball, and last of all, how I could feel so communicative and well acquainted with a person entirely strange to me. The person smiled at my confidential communications, and inquired if I wished for any explanations from him? I replied that this evening I had set out on a voyage of discovery, and had taken Chance for my helmsman, and would have him to govern the voyage. My new acquaintance warned me of the danger of giving myself up to such a helmsman, and sought with delicacy to dive into the intention of my undertaking. I answered evasively; the conversation was jesting, and it seemed to me as if a great ship of war was amusing itself by chasing a little brig, which nevertheless succeeded, by rapidly tacking about, perpetually to escape it. In the mean time we came, quite unexpectedly, into very deep water, namely, into the innermost of the soul and of life, and we soon were contending about that which constitutes the highest weal or woe of human life. We had on this subject entirely different views, because, whilst I, in the calmness of temper and clearness of thought, sought for the haven of felicity, the son of Neptune found it merely in the life and strength of feeling. I asserted that in this way he never would come into the haven, but would always find himself on the outside of it, in the open stormy sea. He had nothing to say against this. It was exactly upon the open stormy sea that he had found happiness. I declared myself opposed to the disquiet of a Viking life; he against a life of quiet and ease. I spoke of the danger of shipwrecks under the guidance of the feelings, and remembered Odin's words in Havamal, "Insecure is that which one possesses in the breast of another." The seaman betook himself to Christianity, and thought with the Apostle, that without love all things in the world were sounding brass and a tinkling cymbal. I bowed myself before human love: this was precisely my proposition. But in regard to private relationships, I found it to be in the highest degree necessary to be able to sing at all times,

"I care for nobody, nobody,
And nobody cares for me!"

The seaman laughed, but shook his head and said, "You would not be able to sing so, and could not sing so, if you had had the happiness—to have children."

"Perhaps not," replied I, in an indifferent tone; pleased in myself to find that my new acquaintance was, as I had already suspected, a married man, and the father of a family.

We were here interrupted by the ending of the gallopade and the dancing ladies seeking for resting places, on which my neighbour stood up. The view through the dancing room was now freer, and permitted one through the open doors to look into the saloon, where turbaned "gracious ladies" occupied the divans, and several gentlemen with stars and ribbons moved about them.

"Ah, there she is!" thought I, with sudden emotion, as a lady of noble figure and noble bearing came in sight, whilst in conversation with an elderly gentleman, she slowly approached the dancing-room.

Yes, that was she; still the same as ever in appearance, grave, beautiful, and tasteful in dress. I recognised the strings of real pearls, with jewelled clasps, which surrounded her neck and her lovely arms, which I would so willingly have kissed in my childhood; I recogbleed the beautiful countenance, and the carriage, so imposing, and yet so full of grace. She was still the same as, twenty years ago, she had stood a half-divinity before my eyes in the magnificent saloons of the capital; when she, as wife of the "District Governor," did the honours, with the looks of a queen; yes, she was still the same as I then had seen her, and nothing more distinguished have I seen since then—although I have looked well about me in the world—and probably never shall, and yet . . . It was my stepmother! My heart beat not lightly, as I saw her slowly approach the side where I sat, and anticipated the moment of recognition; it came.

The glance of my stepmother fell on me; she started, and looked again observantly; I stood up; she hastened towards me, and we soon embraced each other; not without mutual embarrassment, which the surprise, and mutual excuses—from me, on account of my arrival; from her, on the condition of my chamber—helped to conceal. My stepmother now called 'Selma! Selma!' and the white sylph floated towards us, and I clasped my young sister in my arms, glad that she was 'the white rose,' and delighted to see such a kindly joy beam from her dear blue eyes, as blushing, she heartily bade me welcome.

At this moment my glance involuntarily met that of my former neighbour, who from some little distance observed us, with a gentle, half-melancholy smile. After this, my stepmother called 'Flora!' and beckoned; but Flora, occupied in lively discourse with some gentlemen, did not immediately hear. Selma hastened to her, took her by the arm, and returned with her to me. I saw 'the red rose,' the other queen of the ball, before me. Selma whispered, "Sophia! thy and my cousin, Flora!"

My cousin Flora Delphin, whom I now saw for the first time, greeted me courteously; and after a short and indifferent conversation, she turned again to her gentlemen.

"For this evening no more acquaintance, my sweet Selma," I now, besought. "I know that I here must have several, to me, yet unknown relations; but I would rather defer making their acquaintance till another time.

"All the better!" answered she; "then can I yet a while alone belong to you. I shall not dance this dance—I must chat with you." And now, as a quadrille was played, Selma's partner approached; she excused herself to him, and introduced him to a young lady who was sitting, and whom he led to the dance. On this, she seated herself near me, asked with warm interest after things which concerned me, and reminded me, with a voice full of tender emotion, how I had been so good to her in her childhood, told her tales, had brought about pastimes, and little merry-makings and such like, in order to please her.

"This time, Selma," interrupted I, "you must tell me tales; but, of course, only true ones; because I am totally unacquainted with the world which surrounds me here, and would willingly be conducted into it; or much rather, without any trouble on my part, have it brought to me."

"Ah! you have addressed yourself exactly to the right person," said Selma, with comic dignity; "and in order to begin now my office of chief mistress of the ceremonies, thus—who shall I, in the first place, have the honour of introducing to you in this company!"

"O! the stately lady there, with the bird-of-paradise waving in the turban of silver gauze, and in a dress of black velvet—she, who now talks with your mamma and laughs—a fine woman; she might represent the queen of night."

"So she is," answered Selma laughing. "Signora Luna, as we sometimes call her, or, 'our lady with the bright eyes;' she is lady of honour to her majesty the queen, where, as one knows, night is turned into day; she will please you; she belongs to our very best acquaintance, and this evening, over and above, Signora Luna is at the full; shall I not immediately intro—"

"No! no! not this evening; Signora Luna is, at this moment, too splendid for me. Who is the tall gentleman who now talks with her! a stately figure also, but somewhat ostentatious."

"Respect! I pray for—Alexander the Great, or the Great Alexander—he has translated the logic and rhetoric of Aristotle; a most learned man, and the proper husband for the handsome Mrs. Luna."

"Humble servant! But my best one, here is the strangest company in the world—truly, not of this world. Signora Luna and Alexander the Great! I wonder what celestial dignity will next have the honour—that officer, for example, I would gladly know his name; he talks now with a gentleman who wears an order; a delightful countenance; but he seems to me to belong a little to the earth."

"Not so entirely, for he belongs more to the sea. We call him 'the Viking'—for the rest he is called Commodore Captain Brenner, a very brave and distinguished man. Do you know with whom he speaks?"

"No, but I would willingly learn. Of a certainty he is called Aristides, or—Axel Oxenstjerna. Methinks I have seen him before."

"That is Baron Thorsten Lennartson: you will often see him here; he was Felix Delphin's guardian, and is now Flora's guardian."

"He is the same whom I fancied I knew again. You have given him no character-name, Selma; but I should like to give him one!"

"And what?"

"I would call him 'My lord,' because he seems as if he could be lord over himself; what say you?"

"You have said it excellently. It seems to me as if you had known him long."

"I have seen him years ago, and—but there stands a person beside Flora, whom, I think, I have seen also formerly; a regular, but marble-cold countenance; rather sallow, Voltaire-like features!"

"One of your relatives too! My and your brother-in-law, the Envoyé St. Orme; who only a few months ago came here from Paris."

"Virginia's husband! Ah, I ought to have recognised him: but it is above ten years since I saw him, at Virginia's marriage. How beautiful she was! That she must so soon leave the earth! One year after her marriage!"

"Yes, on the anniversary of her wedding;" said Selma, with a voice that shewed a painful remembrance. For this reason I continued my inquiries.

"And that young officer with whom you were dancing; a distinguished, handsome young man?"

"Another relation, Felix Delphin, Flora's brother. Is not Flora gloriously beautiful?"

"Very beautiful!"

"And how witty! how richly gifted! She has at least a dozen talents."

"That were almost too much!" said I, laughing; "and now, thanks my sweet Selma, that you have so richly entertained me. I now see a gentleman approaching you with dancing intentions, and you shall not any longer drive your partners to desperation on my account. Be easy about me; I amuse myself excellently with looking on the dance, and on the new, interesting acquaintance that I have made, Signora Luna, Alexander the Great, my Lord——"

"Bestow a glance on the philosopher," said Selma archly, and pointed to a servant in the livery of the family who approached with a tray of ices, and had a very grave countenance, with the features of a parrot.

"Take care, Jacob," continued she, merrily addressing him, "and look before you, that we do not waltz over you."

"O heaven defend me, Miss!" replied the philosopher with a rough voice, while a sudden illumination passed over his countenance, but which speedily resumed its dark expression, as he remained standing before me with his tray. 'Miss' floated away in the waltz, light as a breath.

Immediately after this, my stepmother came up to me with 'the rich old bachelor,' wearing the French order, and introduced 'your uncle, Chamberlain X.'

My uncle seated himself near me, and began the conversation with much politeness, which advanced from some compliments on myself to a tolerably witty criticism of others, but which had a less digestible relish in a spiritual sense.

Whether it were that I was wearied by the journey, or by the noise of the ball, or was spoiled by the conversation which I had already had, certain it is that this did not please me, and a sort of twilight mist spread itself before my eyes over that animated life which had just before been so brilliant. At the same time, I listened with pleasure to the praises of my stepmother. "A most excellent person," said my uncle, "I know no one in whom I have so great a confidence, no one on whom one can so much depend. When I would do a little good in secret, and would not wish it to be known, I always betake myself to her."

The Viking had left the company, after having, at going out, cast towards me a parting glance, which lived in my remembrance like a little point of light. Signora Luna's brilliant appearance vanished from our horizon, in order to ascend into the horizon of the Court, where she was at this moment in attendance. I only saw Selma when, between the dances, she came, with a friendly word or a question, bounding towards me: thus I saw her also now by the side of her mother, now by an elderly lady in the company, as if she would make all happy.

After supper, somewhat occurred, the impression of which I shall long retain. There arose a lively movement in the saloon, and I saw how my young sister was borne in an arm chair under the chandelier, whose light beamed around her, and the most animated vivat-cry resounded from the encircling gentlemen.

"My lord" was among those who thus exalted the young heroine of the festival, and right beautiful and princess-like sate she there, in the strong blaze of light, herself beaming with the charm of youth and becoming joy. An exclamation of admiration and homage went through the whole assembly. As my eyes sunk from the almost dazzling view, they were arrested by a countenance whose expression gave, as it were, a stab to my heart. It was the countenance of Flora. Vexation, envy, anger, lay in the almost spasmodic movements which thrilled through and disfigured the beautiful features—but only for a moment. As her eyes encountered mine, that expression changed itself again; and soon afterwards she laughed and joked with the Envoyé St. Orme, who was seldom from her side, and whose observant and cold glance had for me something repulsive.

As I now wished to sneak away from the company my stepmother shewed a determined resolution of accompanying me to my chamber; but, on my warm opposition, allowed herself to be persuaded to remain quietly, and not to let Selma, who was again engaged for a dance, observe anything.

When I returned to my chamber, I found it changed. The disorderly, lying-about articles of dress had vanished, and order, taste, and kind attention had set its stamp upon everything in this large and handsome room.

"The young lady herself has been up here, and has looked after every thing," said Karin, again supplying the fire which had burned low.

"Thanks, my young sister," said I in my heart.

I was fatigued and soon slept, but had disturbed dreams. All the people upon whom, in the course of the evening, my attention had been directed, I thought I saw arrange themselves in a quadrille with threatening gestures, and ready to pounce on one another. I found myself among them, and just on the point of—skirmishing with my stepmother. At one time floated past a sylph-like being, with glimmering wings, smiling lips, and enchanting zephyr-like movements, and danced between us, and wove us together with invisible but soft ribbons, and this sylph, this other Taglioni, was—Selma!

During this apparition, the tension of mind allayed itself; the bitterness ceased, the enemies made chaine, and I sank into a refreshing, sweet sleep, which let me forget the whole world, till the new morning awoke.

And now, whilst all is quiet in the house, and seems to repose from the dance, I will take a somewhat nearer view of my past and present circumstances.

I have passed through with my stepmother two entirely different periods. The first I will call.

THE PERIOD OF MY IDOLATRY.

At the age of eleven I saw my stepmother for the first time, and was so captivated that I adored her. This continued till my fifteenth year, when I was separated from her. But bitter were my days in this time of my idolatry; because never could a golden idol have been more deaf and silent to the prayers of its worshippers, than was my stepmother to my love. Besides this, I was a violent child, and in my whole being the opposite of the lovely and the agreeable, which my stepmother so highly valued, and of which she unceasingly spoke in quotations from the romances of Madame Genlis. I was compared with the enchantresses in these romances, and set down in proportion. In one word my stepmother could not rightly endure me, and I could not endure—Madame Genlis and her graces, who occasioned me so much torment. Ah! the sunburnt, wild girl, grown up in the 'moors' of Finland, whose life had passed in woods and heaths, among rocks and streams, and amid dreams as wild and wonderful as the natural scenery among which she grew; this girl was in truth no being for the saloon, for a French Grace. Transplanted from the fresh wilderness of her childhood into the magnificent capital, where huge mirrors on every side reflected every movement, and seemed scornfully to mimic every free outbreak which was not stamped by grace,—she was afraid, afraid of herself, afraid of everybody, and especially of the goddess of the palace. The governess and the servants called me 'the Tartar-girl,' 'the young Tartar.' My stepmother was never severe towards me in her behaviour, but crushed me by her depreciatory compassion, by her cold repulsion; and I soon could not approach her without burning cheeks, and a heart so full, so swollen—if I may say so—with anxious sighs, that the tongue in vain sought for a word. To find any fault in my stepmother was what I never thought of. Every, every fault lay certainly in me; but ah! I knew not how I should behave in order to become different, in order to become agreeable to her. I know that at this time more than once I besought heaven on my knees, never to give me a lover, if it, on the contrary, would only give me the love of my mother. But heaven, deaf to my prayer, gave me a lover, but—not the love of my mother; and I must learn to do without it; which was made easier to me by my being removed from her, and transplanted into another sphere of life, and—where also I suffered, but in another way.

Five years afterwards I came again into my father's house, and passed some time there. This epoch, in relation to my former idol, may be called for it was in many things opposed to the former. I had, after severe combat with life, and with myself, moulded myself to a stern and truth-loving being, who would see reality in everything, and who despised all that appeared to be gilded in life as miserable froth. French worldly morality, accomplishment, and grace, were an abomination to me, towards which I now assumed as perfectly a well-bred demeanour as my stepmother had formerly assumed towards my world of nature. The shining veil through which I had regarded her had now fallen off. I now saw faults in her, and saw them through a magnifying-glass. She pleased me still, but I loved her no longer.

I had fallen in love with the spirit of Thorild, had imbibed his love of truth and integrity, but at the same time somewhat also of his less pleasant way of showing them. And now clashed together Madame Genlis and Thorild, in the least pleasant manner, through my stepmother and me. For every quotation from Madame Genlis I had, always in warlike opposition, a quotation ready from Thorild, and my stepmother answered in the same spirit. Nevertheless, by degrees the French Marquess yielded to the Swedish philosopher; that is to say, she relinquished the field because such a rude fellow struck about him. It is to me a strange, half-melancholy remembrance, that my stepmother at this time was really afraid of me, and avoided me, evidently grieved by my unsparing earnestness. Several times also she endeavoured to govern and to overawe me; she would at times resume the sceptre, but in vain; it was broken in her hand: she saw this, and yielded silently and somewhat dispirited.

At the recollection of the harsh feeling I had at times, when I remarked this reaction in the relationship between us, I cannot preserve myself from a secret shudder; and would exclaim warningly to all over-severe parents, the counsel of the Apostle: "Parents, provoke not your children to anger!"

The fault was this time, for the most part, on my side. But I was embittered by the remembrance of that which I had suffered; and, besides this, to say nothing of Thorild, was unclear in my views of life, and unhappy in my soul; and this may obtain for me some excuse. My stepmother, a joyous, and pleasant, and much esteemed lady of the world, was entirely accustomed to the sunny side of life, and wished only to see this. I was more accustomed to the dark side, and thus we separated more and more.

One bond of union existed at this time between us; the little Selma, a weakly, but interesting child. She seemed, by I know not what incomprehensible sympathy, attracted to me; which yet, according to my Thorildish love of justice, did not at all accord with the reverence which was shown to her at home. But I could not help feeling myself drawn to her. She was her father's darling, and his chiefest occupation. He was a friend and pupil of the great Ehrensvärd, of the man with the severe and pure sense of beauty, and he wished to form of his daughter a being as harmonious and lovely as the ideal which he bore in himself: and not the eleven thousand heroines of modern scenes and novels, but the antique Antigone, so beautiful as woman, while she was so unmasculinely noble, was the prototype upon which he early directed the eye and heart of his daughter. Thus created in her a new Antigone, and enjoyed through her a life which very weak health had rendered somewhat joyless. My stepmother was about this time very much occupied by her daughter Virginia, who by her beauty and her character might well flatter the pride of a mother. Admiration of her, and tenderness towards Selma, led us sometimes to an accord of feeling.

We were again separated; and now that after ten years we are again come into contact, I am not without some uneasiness on account of our living together. Will it occasion a union, or—a deeper separation? One of the two, that is quite certain; because my stepmother, just as little as myself, had stood still during her decennium. We both have lived to see sorrow. My stepmother has lost her husband and her beloved eldest daughter, and I, I have—yet nevertheless, that is now over, and I am free.

That I am now better than when we last met, I will venture to hope. The philosophy which then made me so proud and so disputatious, has since then made me peaceable; thought has quietly and regulatively laid its hand upon my brow; and life has cleared itself up, and the heart has calmed itself. Books have become my dearest companions; and observation, a friend which has accompanied me through life, and has led me to extract honey from all plants of life, even the bitter ones also. Thorild is still for me, as ever, a star of the first magnitude; but I no longer follow him blindly, and I have also become possessed of eyes for the constellation of Madame Genlis. In one thing will I always truly follow him—namely, in his doctrine, unceasingly to study and inquire after the good in all things.

On the shore where I was born, on the alder-fringed streams of Kautua, I often went, as a child, pearl-fishing, when the heat of the sun had abated the rigour of the water. I fancy still that the clear cool waves wash my feet; I fancy still that I see the pearl muscles which the waterfall had thrown together in heaps in the sand of the little green islands. Whole heaps of these muscles I collected together on the shore, and if I found one pearl among them—what joy! Often they were imperfect, half-formed, or injured; still sometimes I found right beautiful ones among them. Now will I again go out to fish for pearls, but in the stream of life.

The 2d of November.

I was yesterday morning interrupted by the messenger who called me to breakfast, and the messenger was my young sister, whose silvery clear voice asked at my door, “may one come in?” Yea, to be sure you may! besides, sylphs are not easily bolted out, and one opens willingly the door and heart, when a being like Selma desires to enter, and with benevolence and joy beaming from the diamond-bright eyes, bends before thee, and shews to thee tokens of friendship and kindly inclination. She was so charming, my young sister, in the flower of youth and life; in her simple, well-chosen, tasteful dress; and, above all, in her captivating manner, that I seemed to see in her the personification of the muse of Franzén, whose name she bears.

“God guard thee, thou lovely being!” thought I silently, as I observed her, and something like a painful foreboding brought tears into my eyes.

Not without a beating of the heart did I follow her down stairs, and prepare myself to see my stepmother and my home by daylight.

But my feeling of anxiety vanished as I entered the inner ante-room, and my stepmother met me with looks and words which seemed the expression of cordial good-will. Beyond this, every thing in the room was comfortable—atmosphere, furniture, to the inviting coffee service glittering with silver and real pearl.

Nothing here gave me greater pleasure than the sight of the collection of good oil-paintings which decorated the walls of the two ante-rooms. At the very moment when I was about to express my feelings on this subject, Flora entered. I scarcely recognised again the queen of the last night's ball. The delicate skin appeared coarse by daylight; the eye was dim; the dress negligent; and the beautiful countenance disfigured by an evident expression of ill temper. Selma, however, gains by being seen in daylight; her skin is delicate and fair; and her eyes have the most beautiful light, and the clearest glance, that I have ever seen in a human eye.

We seated ourselves to breakfast. We spoke of last evening's ball. My stepmother made on the occasion a little speech from the throne, which I had heard already in former times, but which had always somewhat embarrassed me. I was silent the while; but it excited in me a secret opposition, which I fancy my stepmother suspected; I know not otherwise why her glances were so often questioningly sent towards me. Selma's merry remarks interrupted the speech, and made us all laugh. Flora became again animated, and was witty and satirical. I put in my word also, and our gracious lady-mother appeared highly delighted. We brought into review various good acquaintance in last evening's ball; various toilets were criticised. In the mean time, Selma stared roguishly at my collar, and pronounced it somewhat ‘rococo.’ My stepmother looked at my dress, and pronounced this also somewhat ‘rococo.’ With that I started the idea, that my person itself might be somewhat ‘rococo,’ which was negated with the greatest and the most courteous zeal.

My stepmother said I was exactly at the handsome, ‘modern age,’ for a charming woman; in one word, ‘la femme la trente ans, la femme de Balaar,’ and added various things half unexpressed, but yet perfectly intelligible; as that I had grown handsomer, in my complexion, in my eyes, in my hands; and all this, to me, poor daughter of Eve, was a great happiness to hear.

Selma was resolute about taking my toilet in hand herself, in order to make ‘this also’ modern! I promised to submit myself to her tyranny.

After breakfast, my stepmother and I continued the conversation à la-tête; and I remarked during this that her countenance had considerably altered, and I saw a something uneasy and excited in her looks, which I had not seen before. Yet her features had not lost their noble beauty. While we talked, Selma watered her flowers, and sang thereto charmingly. The eyes of my stepmother turned often towards her, as if towards their light.

Flora was in a changeful humour. Now she opened a book, and now threw it from her; now she seated herself at the piano, and played something with good skill, but left off in the middle of the piece; now arranged her curls, and looked at herself in the mirror; at length she seated herself at the window; and made observations on the passers by. I called her secretly “Miss Caprice.”

Thus stood affairs in our ante-room, when, in a pause of the conversation, we heard a faint hissing whistling, and slow steps approaching the room where we sate.

My step mother cast an uneasy glance towards the door. Selma's song ceased, Flora looked quietly from the window, and upon—St. Orme, who entered the room. He and I were now formally introduced to each other. The repulsive impression which he had made upon me was not diminished by the shake of his hand. I receive an especial impression of the sort of person by the manner of taking the hand, and cannot avoid drawing deductions therefrom,—more however by instinct than by reason, since my reason refuses to be led by outward impressions, which may be merely accidental; but I cannot alter it: a cordial warm shake of the hand takes—my heart; a feeble or imperfect, or cold, one repels it. There are people who press the hand so that it is painful for a good while afterwards; there are also those who come with two fingers; from these defend us! . . .

But again to the Envoyé whose hand-shake, weak and sharp, although the hand was soft, did not please me. He went from me to Flora, whose hand he kissed; he wished then to put his arm confidentially round Selma's waist, but she escaped from him, and called to me to come and make acquaintance with her flower-bulbs, which she merrily introduced to me under the names of 'King Hiskia,' 'Lord Wellington,' 'Grand Vainqueur,' 'l'ami du cœur,' 'Diana,' 'Galathea,' and so on:—flower-genii hidden in the bulbs, which we rejoiced to see unfolding in the winter sun.

We were here interrupted by Flora's brother, Felix Delphin, who gave to Selma a half-blown monthly rose. She took it blushing. Aha, my young sister! But I know not whether I may bestow thee on the young Delphin. His remarkably handsome and good face has a certain unpleasant expression which tells of an irregular life.

The Envoyé said something softly to my stepmother which made her change colour, and with an uneasy look, rise up and go with him into her room.

I left the young merry trio employed in propositions and schemes for the pleasures of the day and of the week, and went up into my own room. It had a glorious prospect—my room, and afforded me an opportunity of observing, in a free and extended heaven, the play of light and shadow of clouds, and of azure blue, which gives so much life and animation to the firmament above our heads.

We dwelt upon the Blasieholm, exactly upon the limits of the fields planted with trees, where the Delagarde Palace, with its towers, had elevated itself for centuries, and had been burnt down in one night. I look out from my window, and see and hear the roaring of the broad stream which separates the city from Norrmalm, and on whose shores have been fought so many bloody battles; on the haven, the bridge of boats, the royal castle, with the Lion Hill; the river promenade, farther on, beneath the north-bridge; and on the other side of the island of the Holy Ghost, the blue water of the Mälär, and the southern mountains. From among the masses of houses upon the different islands, raise themselves the bold spires of the church-towers. To the left I have that of St. Catharine; to the right, that of St. James; and farther off, the royal gardens, with their rich alleys, and — I should never come to an end, were I to name all that I have and govern—from my window. And in my chamber, I have my pencils, my books, and—myself.

The 5th.

I have looked about me in the family, at least as far as regards the outside of people. Because rightly to decide between minds, and to pass through the outward into the actual being, requires more time. My silent question addressed to every one for this purpose is, "What wilt thou, what seest thou in life?" According to this rule, I botanize among human souls, and classify them.

"You must see Flora's paintings! You must hear Flora sing! You must see and hear Flora play in comedy! Flora must show you her poetical and prose descriptions and portraits! they are so witty, and so droll!" Thus I have often heard Selma say in these days; and she did not rest till I had seen and admired all—and I have admired it with great pleasure, for Flora's turn for the arts is in many ways distinguished. But greater still, I fear, is her self-love, or what do expressions like the following denote:

"I am not like common people; if I were like others, so and so, but I am really quite peculiar and remarkable, I cannot lower myself to the point of sight of these every-day figures," and more of the kind.

So seems with Flora the chief person to be an I, with Selma a thou. Yet I will not too hastily judge Flora.

Selma furnished me with a most agreeable morning yesterday, by allowing me to make acquaintance with several masterpieces in her beautiful collection of pictures. They were presents to her from her father, who collected them himself during his residence in Italy. By the accurate knowledge of the spirit of the various colouring, by the pure and severe sense of beauty, one recognised the scholar of Ehrensvärd. In the mean time, the conversation turned to Selma's own residence in Rome. After Virginia's death, she accompanied her parents thither, who in this journey sought for the dissipation of their sorrow and an occasion of more highly accomplishing their beloved daughter. Here had Selma awakened to a consciousness of the beauty of life, but also to that of its pain, for here had she lost her adored father. Lennartson was then in Rome, had partaken with her happier days, and became in grief her support and consolation. With filial and brotherly tenderness he attached himself to the two mourning ladies, and conducted them, under his own faithful guard, back to their native land. Selma spoke with deep emotion of all that which he had been to them.

Towards evening came St. Orme and the young Delphin. St. Orme made Flora a present of a beautiful bracelet, over which she exhibited great delight, and allowed St. Orme himself to clasp it on her arm. After this, he held it forth and kissed it, and Flora—permitted it. Selma saw this with a disturbed look, and blushed.

We divided ourselves this evening into three parties. Felix and Selma threw the feather-ball, and played comedy in the farthest ante-room, and their jests and her silver-ringing laughter came thence to us here; Flora allowed the firework of her wit to blaze before the Envoyé, who animated it by his satire, whilst he evidently ruled her and guided the conversation, which amused me, although I did not understand the frequent secret hints in it, and the vexation which these seemed sometimes to excite in Flora.

My stepmother permitted her lights to shine before me, and instructed me on the positions of the relationship in the State. I allowed myself to be edified, lent my two ears towards three sides, and made now and then one and another wise remark on my stepmother's views, as I with Sibylline solemnity laid my cards in order to read the book of fate. For I should be no worthy daughter of the home of the magic arts, Finland, if I had not been somewhat skilled in the prophetic-lore of coffee and cards. True it is that I never was an altogether worthy scholar of the celebrated soothsayers, Liboria, who had taught me her art; and I have never yet laid the cards with her devotion and her spirit, but—short and good, it amused me to see the play of fate in the cards, and I have often amused myself and others with it, and I did so also at this time.

When the evening was ended, the company separated; and Flora and I went through the little corridor towards our sleeping-rooms, which were separated by it; Flora remained standing, and said, as she suddenly turned herself toward me,

"You think certainly that I am in love with St. Orme."

"Hm?" answered I, "methinks it looks rather like it."

(For Flora this evening had really coquetted with St. Orme.)

"And know you not, wise Sibyl, that appearance often deceives! And so it is now. One must often appear that which one is not, in order to obtain that which one wishes. Craft and cunning were given to woman, in order to govern those who would rule her. They are her rightful weapons."

"So people often say," I replied, "but I have not found it so. I have found the force of truth and of earnestness—if they be used with prudence, and love—alone right powerful, and that in men as in women."

"Truth and earnestness!" said Flora scornfully, "shew me where they can be found. We altogether cheat one another every day through life, however sanctified we may conduct ourselves. How for example, is it with us two? Have we not for several days 'played off' the most courteous cousins to each other, and yet I believe that at the bottom we think very lightly of one another. What is your opinion?"

"I think with you," said I, animated by this candour.

"Well then?" continued Flora, "were it not quite as well that we openly assumed our position of hating one another?"

"Why not?" said I, as before, "that would be perhaps an entirely new way to love."

"Novelty pleases me," said Flora laughing too; "thus then, from this day, we are open enemies, and mutually cherish a little hatred. Is it not so, Miss Philosophia?"

"Agreed! Miss Caprice!"

We shook each other's hand laughing, and parted better friends than we had been before.

Notwithstanding Flora's words, I made up this evening, according to my unlooked-for conjectures, two matches, and united Flora and St. Orme, Selma and Felix. There was yet my stepmother and myself to provide for. Good, now! We will become the comfort of each other's age, and will govern the state together. Thorild and Madame Genlis can help us.

The 6th.

My unlooked-for conjectures are rendered vain; and by whom? By the Baroa.

At breakfast, Flora and I declared in a lively way our agreement of the foregoing evening. My stepmother took the affair jestingly, as she would shew, and laughed at our 'baited contract.' Selma looked on the affair, not as a merry one, but regarded us with grave and almost sorrowful eyes. I endeavoured to satisfy her by representing that I would shew her our hatred as a new way to friendship. She became again gay, and singing left us, in order to look after the domestic concerns. Soon after this came Baron Lennartson.

*A little strife and brawl
Injures not at all,*

After some time of general conversation, he led Flora aside, and talked for a long time to her in a low voice. He seemed to beseech from her something earnestly, and during this seized, more than once, her hand. And Flora appeared not at all to oppose. I looked at my stepmother, and my stepmother looked at me.

"There seems to be quite a friendly understanding between guardian and ward," said I.

"Yes," replied my stepmother, "they are something more to each other than that."

"How! are they betrothed?"

"Yes! but it is not declared, and it will not yet be generally spoken of."

"Flora," continued I, "will next spring be of age, and will then have control over a considerable property."

"Merely over the income of it," said my stepmother; "over the capital her future husband alone will have control, according to the will of the uncle whom Flora and her brother have to thank for their property. He was a crabbed old man, and had no confidence in ladies' management of business. He ordered also that Flora should not marry before her five-and-twentieth year—which she completes in the spring—under the disadvantage of losing a considerable part of her property."

Selma entered. Lennartson ended his discourse with Flora, and went, after he had kissed her hand, and had said, slowly and emphatically,

"Think on it!"

"There was indeed a very warm conversation," said my stepmother somewhat inquiringly to Flora, as she, after a glance at the mirror, approached us with beaming eyes.

"Yes," said Flora, "he is as kind as he is excellent; one must do everything that he wills."

I sighed aloud.

"Now, why does Sophia sigh so?" inquired Flora.

"Because I conjecture that you will be right happy soon with Lennartson, and receive his hand. I must indeed nourish my hatred."

"O," said Flora, laughing, "do not mourn yet. It will not be so good with me," added she, half mélanchole. "The talk is now less about me than about Felix. My guardian wishes that I should be for him a prototype, and an example, and a guide—but my influence upon my dear brother is not much to be boasted of; and I well know who, better than I, could work upon him, and could change my dear Felix into a true bird, 'a phoenix,' if she would. What do you think, Selma?"

Selma turned herself away, and said, half to herself, "Do not let us talk of it."

"Well, then, let us talk of my masquerade costume," replied Flora with liveliness; "come and help me to choose the colours; you have so good a taste." She took Selma by the arm, and the two young cousins chatted, singing, out of the room.

"Later, as I went with a message to Selma, in Flora's room, I found them in eager discourse, amid gold and silver gauze.

"But Flora, that is too dear!" said Selma,

"But it is so divinely beautiful!" said Flora.

"But it may still be beautiful—and the difference in the cost is so considerable! You have indeed promised Lennartson himself to be an example to Felix."

"Yes, yes, in generale, but not in all trifles. In them I will follow my own head. So look Selma dear, do not assume airs of wisdom to me; they do not become you—be a little bit livelier. Let us come to my turban. Ah, aunt! That was divine! My aunt shall say"—and Flora turned herself warmly to my stepmother, who just then entered, and now without hesitation entered in Flora's plans respecting the expensive costume which should change her into a Circassian.

After this she said to me, whilst she embraced Selma, "What think you of this child here, Sophia, who will sit at home by her old mother, instead of going to the masquerade at W.'s?"

"I love her on that account," said I.

"How should Miss Philosophia do otherwise, towards such behaviour?" said Flora, somewhat pointedly.

"But if I," continued my stepmother, her eyes twinkling with delight, "take upon myself all cost of the dress, and—"

"That mamma should not do, if mamma loves me," exclaimed Selma. "It is really so, that I have no desire for this ball, and still less to ruin myself for it. My mother, beside, would merely go there on my account, and—one thing with another, I am convinced that I shall be far more pleased if I remain at home this evening."

"Now you wish to win Lennartson's heart;" said Flora, bitterly.

"Flora!" cried Selma, with a look of astonishment and wounded innocence. Her eyes filled with tears.

"Pardon," besought Flora, and kissed her burning cheek. "I did not mean what I said. That which I really mean is, you deserve him far more than I do."

We now, every one of us, got very deep into dresses and costumes.

The 9th.

Selma has altered my wardrobe, and has tyrannized me to become modern. And I have let myself be tyrannized over, because I see that it gives her and my stepmother so much pleasure. And my stepmother! she has embarrassed me with her beautiful presents. But she had such evident pleasure in giving, that I could not do otherwise than receive with gratitude.

To-day, in childish pleasure over my mid-day toilet, Selma exclaimed,

"Ah! I would that Balsac saw you. He would directly bring you into a novel, and let you awaken at least three deadly passions."

"That may be said I," "a strong proof of the power of poetical fancy, since, in reality, I should not indeed awaken one passion."

"Um, um, um!" said my stepmother with a courteously-designed diplomatic mien.

"Nevertheless I wish it any more," continued I.

The times of folly are gone forever
The days of wisdom are at hand.

"A wisdom," said Flora, "which perhaps smacks a little of the wisdom of the fox under the grapes. I, for my part, never believe that a lady does not wish to please and win hearts, and incense and sacrifice, be she called Cleopatra, or Ninon, or St. Philosophia."

"St. Philosophia may sometime teach you otherwise," answered I seriously; and my stepmother, who at times seems somewhat afraid that the hatred between Flora and me might become earnest, hastened to turn the conversation by dinner, during which the merry jests of Selma put all in good humour. Flora and I said many amusing things about our 'hatred-contract,' and added many clauses and paragraphs. My stepmother scattered over them laughter and joke. From what I see, I suspect that we are a set of clever people here together, and can make merry with one another.

The 12th.

Our every-day life begins to assume more and more shape before my eyes. A deal of dissipation reigns here, and I am glad that I am withdrawn from this to my own solitary chamber. The two young girls sport away their lives, but with very dissimilarity.

Flora has perpetually changing, and for the most part, vexatious, tempers. The least adverse occurrence brings on a storm. Selma, on the contrary, has a golden temper; her whole being is harmony, and one sees this in her light graceful gait; one hears it in the joyous singing which announces her approach or her presence, here and there in the house; while she now occupies herself in the domestic concerns, now keeps a sort of dancing attendance by my mother, now takes part in all Flora's revolutions, or now cares for the strangers who daily visit the house. The domestics obey her with joy, because she always speaks kindly to them, and her arrangements evince a good and wise understanding. The Philosopher himself glows at the sight of her. In one word, she is the life and sunshine of the house. The only thing that disturbs me in her is an often-protruding too satirical humour, which at times—shall I say it—degenerates into malice! The word is severe, but I think that it is true. But with such gay animal spirits as Selma and Flora have for their daily companions, it is not easy to maintain here also the right tact and the right harmony. And then the pleasure which my stepmother has in everything that awakens life and spices it, and her love to the young girls, makes her often not observe that they scatter about cayenne pepper instead of harmless salt.

Between me and my stepmother much politeness prevails,—although no confidence. I fancy that we are rather afraid of each other. We have commonly an hour's tête-à-tête each day, in which we together care for the affairs of the state, and make our 'reflexions chrétiennes et morales,' on the course of time and things. In these, and in all our politenesses, I remark that we secretly strive to enlighten and to convert one another, and even as with our profound words and views to startle one another. Thus it happens, that while we are trying to set together the state-machine, it sometimes, between us two, is near going a little to pieces. For, although we both of us maintain that we stand in the most exact 'juste milieu' of heavenly right; still my stepmother leans considerably to the aristocratic side of the state, just as I towards the democratic. My stepmother, who in her former importance as wife of the District-Governor exercised no inconsiderable influence upon the affairs of the government, conceives herself to have not only all the knowledge of experience, but also the skill of a ruler. I, on the contrary, conceive that from my philosophical point of vision, I see everything and understand rather better; and all this occasions at times a little strife between us, which, however, never becomes violent. Because when my stepmother raises her voice with a 'believe my, friend,'—I am silent, and amuse myself by assuming a disbelieving air; and although I also put myself in opposition, I still let my stepmother always have the last word or tone, namely, the diplomatic 'Um, um, um!'

In the evening the family, however, is mostly at home (they say that in the New-Year this will be different); and Felix Delphin, St. Orme, and Lennartson often join it. I see plainly that the Baron has directed an inquiring glance upon Flora and St. Orme. It seems to me often that his eyes turn from the brilliant effect-seeking Flora to Selma, and rest upon her with a certain tender observation; and she—why are her eyes in his presence so continually shaded by the long dark eyelashes! Why hears one nothing of the gay sallies, of the sagacious and fine observations, which otherwise are peculiar to her! Yet Flora would of a truth not endure that. I have seen this in one and another pointed jealous glance which has flashed from Flora's eyes. But I also have received my share in this glance when Lennartson gives me any considerable portion of his attention, which, I say it with pleasure, not seldom happens.

The Baron—no! No description of him. Bulwer, who has thrown so many deep glances into the nobler class of the female mind, observes with justice, how indifferent to them is the beauty or plainness of a man. It is the impression of the character in demeanour, gestures, and words, which fetter or repel. Thus, not a word about the Baron's height, size, hair, teeth, and so on. Neither should I have much to say on the subject; but I know this, that the impression of his personal appearance is such that one does not forget it, and never will. One feels, as it were, exalted by it, and his look—yes, of that I must say one word.

There are eyes, in which one looks as it were into a brightened world,—so must the eyes of Schelling be, and therefore I wish for once, to be able to look into them;—there is also a look which I call especially the look of the statesman. Some one has said, "philosophers see more light than shapes;" and I say "most others see more shapes than light;" but the true statesman sees at the same time the shapes of life, and sees them in the true light of life. His glance is at the same time bright and distinct. Such is Lennartson's glance, and one sees soon that sun as well as lightning can speak from it.

I am glad to have seen and known this man.

St. Orme makes beside him a decided contrast, although he also has a distinguished exterior, and is rich in knowledge, wit, and experience of life. But he wants a something in his being, a something which ennobles the whole. He inspires no confidence, no esteem. Besides this, he has a certain uneasy activity in his arms and fingers, which reminds one of a spindle, and makes him—at least to me, disagreeable.

How should I understand the way in which Flora acts towards these two men? It seems to me certain that she loves the Baron; but why then coquet with St. Orme? Why accept presents from him?

A guest, who also begins to present himself here more frequently is, 'the rich old bachelor,' my uncle. He is tolerably agreeable and entertaining; and if I might not fear being proud, I might believe that his visits had reference to—me.

He sees in me perhaps a 'passable souper.' My stepmother begins to give me one and another well-meant little hint on the subject; I pretend that I understand nothing about it.

Among the frequent guests here are the two sisters von P., Mrs. and Miss, commonly called here the Lady Councillors of Commerce, who drive an important trade in the city with the phrases 'they said,' 'they think,' 'they know.' To us this is somewhat ridiculous; but yet we are no despisers of the commerce which we laugh at, for both sisters know a vast many people, and the unmarried lady is a wide-awake person, whose great, peering eyes see very sharply and correctly, and whose tongue is more amusing than keen. She has above ninety cousins; all on the side of the ladies, as she told us the other day.

The 14th.

Yesterday evening I made the acquaintance of 'our nearest,' as Selma calls the circle of the most trusted friends of the house, in contradistinction to 'our remotest.' When I, as usual, towards half-past seven, came down into the room of my step-mother, I saw Signora Luna sitting in one corner of the sofa, but evidently in the wane, as Selma also whispered when she introduced me to her. The beautiful Countess saluted me somewhat coolly, yet I was pleased with the pressure of her warm, silky-soft hand.

The rest of the company consisted of Baron Alexander G —, a young lieutenant, Ake Sparrsköld; a sister of Flora's, a widow, and ten years older than herself; the Baroness Bella P., whom we call 'the Beauty,' and whose features are of the first class, but in expression only of the second; of the handsome old lady Mrs. Rittersvård, and her daughter Helfrid; and of St. Orme and Lennartson.

They spoke of a now greatly-admired French romance which St. Orme had lent to Flora. St. Orme extolled the strength of the characters, and the boldness and pomp of its colouring. The young Sparrsköld considered the last to be false; and in the first he found an exaggeration which robbed them of all strength. Every human effort immediately mounts up to insanity, and loses as well proportion as design; even virtue cannot appear sublime, without being placed on stilts and becoming unnatural. And the object of the actions! Always merely single, contracted motive, always self, selfish, isolated happiness; never an endeavour, an interest, which embraces the great interests of humanity. And these faults he believed were to be found in the whole of the new French literature.

Lennartson agreed warmly in this; "and the aim of this literature," said he, "is not merely false in itself. They are untrue as chronometers, and libel the nobler and one may say the UNIVERSAL SPIRIT of the times—the spirit which places individual efforts and individual well-being in the most complete connexion with the universal good. In regard to this feeling towards the UNIVERSAL, towards the WHOLE, the present young France might go to the school of the old Rousseau. With all their faults, still his romances are, to a great degree, patterns for pictures of this kind of citizen social life. See how here the single individuals represent the chief varieties of mankind; and how, when they embrace one another in love, this love stiffens not into egotism, but expands itself, in order to embrace the most sacred institutions of the citizen social life, the life of humanity and of nature in its divine existence, and domestic life steps forth, as it must do, as the point from which the great life of the world will be sanctified and blessed."

St. Orme shrugged his shoulders. "Poor Rousseau! With all his ideal romances he was merely—a fanatic!" said he, and went to join Baron Alexander in the great ante-room.

"I feel that you have right on your side," said I to Lennartson, "but—still I would so willingly see the progress in every important formation of harmony—see an actual advance forward, a step upon the path of development—and it cannot be denied that this French literature presents characters and situations of a variety and depth such as the world has never before seen; it presses into every corner of social existence—its every moment of suffering, darkness, and dissonance: this is probably only a descent into hell, but—must not an ascent into heaven be near; a change in which night's deepest night shall be illumined by its most beautiful morning? Is it indeed possible that the highest point of this literature shall be only—a return to Rousseau?"

"Yes," replied Lennartson, smiling at my zeal, "but as I just observed, merely as concerns the looking to, the feeling FOR THE WHOLE, the universal. I see, like you, in this literature, a decided new development, and it is not the first time that the people who exhibited this have broken up new paths for the world. But it is yet merely fragmentary; it contains studies for a great composition. And some day certainly will the master step forward who will arrange these chaotic creations into a harmonious world. Yet—perhaps, the model for this must first of all present itself in actual life."

"How do you mean?" asked I, excited.

"Permit me," continued Lennartson, "to direct your attention to the principal feature in the better, beautiful literature of our time—namely, to its tendency,—that of presenting woman as the point in life from which animating, renovating strength proceeds. And I confess that I accord with it. I expect at this period of the world much—from woman."

That the female auditorium, before whom the Baron spoke these words, looked up to him with pleasure and acknowledgment, was merely natural. A modest joy glowed in Selma's beautiful eyes, whilst from the flashing eyes of Flora broke forth something which I might call—great.

My stepmother now made the move that we should go into the saloon and hear some music. We followed her.

Flora called Lennartson to the piano, and sung and played bewitchingly for him; at intervals they talked in a low voice.

I attached myself to Helfrid Rittersvård and Lieutenant Sparrsköld, who, with his honest countenance and his frank way of acting and speaking, pleased me particularly. 'The Beauty' joined herself to us, and seemed to wish to make a deathless impression upon Ake Sparrsköld, but he seemed for the present, like myself, to be more taken with Miss Rittersvård.

When I see a young lady who is as ugly as Miss Helfrid Rittersvård, and at the same time has so tranquil a manner, and has so pleasing and happy a way of acting and speaking, I form a very high opinion of her. I feel that some way a high consciousness exalts her above all the petty miseries of weakness; she has a full confidence in the noble within herself and in her fellow-beings, and calls forth thereby their esteem and every sound feeling, which easily vanquishes all outward troubles. I found Helfrid's conversation spiced and animating, and I fancy that Sparrsköld found it so too, although 'the Beauty' exercised upon him certainly her power of attraction.

My stepmother played piquet with her good friend Mrs. Rittersvård. This amiable old lady suffered from a nervous affection of the head, and is come to Stockholm in order to consult the physicians there on the subject. Her daughter obtains the means needful for this by her translations of foreign works, and also assists thereby in providing for two younger brothers. Well deserves she the name in earnest of "Miss Estimable," which Flora gives to her half in jest.

Selma was here and there in the company, and took a friendly part in every thing that went forward.

St. Orme played cards with the Baron Alexander and Felix Delphin, but he threw often from his cards sharp glances upon Flora and Lennartson, who, at the piano, had forgotten the music for a low but warm conversation. This was suddenly interrupted by St. Orme, who exclaimed—

"Flora! my best Flora! bestow upon me one quarter of a thought. I am to-night an unlucky player; come to my help with a piece of good advice. Tell me in which colour shall I play. . . Is black or red?"

"In black," answered Flora.

"In black!" repeated St. Orme, "why do you not rather council me in red? Red is your favourite colour—crimson red—is it not? or do I remember erroneously?"

"I do not remember!" said Flora, with apparent indifference, as she rose, and a crimson glowed upon her cheeks.

"But I remember it, I!" returned St. Orme. "Crimson is your colour, and therefore—gentlemen! Six in hearts. This game I hope to win," continued he, nodding to Flora, who suddenly went out. She soon returned; but her joyous mood was gone, and her cheerfulness for the remainder of the evening was constrained.

As St. Orme went away, I heard him say to Flora half offensively, "Thanks for your council, dear cousin! I won my game! and with your colour upon my heart, I hope to win it also in the future."

"Do not make yourself sure of it!" said Flora, out of humour.

"Defy me not!" said St. Orme, slowly, half in jest, but with warning earnestness; and he seized her resisting hand and kissed it, and bowed smiling to her.

What may that portend?

The 16th.

I went out to-day far and alone, and enjoyed myself with my own thoughts. Returned home, I found visitors, and among them the Chamberlain. I saw certain strange telegraphic signs between my stepmother and him.

Flora lives only in her costume, and in her thoughts of the ball at Minister — What weariness for—an evening!

Many projects for balls and other pleasures, I, for my part, say 'No!' to all of them. I say that I am too old to dance.

"Um, um, um!" says, politely negatively, my stepmother.

I think, however, of being present at the New-Year's assembly, because I there shall see the royal family more nearly.

The 17th.

Noble flowers have nectaries, honey-containers, in which the noblest juices of the plant are preserved. But in order to come at these, one must sometimes—if one has not the genius of a bee, or of Hummel, but has merely unskilful human fingers—one must sometimes wound the flower. The human soul has also its nectaries, which we must often handle as we do the flowers.

The occasion for these reflections is the following—I found Selma and Flora, as well as my stepmother, occupied by reviewing the acquaintance and friends of the house. They made sharp work of it, and most of them were treated without mercy or forbearance.

Flora was the severest, but Selma soon followed her footsteps. My stepmother laughed a deal at this mimicry and these caricatures of the young girls. I also began to laugh, for the satire was strikingly witty; but when a couple of good, estimable people, and whom the young girls liked with their whole hearts, were handled quite remorselessly, I felt myself wounded, and was troubled at all the poison which these young human flowers, as it were, breathed forth.

I made use of a moment, when my stepmother was out of the room, to tell them, affectionately, how deeply I felt this.

Both blushed; and Flora said, "I could very well see by your silence that you were thinking about reading us this lesson. But my best Philosophy, if you will preach, do it in a Finland church, but not in the saloons of Stockholm, where you will convert nobody. It is here as everywhere in the great world, 'tous les genres sont bons, hors le genre comique.'" Besides this, when people are young they must amuse themselves and laugh. It is time enough to be grave and silent when the years of wisdom come. And when we shall be old maids, then we shall be, perhaps, as moral and virtuous as you."

I was silent; for what was the use of replying to anything like this? and when my stepmother came in I went out softly, and up to my own room. I was inwardly uneasy. Selma is not that which I fancied, thought I, and looked up to the beaming stars, which, in the evening twilight, began to step forth from the deep blue, and thought of the stars which I had seen beaming in her eyes, and mourned sincerely over their dimming.

But I had not been long alone, when I heard light footsteps springing up-stairs. My door opened and—Selma threw herself into my arms, and said—

"Are you very indignant against me?"

"No longer, now, my sweet Selma!" said I, affected by her heartfelt manner.

"But you have been indignant, you have been dissatisfied with me, and that certainly more than once. Is it not so?"

I assented. I told her how I feared that Flora might mislead her to an unworthy passion for censure and severity, and how it grieved me to see dark specks in her soul. I spoke earnestly of that blameable sharp-sightedness to little things, which blinded the mind to what was great and conciliatory; of the disposition of mind which led us to depreciate others in order to exalt ourselves. I became severer than I had wished to be, and pronounced this judgment to be self-righteousness and phariseism. Selma listened to me in silence, and became more and more grave and pale.

"You are right!" at length she said; "you are certainly quite right. Ah! I have reflected so little upon myself; till now I have given so little heed to myself.—Everybody has been so kind to me, has, in fact, spoiled me. But do you tell me of my faults, Sophia! I will alter, I will improve myself!"

"But you must not weep, Selma."

"And what matters it if I weep? Tears truly must wash away the hateful spots from my soul. Be not afraid for me, and spare me not, Sophia. Tell me always the truth, as long as you consider me worthy of hearing it."

I embraced the affectionate girl warmly, and told her how happy she made me.

We talked now calmly of the difficulties of a true middle-path along the field of social criticism. I agreed as to the difficulty of finding it; and that although I watched over myself, I had often to reproach myself with sins of the tongue. An affectionate tone of mind, which regarded more the intrinsic than the accidental in man, would be the safest guide to this. And for the rest, the more experienced, and the more prudent we were, should we, all the more, find better subjects for our sharp-sightedness than the short-comings of our neighbours.

"You speak of something," said Selma, "which I for some time have dimly felt. Since the death of my father and teacher, I am, I fear, gone back in many things. I know not how it is now; but my days are trifled away in nothing. I often feel an emptiness—I fear that I have sunk. Ah! thank you, Sophia, that you have awoke me to it. But help me now again into a good way. Help me to occupy myself with that which makes wiser and better. You are indeed my elder sister! Be now also my friend!"

How willingly will I be so. We now projected together a new arrangement of life; we laid our plans for the future, and continued our conversation long, by which I was permitted to see a soul which is capable of the noblest perfection.

That which had begun so gravely ended, however, jocely; inasmuch as I promised, as an equivalent for Selma's instruction in singing and Italian, to teach her Finnish; she promised in return to exercise my patience severely, because she never would understand Finnish.

When Selma had left me at the call of her mother, I felt that I loved her, and that truly for the whole of my life. Never, never shall I forget how she stood before me, and said,

"What matters it if I weep? Tell me always the truth; I will alter, I will improve myself." And the quiet tears in the noble, soul-beaming countenance—I wish that Lennartson had seen and heard her. Oh, there are still beautiful things on earth!

The 19th.

Selma was right in her prophesying. The masquerade evening was to us home-tarriers a far pleasanter evening than if we had figured in the most magnificent parts.

Whilst Selma gave the finishing hand to Flora's toilet, I went down to my stepmother, and found Felix, the Viking, and the Baron, with her.

The latter was very little talkative, and often turned his eyes towards the door.

When Flora, attended by Selma, entered in her magnificent costume, he seemed struck by her beauty. I was to that degree, that I could not withhold an exclamation of surprise and rapture. We were all carried away; and Selma's beaming eyes went beseechingly around in order to collect honour and incense for the beautiful Circassian, who stood there in proud consciousness of her youth, her beauty, and her splendour. Lennartson's admiration, however, quickly cooled; his glance became serious; and when St. Orme entered in an ornamental Turkish dress—he and Flora were to dance together in a quadrille—he suddenly vanished, without taking leave of any one.

Flora's countenance plainly showed an expression of disquiet; but it soon vanished, and she smiled with pleasure as the Envoyé, with well-selected oriental compliments, conducted her to the carriage, where her sister awaited her, in order to drive her to the ball. The Viking remained with us, and so did Felix, although he was to have been at the masquerade.

We spoke of Baron Lennartson; and I expressed my delight in the strong feeling for the worth of woman and for her usefulness, which he had acknowledged a few evenings before. The Viking said—There is no one who thinks more highly of woman; and no one also who is severer in his requirements from her than he. The admiration and love which his mother inspired him with, seem to have laid the foundation of this.

My questions drew forth many relations of the childhood and youth of the Baron, which I have collected together in the following picture.

Lennartson's father, General Lennartson, was a man of violent temper and dissolute life. All care for the children and their education devolved upon the mother; a noble, highly accomplished lady, but of feeble health.

The eldest son, our Lennartson, was in his youth of a delicate constitution and irritable temperament. The mother dedicated to him the greatest attention; not an effeminating, but a tenderly cherishing care, which makes strong in love. By the bed of the boy the quiet mother often sat, and related to him, or read aloud of men who have overcome the infirmities of the body by the strength of the soul and the will, and who have become the glory and benefactors of their nation. Especially dwelt she upon the great men of his fatherland; those strong-minded and pious men, who by the union of those qualities, laid the foundation of the character of the Swedish people when this is true to itself.

The boy listened inquisitively; his breast opened itself to great thoughts; and the soul, nourished by the marrow of heroism, soon raised up the weaker body. This also was strengthened by useful exercises. At the age of fifteen, Lennartson excelled the greater number of his companions in pliancy and strength of body. The mother soon saw the affectionate spirit of her son break forth in its whole wealth, but with its dangerous propensities likewise. The young Lennartson had, like his father, a violent and inflexible temper. His father's severity towards his mother, excited him in the highest degree; and this gave occasion to scenes between father and son which unsettled the weak health of the mother, but—strange enough—broke also the rude power of the father. He became, as it were, afraid of his son; afraid, at least, in all things which concerned the mother, and he no longer dared to offend against her. This St. John-like nature had brought up an eagle; and this eagle now spread its wings defensively over her. Happy in the love of her son, but terrified also at the almost fearful temper which she saw break forth in him, she wished to teach this young power to govern itself; and sought to strengthen him in that which alone gives all power its truth, its proportion, and its right direction; namely, in the true fear of God. Early had she permitted the great figures of humanity to step forward before the eye of the child. Now she endeavoured to let the inquiring understanding of the young man ascend to a clear conception of the reality of life, and of the doctrine which had cradled in unconscious love the heart of the child. For this end she went to work in quite another way to most parents and teachers. Instead of removing books, which are looked upon as dangerous to piety, she brought these forward. She read with her young son the works of the most renowned atheists and deists, from the oldest times to the present day, and let his reason exercise itself with comparing their doctrines with the doctrine in which a personally revealed God gives most complete solution of the enigma of life, as well as in this revelation of His will and His being, the only secure, fully-efficient guarantee for the fulfilment of man's deepest longing, his holiest hope on earth.

She let him in this way surround himself with perfect difficulties, and, as it were by his own strength, open the way to the innermost centre of life. She it was who brought forward objections founded upon the doctrines of the Naturalists; he it was who answered them. But the joy which beamed from the eyes of the mother at the happily solved difficulties, probably enlightened the son secretly in his inquiries.

And whilst she thus conducted him to an independent and firm point of mind, she taught him to have esteem for his opponent, and to value all honest inquiry and all sincere opinion, and to acknowledge the sproutings of truth even in immature doctrines.

Lennartson often spoke of this period of his life, as of the happiest and richest. His mother's affectionate glance and approving word were his dearest reward. She caressed him but very rarely, although he often fell upon his knees before her in fanatical reverence, and kissed her and her dress. Only sometimes at those moments, in which she remarked that the young heart was too violently consumed by a desire for reciprocation, did she allow his glowing cheek to repose on the breast which only beat for him, but which already bore the seed of death in a cruel and generally incurable malady.

Carefully concealed she from her son the pangs by which she had been wasted for many years. For the first time, when an operation was necessary, Lennartson became aware of the sufferings and the danger of his mother. She wished him to be absent during the painful hours, and sought by an innocent guile to deceive him as to the time. But he allowed himself not to be deceived; he allowed himself not to be sent away. His arms sustained her in the painful hour; her eyes rested during it upon his, and for his sake she bore all without the slightest complaint.

And she was able to live yet three years for his sake; yet three years to be happy through him. Then broke out the malady incurably. Whilst she spoke of immortality and of the certainty of seeing him again, and besought of him to have 'patience with his father,' she departed in his arms.

The effect of this loss upon the youth of eighteen was terrible, and matured him early to manhood. His tone of mind at this time, and his love to the studies in which he had early found such pleasure, determined him secretly to enter the clerical profession, and his studies at the University, like the studies of the greatest statesman of Sweden especially—were theological. In these studies he was—also like Axel Oxenstierna—interrupted, in order, according to the will of his father, that he should travel abroad. As Secretary to the Swedish embassy, he travelled to Vienna.

The success which he had here, and the talents which he exhibited, determined, according to the wishes of his father, his future destiny; and he has now shown, on the path of the statesman, that he deserves all esteem and confidence.

After my stepmother and the Vicking had alternately given this account of Lennartson's life, Selma reminded me, that the first evening I had seen him here, I had said that I had many years before already made his acquaintance, and I must now relate how and where; which I did in the following manner:

It is now about fifteen years ago, when I found myself at a dinner-party, at which were present General Lennartson and his son. The company was large, and consisted for the most part of the connexions and acquaintances of the General. Merely a corner of the table separated me from young Lennartson. The distinguished young man was good enough to busy himself about me, at that time a bashful girl of fourteen, and related to me Schiller's Wallenstein, and I forgot over this both eating and drinking. During the meal-time, the general conversation was of a disturbance which had taken place in the military academy, and they mentioned a young man who was at the head of it, who had made himself amenable for several uproars, and in consequence thereof was expelled. Some of the guests gave the young man very hard names, called him 'gallow's bird,' and so on.

The young Lennartson undertook alone the defence of the young man, and did it with warmth; he shewed how, in this last instance, he had been provoked by words into the existing quarrel, and how even his errors bore traces of a noble heart. The General took up the affair against his son, and became ever more violent against the accused. Young Lennartson continued to defend him too even against his father, with respect, but with great determination. All at once the General became, as it were, insane, and turned himself personally against his son, with an outburst of rudeness and the most violent accusations.

From that moment, in which the father's attack was directed against himself, the son became wholly silent. It is true that his cheeks and his lips became somewhat paler; but his look upon his father was so firm, his whole bearing was so calm, that one might almost have believed that he was almost insensible to his father's unworthy behaviour. Whilst all looks, with a kind of anxiety, passed to and fro between father and son, mine dwelt with a feeling of admiration upon the noble countenance of the latter. Involuntarily they riveted themselves upon a small gleaming speck upon the white, youthful, polished forehead, which became large and more shining, and at length rolled down a clear sweat-drop, to conceal itself in the dark eyebrow. This was all which betrayed the struggle within himself. The General at length paused for the want of words and breath, and for a moment it was as still as death at the table. The young Lennartson was as still as the rest; no affectation of indifference or defiance disfigured his beauty. He seemed to me on account of his perfect self-government to be worthy of admiration, and many seemed to share this impression with me. All, however, seemed desirous by general conversation to throw off the painful excitement. The young Lennartson also took part in it without constraint, but he was more grave than before—the end of Wallenstein I did not hear.

"Do you remember," inquired the Viking from me, "the name of the young man whose great deeds gave occasion to this scene?"

"No! the name I have forgotten, or else did not hear. But I mentioned some facts which I remembered in that history, and which represented him as a restless and powerful character."

"And that then was the first thing which you heard about me?" said the Viking softly, but emphatically.

I looked at him in surprise; his eyes were directed to me with a troubled earnestness; and I read in them such dark remembrances, that I quickly withdrew mine, vexed and almost full of remorse for having awakened them.

My stepmother remarked significantly, "Lennartson is in truth a rare character, and I wish that all young men would take him for example."

"Yes! who does not wish to resemble him?" exclaimed Felix Delphin, who seemed to draw the moral to himself. "Ah! if he were only—how shall I say it!—a little less superior. But he stands so high, that one hardly dare look up to him. He is—too free from faults."

"Without faults Lennartson is not, just as little as any other mortal," said Brenner, "but they are such faults as belong to great natures. In the meantime they prevent him from being happy."

"Is he not happy?" exclaimed Selma, and looked up with a troubled and astonished glance.

"He is not happy," said Brenner, "because he is so seldom satisfied with himself. He has an insatiable thirst which consumes him."

"And what thirst?" asked I.

"The thirst after perfection."

We were all silent a moment. Brenner's word and tone had awakened something great within us. At length said Felix,—

"It is precisely this greatness in him which bows down and humiliates natures less gifted. He overawes more than he exalts. For my part, I confess that I at the same time admire him and—fear him."

"And yet, Felix," said Selma, "you know that he is very kind."

"Yes, when I deserve it, Selma! And see, there it is. I do not often deserve it, and then—Ah! how often, when I was with him, when I heard him, when I saw him act, I have despised myself for this reason, that I was so unlike him! And I have then made the best resolutions. But when I come out again into the world, then I forget myself and him, and do as other fools do, and then—I am afraid of him—of his look, because he is one with my conscience, and—condemns me."

Selma extended her hand to her cousin, and looked at him with bright, tearful eyes. Young Delphin was evidently affected, seized the offered hand, kissed it vehemently many times, and hastened away.

It is impossible that Selma can be indifferent towards this amiable young man! Soon afterwards the Viking left us also, with his gloomy thoughts.

When we were alone, my stepmother gave me the following description of the former circumstances of the Viking.

Vilhelm Brenner, in his childhood, was remarkable for his good heart and his unquiet head. In the military academy he was universally beloved, at the same time that his pranks and his disorderly conduct involved him in quarrels, and drew upon him many annoyances. He was without stability, and was impelled by the suggestions of the moment. Various acts of insubordination drew upon him the severity of the law; this he met with obstinacy and defiance, and was in the end expelled from Carlberg. His connexions, provoked by his behaviour, received him with a sternness and depreciation which completely irritated the passionate soul of Brenner. He looked upon himself as dishonoured by the whole world; saw the future closed before him; and, in order to deaden his despair, plunged into still wider disorders than before. When he had run through all that he possessed, and saw himself in debt beyond his power of payment, he turned his destructive hand against his own life. But a preventing hand was laid upon his, and he was withheld from the brink of the abyss; and he who withheld him was Thorsten Lennartson. He caused light to ascend into the darkened soul of Brenner. He shewed to him the future yet open; he let him feel that he had his own fate yet in his hands; that he might again obtain the esteem of social life, and the peace of his own conscience.

But not merely with words did Lennartson seize with a guiding hand upon the fate of Brenner. It was at the time when France made war on the States of Barbary. Lennartson managed so with Brenner's connexions that he should take part in this campaign, and fitted him out at his own expense, though at that time he was anything but rich. Lennartson, in his plan, had rightly judged of his friend, and accomplished his salvation.

With strong natures there is only one step between despair and heroism. With a lock of Lennartson's hair upon his breast, and his image deeply stamped upon his soul, the young Brenner plunged forward upon a path on which dangers of every kind called him forth to combat. To him, there was more than the conquering of people and kingdoms; to him, there was the winning again of honour; the winning again the esteem of himself, of his friends, and of his fatherland. And with the most joyful bravery, he ventured his life for that purpose. The young Swede divided dangers and laurels with the Frenchmen. And upon the wild sea waves, in battle before the walls of Algiers, in combats with Arabs and Kabyles on the soil of Africa, the French learned highly to esteem a bravery equal to their own (a greater is impossible,) and to love a humanity towards vanquished foes, with which they are not so well acquainted.

Afterwards, Brenner accompanied some learned Frenchmen on their dangerous journey into the interior of Africa. After an absence of nearly seven years, Brenner again saw his native land. Honour and esteem here met him. He soon found an opportunity of signaling himself as a sea-officer, and was quickly advanced in the service.

The first use which Brenner made of the money that he obtained in service, was the payment of his debts at home. When he returned, he was no longer in debt—no! neither in money nor property. But one debt had he yet upon his soul, and this he longed to pay. He had left behind him during his absence a poor girl of noble mind, and of humble, though honest birth; whom he loved passionately, and who loved him equally as well. He swore solemnly to return to her, and to make her his wife. Years however went on. Only seldom flew a dove from burning Africa to misty Europe, to console the solitary heart. Poverty, care, and sickness, changed in the saddest manner the young blooming maiden. She knew it; was frightened at herself; and like the sick bird, which finds out a dark place in the wood in which to die, so did she retire far from the world, and determined to die for him whom she loved!

He sought her out, however, and found her. But he scarcely could have recognised her. He saw merely by the tone which at sight of him broke forth in her voice and in her look, that she was the same, and that she was true to him. He pressed her to his breast; he seized her hand in order to lead her to the altar. But she refused. Ah! she was so withered, so poor, so joyless. She should only encumber his life; should only follow him like a shadow upon his sun-brightened path of life. She would rather remain in her obscurity. She could, notwithstanding, gladden herself in its shade with the beams which surrounded him.

Thus spoke she in the earnestness of a pure heart; and whilst he read this heart, she became to him yet dearer than before. And he talked to her of accompanying him to lands of more beautiful climate; talked to her of new flowers on foreign, lovely shores; of the fresh wind and fresh waves of the sea; of dangers which they could share with each other; of burdens which she could lighten to him; of the omnipotence of love; of a new life. She listened to him; it went so fresh through her soul; it bloomed anew in her heart, she believed, and—followed him.

And upon her cheeks, which sickness had paled, Brenner impressed his kisses, breathed the fresh sea air. They bloomed again. When, after an absence of two years in foreign countries, he came back with his wife, she bloomed with health and happiness.

On the occasion of Brenner's marriage were heard many voices of disapproval and opposition; others also raised themselves approvingly, and no one's was warmer than that of Lennartson.

He and Brenner were from this time forth inseparable in their lives-interests, and still love one another as brothers—but very seldom do love.

"Why have I not seen Brenner's wife here?" I asked from my stepmother, affected by the relation which I had heard.

"Why?" replied my stepmother, smiling and rather hurt—"for a very good reason. She has been dead three years. The birth of her youngest child, cost her her life."

I sat there somewhat astonished, and almost shocked. My stepmother spoke of the beautiful qualities of the late deceased, and rather prided herself that she (my stepmother) had taken her under her wing and introduced her into society, in which she otherwise would not easily have gained admittance, on which account Brenner always feels and shews an indescribable gratitude, and so on.

I inquired if he had mourned much for his wife!

"Almost to insanity," replied my stepmother. "For nearly a year he could scarcely bear the sight of his children. Now, however, they are his greatest delight. And sweet amiable children are they—three boys and two girls."

It had struck twelve o'clock during this history, which had awoke in me such beneficial feelings.

The Countess G—— had promised to bring Flora home to spend an hour with us herself, in order to relate to us the splendours of the ball, if we only would wait for her till three o'clock in the morning with warm coffee. My stepmother, who is charmed with every thing lively and gay, promised it; and whilst Selma and I made giant steps in our Christmas-boxes, amid continued conversation about our two heroes, came unexpectedly the morning hour. Signora, Luna, and Flora came also, and now there was a zealous coffee-drinking and talk about the ball. The ball had been magnificent, and Flora one of its beaming stars; but—but it was with this magnificent ball as with so many others—it had been too hot, too much crowded. The ornamental quadrille in which Flora danced had too little space in order to exhibit itself properly; the people who had to figure could not display themselves; people were almost overlooked, and had become mixed up with the crowd: in one word, they had not been amused.

"St. Orme among the gentlemen was the one who did most honour to his costume," said the Countess of G——, and added, "and was only somewhat too much of a Turk. Towards Flora in particular, he exercised a certain Sultan power. Perhaps," continued she archly, "the Gentleman Envoyé would thus hold all poor attaches in order."

Flora was the first who acknowledged the desire to go to rest; and whilst I went out to awake her sleeping maid, Anna, she ascended the steps which led to our chambers. Some time afterwards I also came up, and found her standing at the window of the corridor, looking thoughtfully out into the night illumined by feeble moonshine. As she did not appear to notice me, I touched her arm softly and asked, "Where are thy thoughts now, lovely mask?"

"Where?" answered the Circassian, with a strangely ringing voice, "Now! in the wilder-less, where John nourished himself with locusts and clothed himself in camel's hair. Ah! to be there, far from the world, far from oneself!"

"Flora, you are"—strange, I would have added, but Flora interrupted me and said,

"Yes, what am I! I would really thank those who would tell me what I am. What I was—I know."

"And what were you?"

"A being gifted with the richest and most beautiful powers, which might have become—yet what is the use of speaking of that which I might have been! That which I shall become, begins to be tolerably clear to me."

"Certainly you may become whatever you really wish to be," said I.

Without seeming to regard these words, Flora continued bitterly, and full of thought—"Have you read in legends of people, who through evil magic-power have in one night been changed into Var-wolves, and have taken upon themselves the evil nature of those who have bewitched them?"

"Yes," replied I; "but I have also read that the christian name of the bewitched spoken by a loving voice, has the power of dissolving the magic and saving the unhappy one."

"Who calls me thus! Who loves me thus! Nobody, nobody!" exclaimed Flora; "and I do not deserve it. I am—not good! I am—but what matters it what I am! It will make nobody wise. Hate me as much as you can, Sophia. In so doing, you do the wisest thing. No! do not look so tragical. I laugh at myself, at you, and at the whole world."

Flora laughed, but not from her heart. Anna now came up.

"Will you not, for this once, let Anna go to rest, and accept me for your maid? I fancy I am not entirely without talent as—"

"No! my best Philosophia;" exclaimed Flora, laughing; "that I really cannot, although I curtsy low, and thank you for this proposal, so full of honour. Yet I would rather see my pins in Anna's hands than in yours, although she now looks like one of the seven sleeping virgins. Anna! do not fall upon the candle! You are the veriest nightcap in all Stockholm! Cannot you keep your eyes open for one quarter of an hour at night? Look at me! I have been awake the whole night, and am still so lively."

"Yes, that I believe," replied Anna grimly; "the young lady has amused herself, and danced, but—"

"If that is all that is wanted, you may dance on before me, in order to waken you."

Thus talking vanished the young lady and her maid in Flora's chamber, and I went into mine. But it was long before I could sleep: Lennartson and his mother, the Viking and his wife, stood so livingly before my soul; and then Flora, with her strange, capricious confession. Still in sleep it occupied me, and the beautiful Circassian, and Var-wolves, and locusts, made a strange confusion in my dreams.

The 21st.

A new revolution in Flora; a new light respecting Selma; with uncertain gleams respecting certain dark things. Signs of the times: conversation between my step-mother and me.

Felix Delphin's associates and friends; the gentlemen Rutschenfelt and Skutenhjelm, or the 'Rutschenfelts,' as they are called collectively, paid us, this morning, a rather unexpected visit, under the conduct of St. Orme and Felix. Their courteous errand was an invitation to a great sledging-party, whose originators they were, and which was to be on Sunday. Felix wished to drive Selma, and St. Orme invited Flora to his sledge. This was to be covered with tiger-skins, and would be drawn by fiery piebalds, which Flora had seen, and found much to her liking. This sledge was to lead the procession, which was to drive through the principal streets of the city to the park, where they were to dine, and after that were to dance, and so on.

Flora accepted the offer with evident delight, clapped her hands, and exclaimed, "Ah! I know nothing more divine than tiger-skins and fire-breathing horses! It will be a divinely-delightful drive!"

But Selma whispered suddenly to her, "Consent not, I pray you! Think on Lennartson!"

"Now, why then?" replied Flora, impatiently.

"He would not wish it. Defer at least a decided answer yet!"

"Ah! always difficulties and opposition when I wish any thing;" said Flora, stamping a little with her foot, and with the crimson of disquiet on her cheeks.

In the mean time Rutschenfelt had turned to my stepmother, and Skutenhjelm to me, with the offer of being our sledge-drivers. I looked at my stepmother, and my stepmother looked at me, and this time with unity of mind, since we both of us answered doubtfully, and prayed for time for consideration, before we could give a decided answer.

As we now all of us stood there undeterminedly and almost declining, the spirit of defiance entered Flora, and she said decidedly, "Others may do as they will, but I mean to go, and St. Orme has my promise."

"That is beautiful!" said he, "and I hope that the other ladies will follow so good an example. I will come this evening in order to receive the decided answer."

Scarcely was St. Orme gone, and the 'Rutschenfelts,' together with Felix, had rushed down stairs, when Lennartson entered. He soon was informed by my stepmother of that of which we spoke.

"What answer has Flora given?" asked he, short and hastily as he turned himself to her.

"I have promised to go with St. Orme," replied Flora, although evidently not with a good conscience—"I know not why I should refuse such an innocent pleasure."

"It grieves me, Flora," said Lennartson mildly, but gravely, "but I must beseech of you to give up this pleasure."

"It grieves me, Lennartson," said Flora insolently, "that I cannot follow your wishes. I have already given my promise to St. Orme, and my guardian will certainly not compel me to break my promise."

"In this case, I must require that you recal an over-hasty promise. I have my reasons for it, which I do not now wish to give. In one word, Flora shall not go with St. Orme!"

"Shall not!" cried Flora with flashing eyes, "and who can forbid me?"

"I!" said Lennartson, calmly but resolutely.

There was a time when I thought I never could hear a man speak dictatorially to a woman without my heart mutinying in my breast with hatred and bitterness. But now at this moment, I heard such a mode of speaking and I was calm! I felt the whole force of a noble power.

Flora felt it also. She said nothing. She went quietly aside to a window. Lennartson talked for a good while with my stepmother and me, as if nothing had happened.

When I next looked at Flora she sate and sewed. She was pale, grave, and as it were, changed. After a time, Lennartson went and seated himself directly opposite to her in the window. He took her half-reluctant hand, and his eyes sought hers. But she only looked down the more at her work. At once two bright tears rolled down upon it. Lennartson whispered "Flora!"

She raised her head, and looked at him with eyes that beamed with love.

Lennartson looked at her seriously, and at the same time evidently affected.

"Flora!" said he again, "how am I to understand you?"

"Can you not have confidence in me; not have faith in me; although you do not understand me?" replied she.

He said nothing, but kissed her hand repeatedly. Again several words passed between them, which I did not hear. When Lennartson arose, tears were in his eyes also. He bowed silently to us, and went out.

Flora sate silent for a long time, her face concealed in her pocket-handkerchief. I fancied she was deeply affected. But all at once she raised her head and exclaimed, "Ah, I mourn so about the tiger-skins and the fiery horses. I should have driven as in a triumphal procession. I would have worn my bright red fur and my bonnet with the white feathers—that would have looked enchantingly beautiful!"

Selma looked at her with a half-wounded, half-troubled glance, as if she would say to her, "how can you now think about such a thing!"

Flora observed it and exclaimed, "See! Selma, do not direct yourself by Sophia; and at any little flights of mine, do not go and look like a litany. I cannot help my liking that which is splendid and beautiful. And some little pleasure will I have in this life if I am to live. Ah! a sunny, gay life is glorious. Take two cups, and pour into the one the bitter draught of renunciation, and into the other youth, strength, health, pleasure, joy,—and I would defy even you, wise Philosophia, not to grasp after the latter. O! I would that I could drink out the latter, drink it to the very lees."

"And would," said I, "find there just the bitterest portion of the draught which you have represented to be the contents of the first cup. For my part, I will have a better joy—than pleasure; a better draught of refreshment than amusement."

"Give me," exclaimed Flora, "amusement, enjoyment! Create for me pleasure, pleasure, pleasure; and after that—let me die! So speaks a candid person."

"But not so a reasonable one," said I, smiling.

"And who told you that I am a reasonable person!" exclaimed Flora, with vehemence, as she waltzed around a few times. "Perhaps I am not at all a person. Perhaps I am one of those beings who float between heaven and earth, without the property of belonging to either of them, and which, therefore, dance upon the earth as bright will-o'-the-wisps. And—perhaps it is better so to dance, than like you and others, to grope over that about which nobody wants any certainty. Come, Selma dear, let us waltz. Play us something from Strauss, Sophia; the wilder the better."

I played, and the two young girls danced; and that was just now as good as talking rationally with Flora. And sometimes people dance themselves into quiet, sooner than one can reason them into it. At the bottom of all Flora's outbreaks lay an inward disquiet. The whole day she was in an overstrained changeable humour, and seemed purposely to avoid becoming quiet and rational.

In the afternoon St. Orme came, and at sight of him Flora drew herself together.

"How is it with our sledging-party?" was his first question.

Flora, with assumed calmness, besought him to excuse her, taking back her promise for this party. "An earlier promise—another engagement, which she had forgotten this morning, prevented her—"

St. Orme heard her excuses with a dark look, and a crafty smile upon his thin lips. He then approached her, and said with a low voice,

"May one know what promise it is which prevents you from fulfilling the one which you made to me! But perhaps you have also now forgotten that!"

"That may be!" said Flora, with negligent pride.

"Such forgetfulness never occurs to me," said St. Orme, with a mild but expressive voice. "I have a good memory; and I can also prove it by that which I bear upon my breast." With these words he folded back his waistcoat a little, and I saw a somewhat shine, which appeared to me in the haste to be a red-coloured silken ribbon. But paler was the red than that upon Flora's cheeks. She clenched her hand convulsively, and exclaimed in a bitter tone, as she turned herself suddenly from St. Orme to me: "How happy men are! They can with arms in their hands demand right or revenge! Ah, that I were a man!"

"Would you then fight with me, my lovely cousin!" asked St. Orme, smiling. "Should we fight a duel?"

"Yes," cried Flora; "hotly, for life and death!"

"It is fortunate for me," continued St. Orme in a jesting tone, "that you are only a lady. And now I counsel you to use no other weapons against me than your beautiful eyes. To these I am ready to resign myself captive. Adieu, Flora! Adieu, Sophia! I wish you much pleasure this evening."

It was Abonnement's-day; and Flora and Selma were to go to the opera, with Mrs. Rittersvård and her daughter, to my stepmother's box. My stepmother herself was a little wearied, and wished not to go; and I promised Selma that I, at all events, should stay at home, to keep her company, and to amuse her.

"And hear, thou sweet angel," whispered

Selma archly before she went; "do not be too rigidly-Christian in thy love of justice towards the Gyllenlöfs and the Silfverlings, in case the conversation turn upon them. Such 'spasmodic acquaintance' can bear a little bitterness and peppering."

I promised to be severe against them, and desired an explanation of the phrase 'spasmodic acquaintance;' but she asked, "is it possible not to understand it! O golden innocence!" And she ran away, laughing at my ignorance.

Alone with my stepmother, I remarked that we, on both sides, were laden with strong material for a great conversation, and desired nothing better than to come together.

'It is extraordinary,' began we, both of us, as we seated ourselves by the evening lamp. (N.B. We begin our political discourses, always with 'it is extraordinary,' or 'it is wonderful,' or 'it is quite inconceivable,' or with a similar expression of excitement, as an introduction to observations on some questions of the day. And as my stepmother and I, in consequence of our different political tendencies, take in opposition newspapers, so it is of consequence to me to have met with any appropriate reflection or phrase therein, in order that we may startle one another, nay indeed, sometimes strike one another; but all in the very best friendliness, of course! This has been a horribly long parenthesis! Now I had exactly to-day read in my newspaper various remarkable facts on the progress of industry, and had appropriated to myself a strong phrase respecting this giant work. It was as an introduction to it that I began with 'it is remarkable.' And now at length is the parenthesis ended.)—When I heard my stepmother begin in the very same way as I had begun, I gave with due reverence the preference to her 'extraordinary fact;' and it showed itself not to be the industrial spirit of the age, but it was 'some people, and their want of understanding and good feeling,' of which my stepmother had had to-day an extraordinary proof. I saw Count Gyllenlöfs coming; and they came too, and with them Silfverlings. We complained sadly of the first, on account of their want of good breeding, on account of their vanity and their haughtiness; and we made the others ridiculous, on account of their foppery and their gentility. 'The poor people!' they know no better. They are as pitiable as they are ridiculous, said we.

From them we went to other friends and acquaintance, and blew good and ill luck over the people. We added a little to the palsy of Mrs. Rittersvård, and made it more apoplectic, and overturned a little the triumphal-chariot of 'the Beauty,' so as to help us in deciding the choice of Sparraköld, between beauty and virtue; that is to say, Flora's sister, and Helfrid Rittersvård.

My stepmother wished greatly, for the sake of her good friend Mrs. Rittersvård, that the daughter might marry well, and Lieutenant Sparraköld is a distinguished young man, and has good prospects; my stepmother, however, believes in the conquest of beauty, I hoped in the conquest of virtue, and we laid a wager upon it.

During all these arrangements for friends and relatives, I endeavoured, unobserved, to approach our own family, in order to hear the thoughts of my stepmother on the signs and movements which now were going on within it. I revealed also for that purpose, some of my remarks on St. Orme, Flora, and Lennartson, and on the strange relationship between them.

My stepmother listened with excited attention, and put some sudden questions; but instead of opening to me her views, she withdrew herself at once into the intrenchments of the mystery, and with a demeanour which would have been worthy of Prince Metternich himself, said, "You must be convinced, my dear Sophia, that I see every thing—see and hear perfectly every thing which goes on around me, although I say nothing, nor will meddle in the affair, before I—"

Here began the diplomatic water-gruel. I swallowed it, and a little vexation. Unexpectedly, my stepmother turned towards me with remarks on me and my position in life, together with certain entrapping questions, as to whether I would not change it in case a suitable, good offer invited me—for example, if an elderly, sedate man, of good character, respectability, property, education, and handsome establishment, should offer, and so on.

Mortified a little by my stepmother's omniscience and reserve, thinks I, "if my stepmother will enact Prince Metternich, then I can enact Prince Talleyrand;" and instead of replying to the inquiries of my stepmother, I began a warm panegyric on the freedom and emancipation of woman. My stepmother at this became very violent, and without understanding how and what I properly meant, opposed herself, with her utmost seat, to all emancipation. I wished to explain, but she would—as I also, in fact—only hear herself, and so we over-clamoured one another for a long time.

The return of the opera-going ladies interrupted us. They came, accompanied by Lennartson, the young Sparraköld, and Felix. Signora Luna and her 'exro sposo' increased our evening party, who, after accounts of the opera, were drawn into the strife which was on foot between my stepmother and me. They agreed that it should be fought out during supper. It was done with veritable zeal. All spake on the subject with the exception of Selma. I had Ake Sparraköld and Signora Luna on my side. The Rittersvårds and the Great Alexander ranged themselves on the side of my stepmother. The latter was much troubled; her eyes twinkled much when I mentioned Thorild, and quoted certain passages which may be read in the fourth part of his collected works (page 84), and which certain gentlemen and certain ladies would do well a little to consider.

Lennartson for some time took merely a jesting part in the conversation, and amused himself with nullifying the arguments, right and left, by sallies of wit, mine in particular; at length, however, on my gravely demanding that he should understand me, he said some serious rectifying words on the subject; some of those words, of great understanding, which are more charming to hear than the most delicious music. I delighted myself—by storing them up against a future day of judgment. These words closed the discussion. Baron Alexander was, however, much less satisfied with the decision. I concluded this from his reply to his lady, when she proposed that he should invite Lennartson for one day in the week when she should have company. He replied with a gruff negative, and as she beseechingly represented.

"But my friend," he interrupted her peremptorily. "But my friend, I will not. It may be your place to propose things, but it is mine to decide. And now I have decided on this thing, and I will not hear another word."

The Countess G—— was silent; but a cloud passed over her countenance.

It is no wonder to me if she be a radical in the Emancipation question.

When we had separated for the night, Selma accompanied me (as she often does) with a light up to my chamber. There I reproached her jestingly for not having supported my motion this evening, and accused her of being altogether without any "esprit de corps."

She denied laughingly the accusation, but said that for her part she had not felt yet the necessity of emancipation.

"I have," said she, "looked up to the people who ruled over me. You know how kind my mother is towards me; how she wishes only my happiness, and does every thing for it. And my father! Ah! how happy was I, that I could love him, obey him, direct myself in all things by him. And after his death—" She stopped suddenly and blushed. I continued. "Well! and after his death."

"Yes, then I became acquainted with another man, and looked up to him."

"Aha!" thought I, and a light broke in upon me. "May I ask the name of the man?" said I, not without an arch look; "may I—name Lennartson?"

With great seriousness, but with a secret tremor of voice, Selma replied—

"I shall always be glad to have become acquainted, in him, with the noblest and best man on the earth. Might, O might Flora but make him happy! For me I wish merely to be his sister, his friend, and to have the right to be near him, to save him, to contribute in any way to his happiness. May he be happy! may he be happy with Flora!"

"And then, my Selma, shall I not see thee happy with—"

"With no, no husband!" interrupted Selma, warmly; "but I have a mother, I have thee, Sophia! I will live for you, and for the others who are dear to me. It is so sweet to love! But now, my mother indeed thinks that I am quite bewitched here. Good-night, sweet, good, wise, dearest sister!"

She kissed me tenderly and joyfully, and I heard her singing Klärchen's song in Goethe's Egmont, as she went down stairs,

Glücklich allein ist die Seele die liebt.

The 23d.

Poor Felix! He loves Selma so warmly, and fears not being loved again. He is unhappy and dissatisfied with himself and with the whole world. He prays me to be to him friend and sister. How gladly will I! His warm heart and his confidence have softened me towards him; but—but—!

The 24th.

I feel now more clearly, that I am here on a volcanic soil; a soil, which gnawing passions make at the same time interesting and dangerous. For who can tell what the explosion may turn out—whether it may merely produce a beautiful atmospheric appearance, or desolate whole countries. Were not my own heart already too much brought into play on my young sister's account, I should view these scenes of human life, and the enfolding of this, in some respects, puzzling connexion, with calmness, and also with pleasure.

Ah! it is good however, when the youthful time is over, and quieter years come. It is good when the wild combat of the feelings allays itself; good also that it has been, for it has—produced a world! And over it floats a new spirit with new life; the quiet spirit of thought, which lays coolingly its hand on our hot brows, separates darkness from light, and says to the eye 'be clear,' and to life 'be calm.'

In the Evening.

What is this! Will the frenzy of love and romance which is in this family, infect, indeed, the whole world! Or is it with certain mental dispositions, as with the nocturnal dance of the Scottish witches, who draw into their circle whatever comes near to them, and compel it—to dance with them? But no! In the name of free-will, it shall not become so! and for that reason I will—immediately, make confession to myself.

Full of the composing and gladdening thoughts which I had written down this morning, I went out to take a walk. I find great pleasure in rambling through Stockholm, and in looking about me on these occasions. How many various shapes of life move themselves in a large city! how many human propensities and gifts here have taken bodily shape and glance forth with peculiar, marked physiognomies! I find pleasure in observing these little worlds, and in thinking how they all strive forth towards the same sun, and may be brightened by it; I find pleasure in conversing with them, and in letting them answer me.

The Finnish national poem Kalevala, calls the radical words, the words with which the spirits and the being of nature rule each other, PRIMEVAL WORDS, and these words seem to be the PRIMEVAL-BEING of things themselves, the mystery of their inward life. Whenever they may be addressed or conjured in such words, they must answer, they must obey.

This has a deep, gladdening truth.

But one finds not when one will PRIMEVAL WORDS, (neither in the poem Kalevala, nor in actuality). One must be in a particular frame of mind. . . .

This day was favourable in an especial manner for life and observation, for its changing play of shadow and light caused the various regions of the city to appear in a changeful and living manner.

More than ever was I captivated by the individual beauty of Stockholm; historical memories rose up like crowned spirits from the seven islands. . . . I seemed to hear the song of the Sagas in the winds, in the rushing of the waves on these shores, which good and evil deeds, with great actions and great sufferings, have stamped with their poetic seal.

Once saw I a chief-city without any towers, without any one building exceeding in beauty and size the rest; all were equal, and people said, 'see here the image of a true social community.'

But no! thus appears it not. When a people come to the consciousness of its full life, its cities and its buildings will testify of it: there must the flaming spires of the temples ascend to the sky; there must columns of honour stand in memorial of great men; there must magnificent palaces (not private ones!) express the sense of greatness in a noble public spirit; there must the beautiful express in manifold forms the good in the life of the state.

But whither does my wandering pen conduct me! My feet led me this time southward, quite high up the mountain and then down to the strand, and into a boat, in order to come by it again to the North. I had just seen a man come out from a small house on the shore, where a pale elderly woman followed him with blessings to the door, and saw him now go with hasty steps down the stairs to the strand, where the boat lay. As I came down, he turned himself round, and with a joyful 'Ah!' and outstretched arms, helped me lightly into the boat, when he took his place at the helm: It was the Viking!

It pleased me to meet with him, especially as I remarked that his large brown eyes rested upon me with the same expression as they had done on the first evening of our acquaintance. I was warm from walking, the wind had played somewhat wildly with my hair, I knew that I was looking well and saw that the Viking thought so also. A certain satisfaction in soul and body; the low dashing of the waves around me, the mild air, the rich spectacle round about, Brenner's presence,—all gave me a feeling of exalted life, and this caused me involuntarily to give expression to the thoughts and impressions which had animated and still animated me.

Brenner listened to me with evident sympathy and pleasure; but when I expressed my wish "that people still more and more would come to understand life by the light of reason, and to live in bright thoughts," he shook his head, and said,

"Science and philosophy cannot make people better, and contribute but little to their true happiness. The inclinations of the heart alone give to life fulness and worth. The pure atmosphere of thought appears to me like the air of Mont Blanc; one can see in it all the great stars and the clouds under one's feet, but one can scarcely breathe, and all life is soon extinguished from want of the breath of life."

I replied; "The life of thought excludes not the life of feeling, but rules it, and prevents its preponderance. Reason saves man from much suffering."

"Reason!" exclaimed the Viking; "I will know nothing of such reason as kills the best life of the soul, which prevents man from suffering. Without suffering life is not worth much."

I felt myself struck by this thought, and especially by the looks and the tone in which it was spoken, yet notwithstanding, I said,—

"There is so much irrational, aimless suffering; so much tormenting feeling, without rhyme or reason."

"Ah!" said Brenner; "much that appears irrational, is still at bottom good; if it be for nothing else than to slay the egotism which makes us so careful about ourselves, so calculating, so coldly-and-stiffly reasonable that it is—horrible. Feelings without rhyme or reason! They are precisely such as these which please me. Who, for example, speaks of a rational love! And yet love is the noblest feeling of life, its sublimest flower. I, for my part, never am rational—never was so—and never, I hope, shall be."

Smiling and well-pleased I combated his arguments, and would know nothing of any other than of a rational love; whereupon the Viking grew hot, but in a cheerful and good-humoured way.

When we lay to at Logarden, and Brenner offered his hand to assist me out, he said, "Do not be angry with me on account of my want of reason, Miss Adela! I will see whether I cannot improve."

"Perhaps we shall understand each other better for the future," said I cheerfully, and with a friendly feeling.

"Thanks for the words! Yes, may we do so!" said the Viking, and pressed my hand.

What does all this denote? and why does it give me pleasure to please this man, whom I have known so short a time! No, Cousin Flora, it is not a passion for conquest, at least not a blameable one, and—if it had been so for a moment, I would take care that it no longer remained so. For to wish to be agreeable to persons whom one finds agreeable, that is no sin, and no weakness; but a pleasing and becoming nature. It is the foundation of all that which makes social life charming and happy. But human love must not be degraded into—

The 25th.

Worse and worse! Yesterday as we landed I expressed my delight at some hyacinths and jonquils which were carried past us. To-day these flowers diffuse their odour in my room. They were accompanied by a note from the Viking!

Good, now! Flowers are the symbol of good-will and friendship. I will regard these as such.

The 29th.

The Baroness Bella B., the Beauty, and Helfrid Rittersvård, paid us a visit. Afterwards, Ake Sparrsköld, Felix, and others. "The Beauty" expatiated (quite mal-à-propos, methinks) on the unhappiness and disagreeableness of ugliness. She pitied 'from her heart, plain people;' but they must at least know that they are plain, and must stop nicely at home, and not exhibit themselves out in the world, and in society, where they can awaken only disagreeable feelings.

I was provoked at this speech, which evidently was made with reference to Helfrid Rittersvård, whose calm, classical demeanour I admired at this moment. She only cast a quiet, patient look upon the cruel 'Beauty,' and said mildly, "As it is not plain people's fault that they are plain, it is excusable if they go among their fellow-beings with the confidence that they will show indulgence and kindness towards them; nay, precisely on account of their misfortune, if one must take the affair so seriously."

This was said with an indescribably noble expression, and I should have replied with warmth, had not young Sparrsköld anticipated me as he exclaimed,—

"I cannot understand the importance which certain people set upon outward beauty or plainness. I am of opinion that all true education, such at least as has a religious foundation, must infuse a noble calm, a wholesome coldness, an indifference, or whatever people may call it, towards such-like outward gifts, or the want of them. And who has not experienced of how little consequence they are in fact for the weal or woe of life! Who has not experienced how, on nearer acquaintance, plainness becomes beautified, and beauty loses its charm, exactly according to the quality of the heart and mind! And from this cause I am also of opinion, that the want of outward beauty never disquiets a noble nature, or will be regarded as a misfortune. It never can prevent people from being amiable and beloved in the highest degree. And we have daily proof of this."

I would have embraced the young man for these words, which calling forth a look of vexation in the countenance of the Beauty, made her plain, whilst a joyful emotion diffused over Hellfrid's countenance the splendour of beauty. Ake Sparrsköld had never appeared handsomer to me than at this moment. Later in the evening he sang. He had an extremely agreeable voice. I said so to Miss Bittersvärd; she agreed, but so shortly, that I might have fancied her to be cold, had I not observed by her look that her feelings were only too warm.

The 1st of December.

Visits and entertainment. Rutechenfels and Co.; together with a conversation which turned upon Gyllenlöf's soirées, magnificent rooms and furniture, and such like; as well as on the delicate dinners of the new-married couple, the O—sköld's. What wine! what delicacies! St. Orme gave the ton, and Felix and his friends joined in. Among these, a young Captain Rumler (Ake Sparrsköld's captain) distinguished himself, whom the other young gentlemen looked up to with a certain admiration and a certain envy. His domestic establishment was described as a pattern of comfort and elegance, was celebrated as a pattern of a bachelor's housekeeping. People spoke in particular of his sleeping-room, of his expensive toilet, and of his own portrait, which was hung up there over his own bed. (This seemed to me like a little idol-temple of self, and I felt at that moment contempt mount up within me). Beyond this, his connoisseurship in the delicacies of the table was extolled.

He, however, politely yielded the palm in this to the Chamberlain, who accepted it modestly; as he confessed, that although in Sweden people were rather 'gourmand' than 'gourmet,' yet that he belonged to the latter class of people.

Felix agreed with him, that in roast veal there are only three pieces which are 'really eatable.' By degrees, they began to draw a picture of all that which was required in these days to make life comfortable. (Nevertheless, I suspect, from what I know of certain connexions of Captain Rumler, that certain necessities of this felicitous life were now omitted, out of regard to the ladies who were present.) Felix sighed deeply, in regard to the sum of money which the satisfying of all these wants demanded.

In the mean time, Lennartson was occupied in a distant part of the room in reading various newspapers; still I am convinced that he heard all that was spoken in the room. At length, rising and approaching the company, he smiled and exclaimed:

"Here is also a picture of human wants which is original. Will the gentlemen hear it?" And he read from a newspaper which he held in his hand the following article from Hörnäsand.*

"The learned mathematical lecturer Aurén died here during the past month,† at the age of eighty-one. He was the author of several learned works, and among these some on Biblical Chronology, which he published at his own expense. Notwithstanding he amassed out of his small salary, on which he lived, and in his latter years divided with a curate, the sum of eight thousand rix dollars. This could not have been done without the most perfect self-denial of all worldly pleasures and comforts. To what extent he carried these sacrifices may be shewn by this, that his needy dwelling, even in the severest weather, was never warmed, nor was ever a candle lighted within it. When darkness came down, he lay on his bed, whilst his favourites the stars, which were to him sufficient company, furnished a subject for his thoughts, or, if the heavens were clear, for his observation. That he was not impelled hereto by a sordid selfishness, is proved as much by the support which during his life he privately extended to cases of necessity, as by the noble manner in which he has disposed of his property.

"Four thousand eight hundred rix-dollars he has appropriated to two stipends. He has given a garden in the city to an old man, whose wife tenderly and carefully attended to him during the latter years of his life. The remainder of his property descends to his needy connexions."

After Lennartson had ended, a short silence ensued in the room. Selma's beaming eyes were directed to the reader, while the eyes of Felix rested upon her.

Now arose a light murmur:—"Well, yes! an anchorite, a hermit,—but one cannot live in this way if one lives in the world, if one will live with people."

"That I know," answered Lennartson; "but it is a question whether the system of lecturer Aurén will not contribute more than the system which prevails here, towards the obtaining peace and happiness during a long life on earth."

"I would as soon die to-morrow morning," exclaimed Felix, "as live a long life without human happiness!"

"And I," cried Skotenhjelm, "would rather shoot myself through the head the day after to-morrow, than sentence myself to lie a tithe of the year in darkness and cold. If one is to be buried, it is better to be dead first."

"You forget," said Lennartson, smiling, "that Aurén saw the stars beaming over him, and certainly found more pleasure from them than we from the waxlights in our drawing-rooms. And as concerns human happiness," continued he, as he looked at Felix, "I am sorry that a young man should not understand the pleasure which he has enjoyed—the pleasure of useful activity—the pleasure of—doing good."

There was in Lennartson's look and voice, something so serious as he spoke these last words, that Felix evidently was struck by them. The tears came to his eyes, he went away, took a book, and sat down at a table. Selma's eyes followed him evidently with deep sympathy. Lennartson observed her attentively.

Some time afterward, as St. Orme was continuing the interrupted conversation with some gentlemen, and was relating to them various particulars of Paris life and its charms, Lennartson went to Selma, seated himself by her, and said gently, "was I too severe, Miss Selma?"

"O no!" replied she with animation, "there was so much justice in what you said, but—"

"But what? What but?"

"I think that your words really grieved his heart, and—he thinks so much of you."

Lennartson said nothing; but after a while I saw him approach Felix, and lay his hand upon his shoulder.

Felix reddened deeply as he looked up, and with a look of sincere love met the glance of kindness which Lennartson directed to him.

"I have not seen you for a long time in my house, Felix," said Lennartson with friendliness. "Will not you dine with me to-morrow? I promise you," continued he pleasantly joking, "no O—sköldish dinner; but I promise also that neither shall you be treated with Aurénish household-fare. I confess that I myself should be but little satisfied therewith."

Felix accepted the invitation half-embarrassed and half-pleased.

After the guests were gone, we, particularly my stepmother and I, made our "reflexions chrétiennes et morales," on the Aurénish and St. Ormish ideas of life. I grew warm for the first. My stepmother poured cold water over my fire, and talked of 'exaltation, overstraining, and excess'; and said that one might be "yet very good if one lived like other people, took part in the pleasures of the world, and enjoyed its good things." My stepmother was for the motto of Queen Christina—"moderation" (which she herself, however, generally managed to forget). Flora was thoughtful, and said, "when I was a child, and in my early youth, I had sometimes such Aurénish and Pythagorean fancies; I dreamed of—but they soon taught me to laugh at such dreams, and to seek after other aims. Yet, perhaps, these were more of dreams, more of deceptions, than the first. Ah!" continued Flora, with a sudden burst of melancholy, "who can be born anew; who can again be a little child?"

She burst into tears. Selma threw her arms round her, and began to weep with her. My stepmother looked quite in consternation, and I reproached her jestingly with this 'lamentable.' Selma came over to my side, and so ended we the day, 'scherzando.'

The 14th December.

We have passed some weeks in visiting the collections of works of Art, academies, and various other public institutions of the capital.

To many of these shall I often again return, for many of them have had great interest for me. And wherein indeed lies the worth of a solid education, if not thereby enabling us to understand and value every species of useful human activity; and in opening our eyes to life in all its affluence. It offers us also an extended life. I remarked too with pleasure, how willingly scientific men turn themselves to those in whom they perceive a real interest, and where they feel that they are understood.

Lennartson, who was our conductor in these visits, by his own great knowledge, and by the art of inducing others to unfold theirs, increased our pleasure in the highest degree. And how highly esteemed and valued is he by all. Flora listened attentively to him, but seldom to another, and betrayed quite too great a desire to shine herself. Selma belongs to those who say not much themselves, but who understand much and conceal much in their hearts. Lennartson and I listen attentively to every one of her remarks. They always contain something exciting, and often something suggestive. She has a beautiful and pure judgment. A good head, together with a good heart, is a glorious thing in a human being.

Now it is necessary to sit still; to be industrious, and to finish Christmas knick-knacks in two days. It is not my affair.

The 25th.

The Christmas-eve is over, with its Christmas knick-knacks, lights, and tarts. My stepmother, who thinks much of children, had invited here those of several of her acquaintance, and among them those of the Viking. Selma had prepared many trifles for the little ones, which occasioned great delight; and we amused ourselves by contriving plays for them, in which Selma was just as much a child as any of the rest. Felix helped us with ready good-will, but Flora was out of humour, and would neither amuse herself nor others. Brenner's children are lively, sweet creatures, and it did one good to see their behaviour to their father. Rosine, the eldest, an eight-years-old girl, and the youngest boy, little Adolf, pleased me much. The poor little fellow is somewhat lame in the hip. Was it now 'mother's love' which, as a professor, one of my friends, asserts, exists in all women, or a particular liking which drew me towards the little boy; but this is certain, that when I had set him on my knee, and he had looked up to me with a clear and joyous child's glance, I was involuntarily compelled in an actual feeling, of love and longing, to embrace him protectingly, and to clasp him in my arms and to my breast. But as I saw that his father observed us with a look, as if he would have liked to have embraced us both, I became cooler in my tenderness. And how the father must love the children! Did I not hear him say this evening, that one must in choosing a wife take into consideration the future children, and what father and mother one would give them. I could not do otherwise than for the most part concede the right to him in this respect.

The crown of the evening to me was my countryman Runeberg's beautiful little poem, 'The Christmas Eve,' which the Viking had brought with him, and read aloud with a pure and noble expression. He placed me again in my native land, in its wild natural scenery, amid its powerful, contented, and patient people.

My heart swelled. And now—it is church-time, and I shall go to church.

In the Evening.

The sun shone through a great eye into the chancel as I entered the church, and light smoke-clouds from the lights, which had been extinguished after the early sermon, floated through the rays of light upwards into the vaulted roof. It was beautiful. The church, although I came early, was so full of people that it was not possible for me to find a seat, especially as many strove for the same thing. After some vain attempts I took the resolve of standing during service, and found a safe place against a wall, near to women who were sitting, and girls who were standing, to whom I offered eau de Cologne. I was happy in my soul, and had never felt more congregational. As the organ broke forth with its mighty tones the blood rushed through my veins, and a gentle shudder passed through me as a single voice elevated itself, and strongly and softly sang of the highest wonder of the world—of the wonder of which the people even now, and now perhaps more than ever, speak with admiration—

A Virgin has conceived, and borne a son.

Now joined in the congregation, and I with them, with a full, overflowing heart. Scarcely had the song ended when I heard near my corner a tolerably harsh voice, which asked—

“Has Miss Adelan no seat?”

It was the Viking; he was so kind as to compel me to take his seat at a little distance. I must do this for the sake of quiet in the church. Brenner remained then standing near me, and accompanied me home after the service.

At home, I found Flora in a stormy temper. She had headache from the screams of the children on the former evening; she knew no days so bad as Sundays, when one must be sad and religious. This whole day we should be alone, according to the regulation of my step-mother; on this day her domestics go to church, and are allowed to rest. Neither were we either invited out. What was one to do with the whole long day! One might gape oneself to death. And to-morrow! Then it would be still worse with us. One should die of over-exertion. Then would a great fishing-net bring to us the whole populous relationship. A dozen and a half of uncles and aunts, every one of them turtles; and more than a score of cousins, all of the generation of haddock. And one should be compelled to see these from noon-day till midnight; from noon-day till midnight one must be polite to them; and from noon-day till midnight one must amuse them. Ah! one should go distracted!

Selma and I, and at last also Flora herself, were obliged to laugh at these desperate circumstances, and we made various propositions for boldly meeting them.

I proposed that we should all agree to be merry, and to fall into whatever Christmas joke we might be inspired with. But Selma met that with a slight shaking of the head, and with ‘that will not do.’ Several of our gracious aunts are a little prim, and the Lord has given to me such a fund of joy, that certainly—were

I to let this out before them—they would really think me crazy. Upon this my stepmother came and besought us to be ‘tranquil;’ all would go on well and easily; she was accustomed to such things. We should only not torment ourselves, but keep ourselves cheerful, and so on. Selma sighed, and began to sing a song. In the evening, she entertained her mother and me with reading to us. Flora went early to bed, and this was a relief to us all.

The third Christmas-day.

The great fishing-bout is over, and we repose, well pleased, upon our laurels.

The dinner—well! during dinner one can always live, even with forty persons. Good eating is good company, and puts people in good humour. A great loss was it that the Chamberlain did not come. We had reckoned upon his ‘good stories,’ as upon the pepper and salt of the dinner. But he has taste only for small select dinner-parties, and has no inclination to sacrifice himself.

Immediately after dinner they had coffee, which also is enlivening; but after this comes a heavy interval, namely, from coffee to tea-time. One is heavy from eating; heavy from the heat; heavy from the company of thirty heavy people; heavy from the duty of entertaining these. All this is not light. I know very well, however, that the person who looks most petrified, has in himself a living, enlightening spark, and that it only requires a fire-steel wherewith to strike this, in order to call it out; I have often experienced that with pleasure, and I began therefore now to go about in the company as a fire-steel; but it either was my fault, or the fault of the others, nowhere would it give fire, nay, not even smoke or crackle the least. True is it—and I said this for my comfort—that I was too little acquainted with most of the present guests rightly to understand how to strike upon them. Flora gave herself not the least trouble about the company, but sat there with the most annoyed countenance in the world, and turned over a memorandum-book.

Selma moved with the most heartfelt politeness and kindness here and there in the company, and began now with one and now with another a conversation, and tried to make the people chat together, and wherever she turned herself, there her sweetness failed not to call forth a little life; but it soon died out again when she was gone. With one word, it would not succeed, but was ever stiller and stiller, hotter and heavier; and I remembered a witty Countess’s description of a soirée in our highest ‘haute volée’—“We were like fish in a fish-tank, which, on account of the heat, swim slowly about and wind about another, and only now and then move their gills a little.”

Three or four card-tables had taken away a part of the gentlemen; but we had several, who neither played nor yet talked, and the whole mass of sitting ladies, and—these were to be entertained till twelve o’clock at night!

It was now somewhat after six. My step-mother sat on the sofa, and swallowed her yawns under the most polite gestures; but her look was more and more troubled, and her eye sought Selma, and asked intelligibly ‘what are we to do!’

Selma came to me and whispered "this is horrible! In my despair I have just now related a little bit of scandal to my aunt Pendelfelt, but she looked with such a 'God defend us' air, that I took to flight. But now we must set on foot a revolution, in order to enliven us. Poor mamma looks as if she were ready to fly the field! Hast thou no little suggestion—no bright idea?"

"Yes, a splendid idea! We will introduce a Finland Christmas-game, with song and dance, which I remember. I will propose it."

"Ah! that will never do."

"It must do." And I lifted my voice, and proposed to the company to take part in a Christmas game.

I could see by the horrible and perfect stillness which followed my proposal, how bold it was, and my stepmother looked somewhat embarrassed on my account.

But I have a certain Finnish vein in me, which makes me with lively perseverance go through with whatever is begun with boldness. I renewed therefore my proposition, and turned myself particularly to some gentlemen and ladies in company, and explained to them the plan of the game, and besought them to take part. I found several, especially among the ladies, ready to fall into my scheme, but—it was so difficult! "The game was to be accompanied with song, and they could not sing," and so on, with a thousand difficulties; and the royal secretary, Krusenberg, whom I besought to open the dance with me, started back horrified, and exclaimed, "No, heaven forbid, my gracious lady! Impossible that I can!"

It began to get darker before my eyes, as to how the affair was to be managed, when my fortunate star opened the door of the ante-room, and Signora Luna, the Baron, and Lieutenant Sparreköld, entered.

"We are saved," whispered I to Selma, "if we can only excite them to interest themselves in our proposal."

"That will easily be done, I fancy," replied she. "I see Lennartson approach us, we will speak with him."

And when Lennartson came to us we told him our trouble, and I prayed him with my whole heart to help me in my daring undertaking. As long as I live shall I be thankful for the readiness and kindness with which he entered into the affair. There are actions in social life which show as much goodness of soul and human love, as visiting the captives does.

I went with the Baron to Signora Luna to beg for her help; and now our horizon became perfectly bright, for she replied frankly and joyously that she would be 'more than willing' to lead this game, which she knew, and which she had often played in her childhood. And as the kindly-beaming Mrs. Luna opened the dance with the Baron, and I followed on Sparrsköld's hand, up sprung the royal secretary Krusenberg to Selma, and prayed to dance with her; thus a great movement took place, a stirring and rising in the whole company, and the procession, as it turned out into the large ante-room, became greater and ever greater. My stepmother engaged the little Miss M., who had no partner; other ladies followed her example; gray-headed men and matrons joined; everybody was soon upon their legs, and the merry game in full progress, and jest and laughter flourished. My stepmother began to look quite happy.

It was a surprise to me when I saw among the dancers St. Orme, whose entrance I had not noticed, and discovered Flora, no longer the contrary, ill-humoured Flora, but, in the light of the newly-arrived gentleman's glances, a more and more joyous and charmingly beaming Flora.

The game was not properly a game of forfeits, but the baron made it such, at the instigation of Signora Luna, who thought that the redeeming of the forfeits would be amusing. And as the dancing had continued some time, and it looked as if people begun to be a little tired, and a great number of forfeits were collected, 'Our lady' with the bright eyes seated herself magnificently and solemnly in the middle of the circle, and said—

I burn, I burn, I glow, I glow,
Who owns this forfeit I would know?

One of the first who had to redeem a forfeit was the royal secretary Krusenberg. His penalty was to declaim something before the company, and as his talent in this art was well known, a general expectation was excited, which was all the more increased by the subtle countenance with which the young declamator proceeded to his work. He had often shown during this game that he wished to produce an 'effect,' and now set about most properly to 'startle us.' He did this truly, but not in a pleasant way; for he began with great pathos to declaim—the Lord's Prayer.

With a flash of noble indignation in her eyes, Selma rose up, went to him and said, "Mr. Secretary Krusenberg, it were better that you never said the holy words, than that you spoke them here in that way."

The declamator looked somewhat confounded.

"Defend us! Miss Selma is severe to-day!" said he reddening, and added, while he endeavoured to look quite at his ease, "Well then, I must then seize upon something else;" and he began to read some French verses, but he did it not in any extraordinary manner: he was evidently out of tune from the little scene, and from the impression which it seemed to have made upon the company. I immediately looked at Lennartson, who stood a little out of the circle, and read in his eyes, which followed Selma, an expression of decided approbation and pleasure.

With highly-crimsoned cheeks, Selma seated herself by me, and after she had been for some time silent, she turned her lovely and once more gentle eyes to me, and asked,—

"Did I do wrong, Sophia?"

"You did very right," said I, as I pressed her hand.

"But I was certainly too violent, too severe!"

"No; but if you think so, say in a while a word of explanation to the young man."

"Yes, I have been thinking so myself," replied Selma.

An old gentleman, who during the game had distinguished himself by his cheerful participation and liveliness, came diffidently and seated himself near us, and said gaily,—

"It is quite pleasant to be made so cheerful here. When one becomes old and heavy, and all is still around one, then one feels oneself often so stupified, so deadened, that one is ready to think 'it is all over with thee, thou poor simpleton, over, quite over.' But if it happen that one becomes shook up or animated, then one can see that it is not quite so over. Nay, there is so much which can awaken anew in us and revive, that one must be as much pleased as one is amazed to think 'O that thou shouldst still be so young and so full of life.'

Upon this I made the wise remark, that this might prove that in truth the soul preserves her entirely fresh life, although during the evening twilight, as we call 'age,' it slumbers a while.

The old man smiled, and replied, "how lovely she is. It can really do good to an old heart to look at her, and also to talk with her."

As methought that these words were a little incongruous as an answer to my observation, I looked at the old gentleman with astonishment, and remarked that he had riveted his eyes with a bright expression upon Selma, who, in order to redeem a forfeit, was sentenced "to stand a statue," and who stood the test in the most charming manner. While I now, together with my neighbour, silently observed her, I perceived St. Orme's voice. He had, in his customary soft, almost sneaking manner, seated himself near me, while he, with an expression of melancholy very uncommon to him, said,

"Do you remember my late wife—Virginia?"

"Yes," I replied; "she was one of the loveliest women that I have ever seen."

"Think you not that Selma has a resemblance to her—less in the features than in expression, and in the whole being; for example, in the proud and yet charming; in the union of the princess and sylph; in that which is in the highest sense MAJESTIC! And her voice! she often recalls the voice—which is silent for ever."

Such words from St. Orme! I looked at him surprised, but he seemed to have forgotten me and every thing around him, sunk silently in sorrowful remembrance.

Why have I felt myself from the beginning so much excited against St. Orme? Why have I not thought of seeking out the good in him? At this moment his whole being seemed to me ennobled.

Were but human beings always that which they are in their best moments, then should we know here already on earth a kingdom of heaven, of beauty, and goodness. But—!

The redeeming of the forfeits, in which song and dance were brought forward, lasted till supper.

After supper I saw Selma slowly make her way to the window where Krusenberg stood. A little while afterwards she came to me, and whispered joyfully—

"Now have I concluded peace with Krusenberg."

"And what said you to him?"

"I prayed him to pardon my warmth towards him, but said to him at the same time what a painful feeling he had occasioned me, and—in a word, I was friendly and candid towards him."

"Well, and what said he?"

"He—what do you mean? He thanked me and confessed his error, his thoughtlessness; nay, he charged himself with so many faults, that I was a little bit afraid of listening to him.

But, Sophia, how much good there is in people."

"Yes, now! is not that my everlasting sermon! But one must also be careful to call it forth. As one calls into the wood, so is it answered back again."

And these were our 'faits et gestes,' on this day, whose memorandum I may not however close, without adding to it the 'honourable mention' which, at the end of the day, my stepmother made of my good deportment, of my looks, and my toilet. The latter part lost itself in the following agreeable 'clairobscur,' "and in that dress—with thy beautiful white arms, and pearls in thy brown hair, and with all this, there—thou didst not look as if thou wert above twenty—and so 'distingue!' and I assure thee, that more than one—um, um, um!"

I (modest and half curious to hear more).—"O my sweet mother!"

My Stepmother.—"Um! um! um! I say nothing, as long—um! um! um!" * * *

The 28th of December.

FRAGMENTS OF A CONVERSATION.

"But tell me, Selma, how shall I explain to myself Flora's position between Lennartson and St. Orme? She really loves the first, and is betrothed to him, and yet the latter has a wonderful power over her. And she—how unequal and strange she is towards him. Sometimes she appears coquettish, sometimes afraid of him; and at times almost hostile, then again submissive, nay humble; then again proud—what indeed can be the ground of all this?"

Selma (with a sort of anxiety).—"Ah, ask me not! I know not, I understand not how that is but this I know, that Flora, since St. Orme's arrival, has been quite changed. Her temper has never been equal, and her lively imagination has always led her to fly from one object to another; but still she was in all so charming, so pleasant, so amiable."

I.—"How long has Lennartson been betrothed to Flora?"

Selma.—"Rather more than a year. It occurred at the death-bed of her mother. But I know not why, after that, her betrothal was not made known. Old General Lennartson about that time had a paralytic stroke, and his son went abroad with him in hopes of re-establishing his father's health. When Lennartson, a few months ago, returned alone, St. Orme was already here, and Flora changed. But she herself will neither speak of this, nor hear it spoken of. And truly this conduct which now prevails must soon change. It seems to me so unnatural. I hope much from the New-Year and its power. Do you see how Mathilde, between King Hiskia and Lord Wellington reddens already! And here King Ahasuerus begins to open his bright-blue eyes. How pleasant it will be to see all these in full bloom!"

Thus my young sister sought to escape from a subject which grieved her, and to forget amid bright pictures the dark ones. But the dark ones must not be so overlooked, they must be penetrated—made transparent if possible. I mean after this to keep my eyes well open.

The 1st of January, 18—
A bouquet of fresh flowers, and a cordial hand-pressure from the Viking—is the glad impression which I have derived from the forenoon visit.

In the Evening.

Ready-dressed for the Exchange Ball, in black, with lace; pearls in my hair, on my neck and arms.

Be quiet, Selma dear!—Thou shouldst not make me vain! Thou shouldst not mislead thy elder sister.

Flora goes with 'the Beauty' to the Exchange, and makes her toilet with her. I am not in good spirits, and I fancy that I shall have no pleasure. But still, however, a quiet observer need not experience any annoyance, when she herself will not play any part. It is now more than ten years since I saw the world in a New-Year's Assembly in Stockholm. How will it now appear to me? 'Allons et voyons!'

The 2nd.

Let us now relate something of the Exchange Ball. When we entered the large, magnificently-lighted saloon (we came rather late), the upper, that is to say, the aristocratic part, was filled. My stepmother nevertheless steered our way there, and said cheerfully to us, "O we certainly shall find seats!" But the 'honourables' sate like stone-houses on their seats; and at Selma's earnest and whispered prayers her mother desisted from all attempts to unsettle these ladies. Thus we described, with all dignity, a half-circle; and amid the most courteous greetings, we made our retreat towards the lower regions of the saloon, where we obtained places near the door. Now entered Count Gyllenlöf's brilliant group, accompanied by the Silfverling family. As they paused for a moment at the entrance, in order to obtain a view of the saloon, my stepmother arose to speak to the Countess, but she turned herself away with a short and cold salutation, and then floated past us with her splendid train, which seemed not to observe as the very least in the world. My stepmother seated herself, evidently mortified and wounded. Selma was so too, for her mother's sake, and said in a tone of vexation, "How stupid they are!"

A comet-like appearance now suddenly moved through the room. It was Flora and her sister, accompanied by gentlemen. They were both of them dazzlingly beautiful, and dressed with the utmost elegance. Flora nodded gaily to us, and followed her sister up the room, where they found places near the Gyllenlöfs, who had taken seats near the platform, which was arranged for the royal family. Selma looked after Flora, and tears came involuntarily into her eyes. We sate tolerably forlorn, among quite unknown people. My stepmother looked quite troubled, and I felt myself really depressed for her sake. Then my young sister took heart, and began to introduce to me, in her lively manner, those who were arriving and those who had already arrived. My stepmother on this cheered up, and was challenged by me to shew now also her great knowledge of the world and of mankind.

In the mean time we fell into discourse with a charming young girl, who appeared very zealous to learn something of the great world about her, which she now saw for the first time. This charming young person amused us with her liveliness, and the naïve candour with which she communicated to us her great fear that this evening she should not dance a single dance, as she had scarcely any acquaintance here, and besides this, was so strange and so bashful in the world, and so on. She would however console herself for sitting the whole evening, if she could only see the royal family; but somebody had just now told her that perhaps they might not be at the ball. And she had promised her little sisters to wake them when she came home, and tell them about the princess and the young prince. Her fear was soon changed into the most lively delight, as the royal chamberlains shewed themselves, and every body in the saloon rose to salute the Queen, who, with the Crown-prince, the Crown-princess, and the two eldest princes, Carl and Gustav, accompanied by a brilliant train, entered the saloon, and amid kindly greetings went across the room, to take their seats on the platform. And now we rejoiced ourselves, Selma and I, to have been near the door, where we could observe the royal family so well.

Selma's new little friend was quite charmed, and gave her heart immediately to the Prince Gustav; whilst Selma said, jestingly, that she had chosen Prince Carl for the favourite of her heart.

Scarcely had the royal family seated themselves, when the Gyllenlöf's party fell into conversation with the royal attendants. Young Silfverling paid attention to the young ladies of the court.

Slowly now began the quadrille to form itself at the upper end of the saloon. The royal chamberlains had gone round, and given out gracious invitations in the name of the illustrious guests. Now the Crown-princess, majestic and glittering with jewels, was seen to open the quadrille with Baker N., a little, stout old man, whose good-tempered polite behaviour shews how easily true moral education effaces every distinction in all, even in the greatest difference of ranks.

The Crown-prince danced with a young lady of the citizen class; and Prince Carl with —, our little new friend, who had feared so much that this evening she should not dance at all, and who now, on the hand of the young prince, beamed with the charm of youth and innocent lovely delight.

She was pointed out as the eldest daughter of the wholesale dealer M—. In my own mind I saw her thinking, 'what will my sisters say to this?'

Lennartson danced with Flora, Selma with Felix Delphin; and as I now saw my stepmother again more satisfied and drawn into conversation by a lady of condition, I began to use more freely my eyes and ears, that I might seize upon and collect whatever the occasion offered.

The ball was beautiful; the world, thought I, tolerably like what I had seen it almost a dozen years before; old acquaintance were, for the most part, like themselves also. Time had merely wandered with light footsteps over most countenances, and had dug in a few wrinkles. Upon two faces only with which I was acquainted, I saw written a marked history—a development; the one for good, and the other for bad. For the rest, I saw many agreeable forms among the young of both sexes. People say that ugliness and stupidity vanish more and more out of the world. Good luck to the journey!

To the right of me I heard the two young Breanders in quiet conversation together, and heard one of them say,—

"No! a thousand devils take and broil me—"

And the other replied,—
"O! the devil fetch me! the devil in hell fetch me!"

And the first continued,—

"No, seven thousand tuns curse my soul!"

And the other chimed in,—

"Yes, the devil fetch and govern me!"

An old, well-dressed gentleman, with a somewhat sarcastic look, now came up to the speakers, and wished them, with a smile, 'good speed.'

On my left hand I heard Hilda and Tilda Engel talking about the gentlemen who had just been conversing, thus. Hilda said,—

"Ah! he is so sweet, Axel Brevander, with his handsome eyes and his little pointed beard. Heavens! how sweet he is!"

Tilda. "And his brother there! he is according to my taste no less sweet. And how he waltzes! Quite divine! He has engaged me for the second waltz! Ah! he is such a sweet fellow!"

Hilda and Tilda together. "Ah, they are so sweet, so sweet, so sweet!"

Oh! thought I, we have not yet got rid of the ugly and the stupid!

I was interrupted in my observations by a middle-aged lady of a lively and goodly exterior, who saluted me with a friendly zeal, and taking my hand, exclaimed,—

"Ah! my best Mada—Miss—Mrs.—pardon me; I have forgotten the title. I wish you a good new year! How charming it is to see Mada—Miss—home again. And how may be the sweet Lady-District-Governess—I mean Miss—I mean your Honour's Lady stepmother?" I was conscious that I very well knew the person who thus addressed me, but I could not at the moment recal to mind either her name or rank, and therefore, in consequence of the incomprehensible etiquette of our social intercourse, I found it impossible to address her as you or she. I was therefore in the greatest perplexity, as she seemed so certain of our perfect acquaintance. Whilst I secretly vexed myself about this defect and bad custom among us, I seized upon, as it seemed to me, the brilliant idea of calling my unknown acquaintance 'Your honour.' At this she looked somewhat confounded, and our conversation fell, as it were, to the ground, till the Signora Luna, who had now finished her attendance on the Queen, came to us, and after having given me a hearty shake of the hand, addressed my great personage thus: "Ah, good day to you, Provostess R.! A good new year to you! How is the Provost?"

"I thank you, my gracious Barone—or Countess, who are so good as to ask. I hope the Baro—I would say Count—pardon me, I am so unlucky as never to remember titles and names. Is it not Countess that I should say?"

"Could we not simply address one another as you?" asked Signora Luna, smiling, "we then should get rid of a deal of embarrassment; and, as you know, Kellgren says, 'the simpler the better.'"

"Ah, if that could but be!" exclaimed the Provostess, brightening up, "that would really be a blessed thing! For me especially, who have so wretched a memory and am so mortified to be discourteous. But could one really do so?"

"I see nothing in the world which can hinder it," answered 'our lady of the bright eyes,' "if we the Provostesses, the Baronesses, the Count-esses, and ladies of all degrees, determined to carry it through. For you know, indeed, that God wills what the women will. Is it not so, my best Chief Master of the Ceremonies?" continued she, turning herself to the ornate old gentleman just mentioned, "does it not seem to you, Mr. Chief Master of the Ceremonies, that Mr., the Chief Master of the Ceremonies himself, and we all should have an easier life of it here in Sweden, if we, like all polished nations, availed ourselves of the manner of addressing one another which our language offers us; if we employed our honest Swedish you, instead of these everlasting titles? It actually frightens me from talking with the 'Mr. Chief Master of the Ceremonies,' when I bethink me that I must address Mr. the Chief Master of the Ceremonies with the title of Mr. the Chief Master of the Ceremonies, and that it can return every minute and hinders all that which these Masters of the Ceremonies ought to do for my tongue and my meaning. And now I promise to talk no more with a Mr. Chief Master of the Ceremonies, unless the Mr. Chief Master of the Ceremonies gives me leave to address the Mr. Chief Master of the Ceremonies with a simple you, and that I can hear the Mr. Chief Master of the Ceremonies address me in the same style."

"You are perfectly right, my gracious one," smilingly replied the polite old gentleman, "and if you can make your proposition general amongst mankind, you will have rendered a great service to Sweden. I really cannot conceive why at Court and in society we should be less European than in the Swedish academy, where we with the greatest freedom address each other with you, a word which is of equally good tone and has an equally fine sound as the Frenchman's vous, the Englishman's you, the German's sie, and the de of our Scandinavian brothers."

"That is excellent!" exclaimed Signora Luna. "Thus then we make a contract on this New Year's-day to introduce you into our social and every-day life, and a new and better time shall thereby arrive, both for speech and writing in Sweden. Let me now present to you these two ladies, my very good friends; I do not tell you whether they be ladies or Mrs. only, but that they are very charming people, and you shall address them with you, and they shall address you with you likewise. Now I leave you to make a nearer relationship through pro and con."

And we talked together, and it went off both easily and well. The nimble and the light in our new nomenclature, as it were, gave wings to the conversation, and I found the Chief Master of the Ceremonies one of the most interesting old gentlemen and the Provostess one of the most excellent and most lively Provostesses in the world.

The dancing in the mean time went on, but as is usual at these New-Year assemblies, without any particular life. People collect here rather to see and be seen; rather to greet one another with 'a happy New Year!' and to chatter with one another, rather than to dance. Towards eleven the royal party went out into the large ante-room on the right, to receive and to reply to the compliments of the diplomatic corps. When they again entered the saloon they began to make the great round of it, and I actually pitied them for the many unmeaning words which they must address to and hear from the many hundreds of people unknown to them. Yet the procession was beautiful and splendid to look at. The gorgeous dress of the Queen (she was almost covered with jewels) and her courteous demeanour occasioned deep bows and curseys; people looked up with so much pleasure to the high and noble figures of the Crown-princess and her husband, and nobody noticed without joy and hope, the two young tall-grown slender princes; the one so brown and manly, the other fair and mild, and both with the bloom of unspoiled youth upon their fresh countenances.

My eye, however, riveted itself especially upon the Crown-princess. I remember so well how I saw her twenty years ago make her entry as bride into Stockholm; how I saw her sitting in the gilded coach with transparent glass windows; the delicate figure in a dress of silver gauze, a crown of jewels on her head, with cheeks so rosy and eyes so heavenly blue, so beaming, greeting the people who filled the streets and houses, and thronged themselves around her carriage, and with an unceasing peal of shouted buzzas saluted in her the young lovely hope of the country. She was the sun of all eyes, and the sun of heaven looked out in pomp above her. Certainly, the heart of the young princess must have beaten high at this universal homage of love and joy—at this triumphal procession into the country—into the hearts of the people. Life has not many moments of such intense splendour.

Signora Luna has told me, that when towards the end of the procession through the city, the princely bride came before the royal castle, and the carriage drove thundering through the high arched gateway, she suddenly bowed her head. When she raised it again her eyes were full of tears—with still devotion entered she her future habitation.

I thought of all this as the royal train approached us by degrees. I thought how the hopes which the young princess had then awakened, were fulfilled; how her life since then had passed; thought how she had worked on in quiet greatness, as wife and mother—as the protectress of noble manners—as the promoter of industry—as the helper of the poor and suffering; as she now stood there an honour to her religion, to the land where she was born—to the people who now called her theirs,—and I loved and honoured her from the depths of my heart. I thought that I saw in her large expressive eyes that she felt the annoyance of the empty speeches which she had to make and to hear, and it seemed to me absurd, that merely for the sake of etiquette, that not one cordial word should this evening reach her ear. I therefore let my heart emancipate itself, and greeted her with a 'God bless your Highness!' The large eyes looked at me with some amazement, which however now took a colouring of friendship, as she, pleasantly greeting us, past by and paused at Selma, whom she knew, and with whom she spoke with the utmost familiarity for some time, pleased, as it seemed, with the graceful and easy manner of my young sister. The Queen and my stepmother spoke French together, as if they had been youthful acquaintances. The Crown-prince talked with Lennartson, who now for some time had joined himself to us. All this produced a somewhat important halt of the royal train, and its delay with us drew all eyes, with a certain curiosity, upon us. Scarcely had the royal party left us when the Gyllenlöfs, as if struck by a sudden light, hastened up to us with the warmest friendship, and invited us at last to join their party. Seats were procured for us near the platform; we must of necessity follow them up the saloon. My stepmother, always soon reconciled, allowed herself to be persuaded; we went—we arrived—the Silfverlings found us to be their equals, and we had seats. My stepmother had a deal of politeness and many welcomes to answer. Selma declined three invitations to dance with the young Silfverlings, and I now understood what she meant by spasmodic acquaintances.

Shortly afterwards, when the royal party had left the assembly, we left it also. The unfortunate philosopher had forgotten Flora's over-shoes, at which Flora was very angry and unhappy. Selma prayed her warmly to take hers, and Flora did so after some opposition. Lennartson seemed hurt and displeased at this; my stepmother uneasy. Contrary to all my prayers, I could not induce Selma to make use of mine.

We were kept for a good while standing in the lobby by the crush of people. Lennartson threw his cloak before Selma's feet, and obliged her to set them upon it, that she might not suffer from standing upon the cold floor. His anxiety called forth the hateful, envious expression into Flora's eyes. St. Orme observed her quite calmly, while he shewed himself very polite towards her. He gave her his arm, Lennartson conducted my stepmother, the Chamberlain me. Here came we in collision with Aunt Pendelselt, who, in an affected and formal manner, said half-aloud to Flora—

"Now, my sweet friend, when may one congratulate you, if I may ask?"

Flora assumed an astonished and unfriendly look—but St. Orme answered laughing; "quite certainly in the next new year!" Lennartson on this, looked at him with an inquiring and sharp glance. St. Orme looked another way. Flora seemed to set her teeth together. Aunt Pendelselt turned herself now to Selma and Felix, as it seemed, with a similar question, which Selma sought earnestly to avoid, and begged Felix to go forward. At that moment the throng of people opened itself, and we were at liberty. In the carriage, my stepmother and I emulated each other in wrapping Selma's feet up in our shawls and cloaks.

At home, and during a light supper, we were all again in good humour, and amused ourselves with projecting all kinds of improbable plans for the future. We laughed a deal; but at a whisper of St. Orme's, Flora became suddenly gloomy and grave. At the same time I was aware of telegraphic signs between my uncle and my stepmother, which put me somewhat out of temper, and as we were about to part on this first day of the year, several of us were something out of humour; but Selma, good and joyous, and full of joke, prevented all vexatious stiffness, and amid merry "happy wishes," we said to each other "good night!"

And thus it is in our life—in our home here in the North we live much with, and among one another, where not unfrequently the unfriendly is excited, we are disturbed and put into "ill humour," and must endeavour again to heal this at home and in ourselves; since we do not here find this out of ourselves, as in the rich South. Therefore it is so beautiful, when a tone of love and joy goes through the house like a key-note.

Then the dissences die away by degrees, and we can say in peace to one another and to life—"Good night!"

The 7th.

Good morning, life! A lovely, bright day; snow lies upon the southern mountains, and shines dazlingly white against the clear blue horizon. Yet it is not very cold, and the sun bathes with a flood of light, palaces and cottages, waves and shore, men, animals, and statues. Sea-swallows, shining white, swing themselves over the Nordstream, where the water of the lake, with its thirteen hundred islands, breaks into the salt sea, and foamingly intermingles with its waters.

This stream plays a part in my life. Its roaring is my cradle song of an evening, when I rest upon my bed. In the morning it affords me my bathing water, and, by its wild fresh odour, by its strengthening cold, awakens feelings of the life by the Kautua stream; feelings fresh with youth, full of life's enjoyment. In its voyaging waves I see the first glimmer of light, when I from my window salute the new day.

Light! water! these primeval gifts of the Creator to earth, which still to-day are here for all mankind. Why do we not acknowledge more your power of blessing? Why are we not baptized every day by you to new life, and courage, and gratitude?

I have stood at my open window, and with full respiration have drunk in the fresh air, which, together with the sunshine, streams into my chamber. I have had joyful thoughts.

I remember the Polish nobles, who in the past summer visited Sweden, and what was their peculiar feeling of esteem for this country.

"A country never conquered by a foreign power; a people who through their own strength have asserted their own independence!" said they, with an expression of pleasure and melancholy, (melancholy over their own poor fatherland.) And I softly sang from Malmström's beautiful warm song, "The Fatherland," words which often come into my thoughts, and sang them with love.

Thou poor, thou sterile Swedish earth,
Shall famine cast thee down!

Thou honour-crowned Fatherland,
Where old sea-marks abide;
Thou lofty cliff-encircled strand,
Washed by the faithful tide.—
Thou joyous home, thou peaceful shore,
God stretched in love and pleasure o'er Thee his Almighty hand!

I thought also on my own, now so happy independence. O freedom! how charming is the enjoyment of thee after long years of captivity.

Thus thought I on something which is dear to me, and which remains ever more sure. I feel that I am come into an ever-improving, a more and more harmonious relationship to my fellow-creatures. Since it has become light in my own soul, and I am by this means come more "into equipoise" in life; since I am at peace with myself; no longer hotly wishing to please others, and no longer seeking so much for their approbation and their love—since that time I please them much more, and find in them much greater pleasure. Since I have, above all things, seen both in man and woman—human kind, and to this have spoken, I have towards mankind, and mankind has towards me, a certain thou affinity of feeling, a certain relationship, as of the children of one parent, which has opened our souls to each other, and has beautified life. In one word, I acknowledge ever more intelligibly that human love is my proposition.

Two people come in this way nearer and nearer to my heart, Selma and Wilhelm Brenner, my young sister and—my friend! Selma makes me happy by her tenderness, by her joyous harmonious being. She has at once laid aside the scornful mask, which disfigured her pure features, and her natural wit appears to me on that account only the more agreeable. Satire may play even upon the lips of an angel, and even the merry and witty may be hand-maids in the house of our Lord. Does He not let this be seen in nature? Scatters He not over field and wave, among clouds and stars, millions of joyful sallies and rich bursts of laughter, which lighten forth both in sunny and gloomy hours, and enliven the spirits of his creatures?

Wilhelm Brenner, the Viking—why do I feel at thoughts of him as it were a sunshine in my heart? Love, however, it is not, that I know decidedly; but my acquaintance with him gives me joy.

Latterly I have often seen him, and feel myself always well in mood when I am near him. I talk to him willingly of my Finnish fatherland; of the wild natural characteristics of Aura; of its peculiar people and manners; its strange mythological songs and legends, with magic arts and powerful PRIMEVAL WORDS—the keys to the being of things—of my own first childhood on its foaming pearl-rich streams, in the shade of its alders.

How kindly, nay, how willingly he listens to me; how well he replies to my thoughts, my feelings—now seriously, now gently jesting! Many times I request that he should call forth some remembrances out of his restless life, pictures of another climate, of seas and wildernesses, of glowing Africa and strange Egypt; scenes from the battle-fields around Atlas. It is rare that he will relate anything of this; but how curiously and desiringly do I not then listen! These pictures are so grand, and I acknowledge something grand also in the nature which has conceived them.

And what feeling is it indeed which leads the Viking to seek so openly and so cordially intercourse with me? Love? No! I do not think so; and will not think so; at least not in the sense in which people generally accept this word. The tolerably current pretence, that man and woman only under the influence of this feeling approach one another cordially, is not just. They seek, they need one another because they admire a peculiar kind of excellence in each other. He finds in her the inspirations of life, she sees her world illuminated in him; and thus they find, through one another, the harmony of life, the fullness of life.

This I have thought to-day by my clear heaven, by clear, fresh air.

The horizon of the family has exhibited itself to the New Year pretty free from clouds. My stepmother is entirely in good humour amid a host of New-Year's visits, which drop in every day. This has prevented her and me from clashing together in any important quarrel; yet since the emancipation-question we have been rather more ceremonious towards each other, and my stepmother seems to suspect tricks and uneasy machinations under many of my entirely innocent assertions.

THE 11th.

St. Orme comes hither sometimes early in the morning, and desires to speak alone with my stepmother. She always looks disturbed at this; and when she returns from these conferences, she is always annoyed and uneasy till some new impression removes this. I suspect that their private conversations have reference to money which St. Orme borrows. May the good-nature of my stepmother not bring her into embarrassment. I have heard that which is bad spoken of St. Orme's affairs, of his life and connexions. Felix also may be misled by St. Orme's sophisms, and by the example of his friends, the Rutebenfelts, into evil ways. I have spoken with Brenner of my suspicions respecting St. Orme; but the Viking takes the field for him, and is, since his residence in Paris, under obligations to him, which makes him unwilling to believe anything bad about him.

THE 13th.

My bad suspicions have their entirely good, or I will say, bad foundation. Helfrid Rittersvård wrote a note to Selma this morning, wherein she asked a loan of fifty rix-dollars. She needed this sum, in order to pay the pension of her youngest brother, and should be able to repay it in two months. With eyes flashing with desire to gratify Helfrid's wish, Selma shewed the letter to her mother, and prayed her to advance the desired sum, which she had not now herself.

"With infinite pleasure, my beloved child!" exclaimed my stepmother, who is always ready to give; hastened to her writing-desk, and opened the drawer where she usually keeps money; but suddenly she appeared to recollect something, and turned pale. She took out a purse, which a few days before was full of heavy silver-pieces, put in her hand instinctively, but drew out merely a few rix-dollars. A painful confusion painted itself on her countenance, as she said almost stammering, "Ah! I have not—I cannot now! St. Orme has borrowed all my money. He promised to bring it me back again in a few days, but—in the mean time—how shall we manage it?"

My stepmother had tears in her eyes; and her troubled appearance, her pale cheeks—I sprang immediately up to my chamber, and came down again quickly with a few canary-birds (so my stepmother and Selma in their merry way, call the large yellow bank-bills; whilst the others, just according to their look, and their value, have the names of other birds).

Selma embraced me, and danced for joy at the sight of the yellow notes. But my stepmother took them with a kind of embarrassment—a dissatisfied condescension, which somewhat grieved me. She promised that I should soon receive back the bills. And if I "must borrow from her, I might be sure that," and so on.

Her coldness cooled me. In the mean time we governed the state together in the afternoon, and handled 'the system,' and other important things, I will not venture to say exactly according to what system, if not—according to the system of confusion. My thoughts were in another direction. They followed Felix and Selma. He seemed to wish to speak to her alone, and she seemed on the contrary to wish to avoid him, in which also she succeeded.

THE 15th.

To-day Felix came hither early in the forenoon. I was alone with Selma, in the inner ante-room. She was attending to her flowers at the window. After a conversation of a few minutes with me, Felix approached her. Selma went to the other window; Felix followed. Selma would have escaped into the other room, when Felix placing himself in the door-way, barred her progress and exclaimed beseechingly,

"No! Now Selma can no longer avoid me! Give me a moment's conversation, if you do not wish that I should be altogether desperate."

A deep crimson overspread Selma's countenance; a feeling of anguish seemed to seize upon her soul! but she struggled with herself, and whilst she looked down at a monthly rose, which she held in her hand, she seemed to wait for that which Felix had to say to her. I thought I saw that I ought to go, and leave the two young people to explain themselves to each other, and—I went, but not without secret disquiet.

In the saloon I found my stepmother in secret conference with the Chamberlain. She looked more Metternich-like than ever. I made as though I noticed nothing, and went up to my chamber, when I soon received a visit from Helfrid Rittersvård. And out of this visit came quite unexpectedly a confidence which—Now, now, my gracious diplomatic Lady Step-mother, I can also have my state secrets. To my Diary, however, I can very well confide, that Helfrid Rittersvård, after much consideration and after much anxiety and pain, had yielded to the faithful devotion and prayers of Aks Sparreköld, and had promised to belong to him whenever their personal circumstances allow of a union. This may, it is true, withdraw itself to a great distance. Before Sparreköld gets his company it is not to be thought of, and Captain Rumler, his superior, remains probably yet a long time in his post as head of the company.

Helfrid was uneasy, and wished to know from me whether she had done well or ill. I said 'well,' and that made her happy.

It was two hours before I could again visit Selma. As I came into the ante-room where I had left her, it was empty, but I saw that some one had lain upon the sofa, and had supported their head upon the soft pillow. I picked up a few fallen rose-leaves, and saw in their bright-red bosom shining tears. Uneasy in mind, I went farther and sought for Selma. I found her in her chamber.

Her eyes gleamed as they were wont to do when she weeps, and sighs heaved her breast. She soon opened her heart to my tenderly-anxious questions, and I learned her secret feelings and thoughts.

Felix had reproached Selma with the coolness and unfriendliness which she had shewn to him for some time; had told her that this made him unhappy, that he should be lost if she were not different towards him. He confessed his weakness of character—his folly—but Selma could save him if she would, could make of him a worthy, happy man. He prayed that she would confer her hand upon him, and make that reality at which they had so long played. As Selma's husband Felix would be quite another kind of person. "Ah!" continued Selma, "he spoke so beautifully and so warmly of that which I might be to him, and of what he himself could and would be, that I had not the heart to withstand his prayers and promises. But I set fast a time of trial for him, after which—I have always

Hked Felix; he has a good heart, and so many amiable qualities; but he is weak, and for some years, since he has been of age, he has shewn himself so trifling, so little to be trusted!—We have been so dissatisfied with him. But he can change, he can become better, and then—

"Then you will make him happy, Selma?"

"Yes!"

"And you weep?"

"Yes! I know not why."

"I do not believe it of Felix, that he would, as it were, take your feelings by storm."

"Oh, that he certainly will not. But he thinks, perhaps, that I love him more than I really do; and that only temper in me, or his fickle behaviour occasioned my coolness. From our childhood upwards it has been a sort of understood thing in our families, that we were to be married, and we were looked upon as almost betrothed. Felix has always wished for this union, my mother the same, and I have had nothing against it till I learned to become better acquainted with myself. I now know very well that I can never love Felix properly, because I cannot highly esteem him, as I will and, must highly esteem my husband; but—"

"But what, my sweet Selma?"

"If I can make him and others happy, then—neither shall I myself be unhappy. And then—God will give me, perhaps, a child, which I can love, and in which I can have pleasure in the world."

With this Selma wept quite softly, leaning on my shoulder.

I wished to know what Selma had actually promised to young Delphin.

"I have prayed him," replied she, "for one whole year not to speak of his love, but to prove it to me in actions and behaviour. Should I be in this manner convinced that his inclination towards me is actually as great as he says, then I will, when the year of trial is over, consent to be his bride. That I have promised. Felix desires now nothing more; he prayed only for a ring, which he might wear on his hand as a memorial of this hour and of his promise. I gave him the ring with the sapphire. He was so happy, so glad! Ah, Sophia! I must be happy too, since I have done that which is right, and have perhaps saved a human being."

And again Selma's eyes beamed with pure joy, although through a haze of tears. I rejoiced heartily in her prudence and goodness, but still felt myself quite melancholy on her account.

The 18th.

"Invited out for the whole week!" With these words my stepmother met me this morning, and her countenance shewed an intelligible pleasure through an assumed light veil of well-bred weariness and tedium of the world! I exhibited not the least sorrow, especially as I saw my stepmother and the two young girls taken up in the highest degree with the thoughts and business of the toilet. I feel myself fortunate to escape these molestations, and that I can stay at home. My stepmother persuaded me, indeed, a very little "to go with them." But it is not in right earnest.

The 21st.

Among all these dissipations, which reign in the house; amid all those beautiful toilets and artificial flowers, and all these so-called pleasures, still strange symptoms break forth, which testify of the volcanic soil upon which they dance.

Flora has been for several days as changeable in her temper as in her dress; and it has seemed to me, as if she by these changes endeavoured merely to fetter Lennartson's attention, or more correctly, to charm him, and his eye follows her too with attention, but rather with the gravity of the observer than with the expression of the enraptured lover. It seems to me sometimes, as if with all these changes of Flora's, he asked, "which is the true?" and so ask I also; because, whilst she evidently endeavours to draw Lennartson to herself, she disdains not several by-conquests, and keeps these up also with her charms and her endeavours. St. Orme plays the while an apparently indifferent part, but is often betrayed by his crafty glance. He watches her secretly.

Among the pictures in the inner ante-room, there is a beautiful portrait of Beatrice Cenci, the unfortunate fratricide. To-day Flora stood before it, and observed it long, sunk in silent thought. I looked at her, for she was beautiful, as she stood there with an Undine-garland of coral and white water-lilies in her brown hair, and in a dress of that chameleon-like changing-coloured material, which in this year is so much the mode. All at once she broke silence, and said—

"Can you tell me, wise Philosophia! why I find pleasure in this picture; in studying this Beatrice Cenci?"

"Probably because she is so touchingly beautiful," said I.

"Not but for this, because she was so firm and determined. Such people refresh the mind—especially, when we are disgusted by the undecided, weak, characterless people, who are now so abundant in the world. What think you of Beatrice?"

"I deplore her from my whole heart. It must be horrible to hate the author of one's own life."

"Yes, indeed, horrible!" interrupted Flora warmly. "Yes, it is horrible to hate one's parents, but horrible also, if one were compelled to despise them."

Flora with this hid her face in her hands. I looked at her with astonishment and sympathy.

"Ah!" continued she with excitement, "let no one say that it is a matter of indifference what song is sung beside a child's cradle; it sounds through his whole life. Lennartson, Selma, why are they so good, so wholly good; and I, why am I so?—And yet,—Sophia! I am no ordinary person!"

I was silent, and Flora continued, while she looked sharply at me,—

"I know that you never can like me, and that you never did me justice, but still you will not say that I am an ordinary person."

"Extraordinary and beautifully gifted are you in all things," replied I, "but perhaps you are in reality less extraordinary than you fancy yourself to be. For the rest, dear Flora, I cannot judge you, because I do not yet know you. You are often so unlike yourself—you are, as if you were not one, but two—nay, several persons."

"Nor am I one person!" replied Flora; "I have a double being, one good, and one bad, that always casts its spells around me; that is my other I, and follows me like my shadow, and places itself between me and all truth, by day and by night; abroad and at home; when I laugh and when I weep; at the ball and in the church,—yes, even in church it places itself between me and heaven! How is it then possible that I can have peace—that I can be saved? Ah! would that I were a little grey sparrow of the field?"

"And why a sparrow?" asked I.

"Because then nobody would trouble themselves about me, and would know nothing of me—But hush! I feel in me that one of my bad demons is near!"

"Let him obtain no power over you!" prayed I warmly and zealously.

"He has power!" said Flora, with a horrible expression, "and I stand on the brink of an abyss! and soon—soon enough shall I be precipitated down, if not—" she was silent; light footsteps made themselves audible in the outer ante-room, and St. Orme entered. Immediately afterwards came my stepmother and Selma, and all went together to supper at the Silfverlings.

The 23d.

New and distinguishing tokens! My stepmother has her Meternich demeanour, and the telegraph movements between her and the Chamberlain go on. I suspect strongly a complot against my precious freedom. "Must go cautiously and a little diplomatically to work," I heard my stepmother say, softly, this day to my uncle; "you have not let Sophia suspect anything!"

"No; but I feel my way in a delicate manner; confide yourself to me; I understand the ladies," replied he.

To that end my stepmother plagues me with encomiums on the Chamberlain, and the Chamberlain with questions as to my taste in furniture; for example, with regard to the form of tables and bookcases, and so forth. He wishes, he says, in the furnishing of two new rooms that they should be wholly arranged according to my taste. But what is his furniture to me? If my stepmother sings my uncle's praise, he is no less generous in praise of her.

"She is one of the most superior ladies that I know," said he again to-day, "a tact, a judgment, a discretion! Ah! one can confide every thing to her; and I, for my part, when I will do a little good in secret, I know no one whom I would so willingly, and with the most perfect assurance can, make my confidant."

I began over all this to become impatient.

People talk of the marriage of Brenner with a young, lovely and rich widow. This has a little annoyed me. Benner's behaviour appears to me strange. Why has he not spoken to me of this connexion? I am his friend—his sisterly friend. And why?—I cannot endure anything enigmatical in him: but perhaps it is unjust in me so to regard it.

The 24th.

My stepmother and I are on cool terms. Her attempt to impose upon me is repulsed; I am proud, and show my sense of freedom in not a particularly amiable manner. Dissatisfied looks from Flora; uneasy and beseeching ones from Selma. General discomfort. If this should cease here, then it would be quite pleasant.

Ah! they say that life stands still if no outward circumstances excite and move it. But it is not so. It seems to me that it is in such quiet times that the angels of heaven listen to human life most attentively—for then tremble the strings in its innermost depths—then are its finest nerves developed—then fashions itself, that which increases the power of heaven or of hell.

At the moment in which the butterfly develops its wings it is quite calm in the secure resting-place which it has selected. In the moment of change its life appears altogether to be an inward one. But the beaming butterfly of day and the nocturnal death's-head moth are children of the same quiet summer-hour.

A ramble out. A hateful, disagreeable day; the people red-blue, heaven leaden-grey; icicles at all the houses; loose, trampled-up snow, half an ell deep in the streets; vexatious thoughts, unpleasing feelings! Yet—"EVEN THIS WILL PASS OVER!" was the proverb which the wise Solomon gave to an Eastern prince, who desired from him such a motto as would make the soul strong in misfortune, and humble in prosperity; and this motto will I make mine.

The 26th.

I went down yesterday to dinner with the virtuous determination of being complying towards my stepmother, and kind towards everybody. But it was the reverse with me; I entered the inner ante-room, and saw my stepmother and the Chamberlain sitting on the sofa, in confidential and whispered discourse, which they suddenly broke off on my approach. My stepmother seemed very good-humoured, and soon came up to me, and said significantly, as she arranged something in my dress, "I must tell you, that we have just had a long conversation about you and sundry of your concerns—um, um, um!"

"On what concerns?" asked I with a look as if I would not at all understand it.

"O yes, yes; about certain concerns which everywhere have their importance; um—um—um!" said my stepmother, smiling. And then she began a little speech about its being so pleasant to her to see every one about her happy; how all her thoughts and her endeavours tended to that; how she thought not all about herself, how she merely lived for others, and so on. I thought on the bitter recollections of my youth, and assumed a north-pole demeanour on the throne-speech of my stepmother.

We went to dinner. The Chamberlain was "aux petits soins," on my account, and divided the best morsels between himself and me, which had no relish for me. To the most polite observations of my stepmother I answered also coldly, and avoided Selma's looks, which seemed to ask, "What have we done against thee?" At dinner, youth was praised as the golden age; the Chamberlain said that he had in youth "rightly intoxicated himself from the cup of enjoyment." I said, that I had my bitterest remembrances precisely out of my youth; remembrances which even to this day operated disturbingly on my temper. I saw, by the uneasy looks of my stepmother, that she felt this as a reproach to herself. But I had the feeling as if a heavy avalanche lay upon my heart.

In the afternoon, as I was making a little collar, I expressed some vexation that I had no blond with which to trim it. My stepmother hastened instantly to her room, and soon returned with a quantity of beautiful blond, which she playfully threw round my neck, as she prayed me to accept it for love; and I felt myself clasped in her arms, felt her soft breath on my cheek, and she whispered to me archly, that "my passion for emancipation should not prevent her from holding me fast." In my present Spithergen-mood of mind I recognised nothing in this embrace but an attempt to circumscribe my liberty, and therefore I released myself coolly, and even threw away the blond, because "it did not suit me; I could get for myself what I wanted."

My stepmother silently went with her disdained gift back to her room; and as Selma a moment afterwards followed her, I could see, through the open door, how she leaned against the window, looked before her still and sorrowfully, and it seemed to me that tears were on her cheeks.

This sight went to my heart; and whilst I secretly reproached myself for my conduct, I went up to my chamber in order here, in quietness, to demand a reckoning with myself. But I could hardly recognise again my own room; so changed, so beautified was it. For a while I knew not where I was.

Among some handsome new furniture which had been arranged in it, shewed itself an extremely elegant mahogany bookcase, through whose bright glass windows a number of books in ornamental binding smiled upon me; and from the top looked down jestastically a beautiful Minerva's head of bronze.

As an exclamation of astonishment escaped from me, I heard behind me a half-snooring, half-chirping sound, and when I turned myself round, I saw my delighted maid come forth from a window corner, when she could no longer conceal her sympathy with my amazement.

"Her Grace has long thought about this," related she now out of the fullness of her heart; "and the Chamberlain himself has had the bookcase carried up, and then Miss Selma has been here all the morning to arrange the things in order."

A revolution now took place in me. Perhaps I now saw here the aim of every private conversation, of every telegraphic movement, of every secret agreement, which, as I fancied, had been directed against my freedom. And they had reference merely to my well-being and my pleasure! Perhaps it was the thought on this my astonishment, which had made my stepmother to-day in such high spirits. I fancied that I again felt her warm embrace, her breath upon my cheeks. And I? how had I met her? how had I suspected, mistaken, rejected her, and occasioned her tears!

With the speed of lightning I hastened down to my stepmother, and here—

I have a bias of a dangerous kind. If my feelings have become ice cold, and then are suddenly thawed by a ray of sunlight or dew-drop of life, then am I unusually deluged by them as by a spring-flood, and am ready to deluge the whole world with them. Nay, there exists no person whom in such moments I could not press to my heart; and for those who are dear to me I have only one feeling, the feeling of giving them all that I have, myself into the bargain. Seneca and Cicero, and Schlegel and Hegel, and the doctrines of all the wise men of the world on self-government, and quietness and moderation, are in such moments merely like oil upon a waterfall. Certain experiences have, it is true, brought me somewhat to control this rushing flood; but in certain moments nevertheless they will have their way, and the present moment was one of them. Yes, so deeply affected was I by the goodness of my stepmother, and so full of contrition for my own injustice, that—if she now had required that I should confer my hand on the Chamberlain—I should, I think, have done it.* But thanks be to my good stars! she thought not of that; and I could undisturbedly enjoy all the amenities of life which blossomed there, where human souls overflowed in intimacy and love towards each other.

I have silently vowed by Minerva's head, never again to torment with unnecessary suspicion my stepmother and myself. I feel, therefore, a ship's load lighter at heart. I hear Selma joyfully sing. God bless the singing bird! Her song always celebrates the sunny hours of home. She resembles in this the singing birds of Sweden, who (Nilson relates in his Fauna) sing the sweetest after soft summer rain.

The 28th.

Continued rapture on my part over the bookcase, and so on. Increasing pleasure and increasing contentment on the part of my stepmother. Light on the fate of Europe, through my stepmother and me. Active trade with the Lady Councillors of commerce; one betrothal, one marriage, one strikes people dead; in one word, one cares for the success of the world. With all this, secret vexation in my soul. I have not seen the Viking for several days. He ought indeed, at least, to come and announce his betrothal to his friend.

The 29th.

To-day a ramble out. I met the Viking, who was angry, and quarreled because we were out exactly then; and that I, if I also had been at home, and alone, received him not. I was rather proud at this assertion, and assumed a rather frosty deportment, on which Brenner left me tolerably short and cold. Now, now,—

I care for nobody, nobody;
And nobody cares for me!

Thank God! thus can I yet sing, and thus will I ever be able to sing.

I will have no vexation, no unnecessary vexation. I have had enough of that in my life, I have had it from feelings all too warm. I will have these no more. And therefore will I remain cold and calm, as the marble statues which we shall see by wax-light in the sculpture-gallery to-night.

Eleven at night.

But when one sees between the cold marble statues and the pale flames of the waxlights a warmly-beaming human eye which rests with gentle sun-strength upon us—who can prevent the heart becoming warm and soft, prevent the gallery itself from being converted into a temple of the sun. Thus happened it to me, as in the Niobe Gallery, between Roman Emperors and Caryatides I discovered—the Viking. As I met his eye I involuntarily extended my hand, and felt at the same moment his warm, true hand-pressure. O we must still always continue friends! Brenner, however, did not join us. He seemed to have undertaken to protect two ladies, one of whom was young and very pretty. "Perhaps she is his bride," thought I. But I gave up this opinion as again and again I saw his eye between the marble statues directed to me with an expression which quietly did my heart good. The meeting of this glance, the sentiment of a deep sympathy with a warm and noble heart, gave to the ramble through this marble-hall on the arm of the Chamberlain an extraordinary charm. I felt my heart beat with a tall, although calm life, amid these senseless statues; and the perhaps yet less feeling crowd of people, who in elegant dresses filled the galleries, were occupied rather as it seemed to me with the lighting-up, with the handsome dresses, with the Queen and her Court (who also were there), than with the masterpieces of art. But wherefore do I blame that? I myself thought more of the people than of the statues. Lennartson gave his arm to my stepmother, and directed his words and remarks particularly to Selma, who looked lovely, but thoughtful; whilst Flora, on her brother's arm, in a kind of feverish endeavour seemed to wish by her person and her sallies to occupy all those around her. St. Orme, Baron Alexander, and a couple of other gentlemen followed her amid applause and admiration. She was very well dressed and exceedingly lovely.

In the so-called Sergel's room my attention was drawn to three different models for the artist's group of Cupid and Psyche, because we saw so plainly in the works of a mind which clearly understood itself and possessed itself of the life which he would express. In the first model the statues are ill-shaped, coarse, unpliant, soul-less, Egyptian-mummy-like; they lock themselves together in a block-like oneness. In the next they have already life and motion; but are yet without harmony, without beauty and higher unity. These they obtain first in their third formation, when the artist has won the victory, and the splendid figures express the combat of human passions, softened by divine grandeur and beauty. Methought I saw in these forms the whole development, as in humanity so in man, and glad in these thoughts I turned myself round with the necessity of communicating them to some one, who could or would understand me. I saw now in my neighbourhood only Flora, who with an expression of impatience and also of bitterness listened to St. Orme, who spoke to her in a low voice. As my eye met that of Flora, she said, suddenly breaking off, and in a joking tone, "What revelation has Sophia had now? Her eye glows as if she had discovered a new world."

"Merely a thought," replied I, "is become clear to me here." And, carried away by my feelings, I showed to her the three model-groups, told her what they had led me to think upon the development and perfecting of life, on the patience and strength of the true artist, which never rests till it has approached its goal, nor till it sees that its work is good.

St. Orme smiled sarcastically at my enthusiasm, but Flora listened to me attentively. Afterwards she said, "Sergel was fortunate; he was not hindered like many others in his development, was not hindered in working out his own perfection by"—she checked herself, and I continued inquiringly "by?"

"By the want of a great object," continued Flora, with a strong emphasis and with a bitter expression of countenance.

But, nevertheless, I saw this with joy, for I recognised the thoughts and the expression which at times flashed forth in Flora, and made me conscious of the existence of a higher spirit in her enigmatical being.

St. Orme yawned aloud, and began a depreciating criticism of the last group, which was meant to show the folly of my admiration, the imperfection of the artist, and the superiority of his own acuteness.

To me this criticism betrayed merely St. Orme's want of a noble mind. I felt myself also wounded by his scarcely courteous manner towards me; but I am so afraid in such cases of letting myself down by repayment in like coin, or in permitting myself to be mastered by a little desire of revenge, that I listened to St. Orme in silence, without giving any sign of the displeasure which I felt. Yet I was glad to be liberated from it by the Viking, who having disposed of his ladies (God knows how), now came hastily to me in order to call my attention to the group of Oxenstierna and History, and also to the remarkably noble and powerful countenance of the great statesman. In the joyous frank expression of Brenner, I perceived a feeling of fresh sea-air which often comes over me from this spirit. For the rest, he complained that he was wearied, that he had no taste for cold, lifeless figures.

It was nevertheless determined, that this evening the lifeless figures should reveal to me many depths of the living ones.

We were advancing to the marble gallery of Logard where Odin stands so commandingly, Endymion slumbers so sweetly, Venus jests with Love, Apollo plays upon the lyre, and all the Muses stand around him.

There the royal secretary, Von Krusenberg, joined us, who bowing ceremoniously before gods and men, thus made himself perceived by us,—

"It is certain that here one can say that one is in good company. One feels oneself really exalted by it."

"Yes," interposed Baron Alexander, "here one escapes at least the elbow-thrusts of the people; of the common herd which fills the streets and alleys."

Such expressions I cannot bear, and cannot hear them in silence. I replied therefore not quite courteously,—

"I believe certainly, that among the so-called 'people,' one meets with honest and better individuals than among the heathen divinities. There is a deal of the 'herd' upon high Olympus."

As a church-weathercock might look down upon the paving-stones, so looked down the great Alexander on me, and St. Orme said sarcastically,—

"Thus it may appear to those who do not enter into the spirit of antiquity, and do not understand how to grasp its works with an enlightened and unprejudiced eye. The Catechism is of no use here as a scale of judgment. The beautiful and the sublime must be measured by another standard."

"I think so too," said Flora. "The Grecian ideal ought not to be dragged down to the circles of our every-day virtues."

I felt that I crimsoned, for I found that I did not stand upon quite good ground against my adversary. I looked at Selma and she looked at Lennartson, and his calm glance rested upon me, with an expression which animated and strengthened me. And I was intending to reply in order to make my meaning more clear, when St. Orme continued,

"I, for my part, know not what more deserves our homage than the divine gifts of BEAUTY, GENIUS, STRENGTH! I know really nothing which can make themselves of value near them. The small, nameless, modest beings that swarm on the earth cannot do it. No! therefore I beg to hold with the gods, or more particularly with the goddesses. With them one is always at home in a temple of beauty."

"Cultivation of Genius!" said Lennartson, smiling, "and many think that this is very sublime and genteel. But more sublime and more genteel is the cultivation which looks indifferently away from accidental, showy gifts, and inquires after merely the essential in man, the goodness and earnestness of the will; which beholds in each man an elect genius, an heir of another divine home, a living thought of God, which ennobles him for the citizenship of an eternal kingdom, and conducts him there. One may do justice to the heathen point of view, yet with all propriety find its inferiority to the very highest, that is, to Christianity."

This was evidently said to extricate me out of my dilemma, and it seemed to me as if the heathen divinities suddenly grew pale, or evaporated into ghostlike figures, and the great Alexander shrivelled up into a dwarf; von Krusen-berg crept behind Odin, while Selma and I looked up with delight to Lennartson. St. Orme and Baron Alexander consoled themselves by communicating to each other their paltry thoughts on people who could make so much ado about an insignificant occurrence among insignificant beings, and would ascribe a world-historical signification to an event which had happened here two thousand years ago. "How foolish!"

I listened to the two gentlemen, and wondered that great learning could be so completely united to great poverty of mind.

The truth is, that I have found among simple youths and maidens, more deep feeling for the deep in life, than among a certain kind of the learned.

Some time after this, we stood in the middle of the gallery, before a marble group, Cupid and Psyche. One sees Cupid about to leave Psyche in anger, who kneels and prays for forgiveness.

"How could one, like Cupid here, be so immoveable to a beautiful suppliant like Psyche?" we heard von Krusen-berg say.

"Yes," said Flora, while her eye sought that of Lennartson, "is it possible to repulse her, who loves so, and prays so, even if—she be culpable?"

"He must be a downright barbarian!" exclaimed von Krusen-berg.

"I think," said Lennartson, rather coldly, "that there are actions, which one cannot, and ought not to forgive."

"Not even to a beloved one," whispered Flora, with a voice almost imperceptibly tremulous, "not even a bride—a wife?"

"Least of all her," said Lennartson mildly, but with emphasis; and with a serious penetrating look on Flora.

Shortly afterwards some one seized my arm astily, and whispered, "Come with me! I am ill!"

It was Flora; she was pale as death. But the very moment when I was about to go with her (Felix was with Selma, and did not see us), in the same moment Lennartson stood by her side, and led her out of the crowd.

"A little fresh air! I faint!" stammered Flora. Lennartson opened the doors towards the Loggards terrace, and we soon saw the starry heavens above our heads, and the wind of the winter-night blew cold on our cheeks.

Lennartson ordered one of the velvet-covered benches to be brought out for Flora, gave her a glass of water to drink, and shewed her the tenderest care. I removed a few steps. The scene and the time were solemn. We stood, as it were, in the heart of the castle, whose high and gloomy walls surrounded us on three sides; the fourth opened to us the beautiful prospect over the harbour, with its wreath of mountains and inhabited islands, wholly concealed in the nocturnal twilight, lit only by the stars of heaven and the flickering lights of earth. The lights of the gallery threw broad stripes of light between the clipped trees upon the high terrace where we stood, and which were broken by the shadows of the tree-stems. I saw all this, while my ear involuntarily caught the words which were exchanged between two human beings, who seemed in this moment to approach the crisis of their strange connexion, the separating point in their lives.

I heard Lennartson ask something with a soft, almost loving voice, and Flora replied,

"Better—better now! O Lennartson, because thou now lookest bright and gentle, like the heavens above us, and not like the cold marble images within."

Lennartson was silent. Flora continued, with greater emotion, "Lennartson, thou art really as stern, as severe as he, as immovable as thy words sound now. Ah, my God! tell me, how am I to understand thee?"

"Flora," said Lennartson, also deeply affected, "I it is who might have asked thee this question for some time; I it is who wish to understand thee. If thou lovest me—"

"More than everything—more than life," interrupted Flora vehemently.

"Good then!" continued Lennartson, taking both her hands into his, and bending himself over them, "if it be so, then—be open, be candid towards me. Explain to me—"

"Ah! all, all, whatever thou wilt, Lennartson. But at a more suitable time. Here it is—so cold."

"Cold!" exclaimed Lennartson, "that is only an excuse. Be at least, for this once, candid, Flora. Thy hands burn. Thou feelest now no cold."

"No! my heart is warm, warm for thee, Thorsten. And therefore have patience with me. I love thee so strongly, so childishly;—yes, I am therefore afraid of thee, Lennartson; afraid of seeing thee grave and stern. Oh, if I only knew that thou rightly lovedst me, then I should not long be incomprehensible to thee! Oh say, canst thou not love me so, at least, not for my love's sake?"

Methought that loving tone of Flora's was answered. I saw Lennartson bend himself lower before her, heard—the doors of the gallery again open, and saw my stepmother, together with her party, come out, seeking uneasily for us.

On the arm of Lennartson, Flora again entered the illuminated gallery.

Had Flora now obtained a certainty from the heart of Lennartson, which she had not before; had words been spoken which my ear had not perceived, but which had loosened the bond by which Flora had been held captive? This is certain, that a bright joy seemed to have elevated her whole being. Never was she more captivating, nor had Lennartson been more captivated by her charms. Selma looked gently but pale on them both, while St. Orme regarded either with a subtly-searching glance. This glance made me suspect that Flora's romance is still yet far from its termination, and that a new revolution may soon take place.

The 1st of February.

The revolution in Flora has taken place, and all is as dark as ever.

This forenoon I heard outside before my chamber various strange sounds, as of persons violently quarreling. I went out to see what it might be; the little passage between Flora's room and mine was empty, but the door of Flora's outer room was half open, and through this I saw, to my astonishment, Flora endeavouring to release her hands from St. Orme, who held them forcibly. Both looked up to the window by which they stood.

"Ah! let me go!" besought Flora, warmly. "Let me liberate it! It will be soon too late! See, the ugly spider has caught it already!"

"Why must it fly into the web?" said St. Orme, with his cold scorn. "Let it be. It will be interesting to see if it can liberate itself, whether it can escape. If not, then,—laissez faire la fatalité."

"Ah! it is already his prey! The poor wretch! Adrian, let me go!" (She stamped with her foot.) "You are a cruel, horrible man!"

"Because I will not mourn about a fly! The little fool, she has created her fate herself, and who knows whether after all she is so very unfortunate! And the spider! Who knows whether he be so cruel! He merely embraces the little fly."

At this moment a pair of fire-tongs was suddenly raised, which tore the spider's web, and separated the spider and the fly. This catastrophe was occasioned by me; I had, armed with the first best weapon which chance offered me, approached the combatants. At sight of me St. Orme released Flora and exclaimed,

"See, there comes truly, as if from heaven, a saving angel! Pity is it only, that the noble deed comes too late."

And it was too late. The fly fell dead upon the window frame.

"But," continued St. Orme, "Sophia can very well write an elegy or moral observations, and thus it may be always a means of edification, and—"

Flora sprang with her hands before her face suddenly into the inner room. I followed her, and St. Orme went away, whistling an opera air upon the steps.

Flora gave herself up to such an outbreak of violence as I had never seen before. She tore her hair, cried, and threw herself with convulsive sighs and tears on the floor. I stood amazed and silent, and looked at her. Where now was the beautiful Flora? It was a fury that I saw before me. I offered her a glass of water; she emptied it hastily, and then became by degrees somewhat calmer.

"Dearest Flora," said I at length, "why this? How can the fate of a fly thus—"

"Fly!" exclaimed Flora; "do you think that I trouble myself about this? No, I mourn over myself. I, Sophia, I am this unfortunate fly. I shall be a pray of this—and he knows it, the horrible wretch, he enjoys it; he amuses himself in seeing this image of my fate, of my anguish—the cruel one, the detestable one, who—"

"But how? but why?" asked I, interrupting the torrent of names which Flora gave to St. Orme.

"Inquire not!" replied she, impatiently. "I cannot say, and it would serve to no purpose. Ah! why are there not in our country those protecting institutions which Catholic countries are possessed of, where a person can escape from the world, from himself, and from others; nay, can be saved even from humiliation—where even the fallen woman, sustained by the Cross, can erect herself, and under the protection of heaven, can stand there purified and ennobled before the eyes of the world!"

And Flora was again beautiful, as she raised herself up and turned her glistening tearful eyes towards heaven. But this exaltation lasted but for a moment. Then continued she with renewed bitterness,

"And if he pursue me I will become Catholic; nay, I will become a Turk or a Fantee woman. I would adore the Virgin Mary, or Mohammed, or the Great Mogul, or the devil himself, or whatever it might be, if it would only free me from this man."

"Your call for a convent-life," said I smiling, "does not appear to me to be of the right kind. But, Flora, I imagined that you had given yourself up to a good and strong spirit, that you belonged to Thorsten Lennartson."

"Belonged? yes, with my whole soul, with my whole heart, but—"

"Why do you not turn yourself to him with open heart, with full confession? He would free you."

"So you talk! Ah, you know not—Yes, if he loved me as I love him! But—ah, if I knew, if I rightly knew! Why are there no longer oracles, no sibyls, no witches or prophetesses, in the world, to whom one might go in one's need, and from whom one could demand counsel, a hint, a glance into the future? But all that which is pleasant is dead now. How unbearable and flat and insipid is the world now, with its regularity, with its rationality. It disgusts me. I am disgusted with myself. Every thing is nauseous and unbearable to me. Do not stand and look at me, Sophia! Leave me! I will not be a spectacle for you. I know that you hate me, but now I am indeed unfortunate enough. Let me, at least, be alone!"

"Not now. Let me rule over you a little while, Flora! You will then better understand my hatred. I am just going out. Attend me, and let me conduct you. The snow without will fall coolingly upon your hot brow."

I approached her, and began to arrange her hair.

"Do with me what you will!" said she, and remained passive. I helped her to put on her winter dress, and silently we went together out into the free air.

It snowed and blew. We went towards the lowest quay down to the river, on the way to the North Bridge. Flora looked at the foaming waves.

"How it foams! how it struggles!" said she, "see, see how the sea-waves now endeavour to heave themselves, and now are subjected from the other side, and are obliged to sink in their exasperation, because the Mälar-stream proudly rushes over them. The poor waves! I should like to know whether they feel what it is so exactly to sink beneath oneself, to wrestle and to struggle, without hope of ever concurring."

"In a few days," said I, "the Mälar water will perhaps have lost its power, and the combatting streams will have come into equipoise."

"Sometimes," said Flora, "it also happens that the angry waves obtain the upper hand, and rush over the others, and exasperate them. There is a retaliation."

We were again silent. I led Flora over the bridge and through the streets into the city. There are the oldest memories of Stockholm; here is the heart of the Stockholm city, which also has the form of a heart; here flowed the blood of the nobles of Sweden in streams from the hand of Christiern; here the streets are narrow, the lanes dark; but here also is the Castle of Stockholm; and here lift themselves even now, a mass of houses, which show by their inscriptions cut in stone, the strong fear of God which built up in ancient times the realm of Sweden.

We went into a dark doorway, ornamented with statuary work, of one of their houses, which had stood for centuries, and over the doorway of which was inscribed a verse from the Psalms of David in old Swedish.

Flora was undecided: "Whither do you conduct me?" asked she hesitating.

"To a witch," replied I.

"Are there yet witches in Sweden?" said Flora, following me. "But," continued she, somewhat disparagingly, "I have no confidence in the witches of our day, with their card and coffee-cup wisdom."

After we had mounted several steps, I opened a door, and we entered a room where a young girl sat and sewed. I prayed Flora to wait for me here, and went into another chamber, the door of which was shut.

After some time I returned to Flora, and led her in with me.

I saw an expression of astonishment and curiosity depict itself in her countenance, as her eyes riveted themselves upon the figure which, clad in a flowing black silk robe, sat in a large chair by the only window of the room, the lower part of which was shaded by a green curtain. The daylight streamed from the upper half of the window brightly down upon a countenance which was less consumed by age than by suffering, and whose strong and not handsome features stifled the idea that it had ever possessed charms, or that looks of love could ever have rested upon it. Yet this countenance was not without sun. It had a pair of eyes whose glance was not common. It was restless, and as it were vacillating towards indifferent things and objects. But if it were animated by a feeling or by a thought—and that often was the case—then it had beams that could warm, strength which could penetrate; for there lay in it great and deep earnestness. The hair, still beautiful, and of a dark brown, was drawn off the large brow. A plain snow-white lace-cap surrounded the pale, grave countenance. The unknown held the left hand of an almost transparent delicacy, against her breast, in the other she had a pencil, with which she appeared to have been making observations in the margin of a large Bible.

The furniture of the room was so simple that it might have belonged to poverty, but all bore the stamp of neatness and comfort, which does not unite itself with poverty. A vase of fresh flowers stood upon the table, upon which lay books and manuscripts. Every thing in the room was simple and ordinary; the large wonderful eyes alone which beamed there, awoke a feeling that this was the dwelling of a powerful life.

Flora seemed to receive an impression of this, as we neared the unknown, who greeted us with great friendliness, as she said, excusing herself, "permit me that I remain seated!"

She invited us with the hand to seat ourselves upon the two cane chairs which stood near the table, and gave to us, smiling, a sprig of geranium from the flower-vase on the table.

Her earnest eyes riveted themselves upon Flora, who cast down hers, and appeared to struggle for the power to raise them again. I withdrew presently from that part of the room, and left the two together.

I heard the unknown say with a gentle, grave voice; "So young, so beautiful, and yet—not happy!"

Flora was silent a moment, and seemed to struggle with herself. At length she said:

"No! not happy, but—who can tell me how I may become so? Knew I any one who could tell me that, I would go to him through deserts and midnight; but oracles have vanished from the world."

"Not vanished, but only changed their abode," said the unknown, calmly.

"Changed their abode? To where?"

"From the ancient temples, from the deserts, have they removed into the most holy sanctuary of life, into the human soul."

"And thither," continued Flora, sarcastically, "it is more difficult to come than to Delphi and Dodona. And what would now this new-fashioned oracle reply to my question? How shall I become happy?"

"Follow the inward voice!"

"A true oracular answer, that is to say, an answer that says nothing at all. I at least know nothing of one inward voice, but of ten, at least, which one after the other speak in me."

"One must not believe all voices, one must question and deeply listen till one hears the right voice."

"There are in the soul," said the unknown, in a friendly, smiling, insinuating manner, "quiet groves, silent grottoes, and temples—thither must we go. There speaks our genius." The unknown seemed to enjoy the pictures which she called forth.

It seemed to me as if a certain coolness had overflowed Flora's passionate soul at these words. With a sigh and a tearful eye she said,—

"Oh! he who flees to this still region and there finds rest, must yet flee from the world and from himself!"

"He should not flee, he should only collect himself, collect himself in stillness, but for a great object in life."

Flora's thoughts before the sculpture of Sergel seemed to return to her; her look was animated.

"Ah!" said she, "I have sometimes imagined and thought, but—it is now too late. The unrooted flower can no longer keep itself firm, it must be driven by wave and wind."

"It is never too late," said the unknown, emphatically. "But it may often be difficult enough. Ah! I know it well, this flower without a root, this want of foundation and soil, which is commonly the fruit of a false education. No way is more difficult than the way to collect oneself out of dissipation and to become oneself, but still it may be found, and we may walk in it."

At this moment a sunbeam broke through the window, and streamed softly trembling through the flowers of the vase upon the pages of the holy book. The eye of the unknown followed the path of light and shone with great delight as she spoke in broken sentences—

"Not it is never too late to tread the bright paths which unite heaven and the earth and mankind to each other in noble endeavours. They open themselves in our days richer than ever, and in all directions—in all spheres of life—and the eyes of men become more and more opened, and love refuses not his guiding hand! Courage only and a resolute will, and the apparently unrooted plant will take root firmly, and will bloom forth beautifully in the light of the Eternal!"

Flora followed not. As the spirit of the unknown thus raised itself towards the light, Flora's spirit seemed to sink and to look down into the darker depth.

"And after all," said she gloomily, "everything is yet vanity. Every human life has its snake, against which no power can combat. Sooner or later a time comes to every one in which all pleasure is at an end, in which one is subjected to pain, to old age, to death! Is there no power, no bliss, which this can withstand?"

"Yes! let a dying one assure you of this. See! on! I go now with rapid speed towards my change, and great are my sufferings; yet I am to happy that day and night I must sing praises. Many a charming draught has life extended to me; much that was bitter has been changed into sweet, but yet the best wine has been preserved for me till the last."

"The lots here in the world are thrown differently for mankind," said Flora, not without bitterness; "some seem made for misfortune, others again have, like you, sunshine from the cradle to the grave. And for these it must be easy to be good."

"You would perhaps think differently, if you knew me rightly," said the unknown softly; "and a glance into my breast would allow you to judge whether I have always had a sun-brightened life, as you imagine—and yet you would only see an image of affliction which no human eye has seen, and which I myself have almost forgotten. The bitter waves have long ceased to roar, but they have left traces behind them." She opened the black dress, removed a white cloth, and showed us—a horrible sight! The bloody picture was soon concealed again.

"Pardon me!" said the unknown to Flora, who with a cry of horror had covered her eyes, "and now fear not! I feel that suffering comes. I shall not be able to keep back all complaint. Be not terrified. It will soon be over."

At that moment she seized convulsively a roll of papers, the whole body trembled, and the hue of death overspread her face, which with a dull cry of pain sunk upon her breast. This continued probably for ten minutes, then the hyæna of pain seemed to release the sufferer from his claws, but she evidently had not fully recovered her mind, and her soul seemed to wander in far regions, whilst her lips spoke broken words, like to those which Asaria sung in the fiery furnace.

By degrees the exalted expression passed from her countenance. A slumber, as it were, came over it. Then the unknown opened her eyes; they were clear and full of consciousness. She took up a little mirror which lay on the table and contemplated herself in it.

"It is over!" said she, as if to herself, and smiled with a thankful look towards heaven. Now for the first time she seemed to remember that she was not alone.

"It is now over," as she turned her again-feeble glance to Flora and me, "forgive me! Yet I know certainly that you do so. Compassionate me not! I am happy, unspeakably happy!"

I arose in order to end our visit.

"Permit me to come again," prayed Flora with tearful eyes, as she took her leave.

"Willingly," replied the unknown, directed to us a dimmed but friendly look, and extended to us her hand affectionately.

We went.

"Who is she?" asked Flora on the steps.

"She will be unknown," replied I, and we were both silent till we reached home.

As I went down to dinner I heard my young sister (who knew nothing of the forenoon's revolution in Flora) thus giving orders in the drawing-room.

"Trala, la, la! Jacob, do not forget, immediately after dinner, to go to the old coachman with this cake and bottle of wine. And in coming back do not forget to bring the rennets with you, of which my mother is so fond. And you, Ulla, remember at last that you have Miss Flora's dress ready this evening. You must be prodigiously industrious. La, lalali, la, la, la! And to-morrow you shall make yourselves merry. Then I shall let you go to the opera to see the 'May-day.' There you shall be merry to some purpose. Jacob shall be Ulla's and Karin's protector. Tralalili, lalili, la, la, la."

Thus went on for a while the harmonious commands, and gave me again a little proof that it is the endeavour of my Selma in the world to make every one around her happy. But endless is not the right word. When goodness approaches its consummation it has an inward harmony, an ennobled nature, whose movements are as involuntarily beautiful as the movements of Taglioni in the Sylphide. She makes the most difficult thing easy, and gives a charm to the meanest exterior of life.

Flora, during dinner, was thoughtful and gloomy. In the afternoon Lennartson came, and had a long conversation with her. He seemed earnestly and fervently to beseech something from her. She wept. At length I heard her say with vehemence,

"Not now, not now, Lennartson. Have patience with me still, for a little time, and I will tell you all; and then you will see that you are the only one in the world whom I love."

Lennartson now arose with a strong expression of discontent. He appeared impatient, and came into the other ante-room, in which Selma and I sat. The sun shone through the crystal of the chandelier, and hundreds of little prismatic flames trembled on the walls, and on the pictures with which these were covered. Selma remarked the beauty of the colours, and the impression which their beauty made upon the mind.

"Yes!" said Lennartson, aloud, as he fixed his eyes upon her, "light, purity is beautiful, as in colour, so also in the human mind. I cannot comprehend how people love darkness, how people can be willing to linger in it; they must, in that case, have something to conceal, or—suspiciously dread the light."

Flora had approached, but remained standing at the door, on whose frame she leaned, whilst she held her hand pressed upon her breast, and riveted a glance of bitter pain on the speaker.

Selma saw this, and tears came into her lovely eyes. She said to Lennartson, with animation, and almost reproach, "Clouds often conceal the sun from us, and yet it is still bright. If we could only raise ourselves above the clouds we should see it."

Lennartson looked at Selma with an inquiring glance, which by degrees melted away in mildness.

"Yes, you are right," said he, slowly; "there may be faults in those who complain."

He went again to Flora, seized her hand, bowed himself over it, and said some words to her which I did not hear, but whose effect I remarked in Flora's grateful look. Lennartson soon after this left us.

The 2d of February.

Flora is calmer, and all quiet in the house. I begin to be satisfied with the polemical connexion between me and my stepmother. But shall we ever attain to the ideal of a noble contention, which the German professors, Feuerbach and Grollmann, have shewed to the world? These two remarkable men were the warmest friends, and, in the early part of their lives, were of the same way of thinking. Afterwards they separated in their scientific views, but without thereby allowing their personal esteem and friendship to be disturbed. They invariably dedicated to each other their works, in which they invariably sought the one to convert the other. Thus they argued in love, and by the production of excellent works, to the end of their lives. Over such contentions must angels indeed rejoice.

5th February.

My acquaintance with the Viking begins to be somewhat stormy. But I console myself with the thought that 'the storm belongs to God's weather,* and may be governed by His spirit.

We were invited yesterday to a breakfast at the Chamberlain's. Without flattering myself, and without great self-love, I could very well understand the correctness of my stepmother's diplomatic hint, namely, that the breakfast was given on my account. The host did me les honneurs of his handsome house; his splendid furniture, his Athenienne, with a thousand little sumptuousnesses; his many arrangements, for convenience, and for the pleasant enjoyment of life; nay, I must even see his own expensive toilet. Whilst I thus wandered with him through his rooms, I in vain sought for a picture of actual value, or an object of higher interest; I found nothing of the kind, and I could not say much about the rest of the ornaments.

Wilhelm Brenner's eye was often watchfully directed upon me, whilst I was receiving so much of the host's attention. He on the contrary was taken up with a very pretty Mrs. Z.—the same with whom I had seen him at the gallery—a widow, and rich. "Z," says a writing copy, "is in the Swedish language a superfluous letter;" and so methought was Mrs. Z. at this breakfast. By the abstracted looks of the Viking, I might have presumed that he thought so too; but for all that he remained near her, and amused himself by observing me from a distance. This rather vexed me; and thus for that reason I entertained myself more than common with the wit of my courteous uncle, said merry things myself, and contributed in my own way to entertain the company, for which I receive much applause, especially from my stepmother. Towards two o'clock people separated, and went home. As the weather was fine we walked. I saw Mrs. Z. go away on the arm of the Viking. The Chamberlain accompanied us, together with other gentlemen.

Scarcely were we come to the Castle Hill, when the Viking, under full sails from the side of the Bridge of Boats, joined himself to us. He was quite warm, and wiped his forehead. I had the Chamberlain on my left; Brenner took the right, and heard how I was making love—ridiculous! But what he had not heard was the occasion for my satirical sally, namely, the sighs and the little song of my uncle's love and the warmth of his heart! all which cooled me indescribably, because I knew the ground and the intention of it.

"I think," said I, "that never was so much said about love, and so little known about it as in our days. Those who talk publicly the loudest about Christian love, rend one another most bitterly; and as concerns the love which men vow to women, these are only springs of a very doubtful value. How many tender flames—those which are more smoke than flame—burst forth because one has ennui, because one wants to amuse oneself in some way? Is it not thus in glowing Italy, as you yourself have told me? Do not people form connexions there on purpose to drive away time? and merely continue them, because one has no spirit to undertake something else? and so one drags lamentably through life with sighs and lemonade. Here, in our North, we seek really a little more substantial nourishment for love, seek the good things which open a prospect to comfortable life, dinners and good suppers, and so on. Yet the foundation is still no better, and love is even as—needy."

"Have you then never met with, or seen 'REAL LOVE' in the world?" asked the Viking, with a tone of displeasure, and as it were of compassion for me.

"To be sure," continued I, in the same tone, "to be sure I have seen men feel actual love, nay, actually also become quite thin from it. I have heard them declare, when they met with hard hearts, that their life was gnawed by worms, and that people would soon have to weep over their death. Yes, I believe too, that this at one time they themselves also believed; but this is certain, nevertheless, that in one or two years afterwards I have seen these men marry others than those for whose sake they would die, and that too, stout of body and full of joy. In one word, I have seen enough of life and of the world, to have but little confidence in this so much spoken of, and in romances so much bepraised love, and to wish to have as little as possible to do with it. It is not worth one of the sighs which it costs."

"Femme philosophe!" exclaimed the Chamberlain. "You reason perfectly justly as regards this passion. I value the passions very little. Esteem, delicacy, mutual condescension, lay as good a foundation for a much more enduring happiness than—"

We were at this moment just about to cross the North Bridge. Flora just then remembered that she wanted to buy something at Medberg's, my stepmother and Selma had the same thoughts; but I, who had no such views, and wished to get home, said that I would continue my way alone, and wait for the party at home. I earnestly declined the offers of my uncle to accompany me, and as the rest of the party took their way towards the Myn-market, I pursued my way over the bridge.

But scarcely had I gone twenty paces when I saw the Viking at my side, and discovered, I know not how, that my arm rested in his. He hastened onwards with such prodigious strides, that I had trouble to keep up with him.

He turned round at a right angle, just where the bridge extends itself to the right, and remained standing in that corner where the river rages below, and the poplars of the river-parterre ascend upwards to the granite balustrades of the bridge. Then he dropped my arm, and turning towards me with a confidential air, said with a warm but suppressed voice,—

"Tell me! Is all that which you have just now said, this cursed gallemathias of love, your really earnest thought?"

"My really earnest thought," repeated I.

"That I will not believe," continued he warmly, "or I pity you from my whole heart! Good heavens! how can you thus despise the highest and holiest in life! When I hear such talk it makes me abusive. How can people be so contracted, nay I must say, so stupid; and see things in such an oblique, such a false, such a fundamentally false light! I can become angry when I hear how a woman, created to love and to be loved, so mistakes herself, and lets herself be so bewildered by the little poverities of life, that she can exchange them for that of which thought has no idea, and the tongue no word, and which exists as certainly upon the earth as it exists in heaven, and which is the only feeling by which we can comprehend the life of heaven; the only feeling which gives value to life. People talk about science and philosophy as instructors of the heart and of life! That is altogether nonsense say I, compared with the ennobling of a noble love!"

"This is an especially well-chosen place for a little à l'été, and to preach a sermon on love!" thought I, smiling in my own mind, as I observed the vehement mien of the Viking, and the mass of walking and driving people who were in motion around us, and of whom the Viking, in his angry mood, seemed to take no notice. I was also somewhat confounded by his behaviour towards me, but I looked at the raging waters below me, and at the raging spirit before me, and I know not what fresh breath of air passed over my soul. I was yet silent, when Brenner continued as before—

"And this miserable glass-cupboard reason! It makes people from fear of life, shut themselves in a birdcage; from fear of fresh air, steam themselves to death in the warmth of the stove; and from fear of strong feelings and great sufferings, waste their souls and their time in mere trifles. Tell me, how can you endure such reason? It is just as false as it is miserable. It is good for nothing, say I!" and the Viking struck with his clenched fist so violently upon the balustrade, that it would have trembled if it had not been of stone.

As I still stood there like Lot's wife, changed by a shower of fire into a pillar of salt, and was seized upon by a strange feeling, he continued with increasing violence, "Tell me! I will know, what, or who is it that has let you get hold of such a mistrusting of life, of mankind; nay, even of our Lord himself. If it be your blessed philosophy, then—throw it into the river!"

Brenner, by the violent action which he was here making with his arms, struck my reticule, which rested on the balustrade; it fell into the river, and was borne by its waves rapidly forward into the sea.

This catastrophe, and the sight of the Viking's astonishment, dissolved at once my immovable state into a hearty laugh, and as Brenner seemed ready to take the speediest measures for saving the reticule, I held him back, and said—

"Trouble not yourself about it. There are only a few rennets that suffer shipwreck in it. I care nothing about it. Only let your angry temper go with it to the sea, for in truth you do me injustice."

"Do I do you an injustice—thank God for it!" said Brenner, with a look which deeply affected me, and I continued—

"Yes, because, although that which I said just now, and which has made you so angry, is actually my serious opinion, yet I have my reservation as to my object. I distinguish between Amor and Eros, but I have seen more of the first than of the last in life, and I spoke properly of that."

"But you believe in the other?"

"That I do. That I will say; I believe in general in the truth and depth of the feelings of which you speak; but in individual cases I am, in consequence of certain experience, always mistrustful. In the mean time, I thank you right openly for the proof of friendship which you have given to me. Ah! let me think about love as I will; I believe in friendship, and I feel that we are friends."

And herewith I took his arm, and began to proceed homewards. The Viking said—

"Love, friendship! should these be thus separated? And how can anybody doubt the one who believes in the other?"

It did not please me to answer this question, and our conversation was here interrupted by our being overtaken by our party who had been left behind. They looked somewhat amazed, and said various things of our 'speedy return home.' The Viking declared—

"Miss Sophia lost her bag or reticule in the river."

But how it was lost, he said not; and they began to propose means for recovering it, and the Viking, again in cheerful humour, made various break-neck and impossible proposals.

The 3d.

A far handsomer reticule, encircled with a bouquet of roses and myrtle, was sent to me from him in the name of the lost one, which, as he said, had been fished out of the river in this form. The 'river spirit' wished in these flowers to speak to you of his love, said the Viking, and he wondered what kind of an answer he would receive.

I said, "Merely great thanks!"

"And if he be not satisfied with that?" asked Brenner.

"Then, his flowers should be—sent back to him," said I, half jesting and half seriously.

"You would not throw them in the river?" said the Viking, quite gravely—"you are then not afraid of wounding, of doing wrong? You can be stern, unsparing."

"You forget," said I, interrupting him, "that the 'river spirit' and his feelings are fictions, and I am no longer of the age in which one believes in such things; neither can I see, dearest Brenner, why a pretty little joke should be taken so seriously, which in itself is very polite, and for which I thank you sincerely."

The Viking was silent, but looked dissatisfied; I began to fear that the man has a very bad temper.

The 7th.

And a great many faults he has found in me to-day; he has reproached me for my self-will, or, as he called it, my 'Finnish-temper.' I told him that this was precisely my best quality, and as he shook his head, I related to him that I was descended from a race of the Wasastjernar, who had given to the world the most beautiful example of the Finnish national temper. Thus, namely, when the Russians in the year 1809, conquered Finland, there lived in the city of Wasa, two brothers, one the judge of the court of justice, the other a merchant, who, when the residents of the city were compelled to swear an oath of fidelity to the Emperor of the Russias, alone and steadfastly refused it.

"We have sworn an oath of fidelity to the King of Sweden, and unless he himself released us from it, we cannot swear obedience to another ruler," remained their constant answer to all persuasions, as well friendly as threatening. Provoked by this obstinacy, and fearing the example which would be given by it, the Russians threw the stiff-necked brothers into prison and threatened them with death. Their answer remained always the same, to the increasing severity and multiplied threats of the Russians. At length the sentence of death was announced to them, as well as that, on a fixed day, they were to be conducted out to the Gallows-hill, and there be executed as criminals, in case their obstinacy did not give way and they took the required oath. The brothers were immovable. "Rather," replied the judge, in the name of both, "will we die, than become perjured."

"At this answer a powerful hand struck the speaker on the shoulder. It was the Cossack who kept watch over the brothers, and now exclaimed with a kindling glance, 'Dobra kamed' ('bravo comrade!')

"The Russian authorities spoke otherwise, and on the appointed day permitted the brothers to be carried out to the place of execution. They were sentenced to be hanged; but yet once more at this last hour, and for the last time, pardon was offered them if they would but consent to that which was required from them.

"No!" replied they, 'hang, hang! We are brought hither not for speech-making, but to be hanged.'

"This steadfastness softened the hearts of the Russians. Admiration took place of severity, and they rewarded the fidelity and courage of the brothers with magnanimity. They presented them not merely with life, but sent them free and safely over to Sweden, to the people and to the King to whom they had been true to the death. The King of Sweden elevated them to the rank of nobles, and after this they lived greatly esteemed in the capital of Sweder to a great age."

This relation gave pleasure to Brenner. He promised with a beaming and tearful eye no more to reproach me with my 'Finnish mind.'

The 9th.

Something astonishing on the side of my stepmother and on my side, but not in the way in which my stepmother expected. For it really was no surprise to me that my stepmother conducted me with a mysterious air into her boudoir, and announced herself as 'Envoyé extraordinaire,' as 'ministre plénipotentiaire,' on the side of my uncle the Chamberlain, in order to treat with me of an alliance between him and me. But it was unexpected by me, that my stepmother said not a word to persuade me to consent to it. On the contrary, she said sundry beautiful, and to me, particularly agreeable things, on the danger of bringing about or persuading to such things. She wished merely my happiness; I myself must choose that which would lead to it. On one side, I certainly should feel myself happy with a husband like the Chamberlain, and in the 'dead,' in which a marriage with him would place me; but on the other side, it also was certain, that as an unmarried person I should also find myself very well off. Her house should always be mine, and she would be happy to see me there, and so on. "She had not now undertaken to woo for the Chamberlain, but merely to hear whether he might announce himself as a hopeful lover."

This circumspicion of hers pleased me much, because I can thus ward off his attentions, and need not say a word to him, which is contrary to my nature, that little vexatious word, 'No!'

In the mean time he has been good to me, has showed me kindness and confidence—it grieves me not to be able to do him a pleasure—nay, perhaps, to be compelled to distress him. How poor is man here upon the earth! I feel myself quite melancholy and humble.

The 16th.

And thou, honest Wilhelm Brenner, shalt not hear from me that word of refusal. I understand now thy intentions well; but thou shalt not speak out that aloud which I cannot answer according to thy wishes; shalt not stretch forth thy true hand to see it rejected.—I value you too highly for that; I think too much of thee for that. I like Brenner greatly; but not so much as I love my own independence, the peace of my soul, and the prospect of a peaceful and care-free future. I will be his friend, but no more. I dread marriage; I dread that compulsion, that dark deep suffering, which the power of one being over another so often exhibits. I have seen so much of it.

I know well, that in consequence of wise laws of our evangelical church, marriage is not an indissoluble bond, but that a divorce can be obtained on various grounds; wherefore the polemic, which from certain quarters one hears against wedlock and conjugal life, has reached the highest degree of uselessness and absurdity conceivable. For what pure and thinking being enters into marriage without seriously regarding it, as our marriage formula so beautifully expresses—acknowledging in this act a public declaration of God's thought, and which therefore ought to be regarded as law and rule on earth? If He who only once or twice spoke to the children of earth, and then left them to unfold the meaning of his words—if even He had not by his words strengthened the principle of marriage, which, pure in the early times of the world, had its origin in the uncorrupted sense of the human race, yet would human prudence alone lead to the establishment of some law and regulation for marriage, with its glance directed to the children, which are its fruit. The marriage which calls forth in the wedded pair the knowledge of the meaning and object of their union, elevates them thereby to a point of moral greatness, from which the accidental provocations that arise in marriage are easily conquered. And certainly this union would make more people infinitely happy if they allowed themselves to be rightly consecrated by marriage, in its high and they spirit. Yes, if mankind once rose so high in moral greatness, that marriage might be released from all legal bonds, they would, precisely, by reason of this moral greatness—abide by the marriage.

I know also that very often is the woman the cause of unhappiness in marriage. I know that many a wife is for her husband, as it were, a cause of living irritation; and for the terror and warning of all bad wives I will write down here what occurred lately in my neighbourhood.

A young, honest and industrious man, who, with a wife and three children, made a good income by his industry, took arsenic a few days ago. Whilst under the most terrible effects of this, his wife would insist upon his drinking sweet milk. But he thrust her from him, saying—

“Let me die in peace! You have gnawed at me for these years like rust upon iron, I can live no longer.”

But the wife in his last hours let him have no peace, but heaped upon him reproaches, and demanded, “Do you not know that you have committed a great sin against me and my poor children?”

“You would have it so,” replied he coldly, and died. Listen to this, my good woman!

No less, my good gentleman, is it certain that the suffering which I have seen in marriage has proceeded especially from you, and for that reason I will take no lord and master, and will not become a wife.

And shall I on that account be less useful to society? Folly and the belief of fools! Friend, relation, citizen—noble names and occupations. O who is able fully to set up to them!

THE 11th.

Again is a sledging party talked of, and the promoters of it are Lennartson and Brenner. Lennartson will drive Flora, and I suspect that he will take this opportunity of giving her pleasure and coming nearer to her. He pays attention evidently enough to her mood of mind, and this has been for several days in the highest degree disturbed.

The Viking has invited me to his sledge, and I have consented on the condition of his eldest sweet little daughter Rosina going with us. To that he has agreed, but only compelled by necessity. I will not take so long a drive like-a-lie with the Viking, but I will carefully make use of the first opportunity to turn aside his schemes of conquest, and to tell him of my determination of remaining independent, of letting friendship, and not love, be the pulse in the life of my heart.

Selma has declared merrily that nobody shall drive her, but that she herself will go with her mother in their new covered sledge, and will be drawn by their beautiful ‘Isabella,’ and that thus shall it remain.

There will be a train of some fifty sledges. Selma and Flora rejoiced in it—like young girls. The gentlemen equip their sledges with the beautiful skins of wild beasts. We have talked already for a week of nothing else. May the weather only remain favourable.

Yet is it a purely-northern enjoyment, which a purely northern life has—such a pleasure-excursion as this is the clear winter air, under the bright blue heaven, upon the snow-white earth! They fly away so gaily and lightly, the open ones covered with skins and with white nets, which flutter over fiery, foaming horses, they fly along so fleetly to the play of jingling bells. And it feels so irresistibly pleasant thus to drive away over the earth in a train of joyous people, and by the side of a friend who participates in every feeling, every impression.

All this I felt yesterday, and yet I have retained an uneasy impression of our party of pleasure. Thus it is with all the pleasure of the world.

Still it was magnificent in the beginning. Our drive resembled a triumphal procession as we drove through the first streets of the city, and were seen and admired by a vast number of people, as well without as within their houses. After this, when it went out of the city-gates into the country, how white shone the snow-fields—how beautiful was the snow through the pine and fir-woods—how we flew like magic over land and lake, whilst the craggy, woody, shores fled past us! I was glad and enchanted, and Brenner enjoyed my delight, and that sweet girl between us increased it by her child-like joy.

After a tolerably long drive we stopped at an inn at the Park Well, where we were to dine. Dinner was ready to be served as we arrived, and was quite splendid and cheerful, but without that offensive ostentation and superfluity which ought to be banished from the society of thinking people. Our hosts, Lennartson and Brenner, were the life and joy of the dinner. Songs also were sung, in which the voice of the Viking produced a great effect. When we have advanced a little in our friendship I will counsel him to moderate his voice a little.

After dinner Lennartson asked me to play a nigarpolska, and this immediately set the whole company in lively motion with its grotesque, but merry flourishes and jokes. Even Aunt Penderfelt got upon her legs and flourished about with the rest. Selma and Flora signalized themselves by their grace, although in different ways. At length people must begin to think of their return, and cool themselves before it was undertaken.

A part of the company was already about to move away, when Brenner called my attention to two portraits which hung in the room; the one represented the great Queen Elizabeth of England, the other the noble Princess Elizabeth of Thuringia.

“Which of these would you be?” asked Brenner.

In jesting tone I asked back again, “have you not heard speak of a person, who when asked whether he would have warm or cold milk, answered, ‘might I ask for a little ale-possel?’ I must now answer you somewhat in the same way, since I am right joyful that I am not obliged to be one of these Elizabeths, and choose rather to be that which ‘I am,’ though somewhat less.”

Brenner smiled and said, “but if you must choose between these two, could you well be undecided? How beautiful is not that affectionate, self-sacrificing wife, beside the cold, worldly-prudent Egotist?”

“Granted!” I replied; “but the question always is what a woman loves, and for whom she sacrifices herself. Thus, for example, it always seems to me, that the exclusive love of one human being would be too mean an object for a human life, for the citizen of a divine kingdom. And I fancy that he who sinks himself in so contracted an existence in one individual, gives up the noblest in life.”

“Ah! how contracted—and how incomprehensibly vexatiously said is that!” exclaimed the Viking.

"Not so contracted as you think," said I, somewhat proudly, "after that which I have seen of life. And then have I not seen many a young girl, with a rich soul, with a mind open to all that is good and beautiful in humanity, and full of will to work for it; have I not seen how this same girl, some years after her marriage, is shrunk together into a narrow circle of cares and joys—the sense for the general and the whole lost for ever, and more and more compressed into the single and the individual, till she at last had lost sight of her higher goal, and scarcely could lift her eyes above the sill of her own house."

"But my best, gracious Miss Sophia," exclaimed the Viking; "that is an entirely mistaken, an entirely crazy turning of the question, an entirely insane direction. Why should people for their own sakes overlook the true and real? Does a young girl give herself away, or is she given away to a dolt or a block of wood, or to any other beast, then indeed she must drive upon a wooden road, and then I am not guilty, and yet less is love in its true sense guilty. Because true love is that which, while it unites two beings with each other, unites them only the more closely with social life and with humanity; right marriages consecrate people for a higher and a richer world; the right home is that where the fear of God rules like an invincible spirit, and all members of it, each one according to his strength and according to his gifts, is made useful for the great home of the world. This is clear as sunlight! I cannot comprehend how people see these things in an oblique point of view, and argue against them accordingly. That, methinks, is really contracted; and pardon me if I say, a LITTLE STUPID!"

"I forgive," replied I, smiling, "because I begin to be accustomed to your calling me stupid; and your description of these connexions in their beauty affects me, but such are seldom found on earth, and I have not seen them upon my path. On the contrary, I have seen and heard so much that is bitter in domestic life, which knits itself up with marriage, that I am become afraid of it, and for my part have determined not to let myself be bound by it, but to live independently, certain of this, that I in this manner can best accomplish my human mission."

"That you will not," said Brenner, very decidedly. "You mistake yourself. As yet you are young and full of life; as yet the world meets you; as yet you are surrounded by pleasures; but a time will come in which the world will be benumbed towards you, in which you yourself will be benumbed, be frozen for want of warm hearts, of true 'bands which will knit you to earthly life.'"

"Through the power of God I hope neither to be burned nor to be frozen," replied I, smiling. "The human soul also has its sun, which beams high above all earthly suns, and beside this—why should I feel the want of warm hearts as long as my own heart is warm? And that does not feel as if it would grow cold, even if all the snow in the world were piled upon it."

In the mean time we were come down to the ground-floor, where a mass of people were putting on their furs. The light of the full moon shone over the landscape, which, from the height where we stood, spread itself out in wintery pomp. But all was snow-covered and stiff. The trees shone with crystals of ice in the cold moonlight. The cold was severe. An involuntary shudder passed through me. The Viking had taken my fur cloak from the servant, and warmed it on his heart.

"The snow of life," said he, softly and inwardly. "O how you should preserve yourself from it!" he wrapped the cloak around, but it was not this which made me conscious of a soft embrace, warm as a summer wind.

Soon sate we again in the sledge, but the company had separated themselves, and drove in little parties back to the city. Lennartson and Brenner remained together, and then came my stepmother in the covered sledge, with Selma and Mrs. Rittersvard. We were the last of the party, because the hosts considered it as their duty to watch over the departure of all the guests. As we had been warned that the ice was not very strong, every one had agreed that during the drive over the lake, they were to keep at a distance of from twenty to thirty paces from each other.

The moonlight was beautiful, and beautiful its lighting up of the white ice-fields of the dark shore. Far off in the back-ground we saw the lights of Stockholm glimmer. The drive was romantic, but its effect was lost on me. The little Rosine soon fell asleep with her head resting on my bosom, and the Viking made use of the opportunity to lead the conversation in the direction which I feared, therefore I evaded it with a few short and cold answers. He was vexed, and said provoking things to me, to which I was silent. At length he too was silent. We were both of us out of tune, and with a melancholy feeling I contemplated the passing shore, the clouded heaven, and the dark fir-branches, which here and there protruded from the ice to show the open places, and which, in the increasing dusk, resembled horribly fantastic shapes of animals and men. Some words spoken by Brenner had wounded my heart. The gloomy impression of the moment made me feel this deeper—I could not help weeping, but quite silently. I know not whether he conjectured what was passing within me, but after a while he said with a gentle voice—

"Have I been disagreeable again? Forgive me! Do not be angry with me, good, sweet Miss Sophia!" and he laid his hand gently upon mine. I pressed it without replying, for I could not then speak. Further communication was prevented by a dull cry for help, which forced itself on our ears, and in which we could distinguish the voice of a child, which complained lamentably. Brenner pulled in his sledge.

"Perhaps somebody who has driven into a hole in the ice," said he. "I must see what it is. Might I take you and Rosine to your stepmother's sledge? As soon as possible I will return."

"We will leave the little girl there," said I; "but why should I now part from you, when I probably in some way or other may be helpful to you? No! I go with you."

The Viking made no answer; we looked about for the sledge of my stepmother, and a feeling of anguish took hold of me as we could not discover it.

At that same moment two sledges came driving furiously over the ice, from the point where the cry was heard. In the first sate two boisterous and noisy gentlemen, whose voices as well as their mode of directing their horses, made it evident that they were in no quiet state. They drove so furiously upon our horse, that if Brenner had not suddenly checked it, probably some misfortune might have happened. A dark cloud sourcealed the moon, and the deep twilight prevented us from distinguishing the countenances of the noisy gentlemen, but I thought that I recognised the Rutschenfelts in the voice. The other sledge paused a moment, and a voice, which I knew for that of Felix Delphin, said—

"Hold! hold! Really I believe that we have driven over the boy behind us there."

"Ah, a pretty joke!" replied the other, who I would wager was St. Orme; "he only got a little blow, that I will swear. Let the cursed youngster howl, if it amuse him. Let the reins go! else we shall come too late, and the others will get the best part of the carouse from us. See there, now he is still! Let us go!"

And the sledges rushing at the most rapid speed, passed us towards Stockholm.—(N. B. The gentlemen whom I thought I now recognised had declined to be of our sledging party, on the pretence that they were invited out for this day.)

In the intention of turning to the point where the cry, although weaker, was still heard, we saw that Lennartson also turned about, and heard Flora exclaim with anxiety—

"Certainly the ice at the edge is brittle, and we shall all go down together."

Lennartson gave the reins to the servant, and whilst he threw himself out of the sledge, called to us to stop and take him with us. We stopped, he sprang upon the sledge beam, and we drove rapidly forward.

We were now on the spot where feeble tones of lamentations made themselves still heard, and the moon shone over a singular group. A young lady in the most elegant winter dress, with bright red feathers, which waved in a white silk bonnet, stood, bending over a boy clothed in rags, whom a servant in livery had raised up; an old man of tall stature, with a staff in his hand, stood near, and stared up towards heaven with blind eyes.

The young lady was Selma, who having heard the cry for help earlier than we, and who seeing the other sledges continuing their drive, had prevailed on her mother to turn towards this side, in order to see if they could help. My stepmother remained with her sledge immediately on the place.

The old man related how two sledges had driven so rapidly, that he and the boy had not time to avoid them. The first sledge had knocked the boy down, and the second driven over him, and notwithstanding their cries, had continued on their way. The old man appeared not to have suffered at all, but the boy was severely hurt; and after Lennartson had in the best manner bound him with our pocket handkerchiefs, he carried him to the sledge of my stepmother, where he was left under the care of Selma. Our servant was commanded to accompany the blind man to his dwelling in the Park, but he was unwilling to separate from the boy, who was his only comfort and his only support since the death of his children, the parents of the boy; and he was for that reason seated with the coachman, and went with us.

We turned now again upon our homeward way, and met Flora, who was slowly driving towards us. Lennartson took his seat again beside her; but I fancy that the return was not truly agreeable to either of them.

On arriving at home Lennartson fetched instantly a physician to the boy, and this morning he is taken into the hospital. He is fortunately not dangerously hurt and will in a month's time be again restored. In the mean time he is Selma's and my child. Lennartson and Brenner have adopted the old man, whose disease of the eyes is of that kind which admits of an operation, and he may regain his sight.

Flora pouts and looks askew on all this affair, and on the common interest which has sprung up between Lennartson and Selma through their protégé, whilst the dissimilar behaviour of the two young girls on this occasion, seems to have made a strong impression on Lennartson.

The 17th.

I have endeavoured to examine Felix on the ice-drive and its adventure. He pretends to be ignorant and hurt in the highest degree, but a certain painful confusion in his manner convinces me that I have not suspected him and the others in an unjust manner. I have heard from Ake Sparraköld, that St. Orme often misleads young men to drink, and then to gamble, and thus wins from them their money; and that he had invited Felix and his friends to an orgie of the lowest kind on the day of the sledging party. I now spoke seriously and warmly, nay, almost sisterly, to Felix, and warned him of this false and dangerous friend. I reminded him of his promise to Selma, and on that which depended upon it. He answered not a word, but looked unhappy, and left us quickly. I fear that he will not turn out well. His more regular life for some time after his conversation with Selma, seems not to have lasted long, and he is so weak that the Rutschenfelts 'do not be beguiled, Felix! Be a man!' or the jest that 'he is already under petticoat government,' are sufficient to lead him into every possible folly. I have had a prompting to talk myself with St. Orme, and to call forth the good spirit in him; but think! if the wicked one shew his teeth to me. In the mean time I will let these thoughts concret yet a while; over-hasty words seldom fall in good ground.

The 20th.

It goes on hopefully and joyfully with our children, the seven-years-old and sixty-years-old. The aged man is operated upon, and it has succeeded excellently. Lennartson was here to-day, and related to us, in his lively way, the particulars of the affair.

The joy of the old man that he could again see the sun and his child; that he again could work, and lay aside the beggar's staff, affected us all. We took into consideration the future of our children, and adopted unanimously Lennartson's plans.

Selma has found means to draw Flora into this affair, so that she now, like others, takes part in it, and appears warmly to interest herself in it, namely—in Lennartson's presence.

The 23d.

The Baron has received additional honours in titles and stars. As he came to us this evening decorated with the latter, Flora exhibited great joy on that account, whilst Selma and I wished him joy in all simplicity. Lennartson received Flora's exaggerated tokens of joy with coldness, and was, for the rest, not quite in good humour. My stepmother noticed this, and said jestingly—

"It seems as if Lennartson quarrels with his good fortune precisely when it adorns him most handsomely."

"Good fortune!" said Lennartson, smiling sorrowfully.

"Yes," replied my stepmother, "at least, what most people would regard as such."

"Ah!" said Lennartson, while he seated himself beside her with a kind of filial confidence, "it is exactly that which vexes me, that people often regard such things as good fortune, and set value upon them, without asking whether they be a sign of merit; whether they have any real meaning; it makes me angry that it should be so, and that I myself am childish enough not to be rightly free from this weakness. It regularly torments me. But the superficiality of life is so infectious. Therefore I long to release myself from it."

"But in all the world not to quit the service on that account?" said my stepmother, terrified.

"No!" replied Lennartson, "that is quite another thing. I will only be released that I thereby—may come deeper into life. I know well when I could be indifferent to all this outward glitter, and warm and rich from the reward which no human eye sees, from a look, a quiet approval."

"And where is this Eldorado?" asked my stepmother, affected, and at the same time suspicious.

With a voice, which was at the same time softened and rendered more full by deep feeling, Lennartson said,

"I had it once in the heart of my mother; I would meet with it in the heart—of my wife; if," continued he, with emphasis, "if she understood me, if she were such as my soul desires, and my heart seeks after. Many a one congratulates me on my happiness in having made my own way in life, and I—consider myself not to have been happy, that I have not yet properly lived—at least, since my earliest youth," added he, mournfully.

All this was said half aloud to my stepmother, who was evidently affected, and spoke kindly words regarding the future, though it might not be in a cheerful tone.

I looked at the young girls: Flora blushed deeply; that Selma grew pale, I could merely suppose; because at my glance she rose up and left the room.

Here have I then become acquainted with one of the Lennartson faults of which the Viking spoke. But the way in which he discovered it has made the man only more interesting in my eyes.

The 1st of March.

Brenner will not understand me, will not attend to my hints. He seems as if he would give his heart free play in making an attack on my heart. Well, then! May his, during the combat, only not be wounded. I will not lose a friend in the lover, and a friend so noble and so dear to me as Wilhelm Brenner. I never was happy in love. Where I loved I have not been again beloved, and where I have been beloved with true affection I could not return the same feeling. But I have to thank friendship, pure-minded friendship, for my highest delights on the earth. A rejected lover may easily become the truest friend, and that he is not so is often the fault of the beloved woman.

In this case it will not be my fault, that I feel in myself. I know nothing more sorrowful than when an acquaintance, which begins in cordiality, extinguishes itself in bitterness; or where warm feelings change themselves into cold ones. Every seed of tenderness which the All-good has sown upon the earth, should unfold itself into a plant and flower; should here sprout up at His footstool, in order sometime to blossom yet more gloriously before His throne. If it be otherwise; if the flower die in its bud, then is it the fault of man, and a very sorrowful thing. I write this in the odour of the lilacs which I have received from my friend, and with a heart that is warm towards him. It is calm and light within me.

Thou that allay'st the restless heart's commotion,
Illuminator of life's midnight hour!
To whom was given the ancient world's devotion,
And even now art our most glorious dower;
Thou who wast by, when Chaos was up-broken;
Who played'st in joy in the Creator's sight;
Thou who wast by when primal words were spoken
And heights and depths gave being forth to light.
Life's morn and evening star, O Wisdom! brightly,
When I in darkness lay, thy light was shown;
Since then 'tis well with me, my heart beats lightly,
Burning with love; but, but for Thee alone!

The 2d.

The miserable, misfortune-bringing, poisonous and poisoned Lady-Councillors-of-Commerce! I would that they sat turned to stone up aloft on the hill of difficulty, and could move neither foot nor tongue! I would they had been fettered yesterday. Then should I not have been obliged to go thither to-day with the heaviest burthen which life has, and to come back without any alleviation; then had I not been obliged to sit here as now, and to write with a sort of desperation, while tears fall upon my paper rather than the words which I throw upon it, almost without seeing them.

But now came those birds of misfortune yesterday afternoon, and darted down by my stepmother. I was with her while I sat at my painting. I felt myself burdened by having to attend to all the movements which were made by the three ladies among our near and distant acquaintances. Already had they gone through a long list of "they believe, they say, they assert," when Mrs. P. vehemently exclaimed, "Now for a bit of news which is sure and certain! What think you of our honest Colonel Brenner having last week received 'a basket' from the rich widow, Mrs. Z.?" That I know from her own sister-in-law, who related the whole affair to me. She herself, as regarded him, was not disinclined, but the five step-children would have terrified her.

"Yes, the poor man!" said Mrs. P., "he will not find it easy to get a wife with that crowd of children; at least not a wife who has money."

"Need Colonel Brenner then, in the choice of a wife, make money so much an object?" asked I, in no enviable state of mind.

"That a man always must who has five children to care for, and who has no other property than his profession," replied Mrs. P. "Brenner's wife had nothing; and he himself, although a man of rank, has been no good husband of his income."

"Is Mrs. Z. an upright person?" asked I again; and Mrs. P. made answer—

"O, the person is well-behaved enough, I fancy; but she has neither head nor heart; but with a fine skin, a handsome figure, and large landed property,* one needs neither head nor heart to enchant. A little vain, a little mad about getting married, is she to be sure—it is an unfortunate passion that, of wishing to get married! I say with Madame de Sevigné, I would rather get drunk!

"I also," said I; "but is it known for certain * Guldkann skteri, an estate which, according to the Swedish laws, can only be held by a noble.

that Colonel Brenner paid his addresses to Mrs. Z. last week?"

"Quite certainly it is known, my sweetest of friends! Her own sister-in-law told me of it. Besides this, there are documents in the affair; for it was negotiated by letters, which certainly must have been very affecting, for Mrs. Z. has cried days and nights over them—there must singly and solely on that account have been a wash of pocket handkerchiefs. But she has her own friends, and will console herself, and think about a certain gentleman without children, and—à propos, people say also in the world that Colonel Brenner too will endeavour to console himself, and will seek for his consolation in this house; people assert even that Miss Sophia Adelan would know something more of the affair."

Reddening like a guilty person, and proud as an innocent one, I repelled the charge, and declared myself wholly unacquainted with it. And, as the sisters persisted in jesting with me, my stepmother said, with a graceful dignity which pleased me infinitely—

"As Colonel Brenner has so lately paid his addresses to Mrs. Z., it would very little accord with the esteem which he cherishes for Sophia, and with his own character, if he should so quickly solicit her hand. Besides, I fancy that this match would very little suit Sophia. It is no joke with so many stepchildren. If my Sophia wishes to be married, she will not lack opportunities of choosing among—un, dm, um!"

"O, of course! That is certain! When a person has so many charms and talents, and so much property, there lacks nothing; and people talk already of a certain Baron and Chamberlain—perhaps one may already offer congratulations."

I scarcely was able to give a token of disavowal, and was glad that a servant came to say that the carriage was at the door, in which the Lady-Councillors-of-Commerce took leave, and my stepmother and Flora drove out to pay visits.

"Let nobody come in! say that nobody is at home!" said I to the philosopher (the old, trusty servant of the house, whose business it is to watch through the whole day, half sleeping in the hall), and I threw myself in the arm chair, before the piano, in the ante-room. One single light burnt in the chandelier, with a long wick. 'Twas twilight in the room, it was twilight in my own soul.

"It is the property! It is a speculation!" thought I. My mind was in so painful a state that I was obliged to weep. The image of the Viking was dimmed in my inmost soul. I saw him before, so pure, so noble, so far from all worldly modes of action—and now! But no! I will not submit myself to the thoughts which the news that I have heard awakens in me. "Still! still!" said I to the tormenting spirits, "leave me my faith in him, and let me retain my friend. Besides, why should I believe that he will woo me? He will not. He seeks in me merely a confidant, a friend, a sister!" And I let all the five little children come up before me in order to explain his courtship of Mrs. Z.

The 'Sonate pathétique' of Beethoven lay upon the music desk, and I began to play it. This wild agitato removed the tumult from my soul, and hushed it; it elevated itself on the streams of sound, and burst with them through all thwarting hindrances to the grave, lovely, all-releasing, all-reconciling unveiling, to the glorious closing notes. So deeply was I absorbed by my music that I did not hear that a conversation was taking place in the hall, which ended in the philosopher opening the door and saying, in a voice which resembled that of the ghost in Hamlet:

"Miss Adelan, Colonel Brenner is in the hall, and will resolutely come in. Shall I beg him to go away?"

"Did I not say that nobody was to be admitted?" asked I.

"Yes, he said that," said a well-known voice. "But I said to him that I am already admitted!" And Brenner at one spring stood before me, with outstretched hand, so kind, so joyous, so cordial, that I nearly forgot all the impressions with which I had just then combated, and my heart moved itself towards him.

He gave me a bouquet of beautiful flowers, as he continued, "Only do not say to me that I should go away!"

Kindly, but sorrowfully, I said, "Ah no! Remain here now. My mother will soon be home."

"O, that is not of much consequence to me," said he. "I would now rather talk alone with you."

My heart beat from secret anxiety. He looked at me, and my appearance must have indicated fully my state of mind, for he was suddenly uneasy, and asked tenderly and with his whole heart whether I were ill?

"No, I am very well." Whether I was vexed? "Yes, I must confess that; I had heard something which had discomposed me." Whether he might not share it, whether he might not endeavour to be my comforter? I was silent. Should I tell him all? thought I. Yet no! That were indeed a folly. He would fancy that I was in love with him. He renewed his questions with more and more warmth. "No," replied I, at length; "not now—perhaps at some future time—" Whether I were vexed with him? "Yes—no—he must not ask any more."

"Not ask any more?" exclaimed Brenner. He was silent for a while, and began then again, with a gentle, tremulous voice. "And yet I came now, on purpose, to ask you a serious question, a very important question—a question which has often thrust itself to my lips, and which I can no longer keep back—a question, upon which depends the weal or woe of my life. I came on purpose to ask—Sophia, will you, can you love me? I have long loved you unspeakably! Will you accompany me through life, in pleasure and pain?"

The voice, the look, the expression, even the pressure of his hand, which had seized mine—O, what eloquence of the heart! And all this he had consecrated the week before to Mrs. Z. And Mrs. Z., without head or heart, with a fine skin and landed property, ascended like a ghost between Brenner and me, and caused me indescribable anguish.

O, if he had but been to me that which he had been only a few hours before, how candidly and how warmly could I not have talked to him; how could I have refused his hand without wounding his heart; how could I have removed the lover, and yet have retained him for ever a friend.

But in the darkness which had now risen in my soul, I recognised neither him nor myself; the whole world was changed. A crippling coldness, a petrifying stupor overcame my whole being; I felt myself turned into a marble image, and therefore I let Brenner talk without understanding him; heard him speak of his children, 'children which it was a delight and honour to have;' heard him say how he and his children would make me happy by love and gratitude; saw him bend his knee before me, conjuring me to listen to him and answer him. But I could not answer, could move neither hand nor tongue; my eyes were still, and staringly riveted upon him; yet I felt as if my eyes were filling by degrees with tears. Then he reproached me jestingly with keeping him so long before me on his knees; and with a sudden turn he seated himself at my feet, embraced my knees, and declared that he would not rise till I had given to him my 'Yes.'

This manoeuvre had almost entirely overcome me. I was just about to lean myself towards his beloved head, and open my whole heart to him; but at that same moment I heard a bustle in the hall, and the voices of many persons who had entered.

In that same moment I awoke to a full consciousness, and to the whole bitterness of my position.

"Stand up! In God's name, stand up!" said I to Brenner. "Some one comes!"

"The whole world may come!" replied he, with defiance and affection; "I shall not stand up without an answer from you."

A thought of hell arose in my mind; he will surprise thee, he will compel thee; he will remain sitting here at thy feet in order to make it impossible for thee to refuse his hand!

With proud resentment in look and voice, I sprang up, and said—

"Colonel Brenner! I have done wrong to leave you so long in uncertainty. Pardon me, and hear now my last answer. My hand and my property I will preserve independent. I esteem no man high enough to give him right and rule over them."

Brenner on his part had risen up—and at my stern reply fixed upon me a look full of inexpressible astonishment. It was as if he could not thoroughly understand me. Merry voices and the steps of several persons approached the drawing-room door from the hall. I betook myself to the door which led to Selma's chamber. Here, with my hand upon the lock, I turned round and looked at Brenner. He stood immovable, his eyes directed to me; their expression I cannot describe, and I could not rightly comprehend; but I read in them an eternal farewell; and, with a soul assailed by indescribable and contending feelings, I fled up to my room. That which I felt to be the bitterest and the most painful at this moment was that Brenner and I were forever separated. I called up anew Mrs. Z., in her whole terrible shape, and Brenner's conduct to her, in order to excuse and explain my own conduct; but then came the remembrance of Brenner's last look—that strange look, which went through bone and marrow, and all his culpability vanished, and I alone was the culpable one, the one worthy of condemnation.

I was interrupted in this combat by Selma, who besought me to come into company. I thought at first to excuse myself; but when I found that Lennarton was there, a thought or suspicion arose within me, and I followed Selma.

I had a fever from excitement of mind. I soon observed that Lennarton's glance was directed to me with an inquiring expression, and soon also he seated himself on the corner of a 'causeuse' and said in a low voice—

"As I came here this evening I found Brenner alone in the drawing-room, in a strange state, and he could or would not give any explanation of it. Have you seen him this evening?"

"I pray you," said I, and answered his question by another, "tell me whether it be true, as I have lately heard, that within these few days a connexion has been spoken of betwixt Brenner and Mrs. Z. ? You are Brenner's friend, you must know."

"I cannot deny it," replied the Baron smiling.

"Is it true that a marriage was spoken of?"

"Yes, actually was spoken of."

"He has then really paid his addresses to her?"

"Hum! that is again another question," said Lennarton, smiling.

"How! Did you not say that a marriage had been spoken of?"

"Does it then follow of necessity that he must have made the proposal?"

"Not! I fancied so. I pray you jest not in this affair; but tell me out plainly how it hangs together. It is to me inexpressibly important—more important than I can say."

"Well, then; what I know of the affair is, in a few words, this: Mrs. Z. wished to have Wilhelm Brenner for her husband; he did not wish her altogether for his wife. A third person went with the proposal—and with the refusal to and fro between them."

"O God! is it possible? And—pardon me! From whom do you know this? From Brenner himself?"

"No, certainly not; but exactly from this third person, who ought for two reasons to bid adieu to the office of spokesman. It pleases me, Miss Adela, to be able to give you an explanation of an affair in which you have been so badly informed. And now—best Miss Sophia, permit me, as Brenner's and your friend, a question. What is the occasion of his strange state of mind this evening?"

"It is my fault! my unpardonable fault!" I could say no more, I was crushed to pieces.

Lennarton was silent; he regarded me with his serious, prudent eyes. After a minute's silence, he said gently, almost flatteringly—

"I shall probably see him to-night. May I not take to him from you a message—some kind of greeting?"

"Ah, what is the use of it? He cannot, he ought not to forgive me! We are separated forever through my fault—through my unworthy mistrust. But, if you will, impart to him this conversation."

And with this it was ended; but now began for me the pangs of conscience.

O what talisman is there, indeed, against the bitter, crushing feeling of having been unjust towards a noble friend—having cruelly wounded his heart, his dearest feeling; to have murdered the faith in that which he loved—to have disturbed his happiness! And for such a deed no comfort can be found. O Wilhelm Brenner! now I understand thy looks full of condemnation, and full of godlike sorrow over me. Yet when thou knowest that I have bathed my pillow with tears, and yet in the midst of my suffering felt a proud joy over thee, and thanked God that I can bear thy image clear in my breast, wouldst thou—wouldst thou not forgive me?

I passed the night without slumbering in the least, I waited for the morning with impatience

—I hoped that with it Lennartson would come. The morning came, gray and cold, and no Lennartson, and no single sunbeam in my nocturnal soul. One hour went after the other—that waiting was insufferable to me; read I could not, music was to me a torment, and the most common topics of conversation only increased my anguish. All at once the proverb came into my mind—and at the same time the bill of difficulty came before my inmost mind, and it seemed to me a particular refreshment to ascend this. I felt the necessity of calming the soul by the fatigue of the body; and with an advertisement out of the daily paper in my reticule, I rambled in mist and cold towards the South, up the heaven-aspiring mountain, far forth upon the endless street which begins upon the other side of the same. Our own state of mind often lends its colour to objects, but on this day my state of mind and the objects which met me had actually a deep sympathy. The advertisement led me to a dwelling where mould and damp covered the walls, neither was it to be wondered at that the pale dropsy abode there. On the long, ill-built street, I saw a herd of ragged, pale children, old women and aged men, living pictures of sickness, of poverty, and age; and I contemplated misery in all gradations of human life—in all its weeping shadows.

“That which burns the heel burns not the soul;”

And amid all these shadow-figures there yet probably was not one who would have exchanged his lot with mine, if he could have seen into my heart. Ah! the severest kind of wretchedness is not that which exhibits its rags in the streets, and at night conceals itself in great deserted buildings—it is that which smiles in polite companies, which shews to the world a joyful exterior while sorrow gnaws its heart.

Had I been somewhat more joyous of mood, I might have thought with pleasure on the round earthen jugs which many carried in their hands, and on the warm soup which Mercy cooks by the never-extinguished fire, and which now these poor people were carrying, yet steaming, for their dinners.

When I came home, I hoped for some kind of word, of some kind of tidings. But no, nothing! Several hours have passed. Perhaps Lennartson comes this evening.

Evening.

No, he came not. I have obtained by art news of Brenner. He did not go home last night.

The 3d.

Again a sleepless night. It is again morning. Whither shall I go to-day?

“When a man is no longer his own friend, then goes he to his brother, who is so still, that he may talk gently with him, and may again give him life.”

These words of Jean Paul awoke in me the desire to go to my Selma, but I was ashamed of the confession which I had to make to her. Then came she to me with her lovely eyes, and asked so tenderly, so troubled. I could do no other than let her look into my heart. And how tenderly she comforted me! How warmly she defended me from my own self-accusations! How clearly she saw before us the hour of reconciliation! Ah, I dare not hope for this! If I could only know how it now is with him, how he feels towards me.

H

Evening.

I know now. Lennartson came in the afternoon, but not gaily.

Yet it is good that he came. I could hardly have supported such another night. To my inquiring look, he said immediately—

“I have just seen Brenner; I have communicated to him our conversation here that evening.”

“Well, then, and he—” asked I, almost lifeless.

“He said, he had himself imagined that some kind of misunderstanding must have been the occasion of—what he did not say.”

“And besides that—said he nothing?”

“He added, if anybody had said to me anything bad of her, I should not have believed it.”

“And that was all! Said he nothing more?”

“No!” said Lennartson; “but it was evident that he had suffered much in mind, and suffered still. What unfortunate misunderstanding has put you both so out of tune with each other, separated two beings who I fancied should—but they are not separated. That is impossible. I know Brenner’s heart. Give me a word, a cordial word for him, and—let me conduct him to your feet.”

“Impossible! I pray you do nothing now in this affair. You would not wish that yourself, if you knew all. Tell me only—do you think that Brenner cherishes any hatred towards me?”

“Hatred is a feeling which cannot easily find place in Brenner’s heart, and certainly never towards you. The words which he says of you, he speaks with seriousness and tenderness.”

“Thus I may hope then that he does not abhor me. This is much. I thank you from my heart for your kindness.”

“Thank me by letting me take with me a soothing greeting to my friend. He looked to me as if he had not slept for several nights, and would not be able to sleep for yet more.”

“Tell him that neither have I slept, since—and now let us not talk further on this affair. It belongs to the things which must alone depend upon our Lord’s guidance.”

Lennartson bowed with quiet seriousness, and as he saw me weep he took my hand, and spoke gentle words with the voice of an angel. O how good is he too!

It is Twelve at Night.

I am now calmer. I have arrived at certainty. It is then ended, this friendship which gave me so very much pleasure, which was to last into eternity, ended through my fault.

I found in the stream of life a costly pearl, but I threw it heedlessly away. I deserved it not.

“If they had told me anything bad of her I should not have believed it.” What a crushing reproof for me is there in these loving words!

But I deserve all this. Therefore I will bear it all without complaint. I shall not sleep this night, perhaps not for many nights. Knew I only that he slept.

Without, it is restless. Clouds driven by the northern tempest fly over the castle. The lamps on the bridge and on the quay flicker; their light trembles in the agitated waters; one after the other is extinguished in the storm. Poor flickering flames, good-night!

The 7th.

Brenner has set out, on the business of the fleet, to several of the sea-port towns of Sweden. He will be absent several weeks. That is good.

It is cold to-day, clear air and cold. The snow lies upon the ice of the Riddarfjerd, upon the southern mountains, white and still—still and cold as indifference. I will lay it upon my heart. Yet not that will I not. Let it suffer still.

I was too proud of my philosophy, of my strength and prudence, and am—punished. Burn therefore thou holy pain, thou purifying fire; burn to the very roots this selfish, vain temper. Burn and consume!

In the Evening.

I shall overcome this suffering; I feel that I shall overcome it, for I have a clear inward presentiment that he has forgiven me, that he feels and thinks mercifully towards me. And for the first time I feel the necessity of the mercy and the compassion of a fellow-being. Such presentiments of the state of feeling of persons who are dear to me I have often had, as well in bad as in good, and they have never yet deceived me.

The sentiment which united Brenner and me has really not been of a common kind, nor can the overhastiness of a moment annihilate it. It is deeply based in the nature of our being. And I know it. Wilhelm Brenner, we shall yet once more meet and be united in sincerity, in harmony, even if it first be when the scene of this life is ended; I know it, and never have felt more certain than in this moment, when we are apparently more separated than ever.

I have written to Brenner. Words like those which I said here. They will meet him when he returns to Stockholm.

To-night the stars glow brighter. No cloud overshadows them. Good-night, Wilhelm! To-night thou wilt sleep, to-night I also shall sleep, and to-morrow I shall again wholly live for mankind, for the interests which surround me. Thou hast given to me an example of activity, and I will follow it.

The 11th.

And the drama which is being acted in my neighbourhood demands truly all attention. I seek still for the thread which can lead the captives out of the labyrinth; but that St. Orme is the Minotaur I see plainly; and it seems as if Flora's prophesying of herself, that she was possessed by his evil nature, was really about to be fulfilled. But why should Selma become her victim; why should the sylph lose her wings in the struggle? Selma has been for some time an actual martyr to Flora's perpetually unhappy temper, who seems to have a certain delight in tormenting her with ill-humour, with severity, and with absurd suspicions. Selma bears this with wonderful gentleness, but—the joyous song is silenced, and the light dancing gait becomes ever stiller.

Yesterday, I poured out before her the vial of my wrath against Flora.

"Forgive her," prayed Selma, with her beautiful tearful eyes, "she is herself so little happy!"

And this is true. My stepmother, who does not understand Flora's condition, but who would willingly see all around her joyful, endeavours to cheer her by all kinds of dissipations and pleasures; but these now appear to have lost all power over Flora, whilst her evil demon strikes his talons ever deeper into her life.

Towards evening, when the few visitors had left us, and we ladies of the family were together with St. Orme, Flora stood a long time sunk in thought before the portrait of Beatrice Cenci.

"Do you think of copying that lady, that you contemplate her so exactly?" asked St. Orme, in his scornful, disagreeable tone.

"Perhaps!" replied Flora, in a voice which sounded almost terrible. "Then," continued she in an altered tone, "I endeavour to fancy how she felt in mind."

"Before or after the murder of her father?" asked St. Orme as before.

"Afterwards," replied Flora. "Before, I understand; that I know."

"How, my sweet Flora, how can you enter into such horrible thoughts?"

"Yes, I can do so," replied Flora. "She had attempted every thing—every thing, St. Orme—to free herself from her unhappy condition; she did not express her pangs. She was reduced to the most extreme point, was reduced to despair—in short, I understand her deed; but after that—afterwards—"

"Why yes," rejoined St. Orme, "afterwards, she thought on the preparation for her own death, on the scaffold, on the executioner!"

"It is related," continued Flora, "that at the moment in which she went to death, at the moment when she must ascend the scaffold, a stream of words burst from her lips, so full of joy and thankfulness, so full of what is most beautiful and most sublime in the human soul, that they who should have consoled her were dumb, and their pity changed itself into admiration: it is said that never was her beauty more touching, her look more beaming than at the moment when she, as a penitent, but ransomed sinner, met death enfranchised and victorious!—nor is that a wonder to me. But I do wonder how she felt; ah! how she felt herself to be free! free and happy! I do wonder how she felt, I do wonder how she felt, I do wonder how—"

Flora repeated these words several times like an insane person, and sank suddenly to the floor.

Our astonishment was great. Flora was carried into Selma's chamber, and here our attentions soon brought her again to consciousness; but only to fall into a hysterical state, after which she only sunk into repose after the lapse of a few hours.

When she again awoke it was night. She lay still, her eyes fixed upon Virginia's portrait, that hung at the foot of Selma's bed (on which Flora lay), and said passionately to herself—

"She, too, was lovely and unhappy; she, too, died in the bloom of her age, died of a broken heart. But she died, killed by her still suffering—like many a woman, died without glory and revenge. Beatrice was the happier of the two."

"The Eternal Judge only knows that," said I, with gentle voice.

"Yes, what do we know?" continued Flora. "I know nothing, excepting that I am more unfortunate than these two. It is strange, but for some time methinks, that thoughts on a bloody action, on a murder, for instance, have something refreshing in them. A great change must take place in the souls of men who have done something terrible—something that admits of no return, no uncertainty, no fear, no hope more. Then, indeed, might the juggling spirit depart, and the human being comprehend himself! It might become calm and cool in the heart, when the hour of death is near, and all is past from earth; feelings might arise—feelings of humiliation and subjection, and then—there perhaps might come some angel of the Lord, and kindle a light in the dark soul ere one died. But thus will man die! Die, be laid low in the black earth, moulder, turn to dust, be trampled of men—ha! no! no! I will not die. No. Why is it so dark within me? why do you let me lie as in a funeral vault? Bring me more light. And Selma! where is she? She used to love me. But she has left me, like all the rest!"

"Never! never!" replied an affectionate voice, and from the depths of the alcove, on the other side of Flora's bed's head, arose slowly Selma's white-garmented, beautiful figure. She took Flora's hand in hers, and besought with tears—

"O Flora, Flora! if you yet love me, hear what I have to say to you. You are day by day more unlike yourself; there lies some heavy secret at your heart which makes you unhappy. O speak, Flora, tell us what it is—tell us all! You know how we love you. How possible it will be for us to find out some means of consoling and calming you! Oh, confide in us! How free will you feel when you have opened your heart, and have become clear to those who love you!"

"Clear!" repeated Flora, "and if I were to open my heart, and it were to appear merely darker to you than before! Selma, how should you bear that?"

"Ah! I could bear all, except seeing you so unhappy and so changed as you are!"

"You think so," said Flora, "but you deceive yourself. You belong to the good, to the discreet, who abominate every thing that is unusual and eccentric, because they consider it bad, because they do not understand it. They cannot look the reality in the face without trembling; they do not love, except through illusions, which they have no strength to—but forgive me, I will not be severe. I myself need help and forbearance. Help me, you cannot, Selma, nobody can—but you can soften the struggle. And now—will you read something to me, something which will calm me? what have you there? The hymn-book! Read something from it, if you will. It is a long time since I looked into such a one."

As I left the two young friends, I heard Selma read, with a voice which she endeavoured to make firm,

How the whole earth reposes.

The next day Flora was better; but Selma's countenance bore the traces of a deeply-depressed mind. I proposed to her, after breakfast, to go up to the Museum to see some statues which had lately come there. She willingly consented, and that Flora declined the invitation to accompany was not unpleasant to me.

We had not been long among the noble works of art before I saw the young pupil of Ehrens-vard become cheerful, and while contemplating the beautiful and the sublime, her soul freed itself from the burden which bowed it down. I acknowledge with joy how a cultivated taste for art or nature can release the human soul from the pang which is called forth by the pressure of circumstances, or by the excitability of the heart. Yet he cannot always be released from it, neither should he be. There are sufferings which are more elevating than all enjoyments, I mean nobler. These must not be annihilated. They may free us, they may give us wings. Even the larva of suffering can receive wings, can fly in the night, and be lighted by its stars, and bathe in its dew.

A soul-full, brightened melancholy displaced more and more the sultering, depressed expression of Selma's countenance, as my observations excited her to think and to express her thoughts.

At Niobe's statue I said, that Niobe appeared to me too unfeeling; I wished to see in her countenance more despair, more anger.

"She combats with higher powers," replied Selma; "neither revenge nor hope are possible to her. Besides, this is the first time that she knows misfortune; and it comes so suddenly, so mightily, that it overpowers her; she cannot suffer much, she is stunned. See! observe her from this side; see the expression of trembling pain about her mouth. One sees that there needs only one movement, only one arrow now, and she suffers no more; she is turned to stone."

I looked at Selma. There was at this moment a strange resemblance between Niobe's expression and hers. It seemed to me that thus would she suffer, thus turn to stone. But God defend my young sister!

At the antique head of Zeno, I said, "Do you not see in this countenance, as if it were a prototype of Christendom?"

"Yes," replied she; "it is the renunciation, but without the exaltation."

She would not turn to stone, thought I again, with a look at her countenance beaming with soul, she would free herself, she would conquer herself. The sylph would not lose her wings for long.

We now heard somebody whispering near us—

"Lientenant Thure does not go to the ball to-night. It is very vexatious."

"Nor the royal secretary, Von Bure, either. Yet he told me that he would come for my sake. But one cannot depend on the gentlemen. He had as good as engaged me for the first waltz. I will be properly ungracious the next time that he comes, and will render himself so civil."

"Yes, it seemed as if you had made a conquest—Do you not think that the marble head there is like Von Bure? Do you know what sweet thing he said to me last evening?"

The sweet thing was said so softly, that I did not hear it. We had already recognised Hilda and Thilda Engel, who were complaining of their lovers before the bust of Septimus Severus. They were now aware of us, and we mutually saluted each other. As it now began to be cold in the marble gallery, I proposed that we should take a walk towards the park, across the Skeppsholm, and we asked the Engels if they would accompany us. "They would indeed, gladly, but—four ladies without one gentleman—how would that be?"

Selma and I assured them, laughing, that it would be excellent; especially if we went two and two; and we wandered off, each with an Engel (angel) by her side, but had considerable weariness therefrom.

Outside the park we met Mrs. Rittersvard and her daughter. They were cordially friendly, and so merry that it infected us. Mrs. Rittersvard was much better as regarded her health, and Helfrid was quite happy to be again after a long time in the fresh wood. It was glorious. The snow melted in the noon-day sun, the fir shoots gave forth fragrance, and lichens and mosses grew greenly fresh in the field, and on the tree stems. Helfrid was an old acquaintance of all these, and related in answer to Selma's and my questions, so much of their lives and peculiarities, as excited a great desire in our minds to become better acquainted with these children of nature. In the mean time we wished Helfrid joy of this her knowledge and fresh spring of enjoyment.

But the Engels became ever more and more aullen, and I recognised in them that lamentable poverty of soul which our mode of education often fosters, and which often causes people, in the midst of treasures of art and nature, to have thought and memory only for a—ball lover. Thus were we now, six ladies, and—no gentleman! Fate was cruel to the poor children. Their looks animated themselves, however, as two young gentlemen, arm in arm, approached us, and I heard them whisper the names of Thure and Bure. But Thure and Bure greeted, and—passed by! The Engels looked desperate.

Again a gentleman approached us; and this one passed us not by, but, after an exclamation of joyful surprise and friendly salutation, accompanied us back to the city. It was Lieutenant Sparrsköld. But he walked beside Helfrid Rittersvärd. Hilda and Thilda walked with one another.

At a hint from her mother, Helfrid invited them and the rest of the party to go and drink a cup of chocolate in the shadow of her hyacinths. The Engels declined the invitation with a look of ill humour, but Selma, the young Sparrsköld, and I, accepted with pleasure the friendly invitation.

In the shade of Helfrid's fragrant hyacinths we drank excellent chocolate, and had a lively and interesting conversation on the way, of best improving and using life and time.

Nobody was better pleased to hear about this than the good old lady, who finds even now life to be so affluent and so full of interest, that she wakes herself every morning at six o'clock from fear of wasting time, which for her flies too fast.

Young Sparrsköld declared jestingly, that people did a great deal better to sleep; and with that kissed her hand with filial, yes, almost child-like tenderness.

Helfrid looked on both with tears in her eyes.

A horrible catastrophe changed this scene of love and goodwill, into one of horror. A dull pistol-shot was heard, and seemed to have been fired in the room under that where we were. Sparrsköld sprang up.

"It was in Captain Rumler's room!" exclaimed he; and, as if seized upon by a horrible foreboding, rushed from the room. A quarter of an hour after this he came up again, very pale. "Captain Rumler has shot himself!" All was already over with him. People had for some time talked of his deranged affairs, and of his inclination for strong liquors; he seemed already to have laboured at his own ruin. This was now accomplished.

Excited and horrified in mind, we separated.

"He was one of Felix's intimate acquaintance," said Selma, on our homeward way. "May he not—" She did not conclude.

It was terrible news with which we had now to surprise my stepmother.

The 13th.

Captain Rumler's unfortunate end quickly flew through the city. The Lady-Commissioners-of-Commerce informed us to-day that 'people said that he had handled too freely the money of the regiment; that he could no longer conceal this, and would not live over his disgrace; that one and another young gentleman, sons of rich families, who were involved in Rumler's affairs, had fled. People said that several occurrences similar to this would follow.'

From the misfortune, however, one good thing has arisen. Ake Sparrsköld was Rumler's next successor, and received the company after him. Nothing then hinders any longer his and Helfrid's union, and the happiness of the whole family.

The 14th.

Now also have the Rutschenfelts driven off! 'God preserve Felix!' with these words my stepmother entered at noon, and was so cast down by the news and so uneasy about its consequences, that all thoughts of startling me, and all the Metternich department, were forgotten.

Among those who have made their escape for debt, are the Mr. Bravanders (the same who on New-Year's-day challenged the devil so industriously to fetch them).

The 15th.

"Has Felix been here? Do you know anything of him?" asked Lennartson to-day, almost as he entered the lobby; and as we answered in the negative he appeared vexed, although he tried to conceal it. St. Orme, the Chamberlain, and a few other gentlemen, together with Lennartson, were here to dinner. The conversation soon turned to the Rutschenfelts again, who in part had taken flight, and in part were suspected of designing to take flight. Many persons were mentioned whom they had deceived, who had been robbed by them of the little which they possessed; families who were sunk in the deepest sorrow; mothers, brides, whose hope was annihilated, whose future was forever darkened. The old, venerable father of one of the fugitives had had a stroke in consequence of his grief—but it would be going too far to draw forth all the misfortune which was now passingly spoken of.

Lennartson was silent in the mean time, but I gave vent to my heart in a few excited words. St. Orme, who always sets himself in opposition to me, shrugged his shoulders at the tragical way in which people took such every-day affairs, the fuss which people made about a young man's youthful follies. He, for his part, pitied them sincerely, but he judged no man; people must not be too severe against the young. They must have time to run out their course; after this they returned to sense and prudence."

"That is very well said," remarked the Chamberlain, with a fine voice and fine satire, "and for my part, I will always say, 'the blessed (late) Rumler,' although I would not take an oath that the blessed man really is blessed; still I think that people should pay their debts and live decently in the world, and I think that it is rather venturesome to go over into the other, like Rum—like the blessed Rumler."

Lennartson now took up the affair, and with great seriousness; and fixing a quiet firm glance on St. Orme, he censured the conduct which had been described, and the temper of mind which could find it innocent. He described the operation of this on social life in general; he described a people in its decline—laxity of principle, its poisoned root—lust of pleasure and frivolity, taking the upper hand—the sanctity of a promise despised—order and honesty fled—with them confidence, security, readiness to oblige, all pure, all beneficial sentiments—all human ties poisoned—the sanctity and fresh gladness of life fled for ever. Thus was it with the old nations as they advanced towards their dissolution, towards their ignominious tardy death, a spectacle for pity and contempt. Thus will it be with us, if we do not seize with earnestness on life and on ourselves. "I wish," continued Lennartson, while his eyes flashed and the words came like thunder from his lips, "I wish that all honest men would brand with their abhorrence, and the better part of social life with its scorn, all those idlers, those young deceivers, who sacrifice all for the satisfying of their bad passions. I know only one character more worthy of punishment, more despicable than these, and that is he who, under the guise of cleverness, poisons their principles; under the guise of friendship seduces to misery, while he makes them the instruments, the victims of his selfishness, of his low schemes—in one word, the snake in social life, the calculating seducer!"

Was it the intention of Lennartson to hurl a lightning flash at St. Orme, or was it the bad conscience of the latter which made him struck; but certain it is, that for the first time I saw him deprived of his scornful assurance, for the first saw him smitten and confused. The blood had vanished from his cheeks. He attempted to smile, but the thin lips trembled convulsively. Flora saw him with amazement, and a sort of enjoyment! She seemed to feast herself on his pangs. She laughed—hideously—there was a stillness as of death at the table, and at once my stepmother made the move to rise, although the dessert had not been served, and all followed with readiness.

St. Orme soon recovered himself; one heard him soon after laughing and joking with the Chamberlain, but his laugh was not natural. He soon left the company, after he had cast a crafty, poisonous glance on Lennartson.

When our guests were gone, we were all of us extremely out of tune. I endeavoured to fix my stepmother's attention by one of the questions of the day, but it did not succeed.

It succeeded much better with the "Lady Councillors of Commerce," who came full of news, which they were as desirous of imparting as we of hearing. It concerned for the most part the Rutschenfelt company, and the disorder and misery which the fugitives had left behind them; the causes of the ruin of young men were also spoken of—among these were often mentioned unwise parents, bad example, neglected oversight in youth. With all these sorrowful relations, Mrs. and Miss P. helped us through the long evening. During this, two messengers had been sent to inquire after Felix, but they had not met with him at home.

After people had separated for the night, Selma and I lingered, as we often do, among the pictures in the inner ante-room, and contemplated them by the soft lamplight. Selma stood long before a painting after Guido Reni, which represents St. Michael, who, with the flames of anger in his divinely beautiful countenance, plants his foot upon the breast of Satan, and pierces him with his spear.

"Why does my Selma look at this picture so long?" asked I joining her; "it has something quite horrible in it."

"But something quite beautiful also," replied she. "It teaches us to understand what a holy anger is. Look at St. Michael's countenance! Tell me, does it not remind you of—is it not like—" Selma paused, and crimsoned with confusion.

"Lennartson, as we saw him to-day," said I, ending her sentence, and Selma's look told me that I had expressed her thoughts.

We were now disturbed by some one who opened the door of the drawing-room. It was the figure of a man wrapped in a wide cloak. This was thrown off, and we recognised Felix Delphin. But how changed he was! The pale, disfigured countenance had scarcely a trace of its former beauty.

"Selma!" said he, with an agitated voice, "do not be afraid of me. I will merely say farewell to you, before—"

"Before what, Felix?"

"Before I leave thee and Sweden for ever! O, Selma! I wished to see you once more, that I might pray you to think of me, and to pray for me when I am far from you!"

"Felix, why must you go?"

"Why, because I am—ruined, ruined by my weakness, by my folly. Property, health, honour, all are lost! I cannot, I will not live over my disgrace here."

"But is there no help? Cannot Lennartson—"

"No! Once before he rescued me from the hands of the usurer. Then I gave him my word of honour never again to be betrayed into them. I have broken this. Rather would I die than meet his look!"

"But I, but Flora! We are your nearest relations; we have some jewels—"

"Hush, good angel! I am not sunk yet so deep as to avail myself of—and besides, what purpose would that serve? Ah, Selma! all must now be ended between us. Here, have you your ring again. I am not worthy of you. Pray Lennartson to forgive me! Greet Flora! May she be worthy of him! And you, good angel—heaven bless you! Farewell!"

He kissed the folds of her dress, and was about to rush out, but was prevented by a man who stepped in the doorway and seized his arm with a stern—

"Whither, Felix?"

It was Lennartson. Felix gasped for breath, but in the next moment he made a violent effort to tear himself loose and to fly, but the Baron held him with a strong hand, and said sternly—

"Be quiet, boy! no stupidity! Will you make a scene before the people outside? Besides, this avails you nothing now. You now must follow me!"

"You will dishonour me!" stammered Felix, pale with impotent frenzy.

"You will dishonour yourself, but I will save you even against your own will," said Lennartson.

"It is too late!" exclaimed Felix.

"It is not too late," answered Lennartson. "I know all about you, and I promise to save you; and to this end I demand only one thing from you, that you at this moment enter into a bond with me, body and soul, and take not one step without my will or knowledge, but obey me in all things. And in the first place, I desire that you follow quite quietly to my carriage, which stands before the door."

Lennartson had said this with a low voice, as if he would be heard by Felix only, but the strong emphasis which he laid upon his words caused me, although I stood at a distance, not to lose one of them. Felix seemed annihilated; his will was subject to that of a mightier than himself, but he could scarcely endure himself.

He supported himself almost fainting against the wall.

"Lean on me," said Lennartson, quickly and tenderly, as he took the youth in his arms—"why are you afraid? Am I not your friend, your fatherly friend? Confide yourself to me! Come! be a man!"

Felix took courage truly at these words, and said mildly—

"Do with me what you will, I will obey."

Lennartson seeing that he hesitated, seized his arm, nodded to us kindly but deprecatingly, as we were about to call for help, and with a look which said 'be calm,' led the unfortunate young man away.

Selma threw herself into my arms agitated by excited feelings. I did not leave her through the night, which passed sleeplessly for us both, and I have written this in her chamber.

The 17th.

Felix is ill, but they say not dangerously. They have bled him, and Lennartson has watched by him through the whole night. Flora has also come this moment from him, and I am glad to see her really excited and uneasy about his condition.

In the Afternoon.

Lennartson has just been here, so good, so full of consolation! Felix's affairs are not nearly so bad as he himself imagined. A sudden influx of his creditors, who were alarmed by the flight of his friends, their threats, his entire want of money, together with his ignorance of the real state of his affairs, had occasioned his despairing determination. Lennartson was quite sure of being able to save him out of his embarrassments, although various difficulties were to be overcome.

As we expressed our vexation about the trouble and the time which this wretched business would cost, Lennartson said mildly—

"May Felix only allow himself to be saved by this grave warning! I will then not complain about that which has happened, neither on my account nor on his!"

"How good you are! How infinitely good you are! Ah, that Felix, and we all of us, could only once rightly thank you!" With these words, Selma turned herself involuntarily to Lennartson, with tearful and beaming eyes.

He seemed surprised, and his cheeks coloured as he said—

"Such words from Miss Selma? Can I deserve them? But I will do that, will do anything which in any way can contribute—to make you happy!"

There was melancholy in the earnestness with which he said this, whilst he took Selma's hand, and looked deeply into her eyes. But her eyelids sank hastily, and she grew pale, whilst she, as it were, retreated before his searching, warm glance. At this moment Flora entered, and threw upon both a look of flaming jealousy. Selma withdrew quickly. Lennartson was still and abstracted, and soon went away.

Flora then turned to Selma, and said cuttingly, "that was indeed a very affecting scene, which I disturbed! Might one inquire what kind of tender pourings took place? Silent? It looks as if you were all in a compact against me. Selma blushes like a guilty person. You also Selma, you against me also? Yes, then stand I solitary, forsaken."

"Flora! Flora! No such words, if you will not kill me!" cried Selma, with the expression of the most violent pain, and rushed out.

"Flora!" said I, "you are really not deserving of such a friend as Selma."

"Let me be!" replied she, "I do not trouble myself about the whole world."

I followed Selma, and found her in the room, fallen upon her knees, and with her head bowed in her hands.

"Selma!" prayed I, "do not let Flora's absurd words go to your heart. You yourself know, and so do we all, how innocent you are."

"No! no!" exclaimed Selma, with vehemence.

"I am no longer innocent! O Sophia, it is that which makes me unhappy. I am false towards her. I feel it now. Innocent, indeed, as to all intention, all wishes; but not as to all feelings, all secret thoughts. O Sophia, I am guilty!"

"That you are not!" said I confidently; and I now used all my eloquence to reconcile the young girl with herself. I made it clear to her that she could not annul Lennartson's connexion with Flora; nay, even that she might sacrifice her own happiness to promote that of the other. This Selma was obliged to concede, and she raised her head. Then I said to her that such a love as hers to such a man as Lennartson was not a sentiment of which any one need be ashamed. It was at the same time both noble and ennobling. And at last I hit upon a happy thought, that of representing myself as a rival of Flora's, but as an obdurate one, because no noble female mind could remain indifferent to manly worth and manly amiability like his; and I, on this ground, gave myself full permission to love Lennartson.

Selma could not help smiling at this, and smiling through tears, she threw her arms round my neck. I left her, reconciled in some measure to herself, to find Flora. She also was in her chamber; and as I entered I saw her hastily concealing in her bosom a small white bottle which she held in her hand; red and white alternated upon her cheeks. As I saw how deeply unhappy she was, I talked gently with her; spoke of Selma's purity and tenderness; of all our wishes to see Flora calm and happy. I prayed her with warmth to meet us, and to have confidence in us.

Flora listened to me with a depressed brow; and said all at once, with warmth—

"Sophia! I have been for some time fearfully unhappy! I am afraid of myself. There are moments when I am capable of anything merely to obtain the end—the end! Yes, if it then were merely at an end, for ever at an end! But I know—or more properly, I fear that which may come afterwards! Ah, that nothing can end! I am so weary! If you have any love for me, do not leave me much alone! I cannot then answer for myself. How the sun out there shines so whitely upon the snow, as if there were no confusion and darkness in the world. It is all one! Will you go with me to the Unknown? Perhaps she may have a composing word for me."

I was willing, and soon ready. We went. But as we neared the house of the Unknown, we found on the narrow path fresh fir-tree twigs strewn upon the snow; it led us to her door, which was fastened. The Unknown had the day before removed to in the Solna churchyard.*

*The death-still, fir-crowned couch,

"This door closed also!" said Flora darkly, as we betook ourselves homeward. But now opened themselves the floodgates of my eloquence, and in the deep desire to comfort Flora, and in the strong feeling of what life has of great and good, I said many things—well, I believe. But people flatter themselves always in that way. It did not, however, fail entirely, for Flora listened to me calmly, and as we came towards home, she pressed my hand with a friendly, almost melancholy 'thanks, Sophia!' Yet she remained reserved as before.

Ah! I preach wisdom to others, and yet have acted unwisely myself; I try to give comfort, and yet there is no peace in my own heart. At home is disquiet. My stepmother shews coldness towards me, and yet I know not why.

Wilhelm! Thou with the rich, warm heart, thou who wast open to me at all times, at all times affectionate towards me, where art thou? O what a pang to have wounded thee, to have removed thee! For thee—at thy feet fall these burning, penitent tears. Thou hast never shed such;—well for thee!

The 23d.

Heavy, black days,—days in which life resembles a sleep, where nothing will go forward; not even self-improvement, which ought never to stand still! There hangs, as it were, a heavy cloud over us. Flora is, as usual, torn by restless spirits, and Selma is no longer what she was.

My stepmother is in an excited state of mind. I see plainly that the singular conversations which I have sometimes with one and another in the family, do not please her. She looks as if she suspected me of exciting commotions in the house.

Felix in the mean time is better, but his health appears deranged by the irregular life which he has led. He recovers slowly. Lennartson endeavours to animate his mind, and to cheer his spirits. He often spends the evenings in reading Sir Walter Scott's romances to him.

True are the words, 'nobody is so good as the strong.'

The 25th.

A little joy! 'Ake Sparrsköld and Helfrid Rittersvärd are declared betrothed!' With these words my stepmother startled me to-day, and was herself enlivened by the occurrence, which has given great pleasure to her good, old friend. My stepmother will, in order to celebrate this betrothal, give in the next week a soirée, which will redound to the honour of the house. Hereby she seems to wish to repress various unquiet reports respecting the affairs of the family which have begun to circulate, but as I hope—without foundation. But so long as St. Orme comes sneaking here, and has private conversation with my stepmother, I am not sure. Another bad sign is also that our 'spasmodic acquaintance' have not been seen here for some time.

The 29th.

The cloud sinks lower and lower; it becomes more and more twilight around us. My stepmother wished yesterday to have a new carpet in the great anteroom for her festival. The old one has long been disagreeable to her, and has besides this several spots; in one word she wished altogether to have a new and handsome carpet. But Selma opposed herself mildly, and said beseechingly, "Ah, let us have no great outlay just now, not till we see how our affairs stand!"

From this I remarked with terror that Selma (who manages the domestic economy of the house) cherished suspicions which she had hitherto concealed from me.

The Philosopher came in at that moment, and said in his gloomy voice—

"The bills, your honour," and laid a bundle of papers on the table. My stepmother threw an uneasy look upon it, and pushed it from her as she said to Selma—

"My sweet girl! look them through—I cannot do it now. It is horrible what a miserable voice Jacob has sometimes. He quite terrifies me—I confess that at times it makes me quite poorly."

Selma embraced her mother silently, took the accounts, and went with them into her own room. My stepmother was still and thoughtful. She leaned her head back on the sofa cushion, and there was something in her handsome pale countenance that went to my heart. It was late in the evening, and the lamp burned dim. Methought that shadows of care and anxiety gathered around her, and that thereby her face became ever paler, ever older. Quiet wishes for the repose of the grave, for all, pressed through my soul.

The 3d of April.

To-day after breakfast, as I was alone with my stepmother, she introduced the affair of the carpet. She could not bear the dirty spots. Besides this, we were to have on Wednesday an elegant musical soirée. How could one let such a carpet lie on the floor; what would people think of the family that could endure such a one? A new one should be purchased on this very day. I attempted to oppose it a little, spoke of the expense and of the superfluity of such an outlay, and so on; all with the greatest friendship and mildness; but my stepmother took it very ill, and exclaimed at once—

"I must pray you, my best Sophia, not to be at all troubled about my private affairs—and I wish also that in other cases you would not too much rule in my house. I have hitherto been able to rule pretty well and to provide for myself and mine, and I do not think I am quite incapable of doing so still. Emancipate yourself as much as you like, that I cannot prevent; but let me also have my freedom, I beseech of you!"

The absurdity of this sally excited and troubled me at the same time. I sat silent with tearful eyes, and was thinking whether and how I should answer, when we heard St. Orme's voice without in the hall. With a kind of shock my stepmother started and said to me, "tell him that I am not well, and that I cannot receive him," and with that she hastened into her room.

"Alone!" exclaimed St. Orme, as he entered, "where are the others to-day? I come to say farewell to you for a few weeks. I am intending to go to W—s for a little fresh air and hunting. But I am afraid you will certainly miss me very much?"

I was silent. Jest I could not now, and I could not say to him seriously, as I thought, "it pleases me indescribably that you are going away."

"You are silent!" continued St. Orme, "and who is silent consents, it is said. Where are the other ladies? Will they remain invisible to-day?"

"My stepmother is unwell and can see no one," replied I; "Flora is gone to her brother, and Selma is otherwise engaged."

"Then it looks as if we should have a little," continued St. Orme. "I have no objection, because I have one or two things to say to you. Listen, my best cousin! I have several reasons to believe that you are not of the best service to me in this house. What have you against me, if I may ask? Perhaps I have not been polite enough to you, have not flattered you enough? In the mean time, I advise you as a friend, not to intrigue against me, you have 'affaire à trop forte partie;' you would do better to come over to my side, and persuade Flora to consent to that which she cannot escape."

"I do not understand you," answered I, somewhat proudly, "neither do I understand intrigues; but I mean always to speak out openly my honest thoughts when any one asks for them, and neither flattery nor threats shall prevent my doing so."

"Superb, and Finnish in an especial manner," said St. Orme, as he looked at me, with a cold, sarcastic mien, which would have confused me, if it had not operated in the contrary manner, namely, steeled me. "I see how it is," continued he a moment afterwards with contemptuous coldness, "and I will tell you how it will be. All your Finnish magic arts will be in vain, and the conquest will remain mine yet. Adieu! many greetings. Forget me not!" With this he seized my resisting hand, and shook it with a malicious, triumphant look.

Flora entered at this moment, and her suspicious mind saw a friendly alliance in that which was almost the contrary. She cast some lightning glances upon St. Orme and me, and turned her back to him as he approached her. He then said coldly—

"Adieu, belle cousine! au revoir!" and went.

"How! have you and St. Orme become suddenly such good friends?" asked Flora, as she approached me with almost a wild look. "Have you made a compact with him to betray me? Confess it, confess it honestly, Sophia! You do not wish me to be Lennartson's wife, you consider him too good for me; you wish him to have another. Deny it not! People do not so easily deceive me, and I have seen through you for a long time. But to enter into complot with St. Orme—I did not think that you would have carried your hatred to me so far."

This new injustice caused me more pain than anger. I said warmly, "O Flora, how unjust you are to me! But you are unhappy, and I forgive you."

With these words I went out of the room.

I found that it was my destiny to-day to be misunderstood at home, and felt a certain longing to go out. I dressed myself therefore, and went.

It was as if the heavy cloud which had rested so long above me now sent down all its lightning flashes upon my head. It seemed to me that I must resemble the scapegoat, and should be burdened with other people's faults and failings; a thousand excited feelings boiled in my breast, till I came out of the city-gate, and felt the air breathe cold upon my brow.

The spirit of spring had breathed upon the earth, and it thawed strongly,—foot passengers walked carefully upon the melting ice; glittering drops fell from the roofs. The heaven was the colour of lead; but here and there opened themselves the eyelids of the clouds in order to send forth some pale beams of light, which resembled smiles in tears. The air was still and somewhat heavy, but there was a twittering of hundreds of little birds which played in the leafless trees, and these had I know not what strange odour, which reminded me of the sea, and of fir woods, and was full of spring life. I remained standing on the field covered with trees which is directly opposite to the castle, and drank in full draughts of the spring-air, listened to the rushing of the river, and let my eyes contemplate the manifoldly changing world. Then was it to me as if the spirit of the heaths of Finland blew upon me, and awoke the child-feeling in my soul. Clouds and mist fled, and like singing larks, arose the bright, the great thoughts which make life beautiful. Conscious purity exercised itself strong in victory, and—in one word, I was as if changed.

I know not whether it is—as one of my friends says—'better to be a magic spirit than nothing;' but certain is it, that there lives in me somewhat of that magic nature which, from the very ancient times, is said to have its home in my native land. This something I do not comprehend myself, but I feel it as a something wonderful, a momentarily upflaming strength, which will and which can. In such moments nothing is impossible to me. I am conscious of a power to loose and to bind the spirits of others. Primeval words stir within me; yes, there are moments when I feel that I can enchant human souls to me, and—I do it! In my younger days, I had much of this heathenish magic. This since then has been baptized in the spirit-waves of suffering, christened in the fire of love; but rooted out it is not, and it arises in me sometimes quite unexpectedly. I know that it has played me many pranks; but I know also, that when reason has not helped me, magic has, and has given to me both words and songs, to sing myself free from the chains of life, and has enabled me, like the old Wäinämöine, to sing both sun and moon into the thread of my life. And there are moments in which I can turn every stick which may lie as an impediment in my path into a winged steed, upon which I can ride out of the narrow chimneys of life—not exactly to Blakulla—but forth into the free, fresh, blue space.*

The difficulty in such life-strong moments is not having any difficulties to overcome, no impediments to conquer, no hero deeds to achieve. That was my sorrowful condition. Because to seek out and purchase a splendid carpet to lay at my stepmother's feet, a carpet with a heaven-blue ground, strewn with stars, flowers and magic figures, would require no magic power. In the mean time I felt a delight in it; and whilst in spirit I pleased myself with overcoming St. Orme, Flora, and the whole world, and wrote letters to all my friends—for it is astonishing what I do at such times—I wandered without any plan on the quay by the river, and saw the ice-blocks break up on the Riddarfjärd, and the heaven softly clear itself over the liberated waters. Downwards along the river parterre my 'spiritus' led me, and towards the side where the waves boomed most mightily.

Ah! it was there where I once stood with Wilhelm Brenner, heard the waves rage in his breast, and saw a heaven clear itself in his eyes. And these remembrances seized on my soul with painful power,—but—gracious heaven! Was it indeed true? Was it he who again stood there, leaning over the iron railing, and looking down into the foaming deep? It was he! One look was sufficient to convince me of it, and I softly approached him. The magic arose again within me. I knew that he could not escape me, knew that I at this moment should have power over him. What I felt, of life and will and warmth within me, no words could express; but all this I laid in my hand, and I laid it softly upon his arm. He started up as if touched by an electric spark, and looked strong and full into my face. I looked quietly at him, and merely whispered—

* In case this manuscript should fall into the hands of strangers, I will herewith expressly declare, that this must not be taken literally.

“Wilhelm!”

He continued to look at me, but his glance changed; it became inexpressibly heartfelt, and with a sigh from the depths of his soul, he said,

“Sophia, is it thou?”

And we were thou and thou, for we were wholly one at this moment.

Again he said slowly and softly, “is it thou, Sophia? It is a long time since I have seen thee.”

“Art thou still angry with me?” asked I, and my tears fell, for I saw by his countenance that he had suffered.

“I cannot be so,” answered he, “I cannot be so if I would. Thoughts on thee soften my soul, and when thou lookest on me thus with thy clear, lovely eyes, then methinks that all is good. Thou knowest thy power well, Sophia.”

“O Wilhelm! then we are friends, friends for ever. I cannot indeed be otherwise if my faults do not part us. I never had a brother, but I have wished very much for one. Be to me a brother!”

He answered not, but looked at me mildly, although gravely.

But I was happy in this mildness, so happy to have again found my friend, and to be able to feel again the strong inward harmony which united us, that I regarded this new compact as ratified, and talked to him of it out of the fulness of my heart, how it had been between us, and how it yet would be; of the exalted strength and sweetness of friendship; of its power to ennoble the heart and to beautify life. He heard me calmly, but he replied not. At length he cut short the discourse rather abruptly by saying,

“Hast thou been comfortable at home, since I last saw thee? How do Lennartson and Flora go on? What is St. Orme doing?”

I was happy to open my heart to Brenner, and to be able to tell him what it had endured during his absence. When he heard of St. Orme's behaviour and threats, the Viking raged, and was about to leave me, in order to call him to account.

“He has left Stockholm,” said I heartily, “and does not return for some time.” ‘Take council of the storm how to still the tempest,’ said I to myself, whilst the Viking grumbled at St. Orme for his intrigues, and at Flora for her want of integrity, and with me for not having cleared up the business, and for not having earlier communicated to him an affair which so nearly concerned Lennartson.

“Now there again,” thought I, “I shall always be blamed for misfortune.”

“The only thing,” continued Brenner, “which consoles me is the secret persuasion that it would be good for Lennartson if he were well rid of Flora. She is at bottom not at all suitable for him, and I am very much deceived if he do not himself feel this, and secretly, in the depths of his heart, incline to another—what thinks Sophia? Is not thy sister Selma the one whom he loves, and who, according to my thoughts, is formed to make him happy?”

I could do no other than tell Brenner, that I had secretly his suspicions and his wishes; but Flora lay near to my heart. The rich gifts of her soul, her excited and unhappy condition, had fettered me to her.

“When St. Orme comes home again—” said Brenner. He did not end his sentence, but I heard in the depths of his soul that he would compel him to speak out for good or bad.

We were now by my home, and as we were about to separate, I said beseechingly to the Viking—

“Thou wilt come again to us, to me, my brother Wilhelm!”

“Yes! I will come.”

“When?”

“When thou wishest it.”

“To-morrow!”

“To-morrow!”

“Thanks!”

He pressed my hand kindly and warmly as before, and with a happier and lighter heart than I had had for a long time, I hastened up to my room, that I there in stillness might sing Te Deum out of the fullness of my soul.

I then thought about establishing peace with my stepmother; but for this purpose I must go to work in a diplomatic manner.

People who are intrinsically good always speedily repent of the violence and unreasonableness into which their tempers have misled them; and I now know my stepmother sufficiently to be certain that she was vexed with herself for her excess towards me, and would gladly make the amende honorable, if this were only consistent with her character and her dignity. To come to her now with the new carpet would have been to humiliate her; she could not have borne this and her own injustice. The affair must be managed in another way.

I went down, therefore, and, as if nothing had happened, entered the room where my stepmother was sitting on the sofa with a gloomy and annoyed looked, whilst Selma sat reading in a window, and presented myself unaffrighted, as in great want of some black silk for my dress.

“I certainly believe that I have some of the same kind,” said my stepmother, rising up hastily from her sofa, and going to her drawer, where several pieces of black silk soon showed themselves, which she, with the most friendly zeal, besought me to take and use. And I allowed myself to take them, together with some beautiful black lace, which I did not want, but which my stepmother, in the warmth of her heart, felt a necessity of giving to me; herewith she ended with a little gratuitous treatise on prohibitive-measures, luxury, and national economy; and of this I also obtained more than

I wished. But I was in a grateful state of mind, and received this like the rest, as was right.

As now my stepmother was become so considerably lighter by articles of luxury and learning, I could without any scruple burden her with the carpet; but I determined to wait with it till the next morning. I was now for myself satisfied with the position of affairs, and thought that my stepmother was so too, and betook myself, with peace, to my own room. It was, therefore, a surprise to me as I saw my stepmother enter, and heard her say with the most amiable kindness, and with tears in her eyes—

"I must beg Sophia to forgive my violence this morning: I cannot tell how I could be so disagreeable. But thou knowest well that thy old mother does not mean so ill, though she is sometimes irritable when many things weigh on her temper. In the mean time, I can hardly forgive myself—"

This was, in truth, too much, and I was very near falling at my stepmother's feet in deep reverential feeling. We, however, sank merely into each other's arms, but never rested we with more heartfelt affection on one another's breast; or, more correctly, that was the first time that we ever had so rested. I was deeply excited, according to my ancient usage on such occasions. My stepmother was less so; but she spoke well and beautifully of herself and her failings, and of our duty in all ages of life to amend our faults; she thought on this subject with Madame Genlis—"I cannot bear to hear elderly people say, I am too old to mend. I would rather forgive young ones if they said, I am too young! Because, when one is no longer young, one must especially labour to perfect oneself, and to replace by good qualities what one loses in the agreeable."

I did justice inwardly to my stepmother and Madame de Genlis,* and noted down the words for my own account; and satisfied with one another, and somewhat satisfied with ourselves, my stepmother and I parted.

The 4th.

The carpet was spread out this morning by the servants of the house, and received my stepmother as she came in to breakfast. She was as much surprised and pleased as I could have wished, and Selma regained her former temper, and danced before her mother upon the stars and flowers of the carpet.

This little scene has diffused some look of joy through the house.

'By presents and exchange of presents is friendship cemented,' says one of our prudent old bards.

My stepmother is now full of joyful thoughts respecting our soirée on Wednesday evening, and has desired us, the daughters of the house, to make a handsome and elegant toilet.

R R

April 5th.

The Viking has received the command of the frigate Desirée, which sails in spring to the Mediterranean. He remains out perhaps two years. This news startles me. Why will he—yet perhaps it is best so. In the mean time it is hard to me.

The 8th.

Yesterday was our soirée, and right beautiful it was and turned out well. Flora, who since St. Orme's absence has seemed to breathe more freely, had again one of her times of beauty and bloom. She was dressed as when I saw her at first, in crimson gauze. Selma in light blue crape, and I in white muslin and lace. My stepmother contemplated us with pleasure as we assembled ourselves in the room before the guests came, and was proud of her daughters, whom she called les trois Grâces, and said that I looked 'vestal-like.'

A quantity of beautiful flowers adorned the room—it was right festal and beautiful. The new carpet glowed under our feet, and warmed my stepmother's heart.

Such an evening has its fate, like every thing else in the world; and if it be not worth while to place much importance upon it, still it is pleasant if the fairy of joy and not of ennui holds the sceptre.

A great deal depends upon whether any one in the company can or will take the magic staff in hand; and the sylph did that this evening, and continually spun her invisible flowery chains around the company. As my stepmother herself received all the guests in the inner ante-room, all collected themselves there, and it was much crowded and very hot. Selma therefore took the arm of Helfrid Rittersvård, and proposed to her and some other young ladies, that 'they should go and found a colony' in the other ante-room. They emigrated, and others of the company soon followed them, so that the colony, as Selma jestingly remarked to her young friends, flourished very much in a short time. Gentlemen and ladies did not divide themselves into separate herds as is the usual and wearisome way in our northern assemblies, but joined in little circles, and endeavoured mutually to be agreeable to each other, and a lively and a noisy conversation arose. That we had with us some literary and scientific notables, some 'lions' (N. B. of the noblest breed), added importantly to the splendour of the evening. My stepmother was brilliant. Helfrid Rittersvård and her bridegroom looked inwardly happy, and her agreeable, easy, and calm demeanour diffused as usual gladness around her. A skål for her was proposed by my stepmother at supper, and was drank with solemnity.

Flora's sister, the 'beauty,' looked this evening uncommonly little of a beauty. One saw plainly that the charm of her youth was over, and that the time approached when people would say 'she does not please me.'

For my part I never thought much of Flora's sister, and I never found that she had more than two thoughts in her soul, 'the theatre and dress.' But there dwelt this evening on her countenance an expression of dejection and secret pain, which made me seek her out when she withdrew from the animated drawing-room into my stepmother's room, which was merely lighted by a shaded lamp and adorned with white flowers. In this pretty blooming little world ate the fading 'beauty,' supporting her brow upon her hand. I spoke friendly words to her, and my voice must have testified of my sympathy, for by degrees she opened her inmost heart, and this had now interest for me.

* But I beg pardon of my stepmother and Madame de Genlis, it is Madame de Sevigné who has said these good words in one of her letters.

"I feel," said she, among other things, "that I have sacrificed too much to the world. The world and mankind are so thankless! I have wished too much to please people. This will now no longer succeed. Now that I am no longer young, nor rich, nor have any longer that which pleases or flatters them, they withdraw themselves and leave me alone, and I—I know not whither I should turn myself. Methinks the world grows dark around me—I feel as it were, a fear of spectres—it is so empty, so desolate—I have nothing which interests me—the days are so long—I have ennui!"

The bitter tears which followed these words, expressed more strongly even than words the lamentable in the condition of the complainer. And what, indeed, is heavier to bear than the emptiness of life? What, indeed, is more horrible than that twilight in life, without a star in heaven, without one single little light on earth?

But if one cannot kindle for oneself such a little light? If one can borrow no fire from a good neighbour? Ah! light and warmth, objects of interest, activity and joy, present themselves so abundantly in life, that nothing is more difficult for me to comprehend than that any one can suffer from ennui. One must in that case be bound hand and foot, and then one must be released by friendly hands! And a liberated soul, to whom life presents itself in its beauty and its greatness—how glorious!

Like a balloon filled with the air of life felt I at this thought, ready to ascend up aloft, and to carry the Beauty with me on the journey—to the sun. I began to talk (as I thought, particularly like the Book of Wisdom) about life and its objects, about mankind and social life, of the relationship of the individual to the whole, and so on; and then turned from this to the particular sphere of life of my auditor, and proposed to her that she should adopt a couple of orphan children, and educate them for good and happy human beings.

The Beauty on this looked at me with a pair of large astonished eyes; "she really had never thought of that," said she, rather coldly, and as if a little affronted at the proposition.

I then spoke of interesting oneself in public institutions; of the happiness and honour of managing such benevolent establishments, and thus to benefit society by their life and activity. I mentioned my wishes and schemes of living active in this manner; I spoke of one worthy object, of the excellent institution for the care of outcast children, and proposed to the Beauty in my zeal, that the next day she should go with me to visit it. Then for the first time I became aware of her looking at me with a countenance that seemed to say, 'is this person actually insane?' and I then observed too that I had strained my sails too high. Half smiling at myself, I endeavoured to direct my course towards regions which lay nearer to the sphere of the Beauty; but I found her to be so strange and stiff towards everything which appeared to me beautiful and cheerful, that I felt myself quite without counsel, and only began to breathe freely when I saw the Chamberlain approaching us. With the zeal with which a person turns from an enemy to a friend, turned herself the Baroness Bella from me to my uncle, and ac-knowledgeed with animation all those politenesses which he shewed towards her, and among the rest, that he had lent her his box for the last representation of Norma. "I am so full of gratitude," I heard her say to him.

"Ah, my best cousin," replied he in his jocular tone, "it would be a deal better if you were full of chandeliers! For I just now need such for one or two rooms, and I know not where to get any that are suitable."

The Baroness Bella answered laughing, "that although she herself was no furniture-magazine, yet she could give him the address of one where he could get quite divine chandeliers."

The Chamberlain was indescribably glad to be able to get 'divine chandeliers,' and was still more glad to be enlightened by the glance and taste of the Baroness Bella. A party was arranged for the next morning to see the chandeliers, and with a side-glance at me, my uncle besought the Beauty to make use of his box at the opera for the next abonnements-day. She became still fuller of gratitude, and he still fuller of politeness; I felt more and more superfluous during this été-à-l'été, and left them somewhat melancholy—but a little amused also.

I returned to the remainder of the company. The Viking was there, but in a grave and almost gloomy humour; he talked with nobody, and did not approach me. That grieved me; the more so as I had not seen him since I had heard of his approaching and adventurous journey. I would gladly have said something to him, but had not the courage. I had this evening no magic tokens in me, but was merely quite an ordinary woman. I saw by the look of the Viking that it was stormy within him, and that made me afraid.

They asked me to play something, and as I seated myself at the pianoforte and saw Brenner approach, it occurred to me that I could converse with him in sound, and in this way would say to him what I could not clothe in words. I selected, therefore, one of Felix Mendelssohn's "Lieder ohne Worte," whose character is, that under suffering and combat it expresses a something victorious, ascending; a song, a poem, the peculiar beauty of which has always deeply spoken to my soul. I played too with my whole heart, and wished to infuse into Brenner the feelings which animated me, and to elevate us both above earthly struggles and earthly sufferings. And I thought that he knew, that he understood me.

Lennartson, Selma, and several others had assembled round the piano, and listened to the music. When I had ended, Brenner's honest glance met mine. Lennartson said to him—

"That piece reminds me of the history of your Egyptian vulture, Brenner! Tell it us, and Miss Adelen shall say whether it do not contain the words of this song."

Brenner now related—

"It was in Egypt, near to Thebes. I rambled one morning out into the surrounding desert to hunt, and happened to see a vulture sitting not far from me, among the ruins of fallen monuments. This bird is known for its strong power of life, and is dangerous to approach when it is wounded; it has a strength almost incredible. I shot at him, and hit him on the breast, and as I believed mortally. He remained, however, sitting quietly in his place, and I rushed to him that I might complete my work, but in that same moment the bird raised itself, and mounted upwards. Blood streamed from his breast, and a part of his entrails fell out, but notwithstanding this he continued to ascend still higher and higher, in wider and wider circles. A few shots which I fired after him produced no effect. It was beautiful, in the vast silent wilderness to see this bird, mortally wounded and dyeing the sand with his blood, silently circling upon his monstrous wings higher and ever higher; the last circuit which he made was unquestionably a quarter of a mile in extent; then I lost sight of him in the blue space of heaven."

"Ah, my stars! To have been in Egypt," now said the Chamberlain with his refined voice, "and to have seen vultures and crocodiles, and such things there! That must have been very interesting."

"Ah! tell us something more about Egypt and the crocodiles there," exclaimed little Miss M.

"Is social life cheerful in Egypt? And how do they carry on conversation?" asked the royal secretary Krusenberg.

I do not know how Brenner answered these attacks, for I left the circle as they began. During the course of the evening we did not come together again, but I saw by his looks, which were often directed to me, that his heart was full; and so, to say the truth, was mine likewise. Brenner's approaching journey, the images which the music and the history of the vulture had called up, agitated me powerfully.

Was it a secret wish of us both, or was it chance merely, I know not in the least—but when all the guests had taken leave, and my stepmother, with Selma and Flora, had accompanied the last out, and now tarried with them in the hall in conversation, Brenner and I found ourselves alone in the white-flowered boudoir. We stood both of us silent; he excited, I embarrassed and depressed.

"Thou wilt take a journey," said I, at length.

He answered not.

"It will be a great journey," said I again; "wilt thou be long away?"

"Yes!" replied he, with half-suppressed vehemence. "Yes, I shall remain away a long time. I journey because it is too stifling for me, too confined for me, at home; because I must hence, to where I no longer see, no longer hear thee!"

He seized my hand and pressed it upon his eyes, and I felt that it was bathed with tears. "Oh!" continued he, "this is childishness! But let me dream for a moment! It will soon be past. Be not afraid, Sophia! I will, I wish nothing more than to see thee for one moment and to be happy in loving thee, and that I thus may love thee, although thou hast rejected me. I never loved any one better; I have been happy in the feeling, in the foolish hope that thou shared it with me, that we were made for each other, that thou wouldst wish—but it is past! And after this, my love, near thee, would be my torment. When the storm in my breast has laid itself to rest, I will return to my children and to thee. Think of me when I am far from here—think that my heart belongs not to those which thou mayest despise! Weep not;

I do not complain. I wish not to have loved thee less. Upon the waves of the ocean, or in the deserts of Africa, I shall feel myself rich in this love. Wish me not freed from it if thou wishest me not a misfortune. I shall love thee now and for ever. I challenge thee to let it be otherwise, but—it is the last time I shall speak to thee on this subject. And now farewell! Farewell, my Sophia! God bless thee!" And before I was able to bethink myself, he had embraced and—left me.

That was a tempest. I was not calm after it; I was not calm for a long time. But if he have found peace upon his stormy sea, I should be satisfied that—

The 15th.

It is many days since he has been here. That is sad, but I dare not murmur. He does that which is right and manly. This tender but proud heart will not complain, will not shew its wound; but like the bird of the wilderness, will conceal itself and its pangs in the open, lofty space, where no human eye comes near. He is high and noble-minded, but I—!

A peace pervades the house which we have not known for a long time. This is occasioned by Flora's more calm and cheerful state of mind. But how long will this continue!

The 19th and 20th, in the Night.

Yesterday Flora was rather unwell, and on that account staid at home from a dinner-party, where my stepmother went with Selma. I have a peculiar friendship for invalids; think that they are my children; and treat them in a manner under which they commonly prosper. It was therefore a little pleasure to me to stay yesterday with Flora, and whilst I tenderly and jestingly took the care of her on myself, and we spoke of various horrible things in our great hatred, our hearts neared each other more than they had ever before done. In the afternoon I read aloud to her while she lay upon the sofa in the inner ante-room. As I made a pause in the reading in order to rest myself, Flora said—

"You are quite too good, Sophia. And if I were but good, that is to say, if I were calm and satisfied, then perhaps I should be able to thank you as I now cannot.—I am not a bad person, but—but one may be driven out of oneself, one may become insane, if one be hunted and followed as I have been for some time. Have you not observed a great change in me in the last few days? That is because my pursuer has left me at peace. I have known nothing about him for some time; I do not understand—can it indeed be possible that he has left me for ever!—that I am liberated? Ah, that it might be so! You should see a new—"

"How is it here?" inquired a clear, friendly voice; and Signora Luna shewed her face at the door. She is always a welcome guest, and though I now wished her in the moon because she had interrupted a conversation which had a great interest for me, still she was received as usual, and threw herself comfortably into a corner of the sofa, and continued with friendly talkativeness.

"It is rightly pleasant to me that I find you two alone, because I shall sit myself down here for the afternoon, and talk about one thing and another which lie at the bottom of my heart.

Do you here at home know what report is circulating through the city?"

"Of what? of whom?" inquired I.

"Of Flora. People say that she is to marry St. Orme, and accompany him to Constantinople, where he goes in spring as minister. Can it be possible?"

"I truly do not know;" said I, with a glance at Flora.

Flora turned pale. "The rattlesnake is near!" whispered she, "I hear him coming."

"Ah! why should not people know things which pass before their eyes?" said Countess G—, half impatiently and half jestingly; "when all things come round then Flora does not herself know whether she be betrothed, and with whom. But what I know is, that I will do all in my power that report may have said that which is untrue. Flora is my own cousin, and I love Flora, and I do not wish her to be unhappy, and unhappy she will be with St. Orme. He is a bad fellow; that I know. He sacrificed his first wife, and he will do the same by the second too—depend upon me—there is nothing which drags down both soul and body more than an unhappy marriage."

With this the beautiful eyes of the Countess G— were filled with tears.

At that moment we heard the doors violently opened, and proud steps go through the room, and the great Alexander soon entered the apartment where we were sitting. After he had shortly greeted Flora and me, he turned towards his wife, and said with a domineering air—

"I fancy, my friend, that you heard me say this morning that I wished you not to go out this afternoon, but be at home when I came from dining at L—'s."

"Ah, my best friend, I had quite forgotten that. I did not know that the affair was so important."

"Important! It is not my custom to say anything without good reason, and what I said this morning I had well considered, and had sufficient motive for. The determination of a man cannot be deranged by the whims of a woman, and therefore I hope you will be so good as to follow me home immediately."

"My best Alexander, let me stop here quietly, as I am come here. I sit so excellently, and—I have something of importance to talk with my friends about. I will come home to you when this is ended. Let me for once do in the world as I wish."

"Not at all! you will be so good as to accompany me immediately. And if you will have a good reason for it, see here, I will it! tout simplement."

"But I also have a will," exclaimed Signora Luna with suddenly kindling energy, whilst her eyes flashed like actual moonstones, "till now it has lain asleep, but if you teach me to use it, it may become stronger than yours. And now I will stop here, and not go hence till I will. And if you agree not to this separation, I shall soon seek a longer!"

The great Alexander was evidently greatly confounded by this sudden outbreak of will and passion in his usually passive wife. He appeared to be afraid before it, and murmuring something about 'ladies' absurdities and caprices,' he withdrew.

Scarcely was he gone, when Lennartson came. Countess G— wished not to see him in the excited state in which she was, and went therefore into another room. There she said to me, after she had composed herself—

"It will be the best that I go away after a little while. I wish not to annoy him in earnest, but only to shew him that he must not go too far with his power. There is much that is good in Alexander, and there would have been much more had he not busied himself so much with Aristotle. Aristotle and logic have quite bewildered him. It is no use such men liking to humiliate women; then they are directly tyrants, and I shall shew Alexander—but go in, Sophia, methought Flora looked anxious as you came out; go in, and do not trouble yourself about me;—I will go my way softly and quietly when I think that it is time, for he must wait a little while; afterwards—but go in, go in!"

I followed the injunction, curious to see what took place between Lennartson and Flora.

When I came in, Flora was reading a letter which Lennartson seemed to have given her, and he stood in the window with his serious eyes inquiringly fixed upon her. She was quite pale, and said at the moment in which she laid down the letter—

"I cannot read it—it is black before my eyes! Read the letter aloud to me, Lennartson; Sophia may willingly hear all!"

Lennartson took the letter and read aloud with a firm voice. It contained a warning to Lennartson not to form any connexion with Flora, together with an exhortation to break off such a connexion in case it were formed. Flora was already bound by the ties of love and honour to another, and proofs of this would be made public if this exhortation were not attended to. The writer would unwillingly resort to extremities; and if Lennartson quietly withdrew from Flora, then everything which could impeach her should be buried in silence. The letter was subscribed 'Anonymous,' and was written evidently in a feigned hand.

No longer in a condition to control herself, Flora exclaimed with frenzy—

"Mean, crafty, detestable St. Orme!"

"Then it is he!!" said Lennartson, with a flaming glance, "it is he who is this disturber of peace! I have suspected it long; and now, Flora, now I will know what right, what ground he has for doing so. This hour must end our connexion, or cement it for ever. I have more than once besought for your full confidence—to-day, I must demand it."

"You shall know all," exclaimed Flora, with determination—"and you shall be my judge. But, O Thorsten! remember that even God's highest judgment is—mercy!"

Lennartson made no reply; he sat grave and dark, and seemed to wait for Flora's confession.

"Well, then," replied she, whilst she seemed powerfully to compel herself, "all then may be said. This St. Orme, when he was in Stockholm five years ago, paid his homage to me, and acquired—a certain power over me. His bold confidence, his talents, his powers of mind, which I then regarded as quite extraordinary, made an impression upon me. I fancied that I loved him. He misused my blindness, my inexperience, in order to seduce me into an exchange of letters, and the promise of eternal love and the like. St. Orme however troubled himself but little in the fulfilment of the promises which he made to me. I was at that time poor; and he left me for a journey to Paris, whence for a long time I heard nothing of him. In the mean time I became acquainted with you, Lennartson, and learned what real love is. I regarded myself as forgotten by St. Orme, and forgot also him and my childish, foolish promises. Ah! I forgot the whole world, when you, Lennartson, offered me your heart, and life dawned for me in new beauty. But I was now rich, and St. Orme came again and asserted his old pretensions. He had forgotten Flora, but he called to mind the heiress. And I knew well that he sought not after my heart, but after my property; I loved him no longer, but—but I was obliged to conciliate him and to operate in kindness upon his hard heart, in order to obtain those imprudent, unfortunate letters which he had in his power, and which he dishonourably threatened to produce against me, if I did not break off my engagement with you, and consent to give him my hand. See, then, Lennartson, the secret, the many months of darkness, contention, and opposition, of my existence. I hoped for a long time to be able to conquer him; I have combated long—but this hour shews me that all is in vain. St. Orme has driven me to the utmost extremity; to this confession, which my pride, my womanly shame, my love to you Thorsten, made me shun more than death. And now that all is said, and that this burthen is cast off from my heart—now I wonder that I should feel it to be so horrible; for Lennartson, you cannot regard a youthful indiscretion so great—you cannot for some foolish letters condemn me, deprive me of your love!”

“Have you told me all, Flora, all?”

“I have told you all.”

“Farewell, Flora!” He offered her his hand, which she held fast, and exclaimed with anxiety—

“Where! in mercy—in pity for me, tell me where you are going! What you will do!”

“By one means or another to get these letters out of St. Orme’s hands, and place them again in yours.”

“Thorsten, you are my redeeming angel!” replied Flora as she threw herself on her knees before him. Lennartson was gone already.

Selma came home—alone. Her mother spent the evening with Mrs. Rittersvärd. Selma was in part made acquainted with that which had occurred, and heard it with astonishment and disquiet; yet most of all she seemed surprised that Flora had not earlier opened her heart, and disclosed all that it contained to Lennartson. When she heard Lennartson’s last words she was confounded, and exclaimed—

“By one means or another, Flora! And you have let him take this resolve! You hazard his life!”

“Merciful heaven! is that possible?” cried Flora, “I never thought of that. But no! St. Orme would not venture—”

“St. Orme will venture every thing to obtain you. Lennartson to release you. St. Orme is known for a fortunate duelist; Lennartson abhors no danger, and I know that he regards duels in certain cases—Flora, Flora, what have you done!”

“And what would you that I should have done? Would you have had me sacrifice myself?” asked Flora gloomily.

Selma wrung her hands in despair.

“Fortunately,” continued Flora, “St. Orme is not in Stockholm, and—”

“Envoyé St. Orme is without, and desires to speak with Miss Flora,” announced the Philosopher now with an unearthly voice.

Flora turned pale. I fancy that we all turned pale.

“Go, Flora, go!” besought Selma almost commandingly—“go and speak with him. Prevent their meeting—save, save Lennartson!”

Flora looked at Selma with a dark expression, and turning to me said—

“Wilt thou go with me, Sophia! I will not again be alone with this man, but I will speak with him yet once more—I will attempt the utmost!”

I followed Flora. St. Orme stood in the large ante-room. He looked calm and self-possessed; went up to Flora, and wished to take her hand. She avoided this proudly, and cast upon him an annihilating glance.

He observed her coldly, and then said, “I see how it stands, and you also will soon see. Well then, what do you say? But—could we not speak without witness?”

“No! because I will not be again alone with a man like you.”

“Aha! that sounds severe. Well then! You must complain of yourself, if any thing comes out which you would rather have had concealed.”

“You are a mean slanderer, Adrian St. Orme!”

“Flora Delphin, let us avoid injurious words—at least, till there be further occasion; now they serve no purpose. Let us now talk candidly and reasonably. Let us look at the affairs as they are in their nakedness and truth; for what is the use of kicking against necessity? You have no better friend than I, Flora, and I can prove that thus I have been true to you spite of your whims. I have always behaved openly and honourably to you, even in telling you that you must be mine; that I would defy heaven and hell to prevent your becoming perjured. My love and my mode of thinking are of another kind to those of ordinary men; they take higher paths, and have higher aims. My will bows not either to weather or wind; what I will that will I, and—”

“Spare your words, St. Orme,” interrupted Flora, impatiently. “I know you now, and I will no more be befooled with fine speeches. Tell me in short what you wish, and I will tell you what I have determined.”

“What I wish, that you know—my love and my wishes you know. Let me now rather say what you wish.”

“What do I wish?”

“Yes, what you wish at the bottom. What you must wish. Or, think you, that I do not know you? Do you think that I have allowed myself to be bewildered with these convulsions in your feelings, by this spectre of a new love which has seized upon your imagination? Child! Child! No one has reposed upon my breast whose innermost soul I have not penetrated, whose slightest pulsation I have not heard. And to yours have I listened with the ears of sympathy and love—Flora you are deeply, deeply bound to me; not by your letters, your oaths, your love, which you have given to me—but by a mightier bond—by the depth of sympathy, by virtues, nay, even by failings; for even your failings are mine, and I know myself again in you. Fools command people to reform their errors. I have loved yours and adopted them, in order through them to make you happy. Look around you whether you can find such a love! And from this you will turn yourself, mistaking yourself and me! Do you think that your beauty, your talents, fettered me to you? hundreds possess these in a higher degree than you! No! it is your deeper self; your sublime, eccentric being, wandering and wavering, between heaven and hell! Upon the journey between these poles will I accompany you, you shall accompany me—sharing its perdition or its bliss! At this moment I offer you bliss! Confess yourself; you are no Northern maiden, Flora, and cannot be measured by the temperate life of the north. You are of a southern nature, and require for your bloom a warmer sun. Accompany me therefore to the East, to the magnificent Constantinople, and there—learn to know me rightly. For you know me not yet, Flora. It is a peculiarity of my nature not to open its depths except to a full devotedness—my love burns where it cannot bless, and you, yourself Flora, shall dread me from that moment in which you turn yourself from me. I have used sharp weapons against you, I will use them until the moment in which you—reign yourself captive! But then, too, will you become acquainted with a love stronger than the glow of the East, more beautiful than your own beautiful and burning fancy—trust me! You will recognise yourself again in the hour when you fully return to me—your first, your strongest love; you will find first the fullness of life in my arms. I know you better than you know yourself. For your own sake I conjure you to turn yourself fully to me, throw yourself into these arms which are opened for you, come to this breast and find a heaven—no! that is flat—a hell of bliss!”

And St. Orme fell upon his knees before Flora, and extended his arms to her.

She had during these words let her head sink upon her breast. When he had ended, she raised it, and standing up slowly, said with an agitated voice—

“What words! what expressions! I know them again—they wake strings which I thought were broken—but they resound still. Oh! that I could but believe you, and—But in vain! In this hour, when I am bewitched by your words, I feel, I know that you will only deceive me, that you do not love me, that you merely play a part. O St. Orme, how great would you be! how glorious would you be! if you were but honest! But you fail of this least and this greatest, and with it of all!”

St. Orme sprang up as if struck by an arrow, and a great change passed over him. The solutely-extended arms were folded upon his breast, the colour paled upon his cheek, and with an icy scorn he stepped before Flora and said—

“You can then in this case so much better extend your hand to me, for you cannot indeed, my little Flora, gravely insist upon it that you are what the people call ‘an honourable woman!’”

Flora felt this sting as keenly as St. Orme felt that which she gave. Flaming with anger, she exclaimed—

“Yes, too honourable, too good am I in truth to belong to you, mean man! And let happen what may, I never will become your wife!”

“You shall be my wife or nobody’s; and you shall go to the grave with a stained reputation. If you will have me for an enemy, I will treat you accordingly.”

“Do it! I fear you not, miserable, coward-heart! Thorsten Lennartson will speedily free me from your aspersions. I have seen you grow pale and tremble before him. You shall have experience of a strength which shall tame yours.”

At this remembrance, St. Orme’s pale cheeks coloured, and he said with a vengeful smile—

“Thorsten Lennartson will desert you when I let him see certain letters, in particular one certain letter—my poor little Flora, you seem to have a short memory, and not at all to remember that letter in which you invited me—”

Flora now interrupted him with a torrent of words and expressions, with which I will not stain my paper. Their principal meaning was, that St. Orme made use of her good faith, of her indiscretion, to blacken her intentions and her conduct; but it was not an innocent woman but a fury who spoke in Flora.

St. Orme heard her with coldness, and when she ceased speaking from exhaustion he said—

“When you have composed yourself, you will see that all this serves you not at all. You have in any case only one course to take, and that is, to go with me to Constantinople as my wife. You have made the way difficult for yourself, but it still stands open to you. Shall I shew it to you?”

Flora made no reply, and St. Orme continued—

“You write to-day to Lennartson and tell him, that on account of a prior engagement—which you had for a moment forgotten—you must renounce the honour of becoming his wife. You know best how you can turn it. And after that, confer your hand on your first, true love, and—he will conduct you as his dearly beloved wife to his beautiful villa near Constantinople.”

“Know, St. Orme,” interrupted Flora, “know, that if this took place—and something within me at this moment says that it will take place—then you lead misfortune into your house, your own Nemesis!” With this she stood up, pale, and with outstretched hand and with a fearful expression, she continued—“for I shall hate you, Adrian—I shall so hate you, that you yourself shall be terrified, and shall fear before—your own wife! Yes, laugh now! The time will come when you will not laugh, the time will come when I shall see you—take care of yourself St. Orme, you have awoke in me a horrible thirst. You have given me a desire to be near you, to be your wife, merely to punish you, merely to be revenged on you. There—but, take off yourself! there, take my hand, take it if you dare, take it, and—with it my eternal hate!”

"I take it and your hatred! It has amused me sometimes to compel indifference—now it gives me pleasure to force hate to change into love. In this respect I follow merely the doctrine of Christianity. Agreed, lovely bride! On Sunday they shall publish the banns for us three times in the church, and eight days afterwards, we will celebrate the marriage. But I am charmed with you for the beautiful struggle and the quick resolution. That well deserves a bridegroom's kiss."

With this, he clasped her in his arms, and they kissed; thus embrace each other the spirits of hell.

With a shudder, with a horrible 'hu!' Flora recovered her consciousness. St. Orme had vanished.

In the same moment Selma stood in the doorway and beckoned me silently to her. I went to her, and she whispered quietly—

"Brenner is here! He wishes to meet St. Orme, whom he understood to be here. In my anxiety I have told him somewhat of that which has occurred, and have mentioned to him the meeting which I feared between Lennartson and St. Orme. He seems to think that he has the first right to fight with St. Orme. I have had a deal of trouble to keep him back till the conversation here was ended, and he can hear its result from you. Come now and speak to him; tell us how it is!"

And she led me to Brenner, who was in my step-mother's boudoir. I found him in the most violent temper, and so determined to fight with St. Orme, that it was only with difficulty that I could prevent his doing so, and by telling him what turn the affair had taken, as well as by confessing my uncertainty whether Flora deserved that such men as Brenner and Lennartson should venture life and blood for her. I besought him earnestly at least to keep himself quiet this one day, and await further intelligence. I promised to write to him early in the morning on this subject. With this promise Brenner left us, and I accompanied Selma to Flora.

She paced rapidly up and down the room, talked loud, and seemed not to regard us.

"That is glorious, that is right glorious!" exclaimed she; "all is now settled; all choice, all torment over. He has won the game! But do not rejoice, then! Thou hast closed one future to me, but thou hast opened to me another. I will—I have a new goal, a new interest in life; and that is, to rack thee, to torment, to punish thee!"

"Flora!" exclaimed Selma, with an indescribable expression of pain and tenderness.

"Yes," continued she, "he shall learn whom he has subjected! Ah, Adrian St. Orme! We shall see! we shall see! Long have I wavered between heaven and the abyss—the abyss has won. Well! I will go to school there; I will be skilful in its arts, and more skilful than he. In such things a woman is always more skilful than a man."

"Flora! Flora!" cried Selma again.

"Who calls Flora?" exclaimed she, wildly. "Is it my good angel? then he may know that he calls on me too late. I will listen to him no more. I have now something else to do, and people may curse me or weep over me; it is all the same, and I shall not ask about it. All my feelings and all my thoughts are hatred and revenge. Ah, that I could properly revenge myself!"

She stood still a while, as if she bethought herself, clapped her hands, and exclaimed—

"I have it—I have it! He thinks of obtaining wealth with me, but he shall be mistaken. Married to him, I will become a spendthrift, a gambler; I will in every possible way lavish away money—will accumulate debts—will weave around him a web of trouble and vexation!—Ha! shudder, St. Orme! How thou shalt be imposed upon! To have employed so much labour, so much craft, so much eloquence, to have brought into thy house poverty and hatred! Gold and hatred, those thou mightst have embraced; but poverty and hatred, when they shall embrace thee! then perhaps we may see this iron brow grow pale, this bold glance become timid—then shalt thou wish to escape, but shalt not be able."

In this manner and in this spirit continued Flora for a long time. Selma had vanished in the mean time. It had become dark; a wild storm raged without, and showers of hail and rain poured clatteringly down. The uproar in nature seemed to allay the uproar in Flora's soul. She became calmer. She stood long in the window, observing the contest without. In a while her tears began to flow. She wept long, and appeared to obtain ease from so doing.

When she had somewhat composed herself, she seated herself at her writing-desk, saying—

"Now I will write to Lennartson, and beseech of him to abstain from all thoughts of me. I shall tell him that I am unworthy of his devotion, his esteem. That is not true; but what matters it! In this way I shall preserve him from all danger, and—I am now quite indifferent towards myself."

Deeply affected by these words, I exclaimed, "Wait yet a while, Flora. Let us think; let us consider; some outlet, some help must yet present itself."

"No, there is none;" sighed Flora, with a kind of quiet desperation, "and I am tired of labouring, of struggling against an irresistible destiny. This St. Orme is my dark destiny; I must be his, that I feel. O thou Lennartson! so strong and yet so good—he alone could have saved me. Yes, if he could have loved me as I loved him, beyond everything. But he could not thus love me. And yet I am not altogether unworthy of his love. I have a something in me, which under his protection, by his side, might have developed itself to great beauty. O Lennartson! had I been thine, how different had I, had everything been. That which thou hast loved should I have loved; and talents, wealth, all the gifts which I possess, and which now will be changed into a curse, would in thy hands have been changed into a blessing. Oh, to stand near such a goal, and see it vanish; to hold in one's hand life's best lot, and to see it snatched away! To be compelled to renounce a Lennartson, in order to be the outcast and despairing prey of a St. Orme! Oh, why do I not die!"

And in a new outbreak of the most violent pain Flora threw herself down upon the floor.

At this moment a bright ray of light broke through the clouds into the room, and it seemed to me as if a white dove descended in this brightness, and spread its wings over Flora.

It was Selma, who with the lightness of a bird flew into the room, sank on her knees beside Flora, and whilst she threw off a white shawl which covered her head and shoulders, stretched forth her hands and exclaimed—

"No, live; live, my Flora! Live, and be happy. There are your letters!"

In her hand was a small bag of crimson silk

With an exclamation of joy, "My letters! my letters!" Flora threw herself upon them.

"You are free, Flora!" continued Selma, with a voice which seemed to repress the agitation of her mind. "St. Orme resigns you—sets off soon from Stockholm—you are free—be happy, be happy!"

"Selma, what do you say?" exclaimed Flora; "are you, or am I insane? How—what—how have you known?"

With incoherent, zealous questionings both Flora and I surrounded Selma. But she answered nothing; she heard us not. She lay without consciousness on the floor, her hair and her dress wet through with rain.

We carried her to her bed, but our efforts to recall her to consciousness were fruitless. I sent with all speed a messenger to my stepmother, and another also to our family physician, Doctor L. And quickly were both of them beside her bed; my stepmother with a countenance as pale, almost as death like, as that of her beloved daughter.

After a vein had been opened, Selma returned to life, but not to consciousness. She was in a sorrowful manner out of herself.

The clear friendly eyes were wild and staring, and seemed as if they would avoid some horrible sight.

She drew me towards her, and said half whispering,

"Do you know, it was horrible! I met him just as I came out of—out of the pit; and he looked at me with such terrible, flaming eyes—"

"Who looked at you so, my sweet Selma?" asked I.

"He—St Michael—you know. I wished to fly; but he held me back, and marked my forehead with his finger, because I had been with the bad one; and since then it burns within, and I know that I never more can shew myself among people. They all looked at me with such terrific looks—you also—I must look very horrible!"

"You are ill, Selma, and therefore everybody looks so anxiously at you; but you yourself look like a good angel, as you are."

"Yes, you say so; but he indeed knew better; he who saw me there—he would have killed me, would have run his spear into my heart, if I had not fled. Yes, I fled from him; but I felt that it was all over with me; that I was branded, and the whole world fled before me as I fled—"

"You must not talk so much now, Selma, you must try to sleep."

"Sleep!—No, I shall never sleep more. It burns so sadly here!" she laid her hand upon her forehead. "And I see everywhere the looks—the looks! They will keep me awake till doomsday. No, I can never more sleep!"

K

Whilst I listened to these horrible fantasies, and sought in vain after their cause, Doctor L. explained them to my stepmother by the words 'a brain-fever, a mild brain-fever.' He said that this disease was very prevalent just now, and mostly made violent attacks without any ostensible cause. We immediately adopted all the remedies which he prescribed, and which are useful in the treatment of such diseases. Selma's head was raised high in bed, and the room was made dark and kept still, and cold applications were used for the burning head. As I was engaged with attending to all this, they came and called me out. In the ante-room I found Lennartson, but so pale, and so agitated, as I had never before seen him.

"Where, where is Selma?" asked he hastily. "What had she to do with St. Orme? Who sent her there?"

"You do not suspect Selma of anything bad or incorrect?" asked I.

"Her! Impossible! But I suspect others. I fear that they misuse her self-sacrificing, affectionate heart."

"How and where did you meet with Selma?"

"I went to seek for St. Orme. A lady wrapped in a white shawl came at that moment out of his room. Some unmannerly young fellows tried to unveil her; I released her from them, and then I saw that she trembled; took her hand, to lead her down, and then I recognized her as—Miss Selma! She tore herself from me, and fled so hastily that I could not say a word to her—could not then accompany her—but now I must know why she was there!"

In a few words as possible, I related to the Baron all that had occurred.

We now saw that Selma, impelled by a sudden impulse to save Flora, and to prevent a meeting between St. Orme and Lennartson, had hastened to the dwelling of the first, defended alone by her enthusiasm and her devoted love. But by what talisman she has been able to induce St. Orme to give up the treasure which he has so long kept with the jealous grasp of the dragon, that is incomprehensible to us.

Deeply struck was Lennartson when he was made acquainted with Selma's present condition. As it was now very late in the evening he was obliged to go. "I shall come again early in the morning," said he. He inquired also after Flora, but seemed scarcely to hear my answer. Oh! it is ever clearer to me which he loves.

The 20th, in the Morning.

Now is the night over, but what a night! Selma has constant delirium. The same fantasies return, although under various forms; and well did I now understand their ground. O my poor, young sister! Towards morning she desired to have myrtle and flowers, and began to weave a garland, which she called Flora's bridal wreath; for some time she kept up zealously, but at times her feeble hands dropped down, and would not complete the work. She sang also scraps of her joyous songs, but she ended none. My poor stepmother went about with speechless anxiety in her eyes, and seemed to ask with them, 'How is it? How will it be?' Flora is gone this morning to her sister, after having sat up with me through the night. I have now written to Brenner, and shall not again leave my Selma's chamber, where I write this.

In the Evening.

All remains the same. Selma continues to weave her garland, but laments that it never will be ready; in the intervals she sings. Doctor L. looks troubled, and talks of cutting off her hair—her beautiful hair!

Lennartson has been here several times to inquire after her. They laid in the night straw before the house, to deaden the sound of the wheels. That was Lennartson's attention.

Brenner also has been here, but I did not see him.

The 21st.

Another night of inexpressible disquiet and anguish! Doctor L. does not think that she can live through the day, if a happy crisis do not take place.

In Sweden, they call certain nights at Midsummer iron nights, in which a frost spirit appears and breathes over the flower-strewn earth. Often then is killed and destroyed in a few hours the hopes of years. Then is the heaven clear, the air calm; and when the sun ascends, the corn-fields shine with the finest silver attire—but it is the attire of death; an icy garment, under whose covering the blooming ears are destroyed.

In human life too occur at times these iron nights. Then die the young, the gay, the blooming; happy souls, if they die not only in heart, if they escape being left alone on the earth like the empty ears of the field, without sap and without the power of life. Selma! thou young, thou good one! I can scarcely wish that thou shouldst live—for ever plainer hear I out of thy wanderings, the secret of thy heart, thy silent sufferings. But if thou goest home, how desolate—

Later.

Some change seems to be taking place in Selma; she raves still, but her fantasies assume a more quiet character. She believes now that she shall die, and has called to me several times only to say "when I am dead, remain in my place with my mother! Love her! She is so good!"

Flora was here only for a moment; she cannot bear to see and hear Selma; and is for the most part with her sister.

In the Evening.

O now one hour of hope! May it not deceive us!

In the afternoon, Selma called to me and said—

"Now I am dead, Sophia! You see plainly that I lie in my grave; and it is good to be there too, if I only find rest, if I only can sleep. Used they to sleep in graves! To sleep and forget—till they awoke with God! I wonder why I cannot sleep like the rest!—ah yes, I know, I know, it is his glance! Have you seen him!"

"Seen whom, my sweet Selma!"

"St. Michael! It is his flaming glance, which burnt me, which keeps me awake in the grave. But I know likewise, that when I can once see him in the light, above the clouds, then will he regard me quite otherwise. I know that all here which is bad, happens only because it is so dark on earth; that one cannot see all as it is in its truth."

A sudden thought with this occurred to me, and whilst I endeavoured to chune in with her ideas, I said that I had seen him of whom she spoke; he had no suspicion of her, but would gladly look in light and love upon her.

"If I could believe that," said Selma, with a look of melancholy joy, "then I should be easier. If he will let a look of blessing fall upon my grave, then it would press through the earth, and down into my coffin, and the torments would then cease and I should be able to slumber in peace. But tell nobody in the world," continued she vehemently, "tell nobody that I have loved him. Say to everybody, 'she has loved no one, excepting her father, her mother, her friend Flora, and her sister Sophia.' And do not tell Flora that Selma died for her!—Tell her that I was stung by a snake, and of that I became ill, mortally ill."

Whilst Selma talked thus with loud ringing voice, and fever burning upon her cheeks, a light movement took place in the chamber; and as I looked in its direction, I perceived Lennartson and Flora standing behind Selma's bed's-head. They seemed to have heard all; he held his hands pressed against his breast, and seemed to breathe with difficulty. According to the prescription of the physician, Selma was raised high in the bed, in a half sitting posture; her beautiful hair fell down in waves; over her head she had thrown the half-finished garland, which she had bound for Flora; it was the beloved prey which the dark ravager approached to embrace; it was the sylph, who had lost her wings, but now stiffening in death, could not lose her beauty.

Dark fancies seemed again to ascend in her.

"No, no!" exclaimed she, with supplicating outstretched hands, "thrust me not down into this dark depth! I desire nothing base! Help, Lennartson!"

And in the same moment Lennartson stood before her, clasped her extended hands between his, and said with an indescribable expression of love—

"What fears Selma! Lennartson is here. In life and in death will he defend thee! Look at me, Selma, and trust in me!"

She looked at him at first with a timid, astonished glance; but this soon changed itself through the powers which proceeded from Lennartson's glorious beaming eyes. He seated himself on the edge of her bed, and continued to look at her quietly and steadfastly; and, wonderful! during this gaze, the excitement passed away from hers, and the loving and clear expression returned. She spoke no word, but it was as if her being's hitherto unexpressed, fettered harmony now poured itself forth in silent streams, and united them and made them happy. Over the countenance of the poor invalid, the expression of unspeakable peace diffused itself more and more, the weary eyelids sank, and she softly slept. Long sat Lennartson still, with his gaze fixed upon the slumberous countenance; but my stepmother's mute signs compelled him at length to remove himself. Silently extended she her arms to him: he clasped her in his, leaned himself upon her shoulder, and deep sighs laboured forth from his breast.

Flora had vanished, but none of us had observed when she went.

All is still; so still in the house; they know that the beloved daughter of the house sleeps an important sleep. The philosopher looks gloomy in the highest degree. He said to me yesterday in his unearthly voice, "If Miss Selma dies, then it is not worth while to live." Then is the sunshine gone from the world.

The 22nd.

The house will not lose its joyful sunshine. The crisis is ours, and Selma is out of danger! We thank God; we congratulate one another; and yet, and yet, we cannot entirely rejoice. Life, which again opens itself for Selma, does not appear joyous. Lately, whilst Selma yet slept, I found my stepmother with an open letter in her hand, and with an expression of deep dejection in her countenance. It seemed to me that she had suddenly become several years older.

"She sleeps on yet!" said I with animation, "I think that she breathes easier and freer."

"May that be as God pleases!" replied my stepmother quietly, and almost spiritless, "I dare scarcely wish to keep her. There is so much which hereafter may make life dark to her—that I see now. Flora will marry the man whom of all others is most suitable for my Selma, and the only one whom she has loved, whom I have seriously wished to call my son. St. Orme is gone, and has sent me a letter, which confirms all that I have dreaded for some time. He has the whole winter long borrowed from me, now large sums of money, and now small, which he always promised to repay, and never has repaid, and which I have been good-natured enough, or rather weak enough, to lend upon his bare word, without any written obligation. And now he is gone, and writes merely short and negligently, that 'he will on the first possibility repay me,' and so on. But I know what that means; he will never repay me, and I, who lent to him far beyond my means, and therefore have been myself obliged to borrow from others, am drawn into infinite trouble! I have not deserved it from St. Orme! But this would not make me so uneasy if it only concerned myself. But it is bitter to me that my good lovely girl will be obliged to live in want and self-denial. No! in that case she had better go to our Lord, if such be his will;—to be sure then I should be very solitary, very forlorn in my old days." Large tears rolled down the pale cheeks of my stepmother, and she wiped them quietly away with the corner of her silk shawl. This rent my very heart, and at the feet of my stepmother I conjured her to consider all that which I possessed as her own, and to let me have a daughter's right in her heart; I would, if Selma died, never leave her.

She thanked, she embraced me, but seemed to find little consolation in that which I offered her. Selma's reawaking to life made all trouble for a moment to retreat, and joy's one bear away, but the bird of night soon shewed itself again. The philosopher looks happy, and casts such bright glances at me that I cannot help answering them kindly.

The 24th.

The Viking also, the honest, warm-hearted Wilhelm Brenner also, is deceived and almost ruined by St. Orme.

And his children! My heart bleeds for him, and feels it hard that he no longer comes here. Lennartson has been here every day, happy in the happy change in Selma's illness, but he has not desired to see her. He is now deeply troubled about Brenner's misfortunes, which he however bears with manly fortitude. Lennartson has in a brotherly manner offered him his assistance. But Brenner has refused it; he is certain that in a few years time he shall be able to help him-elf. "But this I say to thee brother," continued he, with melancholy cheerfulness, to Lennartson, "that if our Lord calls me to his army above, before I here have gained firm footing and position on earth for me and mine, I then shall leave thee a legacy."

"O! what!" asked he.

"My children!"

A silent shake of the hands followed; thus understand each other noble minds.

But these words have made me weep. For to me the Viking gives nothing in his will. He does not love me sufficiently for that.

In the middle of May he sails to the Mediterranean.

The 26th.

Deeply affected by the state and the depressed appearance of my stepmother, I asked her to-day why she did not confide her affairs to her half-brother. He would certainly be able as well to counsel as to assist her. But with a kind of horror she repelled this. "No! no!" exclaimed she, "it is not worth! It would serve no purpose." I was astonished; I thought that it would have helped greatly; never could the Chamberlain find a better opportunity than now, of gratifying his so often-talked-about passion for doing good in silence. "Yes, I know what he would say," said my stepmother, sighing; still very much troubled about a considerable sum which she should have to pay in a few days, she resolved at length in the evening to send to her brother. He came, and seemed considerably embarrassed about that which was confided to him. At last he counselled his sister to give up her establishment, and make herself a bankrupt! This would be the best mode of saving herself. With an indignation, and a high-mindedness, which won for her my entire love, my stepmother rejected this proposal; "rather would she live on bread and water, and try the uttermost, than that anybody should suffer by her." The Chamberlain declared that "this mode of thinking was very beautiful, very respectable; but brought her to make use of her reason, and so on." My stepmother would hear nothing of that; her brother had no other advice to give, and cast a glance at me, after which he hastily went jesting about my 'Jupiter-miner,' and pretending some important business. My warm heartfelt approbation of my stepmother's mode of thinking and acting seemed to console and cheer her.

The 29th.

A lovely, warm day, which Selma's convalescence made the more beautiful to us. The quiet seriousness which now pervades her being, prevents her not from receiving with thankful joy every little gift which life and friendship offer to her. My stepmother endeavours to conceal from her her secret disquiet and her trouble, but is often near betraying them. At my request she has now confided them to Lennartson, who seems to be selected to be everybody's helper.

How it now stands between Lennartson and Flora I cannot rightly understand. Yesterday I found them together in the ante-room, he with his arm around her waist, she with her head leaning on his shoulder;—before them, upon the table, lay the crimson little bag, the object of so much torment and confusion. Serious and tender words seem to have been spoken by Lennartson; Flora was deeply excited; but it seemed to me that neither of them were happy. Flora had been here and with Selma, but only for a short time, and continues to be a riddle to me. She has just now written me a few words, the meaning of which is, that since she was easy with regard to Selma's health, she would accompany her sister on a pleasure journey to Svartsjö, to hear the nightingales sing; but that on the 3rd of May she should again be here.

Flora journeys and amuses herself, and leaves the friend who has sacrificed all for her to her silent pain. Her brother also, at this moment, might have some claim upon her care and companionship; his health is very uncertain, and he has been ordered in the spring to travel abroad, and to make use of one of the warm baths of Germany. But amid all the troubles which her connexions suffer, Flora thinks only about amusing herself and listening to the songs of the nightingales. What deep egotism! But I will not condemn her yet. Perhaps she goes to the quiet parks of Svartsjö to listen there in peace to the inner voice.

THE 30th.

To-day Selma was so well, that I could desire from her some account of her meeting with St. Orme, and by what magic art she obtained from him in a moment, the weapons which he had so long held, and nullified the victory which he had just won. The little which Selma told me on this subject, and which I could not wish to pursue farther, from the dread that she might thereby be too much excited, has enabled me, on consideration of every circumstance, to form into the following picture:

At the moment when Flora seemed sunk in a bottomless pit without redemption, Selma felt herself animated by a courage and a wish to save her, which were powerful enough to defy every thing. The fear of coming too late to prevent the meeting between Lennartson and St. Orme, the feeling of a danger which pressed on many sides, made her almost unconsciously follow upon his steps. She scarcely herself knew what she was about when she found herself at St. Orme's door; and the singular reception which she found by him can only be explained by an extraordinary state of mind in himself.

St. Orme had left the bride whom he had fettered with power and craft, had left her with apparent coldness and exaltation of victory. But no man remains cold before the frenzy of a woman who has once had a place in his heart. Nor was St. Orme calm when he left Flora. The tempest of that hour shook its wings, foreboding misfortune over him, and through the power of contrast awoke, perhaps, at this moment the remembrance of a very different kind. It was exactly this very day when St. Orme, so many years ago, led to the altar the lovely and noble Virginia Adelan, his only noble, his only pure love.

And now they stood there beside each other—the two different points of time—the two dissimilar brides. In fancy came to him Virginia's bashful kiss on this day; he felt now that which, like the flame of hatred, lay burning from Flora's lips; and his mind turned itself from her, and was irresistibly drawn to the lovely young wife that once was his. He thought on her beautiful love, how this still was his in her hour of death; perhaps returned to his fancy, also, how he then, in mysticising sorrow, had besought her forgiveness, and had prayed her to reveal herself to him after death, and how she had promised it. Perhaps St. Orme wished to remove these thoughts, and to call up others from the Opera-boxes and Parisian boudoirs—but between these glittering, dazzling scenes, rose up again and again the image of his pale young wife, as he had seen her in her white robe of death—and a horrible feeling, like a wind from death, from the grave, crept through St. Orme's breast.

He sat silently in his room, depressed and full of thought, looking darkly forth into the gathering twilight, when the door slowly opened, and a female figure, clothed in white from head to foot, presented itself before him.

St. Orme started up, but staggered and sunk backward on the sofa, hoarsely stammering forth—

"Virginia!"

"Virginia speaks to thee through me," replied the sweet voice of Selma. "St. Orme, hear us!" And now words flowed from her lips, which she herself cannot remember, and with which a higher power seemed to inspire her. The excitement of the moment had opened St. Orme's heart; the recollection of Virginia, the prayer in her name, the interest which he always had towards Selma, the singularity of her act, the deep earnestness which lay in her representations, the speaking of life and death from such young, lovely lips—all this made his mind waver, and made him listen to Selma's prayer for the liberation of Flora. Selma saw him waver, but thought also that she saw the moment when he would cease to do so, when he would harden himself against her prayers—and suddenly she dropped the tone of beseeching, to show to him in an almost threatening tone, the certain consequences to himself if he persisted in his proposal; she told him Flora's words, and determination for the future; she showed to him Lennartson, Brenner, and even Felix, who were ready, with arms in their hands, to assert Flora's freedom; she showed to him danger, death, and ruin in every way, like the furies who would stand in his path, and St. Orme—shuddered.

It is the established rule in modern romance literature, to represent bad people or villains in an especial manner as strong and powerful men. But in real life we see it otherwise. Then we see that it is, above all, the upright, the noble man who is strong and mighty—who with his will and his faith stands firm to death. The base, the mean mind may for a time appear strong and insolent; but in the hour of certain danger, a sudden outbreak of irresolution or cowardice proves that he bears a terrified heart in his breast, that he knows he stands upon trembling ground.

What passed at this moment in St. Orme's breast I cannot say, nor yet decide which part of Selma's words exercised the greatest power over him; but certain is it, that he now felt the necessity of submitting to her demands; and looking gloomily before him, and murmuring the words of the unfortunate Philip Egalité upon the guillotine, "One hell is as good as another!" went to his writing-desk, and took thence the crimson bag containing Flora's letters. He gave them to Selma, with these words—

"You are the sister of my Virginia, Selma; and for your sake I will voluntarily abstain from that from which no other power should make me abstain. Tell Flora that she is free—my presence here shall not long oppress her; I shall set off the day after to-morrow. You can go now; you have obtained your object, and may be glad."

Selma wished to thank him; but he interrupted her with severity, almost with rudeness, and prayed her to spare him her sentimental talk, and to go her way.

Selma moved away afraid, but still at the door she turned herself, with these words—

"O St. Orme! though you do say so, yet I will bless you!" She heard St. Orme whistling, and hastened down the stairs; here she met—what I have already indicated, and which was too much for so fine feeling and pure a nature to bear.

After Selma had told me what I wished to know, she besought me with deeply crime-stained blushes to tell her Lennartson's behaviour to her during her illness, of which she had only a dark comprehension. I told her all; and an unspeakably inward gladness shone hereupon in her eyes, and expressed itself in grateful tears. She felt herself beloved by him—she knew that she stood bright and pure before his glance. That was bliss enough for her.

The 1st of May, forenoon.

The Lady-Councillors of Commerce! And so stuffed out with gossip, that it stood up to the throat and out at the mouth. The report of Flora's marriage, not with St. Orme, but with Lennartson, was the chief subject; the great ball which was to be given the day after to-morrow at the castle, was the next; the walks in the parks in the afternoons and the beautiful new equipages, which were then to be seen, was the third; and the fourth was Brenner's loss of all his accumulated property, together with his voyage to the Mediterranean, and his long absence. They knew precisely how it would go on with his domestic affairs during his absence, and had many anxieties on the subject. The oldest boy ought to go to the orphan school; and to look after and care for the other children, Brenner had taken into his house one Mrs. Trollman, 'a decent' person enough, but a right coffee-bibber, who made coffee day and night, and was the veriest gossip in the world. And with regard to house-keeping, one could very well imagine how that would go, when we know that during the late Trollman's life they had never baked at home, but had had all their bread from a bakehouse, and yet they had four children and two maidservants in the house!!! One could think how it would be. It would be a foolish business. It really was incomprehensible how Colonel Brenner could take such a person into his house; but she had hung herself in fact upon him, by being, while the children were ill, so obliging as a neighbour, and so good to them.

"Have the children been ill?" exclaimed I.

"Yes; they have had the scarlet fever, poor little things; and the two youngest are even now very ill, especially the lame boy. Now, it would be well if our Lord took him."

"The poor father!" sighed I.

"Yes, poor fellow!" repeated Miss P., "and that he is now obliged to set off from his home in this misery. And then he looks too as if he had not been once but twice buried!"

"But tell me now, in confidence, my sweet young lady," whispered the married sister confidentially; when will the great the extraordinary betrothal here be declared?

I declared my perfect ignorance respecting it.

"The sooner that is done," continued she, "the better will it be for Flora, to silence all uneasy tongues, which assert that perhaps things do not at all hang together. There was at one time a strange report in circulation. And people seem so little satisfied—inquisitive people—and who thought that I ought to know a little of what went on here in the house where I am so intimate, and where I, as I said, loved every chair; yes, people actually reproach me because I am not better informed—but I have, unfortunately, so little curiosity in me! But as regards this affair, I must confess that I willingly would know a little more for Flora's and my good friend Mrs. Adelan's sake."

If the lady was unfortunately so little curious, I also was as little communicative; and to say the truth, that which I had heard of Brenner made me incapable of bearing or talking of other things.

I wonder whether Brenner will see me before his journey.

The 3rd of May.

To-day Selma, for the first time, was able to enjoy the animating air of spring, which breathed softly through the open window into the boudoir of my stepmother.

A lark soared jubilantly over the river up into the high blue air; white sails glided slowly hither from the Rindarfjärd, and the mountains and the shores clothed themselves in green. Selma saw all this and smiled, with tears in her beaming eyes. "How lovely this is!" said she, "how good and beautiful is life!"

She extended her hands to my stepmother and me, who sat on either side of her, and looking observantly upon us, she continued, softly smiling, "Why so grave? why so solemn, as if the conversation were about my funeral? Now I am well; now it is spring; now we shall be happy!"

My stepmother rose up hastily, and wished to go, that she might conceal her emotion; but Selma held her back by her dress, and exclaimed while she wound her arms round her. "No, mamma dear! do not go! Now we can speak openly; now I can hear all; now I must know what it is which makes those who are dear to me, look so anxious. And perhaps it is nothing unexpected by me; perhaps I forebode already what it is. Tell me—tell me plainly at once, has St. Orme deceived us? Are our affairs in a bad condition; in one word—are we poor?"

"Yes, we are poor, my sweet child!" said my stepmother, now sobbing aloud; and bending over the head of her sitting daughter, whose hair and brow were wet with her tears—she could say no more.

"But we are not poor in love," returned Selma. "Then it is not so dangerous; I have my mother, and my mother has me, and we both have Sophia—we are still rich!"

"And we have also Lennartson," said I, and added some words on the manner in which he had behaved in the affair.

"It is so like him," said Selma, with deep, almost quiet emotion.

When we had become calmer, we talked in stillness and cheerfulness of our condition. Selma was one of those who makes all things easy, and proved to her mother, that by the sale of all her ornaments and her own beautiful collection of pictures all debts could be paid, and something remain also over. Selma had evidently a clearer idea of the condition of the family than her mother. "And," continued she with cheerful courage, "after we have made all things straight here in Stockholm, we will retire to some pretty country town, and settle down there and live economically. And I also will do something for food and clothing, and not merely, as hitherto, live like the lilies of the field. I will teach people desirous of learning, some of my many accomplishments, or translate books, or write books myself. Who knows what inspirations may come! And Sophia shall be my reviewer. O! we shall do great things!"

"Oh! if the sylph will only dance before us as hitherto," said I, "then I fear nothing in the world."

My stepmother wept no longer. Consoled and cheered, she embraced her daughters, and thanked God for them.

The Philosopher announced "Baron Lennartson."

Selma turned pale, and arose evidently trembling. I asked if she would go into her chamber and rest for a moment.

"No," replied she, "I feel myself strong enough to see him. Besides, my mother and my Sophia are with me."

Lennartson went up to Selma with an exclamation of joyful surprise as he saw her. She offered to him her hand, which he seized with animation, but both were so much excited, as to be unable to say anything for some time. Selma first broke silence, as she said with a tolerably firm voice—

"We have all of us so much, so infinitely much to thank you for. How good you are, to stand by us even in this trouble!"

We now came to Selma's help, and related to Lennartson that of which we had just been speaking. Lennartson seemed pleased to be able to speak openly with Selma of the condition of affairs, and shewed to her a statement which he had drawn up on paper; and by which it appeared, that the business was much better than they at first had supposed.

When Selma cheerfully spoke of selling her own pictures, Lennartson seemed affected, for he knew well how dear and precious they were to her, even for his sake who had collected and given them to her, her beloved father; but he confessed that by this sale the affairs of the family would be most safely and most speedily rectified, and said he knew a safe purchaser. (I am much deceived if this purchaser be not—the Baron himself. Methought I saw it in him.)

For the rest, he besought my stepmother and Selma to be calm, and to leave all in his hands, he would endeavour to arrange all for the best.

As he was about to leave, it seemed to him difficult. He held Selma's hand at parting long in his, and seemed to wish to say something, but his eyes only spoke a silent and expressive language; at length he pressed her hand reverentially to his lips, bowed himself deeply before her, and went.

And Selma! she stood there so quiet; so beautiful in her womanly nobility, happy in the midst of her misfortune, to feel her own worth and to see it acknowledged by such a man, and this raised her at this moment above all embarrassment, above all pain. Neither did she droop her eyes before his warm, eloquent glance, but met it in clearness and inwardness. She was not ashamed to let him look down into the depth of her soul, she knew that he was great enough to see the feelings that lived therein for him, without misunderstanding her, without moving out of his way. They stood there, full of heavenly confidence in each other.

But the scenes of this afternoon had, however, been too much for Selma's yet weak bodily strength. When Lennartson was gone, her outward fortitude was gone too, and she sank almost fainting into my arms. Perhaps she recognised, as I did, in Lennartson's silent adieu, something of a particular meaning; perhaps it is true, as reports have circulated, that he this evening at the Castle will make his appearance as Flora's betrothed, and receive the congratulations of royalty, and of the whole world. Selma asked me as she went to bed, if I knew anything of Flora.

I replied that I had heard that she had returned on that day, from her Svartsjö expedition, and would with her sister be present at the Castle. I could not help adding a few grave words of blame respecting Flora.

"Oh!" sighed Selma, "truly it is strange, and I do not understand her; but all will some day be clear, and Flora also. I have loved her so much!" and with this Selma began to weep bitterly.

I left my stepmother, who read aloud to Selma by the evening lamp, and went up to my room, longing to be left alone with my own thoughts. And now here sit I alone with them, and have written down the foregoing, amid the dull rattle of carriages which roll upwards from the North-bridge to the Castle. Now it is midnight, and all has become still in the streets. From the Castle windows, towards the Lion Hill, shine orange-coloured lights through the dusky May night; there lie the great state-rooms; and when I think on the different scenes there and here—when I think of Flora glittering in joy and beauty, saluted and honoured as the bride of Lennartson, whilst she forgets her nearest connexions in their trouble, leaves her friend and her preserver to a life full of renunciation.—Then my heart is embittered towards her, and I feel that the hatred at which we played for a time becomes more earnest. If she at this moment stood before me, she should hear words which would cover her brow with shame, which would make her shudder before herself, and—sooner or later, she shall hear them!

The 4th.

I was interrupted on the foregoing night by the stopping of a carriage before our door, and by a gentle movement which occurred in the house; immediately afterwards I heard soft footsteps upon the little stairs which led to Flora's and my chamber.

The bells now rang one o'clock at night. I went out into the corridor with a light in my hand to see what night wanderer it might be, and, in amazement, I saw standing there before me—Flora! Flora in her brilliant ball-dress, with a white garland of roses on her head; but for all that so pale, so changed, that she rather looked as if she had come out of a funeral vault than from a splendid festival.

"Can I speak with you?" said she, with a voice that I also thought changed; but put out the light I pray you! It destroys my eyes—I have lately seen too much light!"

I did as Flora desired, and conducted her into my room, where she throw herself into an arm chair. We both were silent. I remembered out a word of my condemnatory sermon.

"Is it not true, Sophia," began Flora at length, "that lately, and especially to-night, you hate me in good earnest?"

"Yes, it is true!" I replied.

"I do not wonder at it, continued Flora, "but you have not had entire right to do so; and before long, perhaps, you will—hate me no longer. You have been more than once kind to me, Sophia, and therefore I desire now—after the manner of the world—that you should be still kinder towards me, and listen to me with patience. But I am not entirely and altogether selfish. I know how bad it is to cherish bitter feelings, and I will therefore endeavour to extinguish those with which I have inspired you, if it be possible before — But I must not anticipate!"

"You have found me to be a strange and incomprehensible being, and I shall give you the key thereto.

"You have sometimes talked to us of primeval words, and the primeval word of my unclear being is buried deep in my childhood and youthful home, in the influences which surrounded my cradle, which accompanied my soul to its twentieth year. My mother was a good-natured, but weak and vain woman, my father a stern and haughty man, who despised all women, perhaps because he had found none near him whom he could rightly esteem. Contention ruled in our home, in one thing only were the parents agreed; to educate their children only for show, only to glitter and make their fortune in the polite world. In my soul early contended vanity and love of power, with noble impulses, but these were soon compelled to give way before the first; the heart which was capable of throbbing for a noble love, was compelled to throb for trifling and unworthy desires, and all the talents which might have conducted to greater and better purposes were speedily made subservient to vanity. O lot and fate of woman! Already in childhood was my soul poisoned by praise, flattery, and gifts, when I had been successful in company, or had drawn on myself observation and admiration. This went on through the whole of my youth; and to make a great marriage, to obtain a brilliant position in life, was shown to me as the one object of my existence. I lived more and more for this purpose, and sought merely to feed my immeasurable vanity. My natural gifts favoured me, and for a long time I conquered wherever I wished it; but I superciliously refused the easy conquest; refused soon to gratify the projects of my parents, and lived merely for pleasure. It only flattered my self-love, that I in this way made a few honest men unhappy. I myself remained cold. Then I met with St. Orme. You know how his reputation, his talents, his person, enchanted me. For the first time I became acquainted with love, and his homage flattered my self-love. His principles completed the annihilation of the good which still was in me; he imposed upon me by a certain superiority in will and thought, and had, for a time, an extraordinary power over me. But that was of a demoniacal nature, and had no proper root in my heart, in any part of my better self. When I saw myself forsaken by him my pride and my worldly love helped me to forget him. New impressions assisted this. Selma, with whom I at this time came into a nearer connexion, had a living and beneficial influence upon me. I attached myself to her, so far as my selfish heart permitted it, and many better feelings were awakened in my breast by her warm friendship, by her beautiful and pure soul.

"My father died, and had named in his will Lennartson as my guardian, perhaps in the thought that he might soon become something more. It was a marriage in every way flattering to my vanity and my ambition, and there needed not the hints of my mother to make me attempt his conquest. I regarded this as easy; but deceived myself, and the better I knew Lennartson, I saw only in his soul, in his activity, in his efforts, that which was great, before which all that I had before loved or striven after appeared to me pitiful and dwarf-like. Add to this, he was so amiable, so agreeable, even when he blamed me, that my heart soon was drawn into the play, and he became the object of my life. I saw all too well that I had made an impression upon him; and although he maintained towards me his full independence, and seemed not to permit himself to be enchanted by me, still I did not doubt but that in the end I should succeed under some of the forms or hues which, like a cameleon, I had accustomed myself to assume, in order to please dissimilar natures and tempers. But the forms which I assumed were as if without a soul; and as the sunbeams dissipate the ignis-fatui of night, so did Lennartson's glance penetrate and nullify all these false shapes. This character became ever more powerful, ever more conquering, ever more crushing to my self-love, ever more dangerous for my soul's peace. And never did I feel his power, and my misery deeper, than in the mo-most when I knew that he saw through me and despised me. Despised by the man I loved, and felt that it was justice—unspeakable anguish!"

Flora sprang up suddenly, and threw up the window towards the river, threw back her curls, and seemed to inhale with delight the cool fresh night air. And the spectacle that was spread out before her sight was well calculated to calm, to elevate, an excited mind. Crystal-clear and still reposed the May-night over the city. The dark body of the Castle, with its lights glimmering from within, rested itself in quiet majesty amid the dark blue heaven; below, lay in its dark shadow, the island of the Holy Ghost (Helgeandsholm), with its strange, bloody remembrances, and silver-clear lay the water of the Mälar with its shore, and spread out in the distance its calm mirror, over which light mists reposed. The pennons on the vessels in the harbour hung quietly; all seemed to sleep, and the peace of night brought to mind the passing of the day's strife.

After a moment Flora continued, more calmly, "I remember it as well as if it had occurred to-day. Out of old habit, and also with the desire of awakening jealousy in Lennartson, I had coquetted with a man who had a fancy for me, but to whom I was quite indifferent; I smiled him to follies, and laughed at him afterwards in Lennartson's presence. On that Lennartson broke through the forbearance which he had hitherto shewed towards me, and talked sharply to me, unveiled me before myself, and shewed me in what a dangerous and desperate path I stood. Such serious words had never been spoken to me before, never had any one shewn to me so little forbearance. My first movement was one of pride and anger; I would cast the audacious one forever from me; my next was to write to him, to 'open to him my whole heart, and let him see the feelings which he had infused into me.' I was so accustomed to conquest, that I expected immediately to see Lennartson at my feet. He came, but—as a brother, mild but serious, and only by a certain embarrassment in his manner could I see that he well understood, but that he would not understand me. Ah! I was not the woman whom he could love, not the one whom he could choose for his life's companion!

"When I saw that, my pride arose and bade me to conquer my love, this again bade me to conquer my evil propensities and to become worthy of him. The kindness and the interest which he shewed to me, the pleasure which he had in my talents, fettered me all the more closely to him, and gave me the desire to change myself to that ideal of beautiful womanhood which at all times seemed to float before Lennartson's soul. But ah! when one is artificially educated, there is nothing more difficult than to form oneself to a true and simple being. The most ravell'd skein is more easy to rectify than an entangled and corrupted soul. And they alone can understand me, who, while they are labouring to raise themselves and to attain a higher stand, feel themselves perpetually as it were cast backward by a base demon into the deep pit from which they would mount, who have experienced the torment of feeling themselves below themselves.

"At this time my mother fell into a suffering illness which only ended in her death. I watched her with tenderness, and that which all my arts and my talents could not accomplish was effected by this simple thing. When Lennartson saw me fulfil my filial duties he was drawn nearer to me; I regained his esteem, and his heart seemed to meet my feelings for him. By the death-bed of my mother he pressed the fatherless and motherless to his breast, and bade me lay my hand in his, and we exchanged holy vows."

"What now followed you know; Lennartson was called away to his father, and travelled with him into foreign lands; a will made me rich, and St. Orme came back and let me feel the snares in which I had entangled myself. I loved Lennartson now, and with him had new life awoke within me; but he was away when St. Orme returned, and he acquired somewhat of his former power, of his injurious influence over me. His bold will and power imposed upon me again, and he flattered and excited again my not yet rooted-out inclination for pleasure, and for the conquests of vanity. When Lennartson returned he regained his power, and St. Orme's star paled; but I was no longer free to tear myself from him; I was in his power, and my prayers and my threats were alike impotent. Then arose hatred and frenzy in my heart, and all the more as I was convinced that it was not me but my property which he loved. But you know all this, know my struggles, know how the victory was won at the moment in which all appeared to be lost, and I will not repeat it; but know you also Sophia to what degree the victory at this moment is mine?"

"What would you say?"

"I would say at this moment nothing prevents me from being Lennartson's wife. He has offered me his hand, overcoming in magnanimity that which should have divided us; he knows all, and forgives all for my love's sake. The cup of happiness is filled to the brim, and offered to me by the hand of fortune and of mercy; now for me remains merely one thing—"

"And that is?"

"To put it back, to renounce it!"

"How!"

"Ah! at the moment when I heard Selma upon the bed of suffering, where she lay for my sake, utter in the delirium of fever the long-buried secret of her heart; as I saw Lennartson's feeling for her, saw their glances melt into one, then awoke in me the thought to offer myself, and to be the only unhappy one. But I was too little accustomed to indulge noble thoughts, and I struggled against them and tried to persuade myself that Lennartson still loved me at the bottom, and that I could soon regain the love which I had lost through my conduct. I wished to show myself noble, upright; I laid in Lennartson's hands the letters which have made me so unhappy, and prayed him to judge me. I was sure of this, that he would not accept them; I did not deceive myself; he pushed them away from him, but took my hands in his and let me swear, solemnly swear that there was nothing in these letters which prevented me from becoming the wife of an honourable man. Such were his words, and I swore."

Thank God! I could do so. Thereupon he drew me to him, and spake words of angelic goodness and nobility; but confessed that his heart was mine no longer, and acknowledged another love—I knew well to whom, although her name was not mentioned. He asked me whether I would have patience with him and assist his endeavours to overcome this inclination, in order that he might fulfil his engagement with me. He would therefore for a time go into voluntary exile till he again could feel himself free, and could offer me a heart more worthy of me than now, and in a condition to make me as happy as it was his wish and intention to do. "We have both of us," concluded he, "erred in our paths, but the right way stands open to us still, let us take it. I will soon leave Sweden; but you shall write to me in my absence, and I will write to you, and thus we shall become dearer to each other, and become nearer to each other. We separate now only for a time in order that we may be more inwardly united. We will not, my Flora, unite ourselves in untruth, but in truth; therefore have I also laid my soul open before you, as I wish that it always should be to her whom I hope to call my wife. I see that I have distressed you—forgive me for it! love me still and console in me! I will not deceive you!"

"So spoke Lennartson, and pressed me to his heart, and in that moment I felt my heart changed. O the high-mindedness of this man! and his good overcomes all that is mean and little in me, it directs me and shews me my path. I asked from Lennartson a few days' time for consideration, and set off for Svartåsjö; not to hear the nightingales sing, but to listen to the inner voice, to collect myself, to pray! O Sophia! in these days and nights have I for the first time prayed from the bottom of my heart, and felt myself to be heard, and experienced the truth of the words, that 'The power of God is mighty to the weak.' In these days have I felt my will changed, my good resolutions strengthened, my mind renovated, and life and the world brighter before me."

"I returned to Stockholm to appear at the Castle-bell, I rouged my pale cheeks, I made myself as lovely and as brilliant as possible. I would in my pride yet once more triumph over the world, which I know with malicious pleasure would busy itself about me. After this I would accomplish an important business, that is to release, to unite with one another—two noble human beings, and after that—to vanish from the scene. Look not so mysteriously questioning at me, Sophia; be calm! thoughts of self-destruction live no longer in my soul, for that it has received too great and too mild impressions.—My good angels, Selma and Lennartson, have chased the night out of me, and have let the day dawn; some beams of which must thank, must bless them. Fear no longer for me! the life and the suffering which I expect I shall bear in silence."

"O Flora!" exclaimed I with emotion, "how worthy are you of a more beautiful lot!"

"Do not pity me!" said Flora, with a clear and lively expression; "do not pity me, Sophia; I have won much, I have won that which I till now never possessed, true human worth; and in this moment I feel a certainty and a peace in my soul which I never enjoyed till now. I feel that I have risen, I feel that I shall rise in the eyes of all those whose approbation and esteem are valuable to me. O grant me this consciousness, however boastful it may appear, grant it to me, it will help me to go through a heavy, a bitter hour."

"No, for myself I do not lament. I feel that I have conquered. But rather will I lament for the many who, in a situation like my own, seek for such a helper, and go on for ever forlorn; who, through a false education, a misdirected guidance, are shattered from the beginning, and never more can collect themselves into a whole."

"Ah! even I am shattered irrevocably and shall never attain unity. Like a fragment of a better existence shall I go through life, perhaps merely as a warning for the present, to point towards a better future."

"Do you see that it is daylight! Do you see how the world brightens! O certainly will the twilight of humanity brighten also more and more! Certainly the comprehension of the great object of life, the true worth of a human being, will become ever more and more living in the human heart! Certainly will woman be more and more esteemed for her own human worth, and acknowledged in the truth of her being. And when she is so acknowledged, when she in social life has won her true position, as human being, as fellow-citizen, then first will she anew become a divine mother for the earth, and from her bosom will spring a renewed and ennobled human race!"

The fire of inspiration glowed in Flora's eyes, burned upon her cheeks, upon her eloquent lips—she was unspeakably beautiful. Beautiful also at this moment was the scene around us. The sun ascended and cast its first beams upon the heights, flamed on the spires of the church-towers, the mountains reddened; the windows of the Castle towards Långard lit themselves up. A soft sigh filled with spring-life went through the trees of the field, and bowed the poplars on the river-parterre; the pennons in the haven fluttered merrily in the morning wind, and swelled by the rising Mälars-water, the foaming waves of the river rushed more grandly than ever through the arches of the North-bridge, and jubilant larks ascended above it, and snow-white sea-swallows dipped into it.

Long stood Flora and I, silently contemplating the increasing light and life; at length she directed her eyes to the haven, where a small black wreath of smoke raised itself, as if it would point out the way from Stockholm.

"Ha!" said she, "Gauthiod gives the sign already, and warns me to hasten."

"Will you travel abroad!" said I astonished

"With Felix, with my poor brother!" answered Flora. "He has been ordered to make use of the baths at Ems, and I accompany him, both for his sake and mine. It is necessary to me at this moment to leave this place; I am here only a hinderance, and I must breathe the air of other lands. Felix remains to be my dearest care. He has never till now found the sister in me which he deserved. But from henceforth he shall find it. Perhaps sometime the brother and sister, who have suffered shipwreck in fortune and happiness, may return to their fatherland with hearts healed, and more worthy as children.

"And what will you, what intend you for your own peculiar future?"

"First and foremost, to pass several years in foreign countries. Felix and I shall travel. I will observe the world with keen vision; I will observe woman in the new and higher relations of life and society, which the present time begins to form; I will see and judge rightly, and without prejudice, and then will choose an independent position in the realm of the beautiful or of the good, an interest, an ennobling aim for my restless striving soul. O Sophia! I will begin life anew! Yes, I feel it, the turning-point of my life is arrived! Farewell the past! Farewell wavering! Farewell illusions! And now a new sun, a new earth, a new life! And God's grace over my good designs!"

With this Flora raised towards heaven her clasped hands, and tears shone in her beaming eyes. Again we both were silent. I was deeply affected. She resumed more calmly—

"See here, Sophia, a letter to Selma; and here one to Lennartson. They will say all to them. They will also say to them, that the determination I have taken is the only way which remains for me to peace and happiness. No one, who is my friend, would seek to turn me from it. Gladly would I see my Selma once more; gladly view once more the pure countenance, the good clear eyes; but I must spare her the pain of parting—she has already suffered enough for me! But this garland (and she loosened the garland of white Provence roses from her head), this shall you, Sophia, lay on her bed at her feet, and let her keep it, and wear it as a remembrance of her Flora. I know that I do not deserve so pure a remembrance, but I know also that her soul cannot preserve any other of me without suffering. In Selma's letter I have also written to her mother; greet her, greet all whom you think trouble themselves about me, and tell them that I set off thus secretly, only to avoid parting, and spare them pain. And now I must hasten. Felix expects me; my things and my maid are already on board; I will now quickly dress myself, and then—Sophia, will you accompany me to the harbour?"

"To the world's end, if you will," replied I.

"Thanks! you hate me then no longer!"

"Hate you! I love, I admire—"

"Hush! hush! do not drive my virtue away!"

With these words Flora vanished. She was soon dressed ready for the journey, and I was ready to attend her. It was a lovely fresh morning, full of life and spring.

Amid serious yet cheerful conversation we went down to the harbour. Our parting was heartfelt, was full of unity. Flora was firm and steadfast to the last, and only when I could no longer see the waving of her white pocket-handkerchief in the far distance I left the strand. My heart was troubled, but as I returned to our home, and thought on what change of scenes had taken place, and what news I bore to my beloved; methought I had wings to soul and body—and wind and waves, and people and animals, and church-towers and street stones, and heaven and earth, methought joined in with my heart's exulting song—

The good has gained the victory!

O now I shall startle my stepmother! She and Selma sleep yet. They went to bed late, says Karin. I wait impatiently, and write while I wait. I would not exchange my lot with that of an archangel, if—(N. B.) he had anything else to do than carry glad tidings.

The 10th.

O Joy! thou beautiful, heavenly seraph! How loveable art thou, how worthy of adoration art thou, when thou arisest bright in the tearful eyes, and beamest in the looks of the dying! How good thou art when thou fillest life's cup to the brim for the happy and the noble on earth; merciful when thou withdrawest and memories from the wretched, the unfortunate, and crownest his sleep with roses; how lovely and bright thou seemest to me, when I remark thy gentle movement in the human soul! O that thou wert an existence that I could call forth with my prayers, with my heart's blood, then shouldst thou oftener appear on earth!

But perhaps thou wouldst be less beautiful, less enchanting, if seraph, did not precede thee like the sun, which never shines so beautifully on earth as after rain and tempest. Pain and joy are life's pair of wings, with which the human being raises himself to the home of perfection.

"The gentle movements of joy in the human soul!"

O! I have seen it to-day in my home, and among my beloved ones, although we do not venture to speak aloud thereon. Respect for Flora's memory and renunciation occasioned this; but the glory which her action threw over herself, penetrated more and more every sorrowful shadow.

Lennartson and Selma have bound themselves to each other as one being, who have long sought, and at last found each other, like two souls which were originally united in the thought of the Creator.

Their happiness has come forth out of much suffering, that now leaves free room for the play of joy; but on the other side of the clouds of the still melancholy which yet veils them, I heard the laugh of the god of love and the clapping of his wings. O the sylph will yet dance, dance upon the roses of life!

Flora's letter to Lennartson is such that he cannot do otherwise than accept the freedom which she returns to him. She shows herself determined and clear, and prays him to permit to her the consciousness which she has, of making two beloved human beings happy, and thus to regain theirs and her own esteem, "Remorse and self-contempt," writes she, "would henceforth persecute me at your side, Lennartson, and you would not have been able to shield me, for you could not love me. But, separated from you, I shall approach nearer to you. O Thorsten! I feel that, united to Selma, you will think of me with tenderness—I shall remain dear to you. Ah! perhaps it is rather egotism than pure love which guides me at this moment. If it be so—then forgive me!"

Lennartson's letter to Flora must throw into her soul a never to be extinguished beam of gladness and great self-satisfaction. And Flora is right; she will after this become more in-imately united with him than she would have been as his wife.

My stepmother is sweet, and amuses and affects me at the same time. 'She is silent and quiet, often lays her hands together and sighs; but her sighs carry a smile in them, and glad thoughts in her heart force themselves through the grave seriousness which she considers it becoming to assume. She talks therefore beautifully about "the wonderful ordinations of Providence, and of its being the duty of human beings to submit themselves." When will she have courage to become Prince Metternich again?

And I, for I also will be with—I participate, and rejoice, and hope, and am thankful—but in my heart I am not glad nor easy. I am uneasy about Wilhelm Brenner, and I am not pleased with myself.

Many people remain unmarried from noble and estimable reasons, but many also from—egotistical; that I feel in myself, and I acknowledge it with shame. One will gladly be beloved, will gladly warm oneself by the flame of a noble heart—yes, even give some warmth in return; as much, at least, as will not disturb our convenience, our ease. But for marriage, when this is bound up with some care, some trouble in the future—for that one has no courage, no virtue!

In the mean time I wonder whether I shall see the Viking again before his journey! Yet no! I wonder not! For if he will not, then I will; and "ce que femme veut, Dieu le veut."*

The 13th of May.

Most extraordinary occurrence in the boudoir between my stepmother and me.

As we in the afternoon were together, ruling the state, we noticed an entirely unusual accordance in our measures and views. We congratulated each other thereon, inquiring after the cause of this approach of opinion; and then it appeared that my stepmother, while she read so much in certain royalist newspapers, had in some things come over to the opposition side, and I again, had through certain opposition newspapers been drawn by degrees more towards the government than before. Particularly pleased by these discoveries, and congratulating ourselves upon our independence, we determined henceforth, that we might hold the balance even, to hold ourselves as organs of both parties; and we concluded our political discussion, by playing 'patience' together.

The 14th.

Something must have gone out to the world of the altered condition and views of the family, for our 'spasmodical acquaintance,' who had allowed us neither to hear nor see anything of them during the dark period, live now again like gnats in the sunshine.

The Gyllenlöfs and Silfverlings overwhelmed us to-day with friendship and compliments. Lennartson came in, and then the friendship knew no bounds, but laid the boldest plans for the greatest intimacy for the future. My stepmother was polite, and let there be five formed at once; but Selma assumed her princess deportment, and replied somewhat coldly to Adele Gyldenlöf's evidences of friendship and young Silfverling's adoration.

The not spasmodic, but in all cases to us friendly and good Signora Luna cast a glance yesterday into the new and happy relationship of the family, and her lovely eyes beamed with joy at Flora's behaviour, at Selma and Lennartson's happiness. She herself was in full court costume, and so handsome and brilliant that I could not help saying—

"Signora Luna is now in her brightest glory, and must feel herself ready for a beaming path."

She cast upon me one of those looks which reveal the depths of silent suffering, and said—"Ah! all is not gold which glitters," and the beaming path—but it goes well! All goes, although it seems at times as if all stood still."

Baron Alexander now approached, and said with his friendly imperiousness, 'I must remind you, my friend, that it is nearly nine o'clock. It is time to go to the court. This will be a splendid night.'

"And I," said his wife softly to me, as she arose, "I could sigh to-night, like so many others, with Tegnér—

Tell me, thou watcher! how the night is wearing,
Will there then ever be an end of it?

"But seriously!" said I, "is it not amusing to be sometimes in such assemblies of the handsome and the bright; to see life in its holiday attire?"

"It might be truly so," said Signora Luna, "the more so that one comes in contact with many agreeable and distinguished persons—if the heart were only light! But—how few there are who go through life with light hearts! And perhaps it as well so, one might otherwise become too frivolous." She smiled pensively, moved to me, and vanished, obscured by the Great Alexander.

"Domestic happiness or unhappiness?" See then that which equalizes more than anything else, human lot; places often the but beside the palace, the day-labourer near to the king; whilst it makes an immeasurable difference between the life and happiness of the mighty.

"Domestic troubles,"—wrote lamentingly a king who already is gone from the theatre of the world—"are in this respect different to public ones, that they bow down the soul by repeated pains, which every moment calls forth."

"I am the most fortunate man," wrote in a confidential letter, another king who yet bears upon his brow one of the noblest crowns of Europe, "and you will not find many who, like me, after a twenty years' acquaintance and a nineteen years' marriage, finds now the heart of his wife as divine, her eyes as heavenly, as in the first days of his love."

The 15th.

The Lady-Councillors of Commerce, Mrs. and Miss! Miss cast about her great peering glances, made significant gestures, and put sundry amusing questions, thus—

"Well! when shall you remove to Tornea? Has Miss Selma no desire to see a book, which is called 'Instructions in Frugal Housewifery?' I think it would be of use. Shall I purchase it for the young lady! The price is sixteen shillings a banco."

A coffee-council, in the afternoon, between two happy mothers, my stepmother and Mrs. Rittersvård. The first unclouded day in June will beam on the union of Åke Sparraköld and Helfrid Rittersvård.

Why write of all this! To try to forget that on which I now think.

The Viking sets sail on Sunday afternoon. The youngest boy is still confined to bed. Is it possible that Brenner will not see me, not say farewell to me before he sets off!

The 16th.

Letters from Flora have enlivened us all. The change shows itself to be enduring; her state of mind is astonishingly firm and clear. But why should people wonder at it! When once heaven has opened itself over a human head, has opened to his prayer, and it is a path upon which 'angels ascend and descend,' then that takes place in the human being which has not been calculated upon. Then powers are in motion, then communications take place, before which the wisest and best on earth bow themselves in wonder and reverence. But he must be left alone, alone with the Eternal.

That is also the last and highest stadium of all human education, of all higher development. For this, social life labours with all its wisest dogmas and institutions to elevate mankind. In strife with men, humanity never arrives there. Trusting in them, then is it a self-bewilderment. But sanctified and sustained by it, humanity ascends thither where even they cannot come. A new life, a new relationship then arises for it. The immediate relationship to the Eternal good, which will willingly give gifts to men, and give gifts of the Spirit without measure. This relationship on the side of the human being, I call child-like. It is the innermost of me. It may be attained by the most simple of men, if his will be good; and it can not be attained by the greatest philosopher, if he, after he have ascended the highest steps of logic, cannot as a child needing help, fall down upon his knees, and call upon his Father and the Father of all.

How happy was Lennartson this evening, as he, with his beloved Selma and her mother, laid out plans for their future life. How amiable he was, in the joy in the overswelling life to which he then for the first time gave free course! He let his bride have no peace at all, which naturally caused her some disquiet.

And my stepmother, what joy she had!

And I—O, I enjoyed myself in seeing them happy. I felt vividly the pleasantness of a life altogether with them (for I also, so it was said, shall have my home with Lennartson), in the sympathy in everything which life has interesting and elevating in art, in science, in public and private life, by intercourse with distinguished persons and their spheres of life.

O, I feel well how light and cheerful life must be in the daily enjoyment of what Ehrensavård calls "the joyful needs," but—

But what sayest thou, silent talisman, which beats in my breast! And thou, Wisdom, baptized in the eternal waves of love—thou whom I have called to guide my feet, to light my life—what sayest thou?

Here a life filled with lovely enjoyments—comfortable, sunshiny, cheerful in the society of noble and worthy people, but who—need not me, and who without me have enough. And there a sinking home, which I could sustain, orphan children whose mother and cherisher I could be, a husband noble and good whom I could love; yes, whom I—love! A life of labour and care, but in which the Eternal eye would look down brighter upon me than in the other—a life not splendid on earth, but brightened by—

O, can I indeed hesitate!

But Mrs. Trollman! Now, well! One magic-spirit will chase away another. That has often been done.

But the world! How will it cross itself and say, "foolish marriage! marriage phrensy! madness!" Now, yes: "Quand même!"

Selma! Lennartson! I know what they would say. But my stepmother! How it would startle my stepmother!

To-day is Saturday.

On Sunday morning.

A note from the Viking—manly, cordial, but nothing less than unfeeling. Yet he says that he does not feel himself strong enough to take a personal leave of me; he does this, therefore, by writing; bids me to greet my friends from him, and hopes again to see me, and calls himself, in conclusion, my "faithful Wilhelm."

A bouquet of lovely flowers says more to me than the letter. But I regard it as unpardonable of my "faithful Wilhelm," not to see and hear his friend before he voyages to the world's end. I feel that the magic spirit moves within me.

In the Evening.

A very little time, a very little way lies often between the now and the moment which, as if with a magic stroke, changes the whole of our life's state, the whole of our future. We ourselves, for the most part, hold the magic wand in our hand; but whether we use it to create our happiness or our misfortune, that we often know not ourselves. I was, however, tolerably clear on the subject, as I set out the very moment in which Lennartson drove my stepmother and Selma in his beautiful landau to the park—set out slowly and alone on a walk toward the Skeppsholm. It was a quiet, somewhat dull, summer-mild afternoon. I saw the objects around me as though I was taking leave of them; thus greeted I the neighbourhood of the North-bridge, with its castles, statues, and quays along the river; I said farewell to the polite world. At the beginning of the Skeppsholm-bridge I stopped. Before me lay upon its blue waters the green Skeppsholm, with its valleys and groves, with its temple built upon the rock, and reflecting itself in the sea. Behind me roared dully the mass of driving, riding, walking people, who, in festal attire, streamed out to the park. I thought on the landau who conveyed out my friends into the gay, elegant world, and who had just now besought me so earnestly to take my place with them; my heart sunk; it was as if invisible hands fettered my feet and drew me back. That was a trying moment. Then began the church bells to ring; and even as the sound of the temple bells in ancient times had power to put heathen spirits to flight, so-operated they even now on me. The contract—ing bonds loosened, and I went onward excited, but yet reserved. And as I entered into the green groves—an old man has planted them, and beautified the evening of his life by beautifying his native city—as I looked upon the tender green leaves and thought upon the tender children, I became ever calmer and freer in mind.

* Troll is a ghost, a spectre.

When first the long row, or the admiralty-house, threw its dark shadow over me, a certain bashfulness returned, but of another kind. My act was unusual—how would it be judged, how would it look? And Brenner himself, how would he—

"The thousand!" said I, at last, in vexation—N.B. quite softly: "I care nothing about the whole world! I will really only say farewell to my friend! Honi soit qui mal y pense!"

Brenner was not at home, and was expected later. I was glad of that. I said to Mrs. Trollman, who came to me with this intelligence, and who did not appear to me like a dangerous magic spirit, that I would wait here till the Colonel's return, because I had something of importance to say to him. I would in the mean time look after little Wilhelm and the other children, in case she had anything else to do. Mrs. Trollman was very much pleased with this, and I soon perceived the smell of roasting coffee diffuse itself through the house. And now by the little boy's bed, and with all the other children around me, I began to relate histories, and to feel myself in particularly good spirits. My histories were interrupted by steps which were heard in the hall, and, by the assembled children's hasty and exultant outbreak to meet the beloved father. Soon was he beside his sick child, who called his name longingly. When he saw me, he remained standing in astonishment.

I rose up.

"Thou, here!" cried Brenner, and seizing my hand led me out into another room, motioning to the children to leave us together. "Thou here, Sophia!" repeated he, and looked at me with a searching glance.

I did not leave him a long time to bewilder himself, but said—

"How couldst thou think of leaving me without saying one friendly word at parting? It was not good, it was not right of thee. I could indeed believe, that thou troubledst thyself no more me about than about a sea-gull!"

Tears almost choked me.

The Viking was silent, and I continued—

"Now we may see who best understands how to love his friend. Thou wilt not come to me, but I have come to thee, to say—farewell!"

"And thou hast come merely for that purpose! Thanks!" He pressed my hand.

It was now more difficult to continue. I was silent, he was silent. At length he compelled himself, and continued with a gentle suppressed voice, "thanks, that thou so kindly punishest my apparent negligence. May I now accompany thee home, and by so doing make it up with thy relatives."

"Go where thou wilt; I remain here. I—"

"How?"

"I remain with thy children, Wilhelm, till thou returnest from Africa."

Brenner looked at me for a moment, and his eyes filled with tears. "O thou woman's heart!" said he, took my hand, and continued with a penetrating glance, "and when I come back again, what wilt thou do then?"

"What—thou wilt!" replied I.

Brenner was again silent for a moment, and then said with an agitated voice—

"These are words which, some time ago, I would have given half the remainder of my life to have heard. But now—now it is otherwise. That which I then would do, will I now no longer."

I looked upon him questioningly, amazed.

"Now," continued Brenner, "my condition is much changed. I have nothing upon earth except—these poor children!"

"I know that!" answered I.

"I understand thee, Sophia," said Brenner pensively, "and this act surprises me not, from thee. But it involves a sacrifice which I neither can nor may accept. Thou refusedst thy head to the well-conditioned man, thou shalt not give it to the beggar!"

"His kingly majesty has declared for me by word of mouth," said I, "I may do what I will with that which is my own."

"No!" replied Brenner, "that mayst thou not. For thy determination, although noble, is over hasty, and thou mayst not do that of which thou wilt repent. Thy calm life and thy property may not be sacrificed for a ruined family. That shall not be, say I! Canst thou believe me to be such an egotist, such a—"

"Be still, be still, about all that! The children may fancy that we are quarrelling, and it is not so. We can mutually think about it till thou comest home. Perhaps thou mayst find in Africa some beauty—"

"Hush then! what stupidity is that! But if I never come home! My voyage may continue long, may be stormy, dangerous—if I should never come home!"

"Then I remain here to be thy children's mother to my dying day."

"Sophia!" ejaculated Brenner hastily, "thou art an angel, and upon my knees must I thank thee for this word, this will. But yet, yet I cannot accept it. It is a sacrifice, and it is indiscreet, and it is unreasonable."

"Well then! let reason and understanding go!" replied I; "how is it worth while keeping these when one has given away one's heart!"

And now—I lay on the Viking's heart, clasped in his arms. He called me his, and challenged the whole world to part us. He placed his ring upon my finger, he led his children into my arms, he said that I would be their mother, he introduced me as his bride to Mrs. Trollman, who, in astonishment, nearly upset the coffee-pot.

"Now I shall attend thee home!" exclaimed he in conclusion; "I must tell the whole world that thou art mine!"

The Viking is somewhat stormy in his happiness, thought I, but he may now have his will. How it will startle my stepmother!

On the arm of the Viking I retraced my way home. His heart was over full, and how charming was it to me to listen to the swell of the waves within it; but when he kissed my hand directly under the nose of the watch (the nose of the watch of Skeppholm), I was obliged to beseech of him that he would not expose me, nor behave himself like a sea-robber!"

"Confess now," exclaimed he, "that thy philosophy has not helped thee much, has not prevented thee from venturing thy life with a sea robber like me."

"Philosophy," exclaimed I; "it is precisely that which has conducted me to thee."

"Ah, bah! that I will not hear. Confess honestly out that it is love—pure, heavenly, irrational love!"

"No! not irrational—"

"Then rational love! now thou talkest well. Why use any ceremony about the word! It is really life's primal word—my beloved! And actual magic power hast thou never without it. Only do not come with 'Christian's love,' or I shall throw either thee or me into the sea!"

Of course I called him 'a heathen,' and such things. Amid such conversation we came home.

Fortunately it happened that we found my stepmother, Selma, and Lennartson, all together in the ante-room. The Viking threw the doors wide open, and with my hand clasped in his, he marched up into the middle of the floor, and introducing himself before the three sitting ones, exclaimed, "Congratulate us now! See you not that we are bridegroom and bride?"

With a cry of joy Lennartson sprang up and clasped us both in his arms, amidst the most cordial words. Selma sprang up also, half shocked, half glad, and embracing me exclaimed, "Sophia!"

And my stepmother, she sat quiet on the sofa, so struck, so astonished, so startled, that I thought she would have a stroke, and with that was quite terrified.

I now hastened up to her, kissed her hand, and besought her earnestly to forgive my apparent reserve; but that I myself, only two hours ago, did not know my destiny; and I began now a short explanation of the progress of the affair, but was interrupted by Brenner, who would relate the affair in his own way, and thus I fancy nobody rightly understood it, although every one was evidently affected and pleased, my stepmother also.

In the mean time the clock struck eight, and the Viking must go on board. As we now must part, it was hard for us.

"Accompany me to the linden trees below," prayed he; "I must still say a few words to thee under God's free heaven."

I went with him under the linden trees, which were gilded by the evening sun. We seated ourselves on a bench.

"Ah, here it is beautiful!" said Brenner "Within there it was too narrow for me, too heavy to part from thee. In the morning I shall be upon my free sea; but thou, Sophia, wilt then be in a narrow and quiet dwelling, and that—for my sake."

"I shall be with thy children, Wilhelm!" said I.

"I have often," continued Brenner, "heard thee speak with dread of the heavy, the oppressive, the troublesome in life—of the suffering—Sophia! I fear, I fear for that which thou undertakest, for thy strength, thy steadfastness!"

"Thou dost not rightly know me, Wilhelm. Remember that I am of the people and race of the Wasastjernas! Besides—the suffering, which I feared is that which fetters the soul, not that which elevates it, which ennobles it. Thou hast many times spoken of suffering as of what is noble, beautiful—and I have felt for some time that thou art right."

"Thou feelest therefore that thou wilt suffer, that thou mayst become mine?"

"Yes, Wilhelm; for I know that in the world there are storms, and manifold dangers, for those who are out upon the great sea; and I know that every stormy night will find me sleepless and anxious. But every evening and every morning I shall clasp together the hands of thy children in prayers for their father, and their innocent sighs shall part the clouds above thy head, and calm wind and wave. O Wilhelm, be easy about me! I am glad to love and to suffer. But," continued I, for I wished to calm Brenner's excited feelings, and give the conversation a more cheerful turn, "thou hast not given me any directions for the education of thy children. I presume that I must not teach them—philosophy!"

"Teach them in Heaven's name whatever thou wilt—yes, even philosophy, and especially that philosophy which gives thee to me. Teach them that love is the most beautiful wisdom. And now—I must leave thee, my, my Sophia. Remain here, let me see thy white figure under the blue heaven, under the green trees to the last!" He took my pocket-handkerchief, which was wet with tears, and hid it in his breast, as he said, "It shall be my Bethel-flag!" Yet once more he pressed my hand, yet once more his faithful glance sunk deep into my eyes, and down into the depths of my heart. He then moved off with great strides. Near the river, before he was hidden by the houses, he turned round once more and looked back, and waved a farewell with his hand. Thus vanished he from my sight. Slowly returned I home.

Lennartson was gone, in order to take leave of his friend, on board the frigate. My stepmother and Selma surrounded me. The former was evidently a little dissatisfied. But I now opened my heart to them both, and let them see all which had moved within it for some time.

I had the little egotistical pleasure of seeing my Selma's tears fall, because I must leave her; and the happiness to see that my stepmother perfectly approved of the resolution which I had taken, and did not altogether disapprove of my mode of action. A little troubled she was as to how it should be made known to the world, and how this would regard it; but after we had made all our 'reflexions chrétiennes et morales' upon the circumstance, we found that the affair was not so dangerous; nor was the world either, if people only faced it with an honest mind and a polite manner.

As we separated for the night, my stepmother clasped round my arm a beautiful bracelet of her own hair, and said—

"You must not think, my sweet Sophia, that I did not suspect, that I did not in silence rightly see how all was going forward here, although I have said nothing! I have foreseen it altogether!"

"No! has my dear mother actually?" exclaimed I.

"Uu, um, um, um!"

"Prince Metternich again!" thought I. "Good-night, my sweet, gracious mamma!" said I.

Monday morning, 26th of May.

Another day! another change of light and shade. Now friendly day! I salute thee in my new home. Mildly dawns life there.

Thither was I lately attended by my mother, Selma, and Lennartson. There I hope often to see them again.

Already I feel myself quite at home, and so is Mrs. Trollman with me. The upper magic spirit and the lower magic spirit have concluded a fundamental peace upon certain conditions, which stand in our Lord's hand. Merrily dance the waves without upon the Fjård, and bear the Viking away from his home. I bear upon my breast some words from him, written on board the frigate, and conveyed to me I know not by what heavenly wind. There is love in them, and life's primeval word lives also in my heart.

Within, the children wake up out of the arms of sleep, and for me rise up cares for them, and for house and home.

An end now to my life of quiet observation and daily sketches. Away with thee, gossiping, but dear pen, which took up so much time! And in truth, when one has given away freedom, reason, and heart, then is it also well to lay aside—THE DIARY.

STRIFE AND PEACE:

OR,

SOME SCENES IN NORWAY.

CHAPTER I.

OLD NORWAY.

Still the old tempests rage around the mountains,
And ocean's billows, as of old, appear:
The roaring wood and the resounding fountains
Time has not silenced in his long career,
For Nature is the same as ever.

MUNCH.

The shadow of God wanders through Nature.
LINNEAUS.

BEFORE yet a song of joy or of mourning had gone forth from the valleys of Norway—before yet a smoke-wreath had ascended from its huts—before an axe had felled a tree of its woods—before yet king Nor burst forth from Jotunhem to seek his lost sister, and passing through the land gave to it his name: nay, before yet there was a Norwegian, stood the high Dovre mountains with snowy summits before the face of the Creator.

Westward stretches itself out the gigantic mountain chain as far as Romsdahlshorn, whose foot is bathed by the Atlantic ocean. Southward it forms under various names (Langfjeld, Sognesfjeld, Filefjeld, Hardangerfjeld, and so forth), that stupendous mountainous district which in a stretch of a hundred and fifty geographical miles comprehends all that nature possesses of magnificent, fruitful, lovely, and charming. Here stands yet, as in the first days of the world, in Upper Telemark, the Fjellstuga, or rock-house, built by an invisible hand, and whose icy walls and towers that hand alone can overthrow: here still as in the morning of time meet together at Midsummer, upon the snowy foreheads of the ancient mountains, the rose-tint of morning and the rose-tint of evening for a brotherly kiss; still roar as then the mountain torrents which hurl themselves into the abyss; still reflect the ice-mirrors of the glaciers the same objects—now delighting, now awakening horror; and still to-day, even as then, are there Alpine tracts which the foot of man never ascended; valleys of wood, "lonesome cells of nature," upon which only the eagle and the Midsummer-sun have looked down. Here is the old, ever young, Norway; here the eye of the beholder is astonished, but his heart expands itself; he forgets his own suffering, his own joy, forgets all that is trivial, whilst with a holy awe he has a feeling that "the shadow of God wanders through nature."

In the heart of Norway lies this country. Is the soul wearied with the tumults of the world or fatigued with the trifles of poor every-day life—is it depressed by the confined atmosphere of the room— with the dust of books, the dust of company, or any other kind of dust (there are in the world so many kinds, and they all cover the soul with a grey dust mantle); or is she torn by deep consuming passions—then fly, fly towards the still heart of Norway, listen there to the fresh mighty throbbing of the heart of nature; alone with the quiet, calm, and yet so eloquent, objects of nature, and there wilt thou gain strength and life! There falls no dust. Fresh and clear stand the thoughts of life there, as in the days of their creation. Wilt thou behold the great and the majestic? Behold the Gausta, which raises its colossal knees six thousand feet above the surface of the earth; behold the wild giant forms of Hurrungern, Fannarauk, Mugnafjeld; behold the Rjuhan (the rushing), the Vorting, and Vedal rivers foaming and thundering over the mountains and plunging down in the abysses! And wilt thou delight thyself in the charming, the beautiful? They exist among these fruitful scenes in peaceful solitude. The Sater-hut stands in the narrow valley; herds of cattle graze on the beautiful grassy meadows; the Sater-maiden, with fresh colour, blue eyes, and bright plaits of hair, tends them and sings the while the simple, the gentle melancholy airs of the country; and like a mirror for that charming picture, there lies in the middle of the valley a little lake (kjærn), deep, still, and of a clear blue colour, as is generally peculiar to the glacier water. All breathes an idyllic peace.

But a presentiment of death appears, even in the morning hour of creation, to have impressed its seal upon this country. The vast shadows of the dark mountain masses fall upon valleys where nothing but moss grows; upon lakes whose still waters are full of never-melted ice—thus the Cold Valley, the Cold Lake (Koldedal and Koldesjø), with their dead, grey-yellow shores. The stillness of death reigns in this wilderness, interrupted only by the thunderings of the avalanche and by the noise which occasions the motion of the glaciers. No bird moves its wings or raises its twittering in this sorrowful region; only the melodious sighs of the cuckoo are borne thither by the winds at Midsummer.

Wilt thou, however, see life in its pomp and fairest magnificence? Then see the embrace of the winter and the summer in old Norway; descend into the plain of Svalet, behold the valleys of Aamaadt and Sillejord, or the paradisiacally beautiful Vestfjordal, through which the Man flows still and clear as a mirror, and embraces in its course little, bright green islands, which are overgrown with bluebells and sweet-scented wood-lilies; see how the silver stream winds itself down from the mountains, between groups of trees and fruitful fields; see how, behind the near hills with their leafy woods, the snow-mountains elevate themselves, and like worthy patriarchs look down upon a younger generation; observe in these valleys the morning and evening play of colours upon the heights, in the depths; see the affluent pomp of the storm; see the calm magnificence of the rainbow, as it vaults itself over the waterfall—depressed spirit, see this, understand it, and—breathe!

From these beautifully, universally known scenes we withdraw ourselves to a more unknown region, to the great stretch of valley where the Skogshorn rears itself to the clouds; where Urunda flows brightly between rocks—the waterfalls of Djupadahl stream not the less charmingly and proudly because they are only rarely admired by the eyes of curious travellers. We set ourselves down in a region whose name and situation we council nobody to seek out in maps, and which we call—

HEIMDAL.

Knowest thou the deep, cool dale,
Where church-like stillness doth prevail;
Where neither flock nor herd you meet;
Which hath no name nor track of feet?

VILHAVEN.

HEIMDAL we call a branch of Hallingdal, misplace it in the parish of Aal, and turn it over to the learned—that they may wonder at our boldness. Like its mother valley it possesses no historical memories. Of the old kings of Hallingdal one knows but very little. Only a few hewn stones, a few burial-mounds, give a dim intelligence of the mighty who have been. It is true that a people dwell here, who from untold ages were renowned as well for their simplicity and their contentedness under severe circumstances as for their wild contest-loving disposition; but still, in quiet as in unquiet, built and dwelt, lived and died here, without tumult and without glory, among the ancient mountains and the pine-woods, unobserved by the rest of the world.

One river, the son of Halen-Jokul, flows through Heimdal. Foaming with wild rage, it comes through the narrow mountain-pass down into the valley, finds there a freer field, becomes calm, and flows clear as a mirror between green shores, till its banks become again compressed together by granite mountains. Then is it again seized upon by disquiet, and rushes thence in wild curves till it flings itself into the great Hallingdal river, and there dies.

Exactly there, where the stream spreads itself out, in the extended valley, lies a large estate. A well-built, but somewhat decayed, dwelling-house of wood, stretches out its arms into the depths of the valley. From there may be seen a beautiful prospect, far, far thence into the blue distance. Hills overgrown with wood, stretched upward from the river, and cottages surrounded with inclosed fields and beautiful grassy paths, lay scattered at the foot of the hills. On the other side of the river, a mile-and-half from the Grange, a chapel raised its peaceful tower. Beyond this, the valley gradually contracted itself.

On a cool September evening, strangers arrived at the Grange, which had now been long uninhabited. It was an elderly lady, of a noble but gloomy exterior, in deep mourning. A young, blooming maiden accompanied her. They were received by a young man, who was called there 'the Steward.' The dark-appeared lady vanished in the house, and after that was seen nowhere in the valley for several months. They called her there 'the Colonel's lady,' and said Mrs. Astrid Hjelm had experienced a very strange fate, of which many various histories were in circulation. At the estate of Semb, which consisted of the wide-stretching valley of Heimdal, which was her paternal heritage, had she never, since the time of her marriage, been seen. Now as widow she had again sought out the home of her childhood. It was known also and told, that her attendant was a Swedish girl, who had come with her from one of the Swedish watering-places, where she had been spending the summer, in order to superintend her house-keeping; and it was said, that Susanna Björk ruled as excellently as with sovereign sway over the economical department, over the female portion of the same, Larina the parlour-maid, Karina the kitchen-maid, and Petro the cook, as well as over the farm-servants, Mathea, Budeja, and Goran the cattle-boy, together with all their subjects of the four-footed and two-legged races. We will now with these last, make a little nearer acquaintance.

THE POULTRY. THE WATER OF STRIFE.

FIRST STRIFE.

"For Norway!"

"For Sweden!"

DISPUTANTS.

THE morning was clear and fresh. The September sun shone into the valley; smoke rose from the cottages. The ladies' mantle, on whose fluted cups bright pearls trembled; the silver-weed, with its yellow flowers and silver glittering leaves, shone in the morning sun beside the footpath, which wound along the moss-grown feet of the backs of the mountains. It conducted to a spring of the clearest water, which after it had filled its basin, allowed its playful vein to run murmuring down to the river.

To this spring, on that beautiful morning, went down Susanna Björk, and there followed her 'cocks and hens, and chickens small.'

Before her waddled with consequential gabblings a flock of geese, which were all snow-white, excepting one—a grey gander. This one tottered with a desponding look a little behind the others, compelled to this by a tyrant among the white flock, which, as soon as the grey one attempted to approach, drove it back with outstretched neck and yelling cries. The grey gander always fled before the white tyrant; but bald places upon the head and neck, proved that he had not come into this depressed condition without those severe combats having made evident the fruitlessness of protestation. Not one of the goose madams troubled herself about the ill-used gander, and for that reason Susanna all the more zealously took upon herself, with delicate morsels and kind words, to console him for the injustice of his race. After the geese, came the well-meaning but awkward ducks; the turkey-cock, with his choleric temper and his two foolish wives, one white and the other black; lastly, came the unquiet generation of hens, with their handsome, quarrel-loving cocks. The prettiest of all, however, were a flock of pigeons which, confidently and basely at the same time, now alighted down upon Susanna's shoulders and outstretched hand; now flew aloft and wheeled in glittering circles around her head; then set-thud down again upon the earth, where they neatly tripped, with their little fringed feet, stealing down to the spring to drink, whilst the geese with great tumult bathed themselves in the water and splashed about, throwing the water in pearly rain over the grass. Here also was the grey gander, to Susanna's great vexation, compelled by the white one to bathe itself at a distance from the others.

Susanna looked around her upon the beautifully richly coloured picture which lay before her, upon the little creatures which played around her and enjoyed themselves, and evident delight beamed from her eyes as she raised them, and with hands pressed together, said softly, "O heavens! how beautiful!"

But she shrank together in terror, for in that very moment a strong voice just beside her broke forth—

"How glorious is my fatherland,
The old sea-circled Norway!"

And the steward, Harald Bergman, greeted smilingly Susanna, who said rather irritated—"You scream so, that you frighten the doves with your old Norway."

"Yes," continued Harald, in the same tone of inspiration—

"Yes, glorious is my fatherland,
The ancient rock-bound Norway;
With flowery dale, crags old and grey,
That spite of time eternal stand!"

"Old Norway," said Susanna as before; "I consider it a positive shame to hear you talk of your old Norway, as if it were older and more everlasting than the Creator himself!"

"And where in all the world," exclaimed Harald, "do you find a country with such a proud, serious people; such magnificent rivers, and such high, high mountains?"

"We have, thank God, men and mountains also in Sweden," said Susanna; "you should only see them; that is another kind of thing!"

"Another kind of thing! What other kind of thing? I will wager that there is not a single goose in Sweden which could compare with our excellent Norway geese."

"No, not one, but a thousand, and all larger and fatter than these. Every thing in Sweden is larger and more excellent than in Norway."

"Larger? The people are decidedly smaller and weaker."

"Weaker? smaller? you should only see the people in Uddevalla, my native city!"

"How can anybody be born in Uddevalla? Does anybody really live in that city? How can anybody live in it? It is a shame to live in such a city; it is a shame also only to drive through it. It is so miserably small, that when the wheels of the travelling-carriage are at one end, the horse has already put his head out at the other. Do not talk about Uddevalla!"

"No, with you it certainly is not worth while to talk about it, because you have never seen anything else besides Norwegian villages, and cannot, on that account, form any idea to yourself of a proper Swedish city."

"Defend me from ever seeing such cities—defend me! And then your Swedish lakes! what wretched puddles they are, beside our glorious Norwegian ocean!"

"Puddles! Our lakes! Great enough to drown the whole of Norway in!"

"Ha, ha, ha! And the whole of Sweden is beside our Norwegian ocean no bigger than my sap! And this ocean would incessantly flow over Sweden, did not our Norway magnanimously defend it with its granite breast."

"Sweden defends itself, and needs no other help! Sweden is a fine country!"

"Not half as fine as Norway. Norway reaches heaven with its mountains; Norway comes nearest to the Creator."

"Norway may well be presumptuous, but God loves Sweden the best."

"Norway, say I!"

"Sweden, say I!"

"Norway! Norway for ever! We will see whose throw goes the highest, who wins for his country. Norway first and highest!" and with this, Harald threw a stone high into the air.

"Sweden first and last!" exclaimed Susanna, while she slung a stone with all her might.

Fate willed it that the two stones struck against each other in the air, after which they both fell with a great plump down into the spring around which the small creatures had assembled themselves. The geese screamed; the hens and ducks flew up in terror; the turkey-hens flew into the wood, where the turkey-cock followed them, forgetting all his dignity; all the doves had vanished in a moment—and with crimsoned cheeks and violent contention as to whose stone went the highest, stood Harald and Susanna alone beside the agitated and muddled water of discord.

The moment is perhaps not the most auspicious, but yet we will make use of it, in order to give a slight sketch of the two contending persons.

Harald Bergman had speaking, somewhat sharp features, in which an expression of great gravity could easily be exchanged for one of equal waggery. The dark hair fell in graceful waves over a brow in which one saw that clear thought was entertained. His figure was finely proportioned, and his movements showed great freedom and vigour.

He had been brought up in a respectable family, had enjoyed a careful education, and was regarded by friends and acquaintances as a young man of extraordinary promise. Just as he had left the S. seminary, and was intending a journey into foreign countries, in order to increase still more his knowledge of agriculture, chance brought him acquainted with the widow of Colonel Hjelm, at the time in which she was returning to her native country, and in consequence thereof he altered his plans. In a letter to his sister, he expresses himself on this subject in the following manner—

"I cannot properly describe to you, Alette, the impression which she made upon me. I might describe to you her tall growth, her noble bearing, her countenance, where, spite of many wrinkles and a pale-yellow complexion, traces of great beauty are incontrovertible; the lofty forehead, around which black locks sprinkled with gray, press forth from beneath her simple cap. I might tell of her deep, serious eyes, of her low and yet solemn voice; and yet thou couldst form to thyself no representation of that which makes her so uncommon. I have been told that her life has been as much distinguished by exemplary virtue as by suffering—and virtue and suffering have called forth in her a quiet greatness, a greatness which is never attained to by the favourites of fortune and of nature, which stamps her whole being. She seemed to me, as if all the frivolities of the world passed by her unremarked. I felt for her an involuntary reverence, such as I had never felt before for any human being; and at the same time a great desire to approach her more nearly, to be useful to her, to deserve, and to win her esteem—it seemed to me that I should thereby become somewhat greater, or at least better; and as I was informed that she sought for a clever and experienced steward for her sorely decayed estate, I offered myself as such, in all modesty, or rather without any; and when accepted, I felt an almost childish joy, and set off immediately to her estate, that I might make myself at home there, and have every thing in readiness to receive her."

"Thus much for Harald, now for Susanna.

Barbara Susanna Björk was not handsome, could not be even called pretty (for that, she was too large and strong), but she was good-looking. The blue eyes looked so honestly and openly into the world; the round and full face testified health, kindness, and good spirits; and when Susanna was merry, when the rosy lips opened themselves for a hearty laugh, it made any one right glad only to look at her. But true is it, that she was very often in an ill-humour, and then she did not look at all charming. She was a tall, well-made girl, too powerful in movement ever to be called graceful, and her whole being betrayed a certain want of refinement.

Poor child! how could she have obtained this in the home abounding in disorder, poverty, and vanity, in which the greater part of her life had been passed.

Her father was the Burgomaster of Uddevala; her mother died in the infancy of her daughter. Soon afterwards an aunt came into the house, who troubled herself only about the housekeeping and her coffee-drinking acquaintance, left her brother himself to seek for his pleasures at the club, and the child to take care of herself. The education of the little Susanna consisted in this, that she learned of necessity to read, and that when she was naughty they said to her, "Is Barbra there again? Fie, for shame, Barbra! Get out, Barbra!" and when she was good again, it was, "See now, Sanna is here again! Welcome, sweet Sanna!" A method which certainly was not without its good points, if it had only been wisely applied. But often was the little girl talked to as "Barbra," when there was no occasion for it, and this had often the effect of calling forth the said personage. In the mean time she was accustomed as a child to go out as Barbra, and come in again as Sanna, and this gave her early an idea of the two natures which existed in her, as they exist in every person. This idea attained to perfect clearness in Susanna's religious instruction, the only instruction which poor Susanna ever had. But how infinitely rich is such instruction for an ingenuous mind, when it is instilled by a good teacher. Susanna was fortunate enough to have such a one, and she now became acquainted in Barbra with the earthly demon which should be overcome in Sanna, the child of heaven, which makes free and enlightens; and from this time there began between Barbra and Sanna an open strife which daily occurred, and in which the latter, for the most part, got the upper hand, if Susanna was not too suddenly surprised by a naturally proud and violent temper.

When Susanna had attained her twelfth year her father married a second time, but became a second time a widower, after his wife had presented him with a daughter. Two months after this he died also. Near relations took charge of the orphan children. In this new home Susanna learned to—bear hardships; for there, as she was strong and tall, and besides that made herself useful, and was kind-hearted, they made her soon the servant of the whole house. The daughters of the family said that she was fit for nothing else, for she could learn nothing, and had such unrefined manners; and besides that, she had been taken out of charity; she had nothing, and so on: all which they made her feel many a time in no gentle manner, and over which Susanna shed many tears both of pain and anger. One month, however, there was which never addressed to Susanna other tones than those of affectionate love, and this was the mouth of the little sister, the little golden-haired Hulda. She had found in Susanna's arms her cradle, and in her care that of the tenderest mother. For from Hulda's birth Susanna had taken the little forlorn one to herself, and never had loved a young mother her first-born child more warmly or more deeply than Susanna loved her little Hulda, who also, under her care, became the loveliest and the most amiable child that ever was seen. And wo to those who did any wrong to the little Hulda! They had to experience the whole force of Susanna's often strong-handed displeasure. For her sake Susanna passed here several years of laborious servitude: as she, however, saw no end to this, yet was scarcely able to dress herself and her sister befittingly, and besides this was prevented by the multitude of her occupations from bestowing upon her sister that care which she required, therefore Susanna, in her twentieth year, looked about her for a better situation.

From the confined situation in which Susanna spent such a weary life, she was able to see one tree behind a fence, which stretched out its branches over the street. Many a spring and summer evening, when the rest of the inhabitants of the house were abroad on parties of pleasure, sat Susanna quietly by the little slumbering Hulda, within the little chamber which she had fitted up for herself and her sister, and observed with quiet melancholy from her window the green tree, whose twigs and leaves waved and beckoned so kindly and invitingly in the wind.

By degrees the green leaves beckoned into her soul thoughts and plans, which eventually fashioned themselves into a determined form, or rather an estate, whose realization from this time forth became the paradise of her soul and the object of her life. This estate was a little farm in the country, which Susanna would rent, and cultivate, and make profitable by her own industry and her own management. She planted potatoes; she milked cows and made butter; she sowed, she reaped; and the labour was to her a delight; for there, upon the soft grass, under the green, waving tree, sat the little Hulda, and played with flowers, and her blue eyes beamed with happiness, and no care and no want came near her.

All Susanna's thoughts and endeavours directed themselves to the realizing of this idea. The next step towards it was the obtaining a good service, in which, by saving her wages, she could obtain a sum of money sufficient to commence her rural undertaking. Susanna flattered herself, that in a few years she could bring her scheme to bear, and therefore made inquiries after a suitable situation.

There were this year among the visitors at the watering-place of Gustafsberg, which lay near to Uddevalla, a Norwegian Colonel and his lady. He was lame from a paralytic stroke, and had lost the use of speech and of his hands. He was a large man, of a fierce, stern exterior; and although he seemed to endure nobody near him but his wife, and perpetually demanded her care, still it was evidently not out of love. And although his wife devoted herself unweariedly and self-denyingly to his service, still this evidently was not from love either, but from some other extraordinary power. Her own health was visibly deeply affected, and violent spasms often attacked her breast; but night or day, whenever it was his will to rise, it was her patient, bowed neck around which his arm was laid. She stood by his side, and supported him in the cold shower-bath, which was intended to re-awaken his dormant power of life, at the same time that it destroyed hers. She was ever there, always firm and active, seldom speaking, and never complaining. By the painful contraction of her countenance alone, and by the peculiarity of laying her hand upon her heart, it could be seen that she suffered. Susanna had an opportunity of seeing all this, and admiration and sympathy filled her breast. Before long she was fortunate enough to assist the noble lady, to offer to her her strong youthful arm as support, and to watch over the sick man when his wife was compelled to close her eyes from fatigue. And fortunately the invalid endured her. Susanna was witness of the last horrible scenes by the death-bed of the Colonel. He seemed to make violent efforts to say something, but — he could not. Then he made signs that he wished to write something; but his fingers could not hold the pen. Then presented itself a horrible disquiet on his distorted features. With that his wife bowed herself over him, and with an expression of the greatest anxiety, seized one of his hands and whispered — "Give me only a sign, as answer! Tell me! Tell me! does he yet live?"

The sick man riveted upon her a strong gaze, and — bowed his head. Was this an assenting answer, or was it the hand of death which forbade an answer? No one could tell, for he never again raised his head. It was his last movement.

For many days afterwards a quick succession of spasmodic attacks seemed to threaten the widowed lady with approaching death. Susanna watched incessantly beside her, and felt herself happy in being able to watch over her and to serve her. Susanna had conceived an almost passionate devotion for Mrs. Astrid; such as young girls often feel for elderly, distinguished women, to whom they look up as to the ideal of their sex. And when Mrs. Astrid returned to Norway, Susanna kissed with tears her little Hulda, but yet felt herself happy to follow such a mistress, and to serve her in the rural solitude to which she betook herself. Susanna journeyed to the foreign country, but retained deep in her heart her little Hulda and her life's plan.

MRS. ASTRID.

Did ye but feel, O stars! who see
The whole earth's silent misery,
Then never would your glances rest
With such calm radiance on her breast.

HENRI WERDELAND.

As Susanna withdrew from Harald, and from the water of discord, she was quite in an excited and bad temper; but as soon however as she approached the wing of the house which Mrs. Astrid inhabited, she became calmer. She looked up to her window, and saw there her noble but gloomy profile. It was bent down, and her head seemed as it were depressed by dark thoughts. At this sight, Susanna forgot all her own ill humour. "Oh!" sighed she, "if I could only make her happier!"

This was Susanna's daily subject of thought, but it became to her every day a darker riddle. Mrs. Astrid appeared to be indifferent to every thing around her here. Never did she give an order about anything in the house, but let Susanna scold there and govern just as she would. Susanna took all the trouble she could to provide the table of her mistress with every thing good and delicious which lay in her power; but to her despair the lady ate next to nothing, and never appeared to notice whether it was prepared well or ill.

Now before Susanna went into the house, she gathered several of the most beautiful flowers which the autumn frost had spared, made a nosegay of them, and with these in her hand stepped softly into Mrs. Astrid's room.

'Bowed with grief,' is the expression which describes Mrs. Astrid's whole being. The sickly paleness of her noble countenance, the depressed seldom-raised eyelids, the inanimate languor of her movements, the gloomy indifference in which her soul seemed to be wrapped, — like her body in its black mourning habiliments, when she sat for hours in her easy chair, often without occupation, the head bowed down upon the breast; all this indicated a soul which was severely fettered by long suffering.

Suffering in the north has its own peculiar character. In the south it burns and consumes. In the north it kills slowly; it freezes, it petrifies by degrees. This has been acknowledged for untold ages, when our forefathers sought for images of that which they felt to be the most terrible in life; thus originated the fable of the subterranean dwelling of Hela, of the terrors of the shore of corpses — in one word, the 'Hell of the North, with its infinite, treeless wildernesses; with cold, darkness, mist, clammy rivers, chill, distilling poison, cities resembling clouds filled with rain, footless hobgoblins,' and so on.

In the Grecian Tartarian dance of the Furies there is life and wild strength, there is in its madness a certain intoxication which deprives it of its feeling of deep misery. The heart revolts not so much from these pictures of terror, as from the cold, clammy, dripping ones which the chill north exhibits — ah! not alone in poetry.

As Susanna entered the apartment of Mrs. Astrid, she found her sitting, as usual, sunk in deep melancholy. Upon a table before her lay paper and pens, and a book, in which she appeared to have been reading. It was the Bible; it lay open at the book of Job, and the following passages were underlined —

My soul is weary of my life, for my days are vanity.
Man is born to trouble as the sparks fly upwards.

Mrs. Astrid's eyes were riveted upon these last words, as Susanna softly, and with a warm heart, approached her, and with a cordial "Ah! be so good," presented to her the nosegay.

The lady looked up at the flowers, and an expression of pain passed over her countenance as she turned away her head and said, "They are beautiful, but keep them, Susanna; they are painful to my eyes."

She resumed her former position, and Susanna much troubled drew back; after a short silence, however, she again ventured to raise her voice, and said, "We have got to-day a beautiful salmon-trout, will you not, Mrs. Astrid, have it for dinner? Perhaps with egg-sauce, and perhaps I might roast a duck, or a chicken—"

"Do whatever you like, Susanna," said the lady, interrupting her and with indifference. But there was something so sorrowful in this indifference, that Susanna, who had again approached her, could not contain herself; she quickly threw herself before her mistress, clasped her knees, and said—

"Ah, if I could only do something to please my lady; if I could only do something."

But Susanna's warm glance, beaming with devotion, met one so dark that she involuntarily started back.

"Susanna," said Mrs. Astrid, as with gloomy seriousness she laid her hand upon her shoulder and gently put her back, "gratify me in one thing, attach not thyself to me. It will not lead to good. I have no attachment to give—my heart is dead! Go, my child," continued she more kindly, "go, and do not trouble thyself about me. My wish, the only good thing for me, is to be alone."

Susanna went now, her heart filled with the most painful feelings. "Not trouble myself about her!" said she to herself, as she wiped away a tear, "not trouble myself about her, as if that were so easy."

After Susanna was gone, Mrs. Astrid threw a melancholy glance upon the papers which lay before her. She seized the pen, and laid it down again. She seemed to shudder at the thought of using it; at length she overcame herself, and wrote the following letter:—

"You wish that I should write to you. I write for that reason; but what—what shall I say to you? My thanks for your letter, my paternal friend, the teacher of my youth; thanks that you wish to strengthen and elevate my soul. But I am old, bowed down, wearied, embittered—there dwells no strength, no living word more in my breast. My friend, it is too late—too late!

"You would raise my glance to heaven; but what is the glory of the sun to the eye that sees no longer? What is the power of music to the deaf ear? What is all that is beautiful, all that is good in the world, to the heart that is dead; that is turned to stone in a long severe captivity? Oh, my friend! I am unworthy of your consolation, of your refreshing words. My soul raises itself against them, and throws them from herself as 'words, words, words,' which have sounded beautifully and grandly for thousands of years, whilst thousands of souls are in consolably speechless.

"Hope? I have hoped so long. I have already said to myself so long, 'a better day comes! The path of duty conducts to the home of peace and light, be the way ever so full of thorns. Go only steadfastly forward, weary pilgrim, go, go, and thou wilt come to the holy land!' And I have gone—I have gone on through the long, weary day, for above thirty years; but the way stretches itself out farther and farther—my hopes have withered, have died away, the one after the other;—I see now no goal, none; but the grave! Love, love! Ah, if you knew what an inex-pressibly bitter feeling this word awakens in me! Have I not loved, loved intensely? And what fruit has my love borne? It has broken my heart, and has brought unhappiness to those whom I loved. It is in vain that you would combat a belief which has taken deep root in me. I believe that there are human beings who are born and pre-ordained to misfortune, and who communicate misfortune to all who approach them, and I believe that I belong to these. Let me, therefore, fly from my kind, fly from every feeling which binds me to them. Why should I occasion more mischief than I have already done?

"Why do you desire me to write? I wish not to pour my bitterness into the heart of another; I wish to grieve no one, and—what have I now done?

"There is a silent combat which goes through the world, which is fought out in the reserved human heart, and at times—fearfully! It is the combat with evil and bitter thoughts. They are such thoughts as sometimes take expression, expression written in fire and blood. Then are they read before the judgment-seat and condemned. In many human hearts, however, they rage silently for long years; then are undermined by degrees, health, temper, love, faith, faith in life and faith in—a good God. With this sinks every thing.

"Could I believe that my devoted, true pilgrimage by the side of a husband whom I once so tenderly loved, and for whose sake I dragged on life in the fortress of which he was the commander, in comparison of which the life of the condemned criminal is joy; whom I followed faithfully, though I no longer loved him, because it was needful to him; because, without me, he would have been given over to dark spirits—followed, because right and duty demanded it; because I had promised it before God—Oh! could I believe that this fidelity had operated beneficially,—that my endeavours had borne any fruit—I should not then, as now, ask 'why was I born? why have I lived?' But nothing, nothing!

"Could I think that on the other side of the grave I should meet the gentle loving look of my only sister—would I gladly die. But what should I reply to her, if she asked after her child of sorrow? How would she look upon the unfaithful protectress?

"O my friend! My misfortune has nothing in common with that of romances, nothing with that of which the most deep shades only serve to set off the most beautiful lights. It is a wearisome winter twilight; which only conducts to a deeper night. And am I alone in this condition? Open the pages of history, look around you in the present day, and you will see a thousand-fold sufferings, unmerited sufferings, which after long agony lead—to despair. But another, a happier life! Only consolation, only hope, only true point of light in the darkness of earthly existence!—no, no! I will not abandon thee! I will trust in thee; and in this belief will be silenced the murmurings which so often arise against the Creator of the world.

"I am ill, and do not believe that I shall live over this winter. Breathing is difficult to me; and perhaps the inexpressible heaviness which burdens me may contribute to this torment. When I sit up sleepless in my bed through the long nights, and see the night in myself, behind me and before me, then dark, horrible phantasies surround me, and I often think that insanity with ashy cheeks, stony and rigid gaze, approaches me, will darken my reason and bewilder my mind. How can I wish to live? When it is evening, I wish it were morning; and when it is morning, I wish that the day was over, and that it were again evening. Every hour is to me a burden and a torment.

"For this cause, my friend, pray God for me that I may soon die! Farewell! Perhaps I may write no more. But my last clear thought will be for you. Forgive the impatience, the bitterness, which shows itself in this letter. Pray for me, my friend and teacher, pray that I may be able to compose myself, and to pray yet before I die!"

NEW CONTENTIONS.

We're living a peculiar life,
With serious words and serious strife.
MUNCH.

WHILST we leave the pale Mrs. Astrid alone with her dark thoughts, we are led by certain extraordinary discords to look around in

THE BREWHOUSE.

Harald found himself there for the purpose of testing the new beer which Susanna had brewed; but before he had swallowed down a good draught, he said, with a horrible grimace, "It is good for nothing—good for nothing at all!"

Somewhat excited, Susanna made reply, "Perhaps you will also assert that Baroness Rosenhjelm's brewing-recipe is good for nothing!"

"That I assert decidedly. Does not she give coffee-parties? And a coffee-bibber is always a bad housewife, and as Baroness Rosenhjelm is a coffee-bibber, therefore—"

"I must tell you," interrupted Susanna, vehemently, "that it is unbecoming and profane of you to talk in this way of such an excellent lady, and a person of such high rank!"

"High! How high may she be?"

"A deal higher than you are, or ever can be, that I can assure you!"

"Higher than me! then of a certainty she goes on stilts. Now, I must say that is the very tip-top of gentility and politeness! One may forgive a lady giving coffee-parties, and decorating and dressing herself up, but to go on stilts, only on purpose to be higher than other folks, and to be able to look over their heads, that is coming it strong over us! How can such a high person ever come down low enough to brew good beer? But a Swedish woman can never brew good beer, for—"

"She will not brew a single drop for you abominable Norwegians, for you have neither reason, nor understanding, nor taste, nor—"

Out of the brewhouse flew Susanna, in the highest indignation, throwing down a glass of beer which Harald had poured out during the contention, for her, but which now would have gone right over if he had not saved it by a spring.

Towards the evening of the same day we see the contending parties again met in

THE GARRET.

"Are you yet angry?" asked Harald, jokingly, as he stretched in his head through the garret-door, where Susanna was sitting upon a flour-tub, as on a throne, with all the importance and dignity of a store-room queen, holding in her hand a sceptre of the world-famous sweet herbs—thyme, marjoram, and basil, which she was separating into little bundles, whilst she cast a searching glance around her well-ordered kingdom.

The bread-chests were heaped up, for she had just baked oaten-bread; bacon-sausages and hams hung, full of gravy, from the roof, as well as great bundles of dried fish; little bags full of all kinds of vegetables stood in their appointed places, and so on.

Harald looked also around the garret, and truly, with the eye of a connoisseur, and said, although he had yet received no answer to his question—

"It is certain that I never saw a better provided or better arranged store-room!"

Susanna would not exhibit one gleam of the pleasure she felt at this praise.

"But," continued Harald, "you must confess that it does not require so very much skill to preserve the store-room and cellar well supplied in a country so rich in all the good things of life as our Norway—"

Well-beloved land, with heaven-high mountains,
Fruit-bearing valleys, and fish-giving shores."

"Fish also have we, thank God, in Sweden;" replied Susanna, dryly.

"O, but not to compare with our fish! Or would you seriously set your perch and carp against our mackerel, herrings, haddocks, flounders, and all our unparalleled quantities of fish?"

"All your Norwegian kind of fish I would give for one honest Swedish pike."

"A pike? Is there then in Sweden really nothing but pike?"

"In Sweden there are all kinds of fish that there are in Norway, and a great deal bigger and fatter."

"Yes, then they come from our coasts. We take what we want, and that which remains we let swim to Sweden, that down there they may have somewhat also. But I have forgotten that I myself am going a fishing, and will catch little fishes, great fishes, a deal of fish. Adieu, Mamsel Susanna. I shall soon come back with fish!"

"You had best stop with your Norwegian fishes!" cried Susanna after him.

But Harald did not stop with the fishes. On the morrow we see him following Susanna into

THE DAIRY.

"I see that we are going to have to-day for dinner onion-milk, one of our most delicious national dishes, and my favourite eating."

"Uch! One gets quite stupid and sleepy when one only thinks on your national dishes. And still more horrible than your onion-milk, and more unnatural too, is your fruit-soup with little herrings!"

"Fruit-soup with little herrings! Nay, that is the most superexcellent food on the earth, a food which I might call a truly Christian dish!"

"And I might call it a heathenish dish, which no true Christian man could eat."

"From untold ages it has been eaten by free Norwegian men in the beautiful valleys of Norway."

"That proves that you free Norwegians are still heathens."

"I can prove to you that the Norwegians were a Christian people before the Swedes."

"That you may prove as much as you like, but I shall not believe it."

"But I will show it to you in print."

"Then I shall be certain that it is a misprint." Harald laughed, and said something about the impossibility of disputing with a Swedish woman.

Should now anybody wish to know how it happens that one finds Harald so continually in Susanna's company in the brewhouse, in the store-room, in the dairy, we can only reply that he must be a great lover of beer, and flour, and milk, or of a certain spice in the every-day soup of life, called bantering.

Mrs. Astrid always breakfasted in her own room, but dined with Harald and Susanna, and saw them often for an hour in the evening. Often during dinner did the contention about Norway and Sweden break out, for the slightest occasion was sufficient to make the burgomaster's daughter throw herself blindly into the strife for fatherland; and strange enough, Mrs. Astrid herself sometimes seemed to find pleasure in exciting the contest, as she brought upon the carpet one question or another, as—

"I should like to know whether cauliflower is better in Norway or Sweden?" or, "I should like to know whether the corn is better in Sweden or in Norway?"

"Quite certainly in Norway," said Harald.

"Quite decidedly in Sweden," cried Susanna. And vegetables and fish, and the coinage, and measures and weights, were all handled and contended for in this way.

Of the corn in Norway, Susanna said, "I have not seen upon this whole estate one single straw which may bear a comparison with that which I have seen in Sweden."

"The cause of that," said Harald, "is because you saw here good corn for the first time."

Of the Norwegian weights, Susanna said, "I never know what I am about with your absurd, nasty Norwegian weights."

"They are heavier than the Swedish," replied Harald.

Whenever Susanna became right vehement and right angry, then—it is shocking to say it, Harald laughed with his whole heart, and at times a faint smile brightened also Mrs. Astrid's pale face, but it resembled the gleam of sunshine which breaks forth in a dark November sky, only to be immediately concealed behind clouds.

Susanna never thought in the least, on these occasions, of putting the bridle on the Barbra temper. She considered it as a holy duty to defend the fatherland in this manner.

But the spirit of contention did not always reign between Harald and Susanna. At intervals the spirit of peace also turned towards them, although as a timid dove, which is always ready soon to fly away hence. When Susanna spoke, as she often did, of that which lived in the inmost of her heart; of her love to her little sister, and the recollections of their being together; of her longings to see her again, and to be able to live for her as a mother for her child,—then listened Harald ever silently and attentively. No jeering smile nor word came to disturb these pure images in Susanna's soul. And how limningly did Susanna describe the little Hulda's beauty; the little white child, as soft as cotton-wool, the pious blue eyes, the white little teeth, which glanced out whenever she laughed like bright sunshine, which then lay spread over her whole countenance; and the golden locks which hung so beautifully over forehead and shoulders, the little pretty hands, and temper and heart lively, good, affectionate! Ob! she was in short an angel of God! The little chamber, which Susanna inhabited with her little Hulda, and which she herself had changed from an unused lumber-room into a pretty chamber, and whose walls she herself painted, she painted now from memory yet once more for Harald; and how the bed of the little Hulda was surrounded with a light-blue muslin curtain, and how a sunbeam stole into the chamber in the morning, in order to shine on the pillow of the child, and to kiss her little curly head. How roguish was the little one when Susanna came in late at night to go to bed, and cast her first glance on the bed in which her darling lay. But she saw her not, for Hulda drew her little head under the coverlet to hide herself from her sister. Susanna then would pretend to seek for the little one; but she needed only to say with an anxious voice, "where—ah, where is my little Hulda?" in order to decoy forth the head of the little one, to see her arms stretched out, and to hear her say, "Here I am, Sanna! here is thy little Hulda!" And she had then her little darling in her arms, and pressed her to her heart; then was Susanna happy, and forgot all the cares and the fatigues of the day.

At the remembrance of these hours Susanna's tears often flowed, and prevented her remarking the tearful glow which sometimes lit up Harald's eyes.

Harald, however, had also his relations; not, it is true, of so tender a nature, but yet interesting enough to lay claim to all Susanna's attention, and to give us occasion to commence a new chapter.

EVENING HOURS.

I like the life, where rule and line appeareth,
In the mill's clapping and the hammer's blow;
I give to him the path who burdens beareth,
He worketh for a useful end I know.
But he, who for the klap-klap never heareth
The call of bells to feeling's holiday—
Hath but sham-life, mechanically moving,
Soul-less he is, unconscious and unloving.
Fly, agile arrow, rattling in thy speeding
Over the busy emmet's roof of clay,
And waken spiritual life!

Foss

HARALD related willingly, and related uncomfonly well; an entertaining and a happy gift, which one often meets with in Norway among all classes, both in men and women, and which they appear to have inherited from their ancestors the Scalds; and besides this, he was well acquainted with the natural wonders and legends of the mountain region.

And it is precisely in mountain regions where the most beautiful blossoms of the people's poetry have sprung as if from her heart. The ages of the Sagas and the heathens have left behind their giant traces. River and mountain have their traditions of spectres and transformations; giant 'cauldrons' resound in the mountains, and monumental stones are erected over warriors, who 'buckled on their belts,' and fell in single combat. From Halingdal went forth the Norwegian national Polska (the Halling), and only the Hardanger-fela (the Hallingdal fiddle), can rightly give its wild, extraordinary melody. Most beautiful are the flowers of remembrance which the christian antiquity exhibits, and the eternal snow upon the crowns of the ancient mountains is not more imperishable than these innocent roses at their feet. So long as Gausta stands, and the Bjukan sings his thunder-song, will the memory of Mari-Stein live, and his tales of joy and sorrow be told; so long as the ice-sea of Folgefond rests over his silent, dark secrets,* so long will the little island become green, of which it is said, that it is eternally wetted with the tears of true love.

Be it who it may—they who write with their own life, song and legend, who express the depths of being by the silent but mighty language of deeds—they are the real authors, the first poets of the earth. In the second rank stand those who relate that which the others have lived.

When the day's work was over, and Mrs. Astrid had again betaken herself to her chamber after her slight evening meal, it gave Harald great pleasure to read aloud or to relate histories to Susanna, whilst she sewed, or her spinning-wheel hummed often in lively emulation of Larina and Karina, and whilst the flames of the fire danced up the chimney, and threw their warm joyous gleams over the assembled company. It pleased Harald infinitely to have Susanna for his auditor, to hear her exclamation of childish terror and astonishment, or also her hearty laughter, or to see her tears over his now merry and now sorrowful tales.

How deeply was Susanna's heart touched by the relation of Mari-Stein, whose path over the mountain on the edge of the abyss of Rjukanforse, which in these days the traveller treads with dread, was discovered by a young girl guided by the courage of love. It was by this path that the beautiful Mary of Vestfjordal went with light and firm foot to meet the friend of her childhood and her beloved Ejstein Halfvordsen. But the avarice of her father separated them, and Mary's tears and prayers obliged Ejstein to fly, in order to escape the schemes of a treacherous rival against his life. Years passed on, and Mary remained steadfast in her faith. Her father died. Ejstein had, by his bravery and his magnanimity, made his former enemy his friend, and the lovers were now about to meet after a long separation, never again to be divided. Ejstein hastened by the shorter road of the Mari-Stein to meet his beloved. Long had she awaited him. She saw him coming, and his name escaped her with a cry of joy. He saw her—stretched forth his arms, as his whole soul, eagerly towards her, and he forgot—that he had no pinions. He fell, and the Rjukan swallowed him in its foaming depths. For many years after this there wandered daily upon Mari-Stein, a pale figure, whose beautiful features spoke of silent insanity, and stood bent down over the stream, and seemed to talk with some one down in its depths. With melancholy joy in her countenance returned she ever from her wandering, and said to her people in the cottage, "I have spoken with him, and he besought me to come to him every day, and to tell him how I love. It would be wrong to refuse him this; he is so good and loves me so truly."

Thus went she, even when the wind blew her silver hair around her wrinkled cheeks; thus she went until a merciful voice called the weary wanderer to ascend the path of heaven to rest and joy, in the arms of the beloved.

* Several districts, wickied as Sodom and Gomorrah, are said to be buried under the gigantic pall, and it is related that people have heard the cock crow below the snow covering. If the sun appears above the Fjord, it is believed that swarms of innumerable birds of all colours, white, black, green, yellow, and red, are seen flying up and down over the snowy sea. It was thought in early times, that these were the souls of the wicked inhabitants of the valley which swarmed about here in the shape of birds.—FARS.

Less mournful, but not the less interesting for Susanna, was the old legend of Halgrim.

Stormannadauen (the Black Death) had raged through Norway, and cut off more than two-thirds of its population, and desolated whole extents of country and large populous districts. In Uldvig's Valley, in Hardanger, a young peasant of the name of Halgrim alone, of all the people who had died there, remained alive. He raised himself from the sick bed on which he lay surrounded by the dead, and went out in order to seek for living people.

It was spring, and the larks sang loud in the blue clear air; the birch-wood clothed itself in tender green; the stream, with its melting snow-drifts, wound down the mountains singing on its way; but no plough furrowed the loosened earth, and from the heights was heard no wood-born calling the cattle at feeding time. All was still and dead in the habitations of men. Halgrim went from valley to valley, from cottage to cottage; everywhere death stared him in the face, and he recognised the corpses of early friends and acquaintance. Upon this, he began to believe that he was alone in the world, and despair seized on his soul, and he determined also to die. But as he was just about to throw himself down from a rock, his faithful dog sprang up to him, caressed him, and lamented in the expressive language of anguish. Halgrim thought himself, and stepped back from the brink of the abyss; he embraced his dog; his tears flowed, and despair withdrew from his softened heart. He began his wandering anew. Thoughts of love led him towards the parish of Graven, where he had first seen and won the love of Hildegunda.

It was evening, and the sun was setting as Halgrim descended into the valley, which was as still and dead as those through which he had wandered. Dark stood the fir-trees in the black shadow of the rocky wall, and silently rolled on the river between the desolate banks. On the opposite side of the river a little wooded promontory shot out into the blue water, and upon the light green tops of the birch-trees played the last rays of the sun.

Suddenly it seemed to Halgrim as if a light smoke rose up from among the trees. But he trusted not his eyes; he stared upon it breathlessly. He waited, however, hardly a second, when he saw a blue column curling slowly upwards in the peaceful evening air. With a cry of joy Halgrim darted forwards, waded through the stream, and soon stood on its opposite shore. Barking and whining his dog ran onwards to the cottage whence the smoke ascended. Upon its hearth clearly burned the fire, and a young maiden stepped forward to the door—one cry of inexpressible joy, and Halgrim and Hildegunda lay in each other's arms! Hildegunda was also the only living person in her valley after the terrible visit of the Black Death.

On the following day, after mutual agreement, they went to church, and as there was no priest to marry them and nobody to witness the plighting of their faith, they stepped alone together to God's altar, and extended to each other a hand, whilst Halgrim said with a solemn voice, "In the name of God the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost!"

And God blessed the faith plighted in His name. From this happy pair descended generations who peopled anew this region, and the names of Halgrim and Hildegunda are to this day in use among its inhabitants.

Through Harald also was Susanna made acquainted with the legends of the kings of Norway; with the deeds of Olaf Haraldsen, the blood-baptizer; with those of the noble Olaf Tryggveson; and with admiration heard she of king Sverre, with the little body and the large truly royal soul. It flattered also somewhat her womanly vanity to hear of women as extraordinary in the old history of Norway; as for example, the proud peasant's daughter, Gyda, who gave occasion to the hero-deeds of Harald Haarfager, who first made Norway into a kingdom; and although the action of Gunild, the king's mother, awakened her abhorrence, yet it gave her pleasure to see how a woman, by the supremacy of her mind, governed seven kings and directed their actions.

Darker pictures were presented by the citizen wars, which hurried "blood-storm upon blood-storm" through the land, and in which it at length "bled liberty to death."

Now the wild strawberry blooms in the ruins of former strongholds, and upon blood-drenched fields grow golden forests,

As the scar growth o'er the healed wound.—Tegner.

A milder generation lived in the place of the "Bloody Axe,"* and looked serenely and hopefully towards the future, whilst in their peaceful, beautiful valleys, they listened willingly to the memories of the old times.

Upon the hill-tops stands the ancient stone,
Where legend hovers like a singing lark,
With morning brightness on its downy breast.

VELHAVEN.

One subject of conversation and of dispute also between Harald and Susanna, was their pale lady. As soon as the discourse turned to her, Harald assumed a very grave demeanour, and replied only to Susanna's earnest inquiries of what he knew about her, "she must have been very unfortunate!" If, however, Susanna began to assail him with questions about this misfortune, in what it consisted, whether one would not help her in some way or other—Susanna would have gone up and down the world for this purpose—then began Harald to tell a story.

Tales of women, powerful and distinguished in their valleys, are not rare in Norway. The story of the lady in Hallingdal, called the Shrieking Lady, is well known, who was so magnificent that she was drawn by elks; one hears of the rich Lady Belju, also of Hallingdal, who built Naes church, and by means of fire and butter split the Beja rock, so that a road was carried over it, which road is called to this day, the Butter Rock. One hears tell of the Ladies of Solberg and Sköndal, of their great quarrel about a pig, and of the false oath which one of them swore in the lawsuit which thence ensued; and to every one of these ladies belongs the story, that the preacher did not dare to have the church bells rung until the great lady had arrived there.

They tell farther the history of the wife of the knight Knut Eldbjerna, who, from grief for the criminal lives of her seven sons, retired from the world, and lived as a hermit in a lonesome dale, where, by fasting and alms, she endeavoured to atone for the misdeeds of her children. Yes, indeed, there are many histories of this kind. But as concerns the history which Harald related to Susanna, of Mrs. Ästrid, its like had not yet been heard in the valleys of Norway. There occurred in it so many strange and horrible things, that the credulous Susanna, who during it had become ever paler and paler, might have been petrified with horror if, precisely at the most terrible part of the catastrophe, the suspicion had not suddenly occurred to her that she was horrifying herself—at a mere fiction! And Harald's countenance, when she expressed her conjectures, made this certainty; and the hearty laughter with which he received her exclamations and reproaches excited her highest indignation, and she rose up and left him with the assurance that she never again would ask him anything, never believe a word that he said.

This lasted till—the next time. Then if Harald promised to tell the truth as regarded their lady—the whole pure truth, then Susanna tell herself befooled, listened, grew pale, wept, till the increasing marvels of the story awoke afresh her suspicion, which she again plainly expressed as before, and again Barbara stood up, scolded, threatened, banged the door after her in anger, and Harald—laughed.

In one point, however, Harald and Susanna always perfectly agreed; and that was in serving their lady with the greatest zeal; and this, without themselves being aware of it, increased their esteem for each other, which, however, by no means prevented their boldly attacking each other, and slandering—he Sweden, she Norway.

Thus, amid perpetual alternations of strife and peace, slid away the autumn months unobserved, with its darkening days and its increasing cold; and the season came, in which important business demanded the time of the ladies, as well in great as in small houses; the time for lights and tarts, dance, play and children's joy, in one word—

CHRISTMAS.

Come hither, little birds, merry of mood,
By barn-door and dwelling-house eorn-ears are strowed;
Christmas comes hither,
Then may ye gather
Food from the bread-giving straw, golden hued.

BRENEGAARD.

The sun shall warm and illumine the whole earth, therefore is the earth glad of his coming.—THE KING'S PLAY.

THANKS be to God for the sun! So many friends, so many joys, desert us during our pilgrimage through life; the sun remains true to us, and lights and warms us from the cradle to the grave. This is it which unites the Pagan and the Christian in one common worship, inasmuch as it lifts the hearts of both to the God who has created the sun. The highest festival of the year among the Northern Heathens and Christians occurs also at the season in which the sun, as it were, is born anew to the earth, and his strength is converted from waning to waxing. With the greatest cordiality is this festival celebrated in the Scandinavian countries. Not alone in the houses of the wealthy blaze up fires of joy, and are heard the joyful cries of children; from the humblest cottages also resounds joy; in the prisons it becomes bright, and the poor partake of—plenty. In the country, doors, hearths, and tables stand open to every wanderer. In many parts of Norway the inn-keeper demands no payment from the traveller either for board or lodging. This is the time in which the earth seems to feel the truth of the heavenly words—"It is more blessed to give than to receive." And not only human beings, but animals also have, their good things at Christmas. All the inhabitants of the farm-yard, all domestic animals, are entertained in the best manner; and the little birds of heaven rejoice too, for at every barn a tall stake raises itself, on the top of which rich sheaves of oats invite them to a magnificent meal; even the poorest day-labourer, if he himself possess no corn, asks and receives from the peasant a bundle of corn, raises it aloft, and makes the birds rejoice beside his empty barn.

Susanna had had much to care for in the Christmas week, and was often up late at night: in part, on account of her own business; in part, on account of some Christmas gifts with which she wished to surprise several persons around her. And this certainly was the cause of her somewhat oversleeping herself on the morning of Christmas-eve. She was awoke by a twittering of birds before her window, and her conscience reproached her with having, amid the business of the foregoing day, quite forgotten the little birds, to which she was accustomed to throw out upon the snow, corn and bread crumbs; and they were now come to remind her of it. Ah! were but all remembrances like to the twittering of birds! With real remorse for her forgetfulness Susanna hastened to dress herself, and to draw aside the window-curtain. And behold! outside, before her window, stood a tall slender fir-tree, in whose green top, cut in the form of a garland, was stuck a great bunch of gold-yellow oats, around which great flocks of sparrows and bulfinches swarmed, picking and chirping. Susanna blushed, and thought 'Harald!' The people in the house answered with smiles to Susanna's questions, the Steward had indeed planted the tree. The Steward however himself appeared as if he were quite a stranger to the whole affair, betrayed astonishment at the tree with the sheaf of oats, and could not conceive how it had come there.

"It must," said he, "have shot forth of itself during the night;" and this could only be proved from the wonderful strength of the excellent Norwegian earth—every morsel of which is pulverized primary rock. Such a soil only can bring forth such a miraculous growth.

In the forenoon, Harald went with Susanna into the farm-yard, where she with her own hands divided oats among the cows; bread among the sheep; and among the little poultry corn in abundant measure. In the community of hens was there with this a great difference of character observable. Some snatched greedily, whilst they drove the others away by force; others, on the contrary, kept at a modest distance, and picked up well pleased the corn which good fortune had bestowed upon them; others again, seemed to enjoy for others more than for themselves. Of this noble nature was one young cock in particular, with a high comb, and a rich cape of changeable gold-coloured feathers, and of a peculiarly proud and lofty bearing; he gave up his portion to the hens, so that he had scarcely a single grain for himself; regarding, however, the while, with a noble chauticleer-demeanour, the crowd which pecked and cackled at his feet. On account of this beautiful behaviour, he was called the Knight, by Susanna, which name he always preserved after that time. Among the geese, she perceived with veneration that the grey one was still more oppressed and pecked at by his white tyrant than ever. Harald proposed to kill the grey one; but Susanna declared warmly, that if either of the rivals were sacrificed it must be the white one.

In a house where there are no children, where neither family nor friends assemble, where the mistress sits with her trouble in darkness, there can Christmas bring no great joy. But Susanna had made preparations to diffuse pleasure, and the thoughts of it had through the whole week, amid her manifold occupations, illumined her heart; and besides, she was of that kind that her life would have been dark had it not been that the prospect of always making somebody happy had glimmered like a star over her path. Larina, Karina, and Petro tasted on this day of the fruits of Susanna's night-watching; and when it was evening, and Susanna had arranged the Christmas-table in the hall, and had seen it adorned with lut-fish,* and roast meat, and sweet groats, cakes and butter, tarts and apples, and lighted with four candles; when the farm-people assembled round the table with eyes that flashed with delight and appetite; when the oldest among them struck up a hymn of thanksgiving, and all the rest joined in with folded hands and solemn voices—then seemed it to Susanna as if she were no longer in a foreign land: and after she had joined in with the hymn of the people, she seated herself at the table as the most joyous, cordial hostess; clinked her glass with those of the men and maid servants; animated even the most colossal passion for eating, and placed the nicest things before the weak and timid.

Mrs. Astrid had told Susanna that she would remain alone in her chamber this evening, and only take a glass of milk. Susanna wished, however, to decoy her into enjoyment by a little surprise; and had laid the following little plot against her peace. At the time when the glass of milk was to be carried in to her, instead of this a very pretty boy, dressed to represent an angel, according to Susanna's idea of one, with a crown of light upon his head, should softly enter her room and beckon her out. So beautiful and bright a messenger the lady would find it impossible to withstand, and he would then conduct her out into the great hall, where, in a grove of fir-trees, a table was covered with the sweetest groats, and the most delicious of tarts, and behind the fir-trees the people of the house were to be assembled, and to strike up a song to a well-known air of the country, in praise of their lady, and full of good wishes for her future life.

Harald, to whom Susanna had imparted her scheme, shook his head over it, at first, doubtfully, but afterwards fell into it, and lent a helping hand to its accomplishment, as well by obtaining the fir-trees as by fitting out the angel. Susanna was quite charmed with her beautiful little messenger, and followed silently and softly at his heels, as with some anxiety about his own head and his glittering crown he tripped lightly to Mrs. Astrid's chamber.

Harald softly opened the door for the boy. From thence they saw the lady sitting in an easy chair in her room, her head bowed upon her hands. The lamp upon the table cast a faint light upon her black-appareled figure. The audible movement at the door roused her; she looked up, and stared for some time with a wild glance at the apparition which met her there.

* A kind of codfish, which has been soaked in ley for several weeks, and is a general Christmas dish in Norway and Sweden.

Then she arose hastily, pressed her hands to her breast, uttered a faint cry of horror, and sank lifeless to the floor. Susanna pushed her angel violently aside, and rushed to her mistress, who with indescribable feelings of anguish she raised in her arms and carried to bed. Harald, on the contrary, busied himself with the poor angel, who with his crown had lost his balance, and while the hot tallow ran down over brow and cheeks, broke out into the most deplorable tones of lamentation.

Susanna soon succeeded in recalling her mistress to life; but for a long time her mind seemed to be confused, and she spoke unintelligible, unconnected sentences, of which Susanna only understood the words, "Apparition—unfortunate child—death!" Susanna concluded therefore that the fabricated angel had frightened her, and exclaimed with tears, "Ah, it was only Hans Guttormson's little fellow that I had dressed up as an angel, in order to give you pleasure!"

Susanna saw now right well how little fortunate had been this thought; but Mrs. Astrid listened with great eagerness to Susanna's explanation respecting the apparition which had shook her so much, and at length her convulsive state passed off in a flood of tears. Susanna beside herself for grief, that instead of joy she had occasioned trouble to her lady, kissed, with tears, her dress, hands, feet, amid heartfelt prayers for forgiveness.

Mrs. Astrid answered mildly, but with excitement. "Thou meant it well, Susanna. Thou couldst not know how thou wouldst grieve me. But—think no more about it; never more attempt to give me pleasure. I can never more be joyful, never more happy! There lies a stone upon my breast which never can be raised, until the stone shall be laid on my grave. But go now, Susanna, it is necessary for me to be alone. I shall soon be better."

Susanna prayed that she might bring her a glass of milk, and Mrs. Astrid consented; but when she had brought it in she was obliged again to withdraw, her heart full of anguish. When she came out to Harald she poured out to him all her pain over the unfortunate project, and related to him the deep agitation of mind, and the dark, despairing words of her lady.

At this Harald became pale and thoughtful, and Susanna at that was still more depressed. To be sure she had yet a little mine of pleasures remaining, on whose explosion she had very much pleased herself, but this in the disturbed state of mind produced but little effect. It is true that Harald smiled, and exclaimed, "The cross!" when a waistcoat made its appearance out of a wheaten loaf; it is true that he thanked Susanna and pressed her hand, but he had evidently so little pleasure in her present, his thoughts were so plainly directed to something else, that now every gleam of pleasure vanished for Susanna from the Christmas joy. When she was alone in her chamber, and saw from her window how a little beam of light proceeded from every cottage in the valley, and she thought how within them were assembled in confidential circles, parents, children, brothers and sisters, and friends, then felt she painfully that she was lonesome in a strange land; and as she remembered how formerly on this evening she made her little Hulda happy, and how fortunate her projects had always been, she took out a handkerchief which had been worn on the neck of the little beloved sister, and covered it with hot tears and kisses. Great part of the night she passed on the threshold of her lady's door, listening full of anguish to the never-ceasing footsteps within. But with the exception of several deep sighs, Susanna heard no expression of pain which might justify her in breaking in upon the solitude of her mistress.

We will now turn ourselves to a somewhat more lively picture.

There exists in Norway a pleasant custom, which is called Tura-jul, or Christmas-turns. In Christmas week, namely, people go out to visit one another by turns, and then in the hospitable houses is there feasting, sporting, and dancing. That is called "the Christmas-turns."

And the "turns" extended also to the remote-lying, solitary Heimdal. The pastor of the mother parish, the friendly and hospitable pastor, Middelberg, had sent an invitation to friends and acquaintances in the whole neighbourhood, which included also the inhabitants of Semb, to a feast at the parsonage, on the second day of Christmas.

Mrs. Astrid excused herself, but besought Harald and Susanna to drive there. It had frozen a few days before, and had freshly snowed, so that the sledging was excellent, and Harald now again in good-humour seemed disposed to make a little festival of driving Susanna to the parsonage in a small sledge with jingling bells.

Mrs. Astrid had regained her accustomed manner and appearance, and thus Susanna was easy as to all consequences of her unfortunate scheme on Christmas-eve, and could give herself up with a free mind to the agreeable impressions which the winter-drive offered. And these were manifold and rich to a person who was so little used to pleasure of any kind as Susanna, and who, besides this, was of a fresh, open spirit. The air was so clear, the snow was so dazzling, mountain and woods so splendid, the horse so spirited, and Harald drove so indescribably well, the most difficult places being to him mere play-work, that Susanna exclaimed every now and then, "O how beautiful! O how divine!"

With all this, Harald was uncommonly polite and entertaining. Attentive in the extreme that Susanna sat comfortably, was warm about the feet, and so on, laid himself out at the same time to make her acquainted with all the wonders and beauties of the district; besides which he related much that was interesting of the peculiarities of the neighbourhood, of its woods, mountains, and kinds of stones, spoke of the primeval mountains and transition-formations, of that which had existed before the Flood, and of that which had been formed after it, so that Susanna was astonished at his great learning, and a feeling of reverence for him was excited in her mind. It is true that she forgot this for one while, in a quarrel which suddenly arose between them respecting the sun, which according to Harald's assertion, must appear brighter in Norway than in Sweden, which Susanna contended against most vehemently, and assured him of exactly the opposite; and about the strata of air, of which Susanna asserted that they lay in Norway different to Sweden; upon the whole, however, the drive was harmonious, and in the highest degree advantageous to Harald's appearance. By his driving, his politeness, and his learning, he had attained to something quite grand and extraordinary in Susanna's eyes.

—When, after a drive of about six miles, they approached the parsonage-house, they saw from all sides the little sledges issuing from the passes of the valleys, and then hastening forward in the same direction as themselves across the fields of snow. Steaming breath came from the nostrils of the snorting horses, and merrily jingled the bells in the clear air. Susanna was enraptured.

No less was she enraptured by the cordiality with which she saw herself received at the parsonage—she, a foreign serving-maiden—by foreign, wealthy, and respectable people. Susanna was, besides this, very curious to see how things looked, and how they went on, in a respectable parsonage in Norway; and it was, therefore, very agreeable to her, when the kind Madame Middelberg invited her to see the house, and allowed her to be conducted by her eldest daughter, Thea Middelberg, everywhere, from the cellar even to the garret. Susanna, after this, felt great esteem for the arrangements in the parsonage-house; thought that she could learn various things from it; other things, however, she thought would have been better according to her Swedish method. Returned to the company, Susanna found much to notice and much to reflect upon. For the rest, she was through the whole of this day in a sort of mental excitement. It seemed to her, as if she saw the picture of comfort and happiness of which she had sometimes dreamed, here realized. It seemed to her that life amid these grand natural scenes and simple manners must be beautiful. The relationship between parents and children, between masters and servants, appeared so cordial, so patriarchal. She heard the servants in the house of the clergyman, call him and his wife, father and mother; she saw the eldest daughter of the house assist in waiting on the guests, and that so joyously and easily, that one saw that she did it from her heart; saw a frank satisfaction upon all faces, a freedom from care, and a simplicity in the behaviour of all; and all this made Susanna feel quite light at heart, whilst it called forth a certain tearful glance in her eye.

"Have you pleasure in flowers?" inquired the friendly Thea Middelberg; and when Susanna declared that she had, she broke off the most beautiful rose which bloomed in the window and gave to her.

But the greatest pleasure to Susanna was in the two youngest children of the house, and she thought that the heartfelt 'mora mi' (my mother), was the most harmonious sound which she had ever heard. And in that Susanna was right also, for more lovely words than these 'mora mi', spoken by affectionate childish lips, are not in the earth. The little Mina, a child about Hulda's age, and full of life and animation, was in particular dear to Susanna, who only wished that the little romp would have given to herself a longer rest upon her knee. Susanna herself won quite unwittingly the perfect favour of the hostess, by starting up at table at a critical moment when the dinner was being served, and with a light and firm hand saving the things from danger. After this she continued to give a helpful hand where it was needful. This pleased much, and they noticed the young Swede with ever kinder eyes; she knew it, and thought all the more on those who thought of her.

Towards the end of the substantial and savoury dinner, skål was drunk and songs were sung. Susanna's glass must elink with her neighbours, right and left, straight before her and crosswise, and animated by the general spirit she joined in with the beautiful people's song, 'The old sea-girded Norway,' and seemed to have forgotten all spirit of opposition to Norway and Norwegians. And how heartily did not she unite in the last skål which was proposed by the host, with beaming and tearful eyes, "To all those who love us!" and she thought on her little Hulda.

But now we must go on to that which made this day a remarkable one for Susanna.

After dinner and coffee were over, the company divided, as is customary in Norway. The ladies remained sitting on the sofa and in armed chairs round about, and talked over the occurrences in the neighbourhood, domestic affairs, and the now-happily concluded Christmas business, and 'yes, indeed!' 'yes, indeed!' was often heard among them.

The young girls grouped themselves together in the window, and there was heard talk of 'dress' and 'ornament,' 'heavens, how pretty!' and jest and small-talk.

In the next room sat the gentlemen together with pipes and politics.

Susanna was near to the open door of this room, and as she felt but little interest in the subjects that were spoken of in her neighbourhood, she could not avoid listening to that which was said by the gentlemen within the room, for she heard how there a coarse voice was abusing Sweden and the Swedes in the most defamatory manner. Susanna's blood boiled, and involuntarily, she clenched her fist.

"O heavens!" sighed she, "that I were but a man!"

The patriotic burgomaster's daughter burned with desire to fall upon those who dared to despise her fatherland. She could not bear this coolly, and almost fearing her own anger she was about to rise and take another place, but she restrained herself, for she heard a grave manly voice raised in defence of that foreign calumniated country. And truly it was refreshing for Susanna to hear Sweden defended with as much intelligence as zeal; truly it was a joy to her to hear the assertions of the coarser voice repelled by the other less noisy, but more powerful voice, and at length to hear it declaim, as master of the field, the following lines, which were addressed to his native land on the occasion of the death of Gustavus Adolphus the Great:

At once is dimmed thy glory's ray;
Thy flowery garland fades away,
Bowed mother! But thy brightness splendid Shall never more be ended.
The grateful world on me her love will cast,
Who mother of Gustavus wast!"

Yes, truly was all this a feeling of delight for Susanna; but the voice which spoke so beautifully—the voice which defended Sweden—the voice which called forth the feeling of delight, this voice operated more than all the rest on Susanna, for it was that of Harald. Susanna could not trust her ears, she called her eyes to their assistance, and then as she could no longer doubt that the noble defender of her country was Harald, she was so surprised and so joyful that in the overflowing of her feelings she might almost have done something foolish, had not at that very moment one of the elderly ladies of the party come to her, and led her into a quieter corner of the room, in order to be able there quietly to question her of all that she wished to know. This lady belonged to that class (scattered in every country of the world) which has a resemblance to the parasite growth, inasmuch as it grows and flourishes by the nourishment which it seeks from the plants on which it fixes itself. As this lady wore a brown dress, and had brown ribbons in her cap, we find it very appropriate to call her Madame Brown. Susanna must now give Madame Brown an account of her family, her home, all her connexions, why she was come into Norway, how she liked living there, and so on. In all this Susanna was tolerably openhearted; but when the discourse was turned upon her present situation, and her lady, she became more reserved. On this subject, however, Madame Brown was less disposed to question than to relate herself.

"I knew Mrs. Astrid," said she, "in our younger days, very well. She was a very handsome lady, but always rather proud. However, I did not mind that, and we were right good friends. People have told me that I ought to pay a visit to Semb, but—I don't know—I have never seen her since she has been so strange. My God, dear friend, how can you live with her? She must be so horribly gloomy and anxious!"

Susanna replied by a warm burst of praise of her lady, and said, "that she was always sorrowful, and appeared to be unhappy, but that this only bound her to her all the more."

"Unhappy!" began Madame Brown again. "Yes, if that were all—but alas!"

Susanna asked in astonishment what she meant?

Madame Brown answered, "I say and think nothing bad of her, and always defend her, but in any case there is something odd about her. Could you really believe that there are people, wicked enough to speak—to suspect—a murderer?"

Susanna could neither think nor speak—she only stared at the speaker.

"Yes, yes," continued Madame Brown, fluently; "so people say! To be sure the Colonel, who was a monster, was most guilty in the affair; but yet, nevertheless, she must have known of it—so people assert. See you—they had a boy with them, the son of her sister. The mother died, after having confided her child to the care of her sister and her brother-in-law. What happens then? One fine day the boy has vanished—never again comes to light—nobody knows what has become of him; but his cloak is found on a rock, by the lake, and drops of blood on the stone under it! The boy had vanished, and his property came in well for his relations, since the Colonel had gambled away every thing which he and his wife possessed. But our Lord, in his justice, smote the Colonel, so that for five years he remained lame and speechless, and his wife never since that time has had one joyful day on earth."

Susanna turned pale with emotion, and as zealously as she had before defended the honour of her native land, now defended she the innocence of her lady. But in this she was interrupted by the friendly hostess, who invited her to join the other young people in games and dancing. But Susanna was so excited by that which she had heard, and longed so much to be at home with her mistress, for whom, now that she had heard her so cruelly maligned, she felt more affection than ever; she prayed to be excused from taking any part in the Christmas games, and announced her intention of driving home. She wished not, however, to take Harald from the company, and intended, unfearingly, to drive home alone. She could drive very well, and should easily find the way.

No sooner, however, did Harald become aware of her intentions than he prepared to accompany her; and it was of no avail that Susanna opposed herself to it. Host and hostess, however, in their cordiality, opposed warmly their guests leaving them so early, and threatened them with "Aasgaardsreja," who was accustomed to rage in Christmas time, and would meet them by the way if they persisted in their unwise resolve. Notwithstanding this they did so, and were accompanied by their hosts to the sledge. Susanna thanked them from her moved heart for all their kindness, promised the amiable Thea that they would see one another often, and kissed tenderly the little Mina, who hung upon her neck.

Scarcely was Susanna seated in the sledge, and was amid mountains and woods, than she gave vent to her heart, and related to Harald the story which she had just heard. And her abhorrence had not been less than was now Harald's anger at such a shameful calumny, and at the person who had exhibited such an evidence of her own dark soul. Yes, he fell into such a rage with old Madame Brown, and made such threatening demonstrations against her well-being, and the horse made such violent springs and plunges, that Susanna endeavoured to lead the conversation to other subjects. She therefore asked Harald what was meant by Aasgaardsreja, and why they had threatened her with it.

Harald on this returned to his customary temper, and assured her that this was by no means to be jested with. "The Aasgaardsreja," said he, "are the spirits which are not good enough to deserve heaven, and yet not bad enough to be sent to hell; they consist of tipplers, polite deceivers,—in one word, of all those who from one cause or another have given themselves to evil. For punishment, therefore, must they ride about till the end of the world. At the head of the troop rides Guro-Rysse, or Reisa-Rova, who is to be known by her long train. After her follows a long numerous band of both sexes. The horses are coal black, and their eyes flash in the darkness like fire. They are guided by bits of red-hot iron, ride over land and water, and the halloo of the riders, the snorting of the horses, the rattling of the iron bits, occasion a tumult which is heard from far. Whenever they throw a saddle over a house, there must some one die, and wherever they perceive that there will be bloodshed or murder, they enter, and seating themselves on the posts by the door, make a noise and laugh in their sleeve. When one hears the Aasgaardsreja coming, one must throw oneself on the ground and pretend that one sleeps. If one does this not, one is carried away by the troop, and struck down in a fainting-fit in a place far distant from where one was. People often, after this, are low-spirited and melancholy all their days. But the virtuous, who throw themselves down immediately on the approach of the troop, suffer nothing, excepting that every one of the airy company spits upon him in passing; when the troop has passed by, then one spits again, and the affair has then no farther consequence."

Harald added that this troop was commonly out at Christmas, and nothing was more possible than that they themselves might meet it on this very evening, and in that case Susanna had nothing more to do than to dismount from the sledge, throw herself with her nose on the ground, and bury her face in the snow, till the wild herd were gone over."

Susanna declared, it is true, that she had not any faith in the story; but Harald said so gravely, that one of these days she would see that the affair was true, and Susanna was naturally so inclined to believe in the marvellous, that she very often, especially in narrow passes of the valleys, directed her glance to the heights, half fearing, half wishing, that the black horses, with the fiery eyes and the red-hot bridled bits, might make their appearance. But she only saw bright stars look down upon her, now and then dimmed by the Northern lights, which waved their shining fleeting veils over the vault of heaven.

Arrived at Semb, she saw the customary faint light in the windows of her lady. Susanna's heart was affected, and with a deep sigh she said, "Ah, how wicked this world is! To lay yet stones upon the burden, and to make misfortune into crime. What, what can we do to shield her from the attacks of malice?"

"Madame Brown shall at least not spread her lies farther," said Harald. "I will drive to her to-morrow morning, compel her to swallow her own words, and terrify her from ever letting them again pass her lips."

"Yes, that is good!" exclaimed Susanna delighted.

"If an accident happens to a child," continued Harald excitedly, "then directly to charge those belonging to it with wilful murder! Can one imagine anything more shameful or more absurd. No, such snakes, at least, shall not hiss about the unhappy lady. And to crush them shall be my business!"

And with this Harald pressed Susanna's hand at parting, and left her.

"And my business," thought Susanna, with tearful eyes, "shall be, to love her and to serve her faithfully. Perhaps when order and comfort are diffused more and more around her, when many pleasures daily surround her, perhaps she may again feel an inclination for life."

QUIET WEEKS.

When clouds hang heavy on the face of earth,
And woods stand leafless in their mourning plight,—
Then gentle sympathy has twofold might,
And kindles on the social winter's hearth
Within our hearts the glow of spring's delight.

VELHAVEN.

HAST thou heard the fall of water-drops in deep caves, where heavily, and perpetually, and gnawingly they eat into the ground on which they fall? Hast thou heard the murmuring of the brook that flows on sportively between green banks, whilst nodding flowers and beaming lights of heaven mirror themselves in its waters? There is a secret twittering and whispering of joy in it. There hast thou pictures of two kinds of still life, which are different the one from the other as hell and heaven. Both of them are lived on earth; both of them, at Semb in Heimdal, were lived through the following months: the first by Mrs. Astrid, the second by Harald and Susanna, only that sometimes the wearing drops were blown aside by a favourable breeze, and sometimes mud of various kinds made turbid the waters of the dancing brook.

January passed away with his growing sunshine and his increasing winter pomp. Waterfalls planted their edges with flowers, palms, grapes, yes, whole fruit-trees, of—ice. The bullfinches, with their red breasts, shone like hopping flames upon the white snow. The winter bloomed in sparkling crystals, which were strewn over wood and earth, in the song of the thrush, in the glittering whiteness of the snow-fields. Timber was felled in the woods, and songs from Tegner's Frithof resounded thereto. People drove in sledges through the valleys, and on snow-skates over the mountains. There was fresh life everywhere.

The contest at Semb, about Sweden and Norway, had ceased ever since Christmas. It is true that Harald attempted various attacks upon Swedish iron, the Swedish woods, and so on, but Susanna seemed not rightly to believe in their seriousness, and would not on that account take up the strife; and his last attempt on the Swedish wind fell so feebly, that Harald determined to let the subject rest, and to look about for some other matter of contention wherewith to keep himself warm during the winter.

February and March came on. This is the severest time of a northern winter. In January, it is young, but it becomes now old and grey and heavy, especially in cottages, where there is no great provision for the family. The autumn provision, as well in the house as in the yard, is nearly consumed. It is hard for hungry children to trail home wood from the forests, which is to boil for them in their kettle only thin water-gruel, and not always that.

April came. It is called the spring month, and the larks sing in the woods. But in the deep valley often prevails then the greatest anxiety and want. Often then scatters the needy peasant ashes and sand upon the snow which covers his acres, that it may melt all the sooner, and thus he may be able to plough up his land between the snow walls which surround it. Susanna during this month became well known in the cottages of the valley, and her warm heart found rich material for sympathy and help.

Harald thought this too good an opportunity to be lost for infusing into Susanna a horror of himself and his character, and shewed himself cold and immovable to her description of the wants which she had witnessed, and had a proud ability to say 'no' to all her proposals for their assistance. He spoke much of severity and of wholesome lectures, and so on; and Susanna was not slow in calling him the most cruel of men, another tyrant 'Christiern,' a regular misanthrope: 'wolves and bears had more heart than he had. Never again would she ask him for anything; one might just as well talk to a stock or a stone!' And Susanna, set off to weep bitter tears. But when she afterwards found that much want was silently assisted from the hand of the misanthrope; when she found that in various instances her suggestions were adopted; then, indeed, she also shed in silence tears of joy, and soon forgot all her plans of hostile reserve. By degrees also Harald forgot his contention in the subject, the interest of which was too good and important; and before they were rightly aware of it, they found themselves both busied for the same purpose in various ways. Susanna had begun by giving away all that she possessed. As she had now no more to give, she began to give ear to Harald's views; that for the poor which surrounded them, generally speaking, direct almsgiving was less needful than a friendly and rational sympathy in their circumstances, a fatherly and motherly guardianship which would sustain the 'broken heart,' and strengthen the weary hands, which were almost sinking, to raise themselves again to labour and to hope. In the class which may be said to labour for their daily bread, there are people who help themselves; others there are whom nobody can help; but the greater number are those who through prudent help in word and deed can attain to—helping themselves, and obtaining comfort and independence.

* The rushing noise and tumult in the air which attend violent storms, especially in mountain countries, have probably given occasion to the legend of the Aasgaardrejsa. There is no doubt of its having its origin in heathen times, but it may also have reference to the procession towards Aasgaard of the heroes who have fallen in battle, or to the serial journey of the Nornor and Valkyrior. The legend has taken its present form under Christianity, in which the old divinities have been transformed in popular belief into evil powers and servants of the devil.—FAYE.

Harald considered it important to direct the attention of the people to the keeping of cattle, knowing that this was the certain way of this region's advancing itself. And as soon as the snow melted, and the earth was clear, he went out with labourers and servants, and occupied himself busily in carrying away from the meadows the stones with which they, in this country, are so abundantly strewn, and sowed new kinds of grass as a source of more abundant fodder; and Susanna's heart beat for joy as she saw his activity, and how he himself went to work, and animated all by his example and his cheerful spirit. Harald now also often found his favourite dishes for his dinner; nay, Susanna herself began to discover that one and another of them were very savory, and among these may particularly be mentioned groat gruel with little herrings. This course, with which dinners in Norway often begin, is so served, that every guest has a little plate beside him on which lie the little white herrings, and they eat alternately a piece of herring and a spoonful of gruel, which looks very well, and tastes very good.

Harald, towards spring, was very much occupied with work and workpeople, so that he had but little time to devote to Susanna, either for good or bad. But he had discovered that possibly in time he might have a weak chest, and he visited her therefore every morning in the dairy that he might receive a cup of new milk from her hand. For this, he gave her in return fresh spring-flowers, or by way of change, a nettle (which was always thrown violently into a corner), and for the rest attentively remarked the occurrences in the dairy, and Susanna's movements, while she poured the milk out of the pails through a sieve into the pans, and arranged them on their shelves, whereby it happened that he would forget himself in the following monologue—

"See, that one may call a knack! How well she looks at her work, and with that cheerful, friendly face! Everything that she touches is well done;—everything improves and flourishes under her eye. If she only were not so violent and passionate!—but it is not in her heart, there never was a better heart than hers. Men and animals love her, and are well off under her care—Happy the man who—hum!"

Shall we not at the same time cast a glance into Susanna's heart? It is rather curious there. The fact was, that Harald had,—partly by his provocativeness and naughtiness, and partly by his friendship, his story-telling, and his native worth, which Susanna discovered more and more,—so rooted himself into all her thoughts and feelings, that it was impossible for her to displace him from them. In anger, in gratitude, in evil, in good, at all times, must she think of him. Many a night she lay down with the wish never to see him again, but always awoke the next morning with the secret desire to meet with him again. The terms on which she stood with him resembled April weather, which we may be able the clearest to see on—

A MAY DAY.

The first time, yes the first time flings
A glory even on trivial things;
It passes soon, a moment's falling,
Then it is also past recalling.

The grass itself has such a prime;
Man prizes most spring's flowery time,
When first the verdure, decks earth's bosom,
And the heart-leaf foretells the blossom.

Thus God lets all, however low,
In 'the first time' a triumph know;
Even in the hour when death impendeth,
And life itself to heaven ascendeth.

HENR WERGLAND.

It was in the beginning of May. A heavy shower of rain had just ceased. The wind sprang up in the south, blew mild and fresh, and chased herds of white clouds over the brightening heaven.

The court at Semb, which had been desolate during the rain, now began to be full of life and movement.

Six ducks paddled up and down with great delight in a puddle of water, bathing and beautifying themselves.

The chanticleer, called the Knight, scratched in the earth, and thereupon began to crow merrily, in order to make it known that he had something nice to invite to, and as two neat grey-speckled hens sprang towards him, he let first one grain of corn and then another fall out of his beak, of which, agreeably to a clever hen-instinct, they availed themselves without ceremony or compliments. How easily the creatures live!

The turkey-cock was in great perplexity, and had a deal of trouble to keep his countenance. His white lady had accepted the invitation of the chanticleer (which she probably thought was general), and sprang forward as fast as she could with her long legs, and stuck her head between the two hens to have a share of their treat. The knightly young chanticleer on this, with some surprise and a certain astonished sound in his throat, drew himself a little proudly back, but for all that was too much of the 'gentleman' to mortify, in the least, the foreign presumptuous beauty. But the grey-speckled hens turned their backs upon her. Her neglected spouse gobbled in full desperation, and swelled himself out, his countenance flaming with anger, by the side of his black wife, who was silent, and cast deprecating eyes up to heaven.

By the kitchen-wall, the black cat and her kittens romped amid a thousand twists and turns; while above them the mice, in the water-spout, peeped peeringly and curiously forth, drank of the rain-water, snuffed in the fresh air, and afterward crept quietly again under the house tiles.

The flies stretched their legs, and began to walk about in the sunshine.

In the court stood a tall ash, in whose top waved a magpie-nest. A many magpies, candidates for the airy palace, made their appearance there, flew screaming round about, wished to get possession of it, and chased one another away. At length two remained as conquerors of the nest. There laughed they and kissed under the spring-blue heaven, rocked by the south wind. Those that were chased away consoled themselves by fluttering down upon the yard-dog's provision trough, and plucking out of it, whilst the proud Alfiero, sitting outside his kennel, contemplated them in dignified repose.

The starlings struck up their quaver, and sent forth their melodious whistling, whilst they congregated together upon the edge of the roof.

The grapes shook from themselves the rain-drops in the wind, and the little stellaria, which is so dear to the singing birds, raised again its head to the sun, and was saluted by the jubilant song of the lark.

The geese waddled gabbling over the grassy fields, biting the young green herbage. In this way, a change was revealed, which had taken place in the company. The bulky, the white gander, had by accident become lame, and had with this lost his power and his respect. The grey gander had now an opportunity of exhibiting a beautiful character, a noble disposition; but no! The grey gander shewed nothing of that; but as the white gander had done to him, did he now in return; stretching out his neck against him, and keeping him at a distance with cries and blows; and the geese-madams troubled themselves not about it, and the white gander must now think himself well off to see his rival ruling the assembly, whilst he himself crept behind, hapless and forsaken. Susanna, who saw this, lost now all regard for the grey gander, without having any higher respect for the white one. She found the one no better than the other.

Just now Susanna returned from a visit to a peasant's cottage, where some time ago she had helped the wife to set up a piece of weaving, and now had been assisting her in taking it down, and her countenance beamed with pleasure at the scene which she had witnessed there. The cow had calved there that same morning, and the milk ran in foaming and abundant streams to the unspeakable joy of four small pale boys, who now were divided in their joy over this, and their admiration of the little lively black-and-white spotted calf; which admiration, however, in the mind of the youngest, was mixed with fear. The web also had turned out beyond expectation; Susanna helped the housewife to cut out the piece of cloth in the most advantageous manner, and her cheerful words and cordial sympathy were like the cream to the milk breakfast. It was with this glad impression on her soul, that Susanna entered the court at Semb, and was saluted by Alfiero and all the poultry with great joy. In the mean time she heard the cries and lamentations of birds, and this led her to the orchard. Here she saw a pair of starlings, which with anxiety and screams were flying about the lowest branches of an oak. In the grass below, something black was hopping about, and Susanna saw that it was a young starling, which had ventured itself too early out of the nest, and had fallen down. It now raised its weak cries to its parents, which, as it appeared, sought by their fluttering to keep at a respectful distance a grey cat, whose greedy eyes gleamed forth from under a hawthorn-bush. Susanna drove away the cat, and took up and warmed the little bird in her breast. But this did not at all pacify the starling papa and mamma; their uneasiness seemed rather to increase. Susanna would gladly from her heart have allayed it, but when she looked up and saw the starling nest high up in the oak trunk, many ells above her head, she was quite in despair. With that the noon-day bell rang, Alfiero howled to it in his tragical manner, and Harald, at the head of his workpeople, returned from the field. Susanna hastened to ask counsel from him, and shewed him the young one. "Give it here," said Harald, "I will twist its neck, and so we can have a nice little roast for dinner."

"No! can you be so cruel!" replied Susanna. Harald laughed without answering, looked up to the oak to see where the starling nest was, and swung himself with great agility up the tree. Standing now upon the lowest boughs, he bent himself down to Susanna, and said, "Give it here to me, I will manage it!" And Susanna now gave him the bird without any further remark. Lightly and nimbly sprang Harald now from bough to bough, holding the bird in his left hand, and accompanied by the crying starling-parents, who flew terrified around his head. It was certainly a surprise to them when the young one was placed uninjured in the nest, but it was no longer so for Susanna; and as Harald, glowing and warm, sprang down from the tree, he was received by Susanna's most friendly glances and cordial thanks.

At this moment came several travelling tradespeople with their packs into the court, and were observed by Harald, who said that he had some little purchases to make, and besought Susanna's advice. Susanna was a woman, and women give advice willingly. Always good of course.

After some time Harald had made various purchases, and had always asked counsel of Susanna, who thereby felt herself somewhat flattered, but could not help thinking the while of Harald "yet he must be a regular egotist. He always thinks about himself, and always buys for himself, and never anything for his sister, of whom he, however, talks so much, and seems to love so well! But—the Norwegian men, they love themselves most!"

And this time it did not seem to be without reason that Susanna thought so, for it was terrible how thoughtful Harald was for himself, and what a deal he needed for this self.

This piece of damask he would have for his table; this muslin for his curtains, these pocket-handkerchiefs for his nose, and so on.

Susanna could not avoid saying, on purpose to try him, when they came to a handsome piece for a dress—

"How pretty that is! Certainly that would become your sister very nicely!"

"What? my sister!" returned Harald. "No! it is best that she clothe herself. This is exactly the thing that I want for my sofa. One is always nearest to oneself! One must care a little for oneself."

"Then care you for yourself! I have no time!" said Susanna, quite excited, as she turned her back upon him and his wares, and went.

SPRING FEELINGS.

Heaven has strewn thoughts o'er the sweet vernal dale,
These on the hearts of the flowers bestowing,
Therefore, when open the chalice glowing,
Whispers each petal a secret tale. VELHAVEN.

MAY strides on, and June approaches. From their nests in the airy, leaf-garlanded grottoes, which mother nature has prepared for them in the lofty oaks and ashes, the starlings send their deep, lively whistlings, their love-breathing trills. Song and fragrances fill the woods of Norway. Rustic maidens wander with their herds and flocks up to the Säter dales, singing joyously:

To draw to the Säter is good and blessed.

Come Böling* mine!

Come cow, come calf, come greatest and least;

To the Queen your steps incline.

The labour of the spring was closed; the harvests ripened beneath the care of heaven. Harald had now more leisure, and much of this he devoted to Susanna. He taught her to know the flowers of the dale, their names and properties; and was as much amused at her mangling of the Latin words, as he was charmed at the quickness with which she comprehended and applied their economical and medicinal uses.

The dale and its beauties became to her continually more known and beloved. She went now again in the morning to the spring, where the ladies-mantle and the silver-weed grew so luxuriantly, and let the feathery creatures bathe and rejoice themselves. On Sunday afternoons, too, she sometimes took a ramble to a grove of oaks and wild rose-bushes, at the foot of the mountain called Krystalberg, which, in the glow of the evening sun, glittered with a wonderful radiance. She was sometimes followed thither by Harald, who related many a strange legend of Huldren, who lived in the mountain; of the dwarfs who shaped the six-sided crystals, called thence dwarf-jewels; of the subterranean world and doings, as these were fashioned in the rich imagination of ancient times, and as they still darkly lived on, in the silent belief of the northern people. Susanna's active mind seized on all this with the intensest interest. She visioned herself in the mountain's beautiful crystal halls; seemed to hear the song of the Neck in the rushing of the river; and tree and blossom grew more beautiful in her eyes, as she imagined elves and spirits speaking out of them.

Out of the prosaic soil of her life and action sprang a flower of poetry, half reality, half legend, which diffused a delightful radiance over her soul.

Susanna was not the only one at Semb on whom this spring operated beneficially. The pale Mrs. Astrid seemed to raise herself out of her gloomy trance, and to imbibe new vigour of life from the fresh vernal air. She went out sometimes when the sun shone warmly, and she was seen sitting long hours on a mossy stone in the wood, at the foot of the Krystalberg. When Susanna observed that she seemed to love this spot, she carried thither silently out of the wood, turfs with the flowering Linnaea and the fragrant single-flowered Pyrola, and planted them so that the south wind should bear their delicious aroma to the spot where Mrs. Astrid sat; and Susanna felt a sad pleasure in the thought that these balsamic airs would give to her mistress an evidence of a devotion that did not venture otherwise to show itself. Susanna would have been richly rewarded, could she at this time have seen into her mistress's soul, and also have read a letter which she wrote, and from which we present a fragment.

TO BISHOP S ———.

Love does not grow weary. Thus was I constrained to say to myself to-day as your letter reached me, and penetrated me with the feeling of your goodness, of your heavenly patience! And you do not grow weary of those who almost grow weary of themselves! And always the same spring in your hopes—the same mountain-fast, but beautiful faith. Ah! that I better deserved your friendship! But to-day I have a glad word to say to you, and I will not withhold it from you.

You wish to know how it is with me! Better! For some time I have breathed more lightly. Quiet days have passed over me; mild stars have glanced down upon my head; the waterfall has sung its cradle-song to me by night, till it has lulled me to sleep, and it has become calmer and better with me. The spring exerts its beneficent influence upon me. All rises round me so great, so rich in its life and beauty, I forget myself sometimes in admiration. It is more than thirty years since I lived in the country.

At times, feelings arise in me like vernal gales. I have then experienced a certain consolation in the thought, that throughout my long conflict I have yet striven to do right, to endure to the utmost; that in a world where I have shed so many tears, I have also forborne to shed many. Sometimes, out of the vernal blue heaven, something falls on me like a tender glance, an anticipation. But, perhaps, these brightenings are merely spring flowers, which perish with the spring.

I go sometimes out. I enjoy sitting in the beautiful grove of oaks down in the dale, and there, mild and beneficial feelings pass over me. The breeze bears to me odours ineffably delicious. These odours remind me of the world of beneficent, healing, invigorating powers which shoot forth around me, and manifest themselves so silently, so unpretendingly, merely through their fragrance and their still beauty. I sat there this evening, at the foot of the mountain. The sun was hastening towards his setting, but gleamed warmly into the grove. Near me grazed some sheep with their tender lambs. They gazed at me with a wondering but unalarmed air; a little bell tinkled clear and softly, as they wandered to and fro on the green sward; it was so calm and still that I heard the small insects which hummed in the grass at my feet, and there passed over me I know not what feeling of satisfaction and pleasure. I enjoyed existence in this hour like the lambs, like the insects—I can then still enjoy! Mild, affluent Nature! on thy heart might yet mine—but there stands the pale, bloody boy,—there stands the murderer, everlastingly between me and peace of mind! If I could sometimes hear your voice, if I could see frequently your clear, solace-inspiring glance, I might perhaps yet teach myself to—look up! But I ask you not to come. Ah! I desire no one to approach me. But be no longer so uneasy concerning me, my friend. I am better. I have about me good people, who make my outward life safe and agreeable. Let your affectionate thoughts, as hitherto, rest upon me; perhaps they will some time force light into my heart!

MAN AND WIFE.

A FRESH STRIFE.

And I will show what a fellow I am!
My master—I am incensed!

SIFUL SIFADDA.

We have said that Harald, just as little as Griselda's blessed husband, appeared to like a life which flowed like oil. Perhaps it seemed to him that his intercourse with Susanna was now assuming this character, and therefore was it perhaps that, as he could no longer excite her abhorrence as a misanthropist, one fine day he undertook to irritate her as a woman-tyrant.

"I am expecting my sister here one of these days," said he one evening in a disrespectful tone to Susanna; "I have occasion for her, to sew a little for me, and to put my things in order. Alette is a good, clever girl, and I think of keeping her with me till I marry, and can be waited on by my wife."

"Waited on by your wife!" exclaimed Susanna—one may easily conceive in what a tone.

"Yes, certainly. The woman is made to be subject to the man; and I do not mean to teach my wife otherwise. I mean to be master in my house, I."

"The Norwegian men must be despots, tyrants, actual Heathens and Turks!" said Susanna.

"Every morning," said Harald, "precisely at six o'clock, my wife shall get up and prepare my coffee."

"But if she will not?"

"Will not? I will teach her to will, I. And if she will not by fair means, then she shall by foul. I tolerate no disobedience, not I; and thus I mean to teach in the most serious manner, and if she does not wish to experience then, why then, I advise her to rise at six o'clock, boil my coffee, and bring it me up to bed."

"Nay, never did I hear anything like this! You are the sole—God have mercy on the wives of this abominable country!"

"And a good dinner," continued Harald, "shall she set before me every day at noon, or—I shall not be in the best temper! And she must not come with her 'Fattig Leilighed'* more than once a fortnight; and then I demand that it shall be made right savoury."

"If you will have good eating, then you must make good provision for the housekeeping," said Susanna.

"That I shall not trouble myself about; that my wife must care for. She shall provide stores for housekeeping how she can."

"I hope, then," said Susanna, "you will never have a wife, except she be a regular Xantippe."

"For that we know a remedy; and therefore, to begin with, every evening she shall pull off my boots. All that is necessary is, for a man to begin in time to maintain his authority; for the women are by nature excessively fond of ruling."

"And that because the men are tyrants," said Susanna.

"And besides," continued Harald, "so horribly petty-minded."

"Because," retorted Susanna, "the men have engrossed to themselves all matters of importance."

"And are so full of caprice," said Harald.

"Because the men," said Susanna, "are so brimful of conceit."

"And so fickle," added Harald.

"Because the men," retorted Susanna, "are not deserving of constancy."

"And so obstinate and violent," continued Harald.

"When the men," said Susanna, "are absurd."

"But I," proceeded Harald very sharply, "do not like an obstinate, passionate, imperious woman. It is in general the men themselves who spoil them; they are too patient, too conceding, too obliging. But in my house it shall be different. I do not intend to spoil my wife. On the contrary, she shall learn to shew herself patient, devoted, and attentive to me; and for this purpose I intend to send for my dear sister. She must not expect that I shall move from the spot for her sake; she must not—"

At this moment a carriage was heard to drive into the court, and stop before the door. Harald looked through the window, made an exclamation of surprise and joy, and darted like an arrow out of the room. Susanna in her turn looked with anxiety through the window, and saw Harald lift a lady from the carriage, whom he then warmly and long folded in his arms, and quitted only to take from her the boxes and packages which she would bring out, and load himself with them.

"O indeed!" thought Susanna, "it is thus then that it stands with his tyranny;" and satisfied that it was Harald's sister whom she thus received, she went into the kitchen to make some preparations for supper.

When she returned to the sitting-room, she found the brother and sister there. With beaming eyes Harald presented to Susanna—* 'Fattig Leilighed'—'poor opportunity'—is the name given in merit to the cooking-up the remains of the week's provisions, which generally is brought out on a Saturday.

"My sister Alette!" And then he began to dance about with her, laughing and singing. Never had Susanna seen him so thoroughly glad at heart.

At supper Harald had eyes only for his sister, whom he did nothing but wait upon with jest and merriment, now and then playing her, indeed, some joke, for which she scolded him; and this only seemed to enliven him still more. Mrs. Astrid had this evening never quitted her room, and Harald could therefore all the more enjoy himself with Alette. After supper, he took his seat beside her on the sofa, and with her hand in his, he reminded her of their days of childhood, and how little they were then able to endure each other.

"You were then so intolerably provoking," said Alette.

"And you so unbearably genteel and high," said Harald. "Do you remember how we used to wrangle at breakfast? That is, how I did, for you never made much answer, but carried yourself so excessively knowingly and loftily, because you were then a little taller than I."

"And I remember too how you sometimes quitted the field, left the breakfast, and complained to our mother you could not support my genteel airs."

"Yes, if that had but in the end availed me anything. But I was compelled to hear, 'Alette is much more sensible than you. Alette is much more steady than you.' That had a bitter taste with it; but as some amends, I ate up your confectionary."

"Yes, you rogue you, that you did, and then persuaded me into the bargain that a rat had done it."

"Ay, I was a graceless lad, good for nothing, conceited, intolerable!"

"And I a tiresome girl, a little old woman, peevish and sanctified. For every trick you played me I gave you a moral lecture."

"Nay, not one, my sister, but seven, and more than that. That was too strong for anything!" exclaimed Harald, laughing, and kissing Alette's hand.

"But," continued he, "they were necessary and well merited. But I, unworthy one, was rather glad when I escaped from them, and went to the University."

"Nor was I either at all sorry to have my pincushion and things left in peace. But when you came home three years later, then the leaf had turned itself over; then it was otherwise. Then became I truly proud of my brother."

"And I of my sister. Do you know, Alette, I think you must actually break off with Lexow. I really cannot do without you. Remain with me, instead of going with him up into the shivering, cold North, which you really never can like."

"You must ask Lexow about that, my brother."

Thus continued the conversation long, and became by degrees more serious and still. The brother and sister seemed to talk of their future, and that is always a solemn matter, but ever and anon burst forth a hearty laughter from the midst of their consultations. It went on to midnight, but neither of them appeared to mark this.

Susanna, during the conversation of the re-atives, had retired to the next room, so as to leave them the more freedom. Her bosom was oppressed by unwonted and melancholy feelings. With her brow leaned against the cool window panes, she gazed out into the lovely summer evening, while she listened to the soft and familiar voices within. The twilight cast its soft dusky veil over the dale; and tree and field, hill and plain, heaven and earth, seemed to mingle in confidential silence. In the grass slumbered the flowers, leaning on each other; and from amongst the leaves, which gently waved themselves side by side, Susanna seemed to hear whispered the words, 'Brother! Sister!' With an ineffable yearning opened she her arms as if she would embrace some one—but when they returned again empty to her bosom, tears of anguish rolled over her cheeks, while her lips whispered, 'Little Hulda!'

Little Hulda, all honour to thy affections, to thy radiant locks; but I do not believe that Susanna's tears now flowed alone for thee.

ALETTE.

I see thine eyes in beauty fling
Back the tall taper's splendour;
Yet can still, and clear, and tender,
Dwell on an angel's wing.—VILHAVEN.

When Susanna the next morning went in to Alette, to inquire how she had slept, and so on, she found Harald already with his sister, and around her were outspread the linen, the neckerchiefs, the pocket-handkerchiefs, the tablecloths, etc., which he told Susanna he had purchased for himself, but which, in reality, were presents for his sister, on the occasion of her approaching marriage. Scarcely had Susanna entered the room, when, to her great amazement, the brother and sister both united in begging her to accept the very handsome dress which she had once proposed that Harald should buy for his sister. She blushed and hesitated, but could not resist the cordiality of Harald, and received the gift with thanks, though glad was she not. Tears were ready to start into her eyes, and she felt herself poor in more than one respect. When Harald immediately after this went out, Alette broke forth into a hearty panegyric upon him, and concluded with these words: "Yes, one may probably three times a day get angry with him before we can rightly get to know him; but this is certain, that if he wishes it, you cannot get clear of him without first loving him." Susanna sat silent; listened to Alette's words; and her heart beat at once with painful and affectionate feelings. The call to breakfast broke off the conversation.

Alette was something more than twenty years of age, and had the beautiful growth, the pure complexion, the fine features, with which mother Nature seems especially to have endowed her daughters of Norway. Something fine and transparent lay in her appearance; and her body seemed merely to be a light garment for the soul, so full of life. Her manner of action and of speaking had something fascinating in them, and betrayed happy endowments of nature and much accomplishment. Betrothed to a wealthy merchant of Nordland, she was to be married in the autumn; but in the meanwhile came to spend some time with her brother, and with some other near relatives in Hallingdal.

Susanna felt herself but little at ease with Alette, beside whose fine, half-ethereal being, she perceived in herself, for the first time, an unpleasant consciousness of being—lumpish.

From the moment of Alette's arrival in Semb, there commenced a change there. Her charming disposition and great talents, made her quickly the centre round which all assembled. Even Mrs. Astrid felt her influence, and remained in the evenings with the rest, and took part in the conversation, which Alette knew how to make interesting. But Mrs. Astrid herself contributed not the less thereto, when she for hours together, as it were, forgot herself in the subjects of the conversation, and then uttered words which gave evidence of a deeply feeling and thinking spirit. Susanna regarded her with joy and admiration. Yet often a painful thought seemed to snatch her away from the genial impression, some dark memory appeared spectre-like to step between her and gladness; the words then died on her pallid lips, the hand was laid on the heart, and she heard and saw no more of what was going on around her, till the interest of the conversation was again able to take hold of her.

There was frequently reading aloud. Alette had a real talent for this, and it was a genuine enjoyment to hear from her lips poems of Valhalla and Vergeland; which two young men, although personal enemies, in this respect have extended to each other a brotherly hand, because they sincerely love their native land, and have exhibited much that is beautiful and ennobling in its literature.

In the mean time, Susanna became continually less at ease in her mind; Harald no longer as before sought her company, and seemed almost to have forgotten her in Alette. In the conversations, at which she was now often present, there was much which touched her feelings, and awoke in her questions and imaginations; but when she attempted to express any of these, when she would take part and would show that she could think and speak, then fell the words so ill, and her thoughts came forth so obscurely, that she herself was compelled to blush for them; especially when on this, Alette would turn her eyes upon her with some astonishment, and Harald cast down his; and she vowed to herself never again to open her mouth on subjects which she did not understand.

But all this sunk deep into her bosom; and in her self-humiliation she lamented bitterly the want of a more careful education, and sighed from the depths of her heart; "Ah! that I did but know a little more! That I did but possess some beautiful talent!"

AN EVENING IN THE SITTING-ROOM.

And is it once morning, then is it soon day,
For the light must eternally conquer.

Foss.

It was a lovely summer evening. Through the open windows of the sitting-room streamed in the delicious summer air with the fragrance of the bay, which now lay in swath in the dale. At one table, Susanna prepared the steaming tea, which the Norwegians like almost as much as the English; at another sat Mrs. Astrid with Harald and Alette, occupied with the newly-published, beautiful work, "Snorre Sturleson's Sagas of the Norwegian Kings, translated from the Icelandic of J. Aal." The fourth number of this work lay before Harald open at the section "The Discovery of Vineland." He had just read aloud Mr. Aal's interesting introduction to the Sagas of Erik Rode and Karlafne, and now proceeded to read these two Sagas themselves, which contained the narrative of the first discovery of America, and of which we here give a brief compendium.

"At the end of the tenth century, at the period when the Northmen sought with warlike Viking hosts the south, and the Christianity with the Gospel of Peace made its way towards the North, there lived in Iceland a man of consequence, named Herjulf. His son was called Bjarne, and was a courageous young man. His mind was early turned towards travel and adventures. He soon had the command of his own ship, and sailed in it for foreign lands. As he one summer returned to the island of his ancestors, his father had shortly before sailed for Greenland, and had settled himself there. Then also steered Bjarne out to sea, saying, 'He would, after the old custom, take up his winter's board with his father, and would sail for Greenland.'

"After three days' sail, a fierce north wind arose, followed by so thick a fog that Bjarne and his people could no longer tell where they were. This continued many days. After that they began to see the sun again, and could discern the quarters of the heaven. They saw before them land, which was overgrown with wood, and had gentle eminences. Bjarne would not land there, because it could not be Greenland, where he knew that they should find great icebergs. They sailed on with a south-west wind for three days, and got sight of another land, which was mountainous and had lofty icebergs. But Bjarne perceived that neither was this Greenland, and sailed farther, till he at length discovered the land which he sought, and his father's court.

"On a visit to Erik Jarl in Norway, Bjarne related his voyage, and spoke of the strange country which he had seen. But people thought that he had had little curiosity not to have been able to say more about this country, and some blamed him much on this account. Erik Rode's son, Lief, the descendant of a distinguished line, was filled with zeal at Bjarne's relation, to pursue the discovery, and purchased of him a ship, which he manned with five-and-thirty men, and so set out to sea, to discover this new land. They came first to a country full of snow and mountains, which seemed to them to be destitute of all magnificence. They then came in sight of one whose shore was of white sand, and its surface overgrown with woods.* They sailed out farther westward, and arrived at a splendid country, where they found grapes and Indian corn and the noble tree 'Masur'†

"This country† they called 'Vineland,' and built a house, and remained there through the winter, which was so mild that the grass was but little withered. Moreover, the day and night were of more equal length than in Iceland or Greenland. And Lief was a tall and strong man, of a manly aspect, and at the same time wise and prudent in all matters. After this expedition, he grew both in consideration and wealth, and was universally called 'The Happy.'

* Probably Newfoundland. † Probably spotted maple.
‡ Upper Canada.

"Amongst the voyages to this new country which followed on that of Lief, Karlefe's is the most remarkable. But the new colonists were attacked with heavy sickness; and the peculiar home-sickness of the inhabitants of the North might perhaps, in part, drive them back from the grapes of Vineland to their own snowy home: certain it is, that they retained no permanent settlement in the new country. They were also continually assaulted by the natives, whom their weapons were not powerful enough to restrain.

"In the mean time, several Icelandic annalists have recorded that, in every age, from the time of Lief to that of Columbus, America was visited by the Northmen. Testimonies and memories of these voyages we have now only in these relations, and in the remarkable stone called 'Dighton written Rock,' on the bank of Taunton river in Massachusetts, and whose ruins and hieroglyphics at length, in 1830, copied by learned Americans, corroborate the truth of these relations."

Harald now commented on these figures with great zeal, remarking that, in Norway, similar ones were yet found engraven on the face of rocks, on tombstones, etc. "Do you see, Alette," continued he, eagerly, "this represents a woman and a little child; probably Karlefe's wife, who bore a son during this visit to Vineland. And this must be a bull; and in Karlefe's Saga a bull is mentioned, which terrified the natives by his bellows; and these figures to the right represent the natives. This must be a shield, and these Runic letters."

"It requires a right good strength of imagination for all this, my brother," here interrupted Alette, smilingly, who was not altogether so patriotic as Harald; "but granted that all this was evidence of the first discovery of America by our ancestors, what then? What good, what advantage has the world derived thence? Is it not rather sorrowful to see that such important discoveries should have been lost, that they could be obliterated as if they had never been, and must be made anew! Had not Columbus, some centuries later, braved both the narrow-mindedness of men and the yet unmeasured tracks of the ocean, it is probable that to-day we should know nothing of America, and of these stones, the traces of our forefathers on this foreign soil."

"But, my dear Alette," exclaimed Harald, in astonishment, "is it not then clear as the sun, that without the Vineland voyages of the Northmen, Columbus could certainly never have fallen upon the idea of seeking a land beyond the great ocean? In the time of Columbus, the Northmen sailed in their Snäkor* about all the coasts of Europe; they made voyages to Spain, and rumours of the Vineland voyages went with them. Besides—and this is worthy of notice—Columbus himself visited Iceland a few years prior to his great voyage of discovery; and, as Robertson says, rather to extend his knowledge of sea affairs than to augment his property."

* Seails or Cockles, as they called their light craft.

"But," said Alette, "Washington Irving, in his Columbus, which I have recently perused, speaks indeed of his voyage to Iceland, but denies that he derived thence any clue to his great discovery."

"But that is incredible, impossible, after what we here see and hear! Listen now to what Aal says of the time when Columbus made his sojourn in Iceland: 'In Iceland flourished then the written Sagas, and the various Sagas passed from hand to hand in various copies, serving then, as now, but in a higher degree, to shorten the winter evenings. Our old manuscript Sagas thus certainly kindled a light in his dim conceptions; and this must have so much the more brought him upon the track, as it was nearer to the events themselves, and could in part be orally communicated by those who were the direct lineal descendants of the discoverers.'

"Is not this most natural and essential! Can you doubt any longer, Alette! I pray you convert and improve yourself. Convert yourself from Irving to Aal."

"I am disposed to take Harald's side," said now Mrs. Astrid, with a lively voice and look. "Great, and for mankind, important discoveries have never occurred without preparatory circumstances, often silently operating through whole centuries, till in a happy moment the spirit of genius and of good fortune has blown up the fire which glowed beneath the ashes, into a clear, and for the world, magnificent flame. Wherever we see a flower we can look down to a stem, to the roots hidden in the earth, and finally look to a seed, which in its dark form contained the yet undeveloped but living plant. And may not every thing in the world be regulated by the same law of development? In the tempestuous voyages of the Northmen through the misty seas, I could see the weather-driven seed, which under the guidance of Providence, from the soil of Vineland, stretched its roots through centuries, till a mighty genius was guided by them to complete the work, and to the Old World to discover the New."

Harald was delighted with this idea, which blew fresh wind into his sails; and thereby enlivened, he gave vent to the admiration of the ancient times of the North, which lived in his bosom. "It belonged," said he, "to those men of few words but of powerful deeds; those men to whom danger was a sport, the storm music, and the swell of the waves a dance: to this race of youths it belonged to discover new worlds without imagining that to be an exploit. Great achievements were their every-day occupation."

Alette shook her beautiful head at this enthusiasm for antiquity. She would not deny these times had a certain greatness, but she could not pronounce them truly great. She spoke of the revenge, the violence, the base cruelties which the past ages of the North openly paid homage to.

"But," continued Harald, "the contempt of pain and death, this noble contempt, so universal amongst the men of that time, deprived cruelty of its sting. Our degenerate race has scarcely a conception of the strength which made the men of past times find a pleasure even in pains, since they spurred their courageous souls to the highest pitch of heroism; since in such moments they felt themselves able to be more than men. Therefore sung heroes amid the very pains of death. Thus died the Swedish Hjalmar, in the arms of his friend Odd, the Norwegian, while he greeted the eagles which came to drink his blood. Thus died Ragnar Lodbrok, in the den of serpents; and while the snakes hissing, gnawed their way into his heart, he sung his victories, and concluded with the words—

Gone are the hours of existence!
Smiling shall I die.

How noble and admirable is this strength, amid torments and death! Could we but thus die!"

"But the rudest savages of America," said Alette, "know and practise this species of heroism; before me floats another ideal, both of life and death. The strong spirit of past ages which you, my brother, so highly prized, could not support old age, the weary days, the silent suffering, the great portion of the lot of man. I will prize the spirit which elevates every condition of humanity; which animates the dying hero to praise, not himself, but God, and die; and which to the lonely one, who wanders through the night of life towards his unnoticed grave, imparts a strength, a peace, and enables him in his darkness to triumph over all the powers of darkness. Ah! I who deeply feel myself to be one of the weak ones in the earth, who possess no single drop of Northern heroic blood; I rejoice that we can live and die in a manner which is noble, which is beautiful, which requires not the Berserker-mood, and of which the strongest spirit need not be ashamed. Do you remember, my brother, 'The old poet,' of Rein? This poem perfectly expresses the tone of mind which I would wish to possess in my last hour."

Harald recollected but faintly 'The old poet,' and both he and Mrs. Astrid begged Alette to make them better acquainted with him. Alette could not remember the whole poem, but gave an account of the most essential of its contents in these words—

"It is spring. The aged poet wanders through wood and mead, in the country where he once sung, where he had once been happy, amongst those whom he had made glad. His voice is now broken; his strength, his fire, are over. Like a shadow of that which once he was, he goes about in the young world still fresh with life. The birds of spring gather around him, welcome him with joy, and implore him to take his harp and sing to it of the new-born year, of the smiling spring. He answers—

O ye dear little singer quire,
No more can I strike the harp with fire;
No more in youth is renewed my spring;
No more the old poet can gaily sing;
And yet I am so blest—
In my heart is heavenly rest.*

"He wanders farther through wood and meadow. The brook murmuring between green banks, whispers to him its joy over its loosened bands, and greets the singer as the messenger of spring and freedom.

* I have not wished to attempt a translation of these verses, convinced that for the Swedish reader it is not necessary; and why unnecessarily brush off the golden dust from the butterfly's wings.—Fredrika Bremer.

As, however, the English reader may find it rather more necessary to give a translation of the Norwegian verses, I have made it, and that as much in the simplicity of the original as I could.—M. H.

Thy harp, my fleet stream fondly halleth—
It leaps, it exults, it bows itself;
Let it sound then—O make no delay!—
Like me the days hasten away.

"The aged singer replies:

O spring! which dost leap in thy shoes,
No more am I what I have been.
The name of the past I hear alone—
A feeble echo of days that are flown.
And yet I am so blest;
In my heart is heavenly rest.

"He wanders farther. The Dryads surround him in their dance; the Flowers present him garlands, and beg him to sing their festival; the Zephyrs, which were wont to play amid his harp-strings, seek in the bushes, and ask whether he has forgotten them there; caress the old man, and seek again, but in vain. They are about to fly, but he entreats:

O dear ones, depart not I pray!
O flowers, spread with beauty my way!
My harp is broken, but no sigh
Spring's spirits gay shall cause to fly.
And I am still so blest;
In my heart is heavenly rest.

"He wanders farther, and seeks out every beloved nook. The youth of the country assemble, and surround the aged singer—"the friend of youth and gladness." They entreat him with his music to beautify their festival:

For spring is dead, with all its pleasure,
Without the harp and song's glad measure.

"The old man replies:

Quenched, ye youth, is my fire so wild;
My evening twilight is cool, but mild;
And the blissful hours of my youth are brought,
By your lively songs, into my thought.
Bewail me not; I am still so blest—
In my heart lieth heaven's own rest.

"And now he exhorts the songsters of the wood, flowers, youth, every thing that is lovely in nature and in life, to rejoice in its existence, and to praise the Creator. The beauty and joy of all creatures are the garland in his silver hair; and grateful and happy, admiring and singing praises, he sinks softly into the maternal bosom of Nature."

Alette was silent; a tender emotion trembled in her voice as she uttered the last words, and beamed in her charming countenance. The tears of Mrs. Astrid flowed; her hands were convulsively clasped together, whilst she exclaimed, "O thus to feel before one dies! and thus to be permitted to die!" She drew Alette to her with a kind of vehemence, kissed her, and then wept silently, leaning on her shoulder. Harald too was affected; but he appeared to restrain his feelings, and gazed with earnest and tearful eyes on the group before him.

Silently and unobserved stole Susanna out of the room. She felt a sting in her heart; a serpent raged in her bosom. Driven by a nameless agonized disquiet, she hastened forth into the free air, and ascended, almost without being aware of it herself, the steep footpath up the mountain, where many a time, in calmer moments, she had admired the beautiful prospect.

Great and beautiful scenes had, during the foregoing conversation, arisen before her view; she felt herself so little, so poor beside them. Ah! she could not once speak of the great and beautiful, for her tongue was bound. She felt so warmly, and yet could warm no one! The happy Alette won without trouble, perhaps even without much valuing it, a regard, an approval, which Susanna would have purchased with her life. The Barbra-spirit boiled up in her, and with a reproachful glance to heaven she exclaimed, "Shall I then for my whole life remain nothing but a poor despised maid-servant!"

The heaven looked down on the young maiden mildly but smilingly; soft rain-drops sprinkled her forehead; and all nature around her stood silent, and, as it were, in sorrow. This sorrowing calm operated on Susanna like the tenderly accusing glance of a good mother. She looked down into her heart, and saw there envy and pride, and she shuddered at herself. She gazed down into the stream which waved beneath her feet, and she thought with longing, "O that one could but plunge down, deep, deep into these waves, and then arise purified—improved!"

But already this wish had operated like a purifying baptism on Susanna's soul; and she felt fresh and light thoughts ascend within her. "A poor maid-servant!" repeated now Susanna; "and why should that be so contemptible a lot! The Highest himself has served on earth; served for all, for the very least; yea, even for me. O!—" and it became continually lighter and warmer in her mind.—"I will be a true maid-servant, and place my honour in it, and desire to be nothing else! Charm I cannot; beauty and genius, and beautiful talents, I have not; but—I can love and I can serve, and that will I do with my whole heart, and with all my strength, and in all humility; and if men despise me, yet God will not forsake the poor and faithful maid-servant!"

When Susanna again cast her tearful eyes on the ground, they fell on a little piece of moss, one of those very least children of nature, which in silence and unheeded pass through the metamorphoses of their quiet life. The little plant stood in fresh green, on its head hung the clear rain-drops, and the sun which now shone through the clouds, glittered in them.

Susanna contemplated the little moss, and it seemed to say to her: "See thou! though I am so insignificant, yet I enjoy the dew of heaven and the beams of the sun, as fully as the roses and the lilacs of the garden!" Susanna understood the speech of the little plant, and grateful and calmed, she repeated many times to herself, with a species of silent gladness—"a humble, a faithful maid-servant!"

When Susanna came home, she found Mrs. Astrid not well. She had been much excited, and on such occasions an attack of the spasms was always to be apprehended. Susanna begged earnestly, and received the permission to watch by her to-night; at least, till Mrs. Astrid slept. Mrs. Astrid had indeed another maid with her, but she was old and very deaf, and Susanna had no confidence in her.

Mrs. Astrid retired to rest. Susanna seated herself on a stool by the window, silently occupied with her thoughts, and with knitting a stocking. The window had stood open during the day, and a host of flies had entered the room. Mrs. Astrid was much disturbed by them, and complained that they prevented her sleeping. Quietly Susanna laid bare her white shoulders, neck, and arms, and when the flies in swarms darted down upon her, and her mistress now left at peace slept calmly, Susanna sat still, let the flies enjoy themselves, and enjoyed herself thereby more than one can believe.

RETREATING AND ADVANCING.

True delicacy, that most beautiful heart-leaf of humanity, exhibits itself most significantly in little things. These which we in general call so, are not by any means so little.—J. C. Louv.

It is with our faults as with horseradish; it is terribly difficult to extirpate it from the earth in which it has once taken root; and nothing is more discouraging to the cultivator who will annihilate this weed from his ground, than to see it, so lately plucked up, shooting forth again freshly to the light from roots which remained buried in the earth. One can get quite out of patience with the weedy soil, and one is, when this soil is one's own dear self, possessed by the most cordial desire to set off far, far from one's self. But how!!!

Susanna was often conscious of this feeling, as she daily laboured to repress the excitement which arose up within her at this time. Still the thoughts and resolutions which awoke within her on the evening just described, had taken hold upon her too strongly for them to be again effaced, and with the motto—"a humble and regular servant-girl," she struggled boldly through the dangers and the events of the day. Her demeanour was calmer; she quietly withdrew herself from taking part in conversation which went beyond her education; in a friendly spirit, she endeavoured to renounce the attentions and interest of others, and busied herself only in attending to the comforts and pleasures of all, as well as in accomplishing, and when possible, anticipating every wish. And such an activity has, more than people imagine, an influence upon the well-being of every-day life. The affectionate will lends even to dead things soul and life. But heavy to the ministering spirits is this life of labour and care for others, where no sunbeam of love, no cordial acknowledgment, falls upon their laborious day.

In the beginning of August, Harald set off, to return in about fourteen days with Alf Lexow, the betrothed of Alette. During his absence, Alette was to pay a visit to her uncle in Hallingdal; but, according to Mrs. Astrid's wish, she yet spent another week at Semb. During these days, Alette and Susanna became better friends, for Alette was touched involuntarily by Susanna's unwearied and unpretending attentions, and besides this, she found in her such a frank mind and such cordial sympathy, that she could not deny herself the pleasure of communicating much of that which lived in the heart of the happy bride. Happy,—indeed Alette was, for long and warmly had she loved Alf Lexow, and should shortly be united to him for ever; and yet often stole a melancholy expression over her charming face, when the conversation turned to this marriage and to her removal into Nordland. Susanna asked her several times of the cause of this, and as often Alette jestingly evaded the question; but one evening when they had chatted together more friendly than common, Alette said—

"It is a strange feeling to get everything ready for one's own marriage in the belief that one shall not long survive it! This removal to Nordland will be my death, that I know certainly. No, do not look so terrified! It is in no case so dangerous. And thoughts of an early death I have long borne in my mind, and therefore I am accustomed to them."

"Ah!" said Susanna, "those who love and are loved, the happy, should never die! But why this strange foreboding?"

"I do not know myself!" replied Alette, "but it has accompanied me from my earliest youth. My mother was born under the beautiful heaven of Provence, and passed the greater part of her youth in that warm country. The love of my father made her love in our Norway a second country, and here she spent the remainder of her life; she never, however, could rightly bear this cold climate, longed secretly for that warmer land, and died with the longing. To me has she bequeathed this feeling; and although I have never seen those orange groves, that warm blue heaven, of which she so gladly spoke, I drew in from childhood a love to them; I have, besides, inherited my mother's suffering from cold;—my chest is not strong, ah!—the long, dark winters of Nordland; the residence on the sea-shore in a climate which is twice as cold as that to which I have been accustomed, the sea-mists and storms—ah! I cannot long withstand them. But, Susanna, you must promise me not to say one word of what I have confided to you, either to Harald or to Lexow!"

"But if they know it," said Susanna, "then you certainly need not go there. Certainly your bridegroom would for your sake seek out a milder country—"

"And not feel at home there, and die of longing for his dear Nordland! No, no, Susanna! I know his love for his native land, and know that this wintery nature which I dread so much, is precisely his life and his health. Alf is a Nordlander in heart and soul, and has, as it were, grown up with the district which his fathers inhabited, and whose advance and prosperity are his favourite scheme, the principal object of his activity. No, no! for my sake he shall not tear himself from his home, his noble efforts. Rather would I, if it must be so, find an early grave in his Nordland!"

Susanna now desired to know, and Alette communicated to her, various particulars of the country which was she thought so terrible, and we will now, with the young friends, east—

A GLANCE INTO NORDLAND.

All is cold and hard.

BLOM.

The spirit of God yet rests upon Nordland.

Z.

A great part of Norway has, as it were, its face turned away from life. 'The Old Night,' which the ancient world considered to be the original mother of all things, here held the giant child in her dark bosom, and bound it tight in swaddling bands, out of which it could not shape itself to joy and freedom. Neither Nordland nor Finmark see the sun for many months in the year, and the difficulties and dangers of the roads shut them out from intercourse with the southern world. The spirit of the North Pole rests oppressively over this region, and when in still August nights it breathes from hence over southern Norway, then withers the half-ripened harvests of the valleys and the plains, and the icy-grey face of hunger stares stiffly from the northern cliffs upon laborious but unhappy human multitudes. The sea breaks upon this coast against a palisaded fence of rocks and cliffs, around which swarm flocks of polar birds with cries and screams. Storms alternate with thick mists. The cliffs along this coast have extraordinary shapes; new ascend they upwards like towers, now resemble beasts, now present gigantic and terrific human profiles; and one can easily imagine how the popular belief sees in them monsters and giants turned to stone, and why their ancestors laid their Jotunhem in this desolate wilderness.

And a dark fragment of Paganism still lingers about this region even to this day. It is frozen fast into the people's imagination; it is turned to stone in the horrible shapes of nature, which once gave it life. The light of the Gospel endeavours in vain to dissipate the shadows of a thousand years; the Old Night holds them back. In vain the Holy Cross is raised upon all the cliffs; the belief in magic and magic arts lives still universally among the people. Witches sit, full of malice, in their caves, and blow up storms for the sea-wanderers, so that they must be unfortunate; and the ghost Stallo, a huge man, dressed in black, with a staff in his hand, wanders about in the wilderness, and challenges the solitary traveller to meet him in the contest for life and death.

The Laplander, the nomade of the North, roving free with his reindeer over undivided fields, appears like a romantic feature in this life; but it must be viewed from afar. Near, every trace of beauty vanishes in the fumes of brandy and the smoke of the Lapland hut.

Along the coast, between the cliffs, and the rocks, and the hundreds of islands which surround this strand, live a race of fishermen, who rivaling the sea-mew, skim the sea. Night and day, winter and summer, swarm their boats upon the waves; through the whistling tempest, through the foaming breakers, speed they terrified with their light sails, that from the depths of the sea they may catch the silvery shoals of herrings, the greatest wealth of the country. Many annually are swallowed up of the deep; but more struggle with the elements, and conquer. Thus amid the daily contest are many powers developed, many a hero-deed achieved,* and people harden themselves against danger and death, and also against the gentler beauty of life.

Yet it is in this severe region that the eider-duck has its home; it is upon these naked cliffs where its nest is built, from feathers plucked from its own breast, that silky soft down which is scattered abroad over the whole world, that people in the North and in the South may lie warm and soft. How many suffering limbs, how many aching heads, have not received comfort from the hard cliffs of Norway.

Upon the boundaries between Nordland and Finmark lies the city of Tromsøe, the new flourishing centre of these provinces. It was here that Alette was to spend her life; it was here that affection prepared for her a warm and peaceful nest, like the eider-duck drawing from its own breast, the means of preparing a soft couch in the bosom of the hard rock. And after Alette had described to Susanna what terrified her so much in her northern retreat, she concealed not from her that which reconciled her so forcibly to it; and Susanna comprehended this very well, as Alette read to her the following letter.

Tromsøe, May 28th.

Were you but here, my Alette! I miss you every moment whilst I am arranging my dwelling for your reception, and feel continually the necessity of asking, 'how do you wish it? what think you of it?' Ah, that you were here, my own beloved at this moment! and you would be charmed with this 'ice and bear land,' before which, I know, you secretly shudder. The country around here is not wild and dark; as, for example, at Helgoland. Leafy woods garland the craggy shores of our island, and around them play the waves of the sea in safe bays and creeks. Our well-built little city lies sweetly upon the southern side of the island, only divided from the mainland by a narrow arm of the sea. My house is situated in the street which runs along the large convenient harbour. At this moment above twenty vessels lie at anchor, and the various flags of the different nations wave in the evening wind. There are English, German, and especially Russian, which come to our coast, in order to take our fish, our eider-down, and so on, in exchange for their corn and furs. Besides these, the inhabitants of more southern regions bring hither a vast number of articles of luxury and fashion, which are eagerly purchased by the inhabitants of Kola, and the borders of the White Sea. Long life to Commerce! My soul expands at the sight of its life. What has not commerce done from the beginning of the world for the embellishment of life, for promoting the friendly intercourse of countries and people, for the refinement of manners! It has always given me the most heartfelt delight, that the wisest and most humane of the lawgivers of antiquity—Solon—was a merchant. 'By trade,' says one of his biographers, 'by wisdom and music was his soul fashioned. Long life to commerce! What lives not through it?' What is all fresh life, all movement, in reality, but trade, exchange, gift for gift! In love, in friendship, in the great life of the people, in the quiet family circle, everywhere where I see happiness and prosperity, see I also trade; nay what is the whole earth if not a colony from the mother country of heaven, and whose well-being and happy condition depend upon free export and import! The simile might be still further carried out, yet—thou good Giver above, pardon us that we have ventured upon it!

And you must not fancy, Alette, that the great interest for trade here excludes the nobler and more refined mental culture. Among the thousand people who inhabit the city, one can select out an interesting circle for social intercourse. We also have a theatre, and many pleasures of refined life. I was yesterday at a ball, where they danced through the whole night, till—daylight. The good music, the tasteful dresses and lovely dancing of the ladies; but above all, the tone of social life, the cordial cheerfulness, astonished several foreigners who were present, and caused them to inquire whether they were really here under the seventieth degree of latitude!

But the winter! Methinks I hear you say, 'in summer it may be well enough, but in the long, dark winter.' Well then, my Alette, winter—goes on right excellently when people love one another, when it is warm at home. Do you remember, Alette, last autumn, how we read together at Christiansand, in the Morning Paper, the following paragraph from the Tromsøe News of the fourteenth of October:—

"Already for several days successively have we had snow storms, and at this moment the snow-plough is working to form a road for the church-going people. The grave-like stillness of night and winter spread itself with tempest speed over meadow and valley, and only a few cows wander now like spectres over the snow-covered fields, to pluck their scanty fare from the twigs which are not yet snowed up."

That little winter-piece pleased me, but at the expression, 'the grave-like stillness of night and winter,' you bowed your loving dear face, with closed eyes, to my breast. O my Alette! thus shall you do in future, when dread of darkness and cold seizes upon you; and upon my breast, listening to the beating of my heart and to my love, shall you forget the dark pictures which stand without before your home. Close your eyes; slumber, beloved, whilst I watch over you, and then you will, with brightening eyes and blooming cheeks, look upon the night and winter, and feel that its power is not great. O truly can love, this Geiser of the soul, smelt ice and snow, wherever they may be on earth; truly, wherever its warm springs swell forth, a southern clime can bloom; yes, even at the North Pole itself.

Whilst I write this, I hear music, which makes upon me a cheerful and a melancholy impression at the same time. They are eight Russians, who sing one of their national songs, whilst in the quiet evening they sail down the Tromsøe-sound. They sing a quartet, and with the most complete purity and melody. They sing in a minor key, but yet not mournfully. They row in the deep shadow of the shore, and at every stroke of the oars the water shines around the boat, and drops, as of fire, fall from the oars. The phenomenon is not uncommon on the Atlantic; and know you not, my Alette, what it is which shines and burns so in the sea? It is love! At certain moments, the consciousness of the sea-insects rises to a high pitch of vividness, and millions of existences invisible to the naked human eye, then celebrate the bliss of their being. In such moments the sea kindles; then every little worm, inspired by love, lights up its tiny lamp. Yet only for a moment burns its flame, then all the quicker to be extinguished. But it dies without pain, dies joyfully. Rich nature! Good Creator!

My heart also burns. I look upon the illuminated element, which may be said to be full of enjoyment; I listen to the melody of the singers, full of joy and pain, and—I stretch forth my arms to you, Alette, my Alette!

"O!" exclaimed Susanna, "how this man loves you, and how you must love him! Certainly you must live long, that you may be happy together!"

"And if not long," said Alette, "yet for a short time; yes, a short time I hope to live and to make him happy, to thank him for all his love. And then—"

Alette stooped down and plucked a beautiful full-blown waterlily which grew in the river, by whose banks they stood; she shewed it to Susanna, whilst she continued with a pensive smile—

What more then than this ?
One moment she is
A friendly ray given,
From her home's shining heaven :
Then is she the flame,
High mid the temple's resounding acclaim—
One moment like this
Bears you up through death's sleep into him.
MURON.

THE RETURN.

To meet, to part ;
The welcome, the farewell ;
Behold the sun of life !—BJERREGAARD.

ALETTE set off to fulfil her promise to her uncle in Hallingdal; but in a few weeks she was again at Semb, in company with Harald and Alf Lexow, who had fetched her there. Yet this visit could only last for a short time, for then she had to set out with her bridegroom and her uncle's family on the journey to Trondhjem, where her marriage was to be celebrated at the house of a rich and cordial aunt, who had long been rejoicing in it, and had now for several months been baking and boiling in preparation for it. Harald also was to accompany them on this journey.

Alf Dexow was a man in his best years, with an open and generous manner. His face was small, marked by the small-pox, but otherwise handsome and full of life and benevolence. He was one of those men whose first glance attracts one and inspires confidence. Susanna felt great pleasure on seeing the affectionate, confidential understanding between the betrothed. She herself also was now happier, because Harald now left Alette much with her bridegroom, and sought as before for Susanna's society.

Alette was lively, agreeable, and well-educated; she liked best to hear herself talk. So in reality did Harald; and a better listener than Susanna could nobody have. Contentions occurred no longer; but there was a something in Susanna which attracted Harald to her more than the former passion for strife had ever done. He found Susanna's manners altered for the better; there was in them a something quieter, and, at the same time, gentler than before; whilst she was now always so kind, so attentive, and thought of every thing which could give pleasure to others. He saw, at the same time, with what silent solicitude her thoughts followed Mrs. Astrid, who now, at the approach of autumn—it was then the end of August—appeared to have relapsed into her dark and silent mood, out of which she had been aroused for some time. She now very rarely left her room, except at the hour of dinner.

Harald wished that his sister and brother-in-law elect should witness, before their departure from the dale, some of the popular assemblings for games and dancings, and had therefore prepared a rural festival, to which he invited them and Susanna, and to which we also will now betake ourselves.

THE HALLING.

This peculiar, wild, affecting music, is our national poetry.—HANS WERGELAND.

The violins ringing;
Not blither the singing
Of birds in the woods and the meadows.
Hurrah! hand round the foaming can—
Akal for the fair maid who dancing began!
Akal for the Jente mine! And Akal for the Jente thine! And Akal for the fathers and mothers on benches!
NORWEGIAN SONGS.

ONE lovely afternoon in the early part of September were seen two young festally-attired peasant maidens gaily talking, hastening along the footpath through the little wood in Heimdal towards a green open space surrounded by trees, and where might be seen a crowd of persons of both sexes assembled, all in peasant dresses. Here was the 'Leikeveld,' or dancing-ground; and as the young girls approached it, the one said to the other, "It is certain, Susanna, that the dress becomes you excellently! Your lovely bright hair shines more beautifully than ever, plaited with red ribbons. I fancy the costume does not suit me half so well."

"Because you, best Alette, look like a disguised princess, and I in mine like a regular peasant girl."

"Susanna, I perceive that you are a flatterer. Let us now see whether Alf and Harald will recognise the Tellemark 'jente' girls."

They did not long remain in uncertainty on this subject; for scarcely were they come to the dancing-ground, when two peasants in Halling-jackets, and broad girdles round their waists, came dancing towards them, whilst they sang with the others the following peasant-song—

And I am bachelor, and am not roving;
And I am son unto Gulleig Bø;
And wilt thou be to me faithful and loving,
Then I will choose thee, dear maiden, for me.

Susanna recognised Harald in the young peasant, who thus singing gaily, politely took her hand, and led her along the lively spring-dance, which was danced to singing. Alette danced with her Alf, who bore himself nobly as a Halling-youth.

Never had Susanna looked so well and so happy, but then neither had she ever enjoyed such pleasure. The lovely evening; the tones of the music; the life of the dance; Harald's looks, which expressed in a high degree his satisfaction; the delighted happy faces which she saw around her—never before had she thought life so pleasant. And nearly all seemed to feel so too, and all swung round from the joy of their hearts; silver buckles jingled, and shilling after shilling* danced down into the little gaily painted Hardanger-fiddle, which was played upon with transporting spirit by an old man, of an expressive and energetic exterior.

After the first dance, people rested for a moment. They ate apples, and drank Hardanger-ale out of silver cans. After this there rose an almost universal cry, which challenged Harald and another young man who was renowned for his agility and strength, to dance together a 'lós Halling.' They did not require much persuasion, and stepped into the middle of the circle, which enlarged itself, and closed around them.

* About a farthing.

The musician tuned his instrument, and with his head bowed upon his breast, began to play with an expression and a life that might be called inspired. It was one of the wild Maliseknud's most genial compositions. Was it imagined with the army, in the bivouac under the free nightly heaven, or in—'slavery,' amid evil-doers? Nobody knows; but in both situations has it charmed forth tones, like his own restless life, which never will pass from the memory of the people. Now took the Hardanger fiddle for the first time its right sound.

Universal applause followed the dancing of the young men; but the highest interest was excited by Harald, who, in the dance, awoke actual astonishment.

Perhaps there is no dance which expresses more than the Halling the temper of the people who originated it, which better reflects the life and character of the inhabitants of the North.

It begins, as it were, upon the ground, amid jogging little hops, accompanied by movements of the arms, in which, as it were, a great strength plays negligently. It is somewhat bear-like, indolent, clumsy, half-dreaming. But it wakes, it becomes earnest. Then the dancers rise up and dance, and display themselves in expressions of power, in which strength and dexterity seem to divert themselves by playing with indolence and clumsiness, and to overcome them. The same person who just before seemed fettered to the earth, springs aloft, and throws himself around in the air as though he had wings. Then, after many break-neck movements and evolutions, before which the unaccustomed spectator grows dizzy, the dance suddenly assumes again its first quiet, careless, somewhat heavy character, and closes as it began, sunk upon the earth.

Loud shouts of applause, bestowed especially upon Harald, resounded on all sides as the dance ceased. And now they all set themselves in motion for a great Halling-polska, and every 'Gut' chose himself a 'Jente.' Harald had scarcely refreshed and strengthened himself with a can of ale before he again hastened up to Susanna, and engaged her for the Halling-polska. She had danced it several times in her own country, and joyfully accepted Harald's invitation.

This dance, too, is deeply characteristic. It paints the Northern inhabitant's highest joy in life; it is the Berserker-gladness in the dance. Supported upon the arm of the woman, the man throws himself high in the air; then he catches her in his arms, and swings round with her in wild circles; then they separate; then they unite again, and whirl again round, as it were, with superabundance of life and delight. The measure is determined, bold, and full of life. It is a dance-intoxication, in which people for the moment release themselves from every care, every burden and oppression of existence.

Thus felt also at this time Harald and Susanna. Young, strong, agile, they swung themselves around with certainty and ease, which seemed to make the dance a sport without any effort; and with eyes steadfastly riveted on each other, they had no sense of giddiness. They whirled round, as it were, in a magic circle, to the strange, magical music. The understrings sounded strong and strange. The peculiar enchanted power which lies in the clear depths of the water, in the mysterious recesses of the mountains, in the shades of dark caves, which the skalds have celebrated under the names of mermaids, mountain-kings, and wood-women, and which drag down the heart so forcibly into unknown, wondrous deeps—this dark song of Nature is heard in the understrings* of the Halling's playful, but yet at the same time, melancholy tones. It deeply seized upon Susanna's soul, and Harald also seemed to experience this enchantment. Leaving the wilder movements of the dance, they moved around ever quieter, arm in arm.

"O, so through life!" whispered Harald's lips, almost involuntarily, as he looked deep into Susanna's beaming, tearful eyes; and, "O, so through life!" was answered in Susanna's heart, but her lips remained closed. At this moment she was seized by a violent trembling, which obliged her to come from dancing, and to sit down, whilst the whole world seemed going round with her. It was not until she had drunk a glass of water, which Harald offered to her, that she was able to reply to his heartfelt and anxious inquiries after her health. Susanna attributed it to the violent dancing, but declared that she felt herself again quite well. At that moment Susanna's eyes encountered those of Alette. She sat at a little distance from them, and observed Harald and Susanna with a grave, and, as it seemed to Susanna, a displeased look. Susanna felt stung at the heart; and when Alette came to her and asked rather coldly, how she found herself, she answered also coldly and shortly.

The sun was going down, and the evening began to be cool. The company was, therefore, invited by Harald to a commodious hut, decorated with foliage and flowers. At Harald's desire, a young girl played now upon the 'langleg,'† and sung thereto with a clear, lively voice the Hallingdal song, 'Gjetter-livet (Shepherd-life), which so naively describes the days of a shepherd-girl in the solitary dales with the flocks, which she pastures and tends during the summer, without care, and joyous of mood, although almost separated from her kind;—at most, for Havor, the goat-herd, blows his horn on the rocks in the neighbourhood, and ere long sits beside her on the crags—

The boy with his jew's-harp charms the kine,
And plays upon the flute so fine,
And I sing this song of mine.

So approaches the evening, and 'all my darlings,' with 'song and love,' are called by their names:

Come Laikeros, Gullstjerna fine;
Come Dokkerose, darling mine;
Come Hjelka, Qirtelin!

And cows and sheep come to the well-known

* The understrings of the so-called Hardanger-fiddle are four metal strings, which lie under the sounding-board. They are tuned in unison with the upper catgut strings, whereby, as well as by the peculiar form of the violin itself, this gives forth a singular strong, almost melancholy sound.

† The langoleik or langleg is a four-stringed instrument, probably of the same form as the psaltery. The peasant-girls in mountain-districts play gladly upon it, and often, with great dexterity. In the so-called 'Elsker's Song,' from Vestfold, it is said—

Ho sunn so gillt kan po Langoleik spile, Svanang dan vana, aka no vana mi!

voice, and assemble at the Säter-hut, lowing and bleating joyfully. Now begins the milking; the goatherd maiden sings—

When I have milked in these pails of mine,
I lay me down, and sleep divine,
Till day upon the cliffs doth shine.

After the song, the dancing began again with new spirit. An iron hook was driven into the beam in the middle of the roof, and the dancer who, during the whirl of the Halling-polska, succeeded in striking it with his heel, so that it was bent, obtained the prize for dancing this evening. Observing the break-neck efforts of the competitors, Susanna seated herself upon a bench. Several large, leafy branches, which were reared between the benches and window, prevented her from seeing two persons who stood in quiet conversation, but she remained sitting, as if enchanted, as she heard the voice of Alette, saying—

"Susanna is, to be sure, an excellent and good girl, and I really like her; but yet, Harald, it would distress me if you seriously were attached to her."

"And why?" asked Harald.

"Because I think that she would not be suitable for your wife. She has an unreasonable and violent temper, and—"

"But that may be changed, Alette. She has already changed very much. Of her violent temper I have no fear—that I should soon remove!"

"Greater wizards than you, my brother, have erred in such a belief. At the same time, she is much too uneducated, too ignorant to be a suitable companion for you through life. And neither would she be suitable for the social circles into which you must sometime come. Best Harald! let me beseech you, do not be over-hasty. You have so long thought of taking a journey into foreign countries to improve your knowledge of agriculture. Carry out this plan now, travel and look about you in the world before you fetter yourself for life!"

"I fancy you are right, Alette; and I shall follow your advice, but—"

"Besides," said Alette, interrupting him in her zeal, "it is time enough for you to think of marrying. You are still young; have time to look about you, and choose. You can easily, if you will, in every point of view, form a good connexion. Susanna is poor, and you yourself have not wealth enough entirely to disregard—"

Susanna would hear no more; and, in truth, she had heard enough. Wounded pride and sickness of heart drove the blood to her head and chest, till she felt ready to be choked. She rose hastily, and after she had begged an acquaintance to tell Alette and Harald that a mere headache compelled her to leave the dance, she hurried by the woodpath back to Semb.

The evening was beautiful, but Susanna was blind to all its splendours; she remarked not the twinkling of the bright stars, not how they mirrored themselves in the ladies-mantle, which stood full of pure crystal water; she heard not the rushing of the river, nor the song of the pine-thrush; for never before, in her breast, had Barbra and Sanna contended more violently.

"They despise me!" cried the former; "they cast me off, they trample me under their feet. They think me not worthy to be near them; the haughty, heartless people! But have they indeed a right to hold themselves so much above me, because I am not so fine, so learned, as they; because I am—poor!! No, that have they not, for I can earn my own bread, and go my own way through the world as well as any of them. And if they will be proud, then I can be ten times prouder. I need not to humble myself before them! One is just as good as another!"

"Ah!" now began Sanna, and painful tears began to flow down her cheeks, "one is not just as good as another, and education and training make a great difference between people. It is not pleasant for a man to blush for the ignorance of his wife; neither can one expect that anybody would teach a person of my age; nor can they look into my heart and see how willingly I would learn, and—end Harald, whom I thought wished me well, whom I loved so much, whom I would willingly serve with my whole heart and life—how coldly he spoke of me, who just before so warmly—Harald, why shouldst thou fool my heart so, if thou carest so little for what it feels, what it suffers!"

"But," and here again began Barbra, "thou thinkest merely on thyself; thou art an egotist, like all thy sex. And he seems to be so sure of me! He seems not to ask whether I will; no—only whether he graciously should. Let him try! let him make the attempt! and he shall see that he has deceived himself, the proud gentleman! He shall see that a poor girl, without connexions, without friends, solitary in the wide world, can yet refuse him who thinks that he condescends so to her. Be easy, Miss Alette! the poor despised Susanna is too proud to thrust herself into a haughty family; because, in truth, she feels herself too good for that."

But Susanna was very much excited, and very unhappy, as she said this. She had now reached Semb. Lights streamed from the bedroom of the Colonel's widow. Susanna looked up to the window, and stood in mute astonishment; for at the window stood the Colonel's widow, but no longer the gloomy, sorrowful lady. With her hands pressed upon her breast, she looked up to the clear stars with an expression of glowing gratitude. There was, however, something wild and overstrained in her appearance, which made Susanna, who was possessed by astonishment and strange feelings, determine to go to her immediately.

On Susanna's entrance into the room Mrs. Astrid turned hastily to her. She held a letter clasped to her breast, and said, with restless delight and a kind of vehemence—

"To Bergen, to Bergen! Susanna, I set off to-morrow morning to Bergen. Get all in readiness for my journey as soon as you can."

Susanna was confounded. "To Bergen!" stammered she inquiringly; "and the road thither is so difficult, so dangerous, at this time—"

"And if death threatened me upon it, I should yet travel!" said Mrs. Astrid, with impatient energy. "But I desire that no one accompany me. You can stay here at home."

"Lord God!" said Susanna, painfully exclaiming.

ted, "I spoke not for myself. Could I die to save my lady from any danger, any sorrow, heaven knows that I would do it with joy! Let me go with you to Bergen."

"I have been very unhappy, Susanna!" resumed Mrs. Astrid, without remarking her agitated state of mind; "life has been a burthen to me. I have doubted the justice of Providence; doubted whether our destinies were guided by a fatherly hand; but now—now I see—now all may be very different.—But go, Susanna, I must compose myself; and you also seem to need rest. Go, my child."

"Only one prayer," said Susanna—"I may go with you to-morrow morning! Ah! refuse me not, for I shall still go with my lady."

"Well, well," said Mrs. Astrid, almost joyfully, "then it would be no use my saying no."

Susanna seized and kissed her hand, and was ready to weep, from all the pain and love which filled her soul; but her lady withdrew her hand, and again desired her kindly but commandingly to go.

When she was alone, she turned her eyes upon the letter which she held in her hands.

Upon the envelope of the letter stood these words, written by an unsteady hand.

"To my wife, after my death."

The letter was as follows:—

"I feel that a great change is about to take place in me. Probably I may die, or become insane. In the first place, I will thank my wife for her angel-patience with me during my life, and tell her, that it is owing to her conduct that I have at this moment my faith left in virtue and a just Providence. I will now reward her in the only way which is possible to me. Know, then, my wife, that the boy, for whom thou hast loved and deplored—is not dead! Let it also lessen the abhorrence of my deed, when I assure thee, that it was solicitude for your well-being which led me in part to it. I was totally ruined—and could not endure the thoughts of seeing thee destitute! For this reason I sent away the boy, and gave it out that he was dead. He has suffered no want, he has——" Here followed several illegible lines, after which might be read: "I am confused, and cannot say that which I would. Speak with the former Sergeant Ronn, now in the Customs at Bergen; he will——"

Here the letter broke off. It was without date, the paper old and yellow. But Mrs. Astrid kissed it with tears of joy and gratitude, whilst she whispered, "O what a recompense! What light! Wonderful, merciful, good Providence!"

AASGAARDSREJA.

Wildly the misty troop the tempest rideth,
The ghost of heroes seek the Northern fjarde;
There goes the iron-boat; the serpent glideth,
The ravens flutter round the lofty board.

Dark, silent shades the high mast are surrounding;
Lightnings are flashing from the weapons bright;
Rise up from ocean-cliffs their horns resounding,
To-night ride forth the Daughters of the fight!

VELHAVEN.

SUSANNA went into her quiet room, but within her it was not quiet—a hard fight was fought there. It was necessary now to abandon all her own wishes and hopes, for Susanna found now that she almost unconsciously to herself, had cherished such, as regarded her mistress and Harald. She had hoped that through her love she might win his, though her attentions might become necessary to them; and now she saw how infinitely little she was to them. She blushed at her own self-delusion, and reproached herself with having been untrue to her little Hulda; in having attached herself so deeply to strange people, and allowed her favourite scheme to be dimmed by new impressions and views. Susanna punished herself severely for it; calling herself foolish and weak; and determined to fly from Harald, and from the place where he dwelt.

"When I have attended my lady over the dangerous mountains,"—thus thought Susanna,— "when I see her in safety and happy, then I will leave her—and him, and this country forever. Poor came I hither, poorer shall I go away from it, for I shall leave a part of my heart behind in a foreign land. But a pure conscience shall I take with me to my home. They could not love me; but when I am gone, they will perhaps think with esteem, perhaps with friendship, upon Susanna!"

The silent stars mirrored themselves in Susanna's tears, which flowed abundantly during this quiet discourse with herself, and the tears and the stars calmed her mind, and she felt herself strengthened by the resolution which she had taken.

After this she entirely directed her thoughts upon that which would be necessary for the journey, and passed the remainder of the night partly in these preparations, and partly in settling the domestic affairs in order, that she might with a good conscience leave the house.

In the mean time the journey was not so quickly undertaken as was at first intended, for a safe guide and good safe horses for the journey over the mountains had to be obtained, and this occupied the greater part of the next day. Before the morning of the following day, it was not possible that they could set out. Harald, greatly amazed at this sudden determination, endeavoured to delay the journey, by representations of its difficulties and even dangers during this season, for 'from the beginning of September, they may every day look for falls of snow and stormy tempests in this mountain-region.' But Mrs. Astrid, without further explaining herself, adhered to her resolution, and Harald promised to make all preparations for the journey, so that it might be performed as speedily and as safely as possible. They had the choice between four equally difficult mountain roads which led from this part of Hallingdal towards the diocese of Bergen; and of these, the shortest was that which went through Hardanger. Mrs. Astrid determined upon this. This, however, would require at least two-days-and-a-half. Harald, who knew the way, and said that in case of need he could serve as guide, made preparations to attend the lady on her adventurous journey. Alette, in the mean time, with her Alf, should in company with her uncle in Hallingdal and his family, set off on the journey to Troshjem, where Harald promised afterwards to meet them for Alette's marriage.

Harald wished to inquire from Susanna the cause of this extraordinary journey; but Susanna at this time was not much to be spoken with, she had so much to attend to both within and out of the house, and she was always surrounded by Larina and Karina, and Petro. And Susanna was glad that her household affairs gave her a good excuse for absenting herself from the company, and even from avoiding intercourse with the world. A certain bitterness both towards him and Alette was rooted into her heart.

Among many noble and valuable qualities, man has that of being able to condemn and sentence himself. And if we are justly displeased with any one, if we are wounded and repelled by word or deed, we should depend upon this quality, and permit it to operate reconcilingly upon our feelings. For while we are embittered by his offence, perhaps he himself may have wept in silence over it, waked in the silent hours of the night unpitifully to punish himself in the severe sanctuary of his conscience; and the nobler the human being, all the greater is his pang, even over failings which before the judgment-seat of the world are very small or no faults at all; nay, he will not at all forgive himself if he cannot make atonement for his faults; and the hope of so doing is, in such painful hours, his only comfort.

Thus even would every bitter feeling have vanished out of Susanna's soul, could she have seen how deeply dissatisfied was Harald at this time with himself,—how warmly he upbraided himself for the words which, during the yesterday's dawn, had passed his lips, without there being any actual seriousness in them; and how displeased he was by the promise which he had given to Alette, and with the resolve he had made, in consequence of her anxieties and advice.

This dissatisfaction was the more increased, when he saw by Susanna's swollen eyelids that she had wept much, and remarked in her manner a certain uneasiness and depression which was so entirely the reverse of her usually fresh and lively deportment. Uneasy and full of foreboding, he questioned himself as to the cause, whilst he followed her with inquiring looks.

At dinner, Mrs. Astrid did not join them at the table, and the others ate there silent and out of spirits, with the exception of Lexow, who in vain endeavoured to enliven the rest with his good-humour.

In the afternoon, whilst they were taking coffee, Susanna slipped silently away to carry to a sick peasant-woman, before her journey, some medicines, together with some children's clothes. Harald, who had stood for some time observing the barometer, and who seemed to suspect her intention, turned round to her hastily as she went out at the door, and said to her,

"You cannot think of going out now! It is not advisable. In a few minutes we shall probably have a severe storm."

"I am not afraid of it," replied Susanna, going.

"But you do not know our storms!" answered Harald. "Lexow, come here! See here."—and Harald pointed to the barometer, whilst he said half aloud, "the quicksilver has fallen two degrees in half an hour; now it sinks again; now it stands near the earthquake point! we shall have in a moment a true 'Berg-rose,' here."

* Rosen or Ryne (grant) is the name given in Norway to the strong whirlwinds, which are heard howling among the Lexow shook his head mournfully, and said, "It is a bad look out for the morrow's journey! But I presume that your storms here are mere child's play, compared with those that we have in certain districts of Nordland!" And Alf went to his Alette, who looked inquiringly and uneasily at him.

Harald hastened after Susanna and found her at the door, just about going out with a bundle under her arm. He placed himself in the way before her, and said to her gravely—

"You cannot go! I assure you that danger is at hand."

"What danger?" asked Susanna, gloomily, and with an obstinate determination to act in opposition to Harald.

"Aasgaardstreja," answered Harald, smiling, "and it is nothing to joke about. Soon enough will it come riding here and may take you with it, if you do not stop at home. No! You must not go now!" And he seized her hand in order to lead her into the house.

Susanna, who fancied that he was joking in his customary manner, and who was not at all in a joking humour, released her hand and said, crimsoning and proudly—

"I shall go, sir! I shall go, because I will do so; and you have no right to prevent me."

Harald looked at her confounded, but said afterwards, in a tone which much resembled Susanna's—

"If I cannot prevent your going, neither can you prevent my following you!"

"I would rather go alone!" said Susanna, in a tone of defiance, and went.

"I even so!" said Harald, in the same tone, and followed her, yet ever at the distance of from fifteen to twenty paces. As he passed the kitchen door, he went in and said to those whom he found there, "Look to the fire, and extinguish it at the first gale of wind; we shall have a tempest."

At the same moment, Alfiero sprang towards Susanna, howling and leaping up with his paws upon her shoulder, as if he would prevent her from going forward on her way. But repulsed by her, he sprang anxiously sneaking into his kennel, as if seeking there for shelter from danger.

The weather, however, was beautiful; the wind still; the heaven bright; and nothing seemed to foretell the approaching tempest, excepting the smoke, which, as it ascended from the cottages in the dale, was immediately depressed, and, whirling round, sunk to the earth.

Susanna went rapidly on her way; hearing all the time Harald's footsteps a little behind her, and yet not venturing to turn round to look at him. As by chance she cast her eyes to heaven, she perceived a little white cloud, which took the phantastical shape of a dragon, and which, with the speed of an arrow, came hastening over the valley. Immediately afterwards was heard a loud noise, which turned Susanna's gaze to the heights, where she saw, as it were, a pillar of smoke whirlingly ascending. At the same moment Harald was at her side, and said to her seriously and hastily, "To the ground! throw yourself down on the ground instantly!"

rocks, and which in certain mountain-districts are so dangerous.

Susanna would have protested; but in the same moment was seized by Harald, lifted from the earth, and in the next moment found herself lying with her face upon the ground. She felt a violent gust of wind; heard near to her a report like that of a pistol-shot, and then a loud cracking and rattling, which was followed by a roar resembling the rolling of successive peals of thunder; and all was again still.

Quite confounded by what had taken place, Susanna raised her head, and looked around her as she slowly raised herself. Over all reigned a dead stillness; not a blade of grass moved. But just near to her, two trees had been torn up, and stones had been loosened from the crags and rolled into the dale. Susanna looked around for Harald with uneasiness, but he was nowhere to be found, and she thought upon the story of Aagaardseja. In her distress she called upon his name, and had great joy in hearing his voice reply to her.

She perceived him at a little distance from her, slowly raising himself near an angular wall of rock. He was pale, and seemed to feel pain. Busied about Susanna's safety, Harald had assumed too late the humble posture into which he had compelled Susanna, and had been caught by the whirlwind, and slung violently against the corner of a rock, whereby he had sustained a severe blow upon the left collar-bone and shoulder. He, however, assured Susanna, who was now anxious about him, that it was of no consequence; it would soon be better, he added jestingly.

"But was I not right in saying that Aagaardseja is not to be played with? And we have not yet done with it. In a few moments it will be upon us again; and as soon as we hear it roaring and whistling in the mountains, it is best that we humble ourselves. It may otherwise fare ill with us."

Scarcely had Harald uttered these words before the signals were heard from the mountains, and the tempest arose with the same violence as before, and passed over as quickly too. In a few moments all was again still.

"We have now again a few moments' breathing time," said Harald, rising up, and looking inquiringly around him; "but the best is, that we now endeavour to find a shelter over head, so that we may be defended from the shower of stones. There shoots out a wall of rock. Thither will we hasten before the tempest comes again. If I am not mistaken, other wanderers have thought as we."

And, in truth, two persons had before them sought shelter under the rocky projection, and Harald soon recognised them. The elder of them was the guide whom Harald had sent for to conduct them over the mountain-road—a handsome old man in the Halling costume; the younger was his grandson, a brisk youth of sixteen, who was to accompany him. On their way to Semb, they had been overtaken by the tempest.

It was perhaps welcome to both Harald and Susanna, that in this moment of mutual constraint, they were prevented by the presence of these persons from being alone together. From their place of refuge they had an extensive prospect over the dale, and their attention was directed to that which had occurred there.

They saw that the cottages had ceased to smoke; a sign that the people, as is customary in such tempests, had universally extinguished their fires. They saw several horses, which had been out to graze, standing immovably, with their heads turned in the direction from whence the tempest came; in this manner they divided the wind shocks, and could withstand its force. A little farther off a singular atmospheric scene presented itself. They saw thick masses of clouds from different sides rush across the sky, and stormily tumult backwards and forwards. The singularly-formed masses drew up against each other, and had a regular battle in the air. It continued some time; but at length the columns which had been driven on by the weaker wind withdrew, the conquerors advanced tempestuously onwards, and spread themselves over the whole vault of heaven, which now dark and heavy as lead, sunk down to the earth. In the mean time the tempest began somewhat to abate, and after about three hours' continuance, had sufficiently subsided to allow the company under the rock-roof to betake themselves to their homeward way. Susanna longed impatiently to be at home, as well on account of her mistress as of Harald, whose confusion evidently caused him much pain, although he endeavoured to conceal it under a cheerful and talkative manner.

Not without danger, but without any farther injury they arrived at Semb, where every one, in the mean time, had been in the greatest uneasiness on their account. The wind entirely abated towards evening. Harald's shoulder was fomented; he soon declared that he had lost all pain; and although every one urgently discouraged him, yet he resolutely adhered to his determination of accompanying Mrs. Astrid across the mountains.

Poor Susanna was so full of remorse for her wilfulness, which had occasioned Harald's accident, so grateful for his care for her, that every bitter feeling as well towards him as to Alette, had vanished from her heart. She felt now only a deep, almost painful necessity of showing her devotion to them; and to give them some pleasure, she would gladly have given her right hand for that purpose.

THE MOUNTAIN JOURNEY.

Forwards! forwards! fly swift as a hind,
See how it laughs behind! Fausmunkind!
HERN WERGELAND.

The party which next morning set out from Heindal and ascended Usterfjell, did not look in the least gay. They moved along all in a thick mist, which hung over the valley, enveloped all the heights, and concealed every prospect around them. Before them rode the guide, the old trusty Halling peasant, whose strong and tall figure gave an impression of security to those who followed after. Then came Mrs. Astrid; then Susanna; then Harald, who carried his arm in a sling. The train was closed by the young boy, and a peasant, who led two horses with the luggage upon hurdles.

After they had ascended for a considerable time the air became clearer, and the travellers had mounted above the regions of mist; soon saw they the blue colour of the heavens, and the sun greeted them with his beams, and lighted up the wild, singular region which now began to surround them. This scene operated upon Susanna's young open mind with wonderful power. She felt herself altogether freer and lighter of mood, and, glancing around with bright eyes, she thought that she had left behind her all strife and all pain, and now ascended upwards to a future of light and tranquillity. Now her mistress would indeed be happy; and Susanna would, with liberated heart, and bound no longer by selfish feelings, easily follow the calls of duty and the will of Providence. So felt, so thought she.

The road was untracked, often steep and terrific, but the horses stepped safely over it, and thus in a little time they came to a Säter-hut, which lay upon the shore of Ustevand, one of the inland seas which lie at the foot of Hallingskarve. This Säter lies above the boundary of the birch-tree vegetation, and its environs have the strong features peculiar to the rocky character; but its grass-plots, perpetually watered from the snowy mountains, were yet of a beautiful green, and many-coloured herds of cattle swarmed upon them. Like dazzling silver ribbons shimmered the brooks between the green declivities and the darker cliffs. The sun now shone bright, and they mutually congratulated each other on the cheering prospect of a happy journey. At this Säter the company rested for an hour, and made a hasty breakfast of the simple viands which are peculiar to this region. Before each guest was placed a bowl of 'Lefsetriangel,' on which was laid a cake of rye-meal, about the size of a plate. Upon the table stood large four-cornered pieces of butter, and a dish of excellent mountain-fish. Cans of Hardanger ale were not wanting; and a young girl, with light plaited hair, light-yellow leather jacket, black thickly plaited petticoat, and a red kerchief tied round her neck, with a face as pretty and innocent as ever an idyl bestowed upon its shepherdess, waited upon the guests, and entertained them with her simple, good-humoured talk.

After breakfast the journey was continued. Upon the heights of Ustefjell they saw two vast mountain stretches, whose wavy backs reared themselves into the regions of perpetual snow. They were Hallingskarv and Halling-Jokul.

Slowly advanced the caravan up the Barfjell. By degrees all trees disappeared; the ground was naked, or only covered by low black bushes; between, lay patches of snow-lichen, which increased in extent the higher they ascended. The prospect around had in it something indescribably cold and terrific. But Susanna felt herself in a peculiar manner enlivened by this wild, and to her new spectacle. To this the old Halling peasant contributed, who, whilst they travelled through this desolate mountain track, related to the party various particulars of the 'subterranean folk' who dwell there, and whom he described as a spectre herd, with little, ugly, pale, or bluish human shapes, dotted in grey, and with black head-gear. "They often draw," said he, "people down into their subterranean dwellings, and there murder them; and if anybody escape living out of their power, they remain from that time through the whole of their lives, sefected and insane, and have no more pleasure on the earth. Certain people they persecute; but to others they afford protection, and bring to them wealth and good fortune." The Halling peasant was himself perfectly convinced of the actual existence of these beings; he had himself seen in a mountain district a man who hastily sunk into the earth and vanished!

One of his friends had once seen in a wood a whole farm, with house, people, and cattle; but when he reached the place, all these had immediately vanished.

Harald declared that here the imagination had played its pranks well; but the old man endeavoured to strengthen the affair by relating the following piece out of Hans Lanridsen's "Book of the Soul."

"The devil has many companions; such as Elle-women, Elle-men, dwarfs, imps, night-ravens, hob-goblins with red-hot fire-tongs, Var-wolves, giants, spectres, which appear to people when they are about to die."

And as Harald smilingly expressed some doubt on the subject, the old man said warmly—

"Why, does it not stand written in the Bible that all knees, as well those that are in heaven and on the earth, and under the earth, shall bow at the name of the Lord? And who, indeed, can they be under the earth, if not the subterranean? And do you take care," continued he gaily, with an arch look at Susanna, "take care when 'Thusmørkel' (twilight) comes, for then is the time they are about; and they have a particular fancy for young girls, and drag them gladly down to their dwellings. Take care! for if they get you once down into their church—for they have churches too, deep under ground—you will never see the sun and God's clear heaven again as long as ever you live; and it would not be pleasant, that you may believe, to dwell with Thuserne."

Susanna shuddered involuntarily at this jest. She cast a glance upon the wild rock-shapes around her, which the Halling-peasant assured her were all spectres, giants, and giantesses, turned into stone. Harald remarked the impression which all this made on Susanna; but he, who had so often amused himself by exciting her imagination, became now altogether rectifying reason, and let his light shine for Susanna on the darkness of superstition.

Higher yet ascended the travellers, and more desolate became the country. The whole of this mountain region is scattered over with larger and smaller blocks of stone; and these have assisted people as waymarks through this country, when, without these, people must infallibly lose themselves. Stones have, therefore, been piled upon the large blocks in the direction which the road takes; and if a stone fall down the passer-by considers it as a sacred duty to replace it. "Comfortable waymarks," as Professor Hantzen, in his interesting "Mountain Journey," calls these watchers; "for," continues he, "they are upon this journey the only traces of man; and if only once one has failed to see one such stone of indication, the next which one discovers expels the awakened anxiety by the assurance, 'thou art still upon the right way.'"

In dark or foggy weather, however, those friendly watchers are almost useless, and the journey is then in the highest degree dangerous. People become so easily bewildered and frozen in this desert, or they are overwhelmed by the falls of snow. They who perish in this manner are called after death "Drange," and are supposed to haunt the gloomy mountain passes. The guide pointed out a place near the road where had been found the corpses of two trades-people, who one autumn had been surprised by a snowstorm upon the mountains and lost their lives. He related this with great indifference, for every year people perish in the mountain regions, and this kind of death is not considered worse than any other. But dreadful thoughts began to rise in Susanna's mind. There was, however, no reason to anticipate misfortune, for the weather was lovely, and the journey, although difficult, went on safely and well. It was continued uninterruptedly till evening. As no Säter could be reached before dark, they were to pass the night in a place called "Monsbuheja," because in its neighbourhood there was grass for the horses. Here our travellers happily arrived shortly before sunset. They found here a cave, half formed by nature, and half by the hands of men, which last had rolled large stones around its entrance. Its walls were covered with moss, and decorated with horns of the reindeer fastened into the crevices of the rock. Soon had Susanna formed here, out of carpet-bags, cloaks, and shawls, a comfortable couch for her wearied lady, who thanked her for it with such a friendly glance as Susanna had never before seen in her eyes.

Harald, in the mean time, with the servants had cared for the horses, and collected fuel for the night. A few hundred paces from the cave, a river flowed between ice-covered banks; on the edge of this river, and on the shores of the snow-brook they found roots of decayed junipers, rock-willows, and moor-weed, which they collected together to a place outside the cave, where they kindled the nocturnal watch-fire.

During this, Susanna ascended a little height near the cave, and saw the sun go down behind Halling-Jokul. Like a red globe of fire, it now stood upon the edge of the immeasurable snow-mountains, and threw splendid many-coloured rays of purple, yellow and blue, upon the clouds of heaven, as well as upon the snow-plains which lay below. It was a magnificent sight.

"Good God! how great, how glorious!" exclaimed Susanna, involuntarily, whilst with her hands pressed upon her breast, she bowed herself as though in adoration before the descending ruler of the day.

"Yes, great and glorious!" answered a gentle echo near; Susanna looked around, and saw Harald standing beside her. There stood they, the two alone, lighted by the descending sun, with the same feelings, the same thoughts, ardent and adoring in the waste, dead solitude. Susanna could not resist the feelings of deep and solemn emotion which filled her heart. She extended her hand to Harald, and her tearful look seemed to say, "Peace! Peace!" Susanna felt this a leave-taking, but a leave-taking in love. In that moment she could have clasped the whole world to her breast. She felt herself raised above all contention, all spite, all littleness. This great spectacle had awakened something great within her, and in her countenance Susanna beamed in beautiful and mild illumination.

Harald, on the contrary, seemed to think of no leave-taking; for he held Susanna's hand fast in his, and was about to speak; but she hastily withdrew it, and turning herself from him, said—

"We must now think about supper!"

The fire outside the cave blazed up cheerfully, and in the eastern heaven uprose the moon amid rose-coloured clouds.

Soon was Susanna, lively and cheerful, busied by the fire. From cakes of bouillon and prepared groats which she had brought with her, she prepared an excellent soup, in which pieces of veal were warmed. Whilst this boiled, she distributed bread, cheese, and brandy to the men who accompanied them, and cared with particular kindness for the old guide. Harald allowed her to do all this, without assisting her in the least. He sat upon a stone, at a little distance, supported on his gun, and observed her good and cheerful countenance lighted up by the fire, her lively movements and her dexterity in all which she undertook. He thought upon her warm heart, her ingenuous mind, her activity; he thought upon the evenings of the former winter, or when he read aloud, related stories to her, and how she listened and felt the while. All at once it seemed to him that the ideal of a happy life, which for so many years had floated before him, now was just near to him. It stood there, beside the flames of the nocturnal fire, and was lighted up by them. Alette's warnings flitted from before him like the thence-hastening night-mists, without shape or reality. He saw himself the possessor of an estate which he would enoble as Oberlin has done the sunken, rocky valley; saw himself surrounded by dependents and neighbours, to whose happiness he really contributed; he saw himself in his home—he contemplated it in the most trying light—the long winter evenings; but it dimmed not thereby. For he saw himself as before, on the winter evenings with Susanna; but yet not as before, for he now sat nearer to her and she was his wife, and he read aloud to her, and enjoyed her lively, warm sympathy; but he rested at intervals his eyes upon her and upon the child, which lay in the cradle at her feet, and Susanna glanced at him as she had just now done upon the rock in the evening sun. The flames which now danced over the snow were the flames of his own hearth, and it was his wife who, happy and hospitable, was busied about them, diffusing comfort and joy around her.

"What is the use of a finer education?" thought he, "it cannot create a heart, a soul, and qualities like this girl's!" He could not turn his eyes from Susanna; every moment she seemed more beautiful to him. The sweet enchantment of love had come over him.

In the mean time the evening meal was ready, and Harald was called to it. What wonder if he, after a fatiguing day's journey, and after the observations which he had just been making, found Susanna's meal beyond all description excellent and savoury!! He missed only Susanna's presence during it, for Susanna was within the cave, and upon her knees before Mrs. Astrid, holding in her hand a bowl of soup, and counting with quiet delight every spoonful which her lady with evident satisfaction conveyed to her lips. "That was the best soup that I ever tasted!" said she when the bowl was emptied; "it is true, Susanna, that you are very clever!" It was the first time that Mrs. Astrid had paid attention to her eating, and the first praise which Susanna had received from her mouth—and no soup, not even nectar, can taste so charming, so animating as the first word of praise from beloved lips!

When Susanna went out of the cave, she was welcomed by Harald's looks; and they spoke a language almost irresistibly enchanting for a heart to which affection was so needful as was Susanna's; and in her excited and grateful spirit she thought that she could be content for all eternity ty to be up in these mountains, and wait upon and prepare soup for those beloved beings who here seemed first to have opened their hearts to her.

They now made preparations for the night, which promised to be clear, but cold. The peasants laid themselves around the fire. Mrs. Astrid, anxious on account of Harald's shoulder, prayed him to come into the cave, where it was sheltered from the keen air; but Harald preferred to keep watch on the outside, and sat before the fire wrapped in his cloak. Susanna laid herself softly down at her mistress's feet, which she hoped by this means to keep warm. Strange shapes flitted before her inward sight whilst her eyelids were closed. Shapes of snow and ice came near to her, and seemed to wish to surround her—but suddenly vanished, and were melted before the warm looks of love, and the sun shone forth in glory; and happy, sweet feelings blossomed forth in her soul. Amid such she slept. Then a new image shewed itself. She was again in Heimdal; she stood upon the bank of the river, and looked with fearful wonder on the opposite shore; for there, amid the dark fir-trees, shone forth something white, mist-like, but which became ever plainer; and as it approached the brink of the river, Susanna saw that it was a child, and she knew again her little Hulda. But she was pale as the dead, and tears rolled down her snow-white cheeks, while she stretched forth her little arms to Susanna, and called her name. Susanna was about to throw herself into the waves which separated them, but could not; she felt herself fettered by an invisible power. At this, as she turned round with inexpressible anguish to free herself, she perceived that it was Harald who thus held her; he looked so cold, so severe, and Susanna felt at the same time both love and hatred for him. Again anxiously called the tender child's voice, and Susanna saw her little sister sink upon the stones of the shore, and the white waves beat over her. With a feeling of wild despair Susanna now awoke from sleep, and sprang up. Cold perspiration stood upon her brow, and she looked bewildered around. The cave darkly vaulted itself above her; and the blazing fire outside threw red, confused beams upon its fantastically decorated walls. Susanna went softly out of the cave; she wished to see the heavens, the stars; she must breathe the free, fresh air, to release herself from the terrors of her dream. But no beaming star looked down upon her, for the heavens were covered with a grey roof of cloud, and the pale moonlight which pressed through cast a troubled light over the dead country, and gloomy and hideous shapes. The fire had burnt low, and flickered up, as if sleepily, now and then, with red flames. The peasants slept heavily, lying around it. Susanna saw not Harald at this moment, and she was glad of it. In order to dissipate the painful impression she had experienced, Susanna took a water jug, and went down to the river with it, to fetch water for the morrow's breakfast. On the way thither she saw Harald, who, with his gun on his shoulder, walked backwards and forwards some little distance from the cave. Unobserved by him, she, however, came down to the river, and filled her jug with the snow-mingled water. This little bodily exertion did her good; but the solitary ramble was not much calculated to enliven her spirits. The scene was indistinguishably gloomy, and the monotonous murmuring of the snow-brook was accompanied by gusts of wind, which, like giant sighs, went mournfully whistling through the desert. She seated herself for a moment as the foot of a rock. It was midnight, and deep silence reigned over the country. The rocks around her were covered with mourning-lichen, and the pale snow-lichens grew in crevices of the mountains; here and there stuck out from the black earth-rind the bog-lichen, a little pale-yellow sulphur-coloured flower, which the Lapland sagas use in the magic arts, and which here gives the impression of a ghastly smile upon these fields of death. Susanna could not free herself from the remembrance of her dream; and wherever she turned her glance she thought that she saw the image of her little dying sister. Perhaps in this dream she had received a warning, perhaps a foretelling; perhaps she might never leave this desert; perhaps she should die here, and then—what would become of little Hulda? Would not neglect and want let her sink upon the hard stones of life, and the waves of misery go over her? In the midst of these gloomy thoughts, Susanna was surprised by Harald. He saw that she had been weeping, and asked, with a voice so kind that it went to Susanna's heart—

"Why so dejected? Are you uneasy or displeased? Ah! tell it openly to me as to a friend! I cannot bear to see you thus!"

"I have had a bad dream!" said Susanna, wiping away her tears and standing up, "all is so ghastly, so wild here around us. It makes me think on all the dark and sad things in the world! But it is no use troubling oneself about them," continued she more cheerfully, "it will be all well enough when the day dawns. It is the hour of darkness, the hour in which the under-earth spirits have rule!" And Susanna attempted to smile. "But what is that?" continued she, and her smile changed itself suddenly to an expression of anxiety, which made her involuntarily approach Harald. There was heard in the air a low clattering and whistling, and at the same time a mass resembling a grey cloud came from the north, spreading over the snow-fields and approaching the place where they stood. In the pale moonlight Susanna discerned to see wild shapes with horns and claws, moving themselves in the mass, and the words, 'the under-earth spirits,' were nearly escaping her lips.

"It is a herd of reindeer!" said Harald smiling, who seemed to divine her thoughts, and went a few paces towards the apparition, whilst he mechanically shouldered his gun. But at the same moment the herd took another direction, and fled with wild speed towards the east. The wind rose, and swept with a mournful wail through the ice-desert.

"It is here really fearful!" said Susanna, and shuddered.

"But to-morrow evening," said Harald, cheerfully, "we shall reach Storlie-Säter, which lies below the region of snow, and then we shall find birch-woods, quite green yet, and shall meet with friendly people, and can have there a regularly comfortable inn. The day afterwards we shall again have a heavy piece of road; but on that same day we shall have a view of scenes so magnificent, that you certainly will think little of the trouble, on account of the pleasure you will enjoy, for there the beautiful far exceeds the terrific. That spot between Storlie-Säter and Tverlic, where the wild Leira-river, as if in frenzy, hurls itself down over Høgsfjell, and with the speed of lightning and the noise of thunder rushed between and over splintered masses of rock, in part naked, in part clothed in wood, to tumble about with its rival the furious Björja,—that spot exceeds in wild grandeur anything that man can imagine."

Thus spake Harald, to dissipate Susanna's dejection; but she listened to him half-dreaming, and said as if to herself—

"Would that we were well there, and passed it, and at our destination, and then——"

"And then?" said Harald, taking up the unfinished sentence—"what then?"

"Home with my Hulda again!" said Susanna, deeply sighing.

"What, Susanna? Will you then leave us? Do you really hate Norway?"

"No, no!—a long way from that!—But one cannot serve two masters, that I now feel. Hulda calls me. I shall have no rest till I return to her, and never will I part from her again. I have dreamed of her to-night; and she was so pale, so pale—Ah! But you are pale too, terribly pale!" continued Susanna, as she looked at Harald with astonishment; "you are certainly ill!"

"It is this lovely moonlight and this sweet scenery which gives me this ashy-grey colour," said Harald jokingly, who wished to conceal the true cause of his paleness; which was, that his shoulder began to be acutely painful during the night. And he endeavoured to turn Susanna's attention to another object.

The two had in the mean time reached the cave. Harald revived the smouldering fire with fresh fuel, and Susanna crept softly into the cave, and resumed her former place at the feet of her mistress. But it was not till late that she sunk into an uneasy sleep.

She was awake by a loud and rushing noise. A pale light came into the cave, and she heard Harald's voice saying aloud outside, "It is time that we are preparing for the journey, that as soon as possible we may get into quarters. We have a laborious day before us."

Susanna looked around her for her lady. She stood quite ready near Susanna, and was regarding her with a gentle, attentive look.

Susanna sprang up, shocked at her own tardiness, and went all the quicker now to make arrangements for breakfast. The bouillon was again had recourse to, the servants were refreshed with salmon, bacon, and curds thawed in snow-water.

A tempest had blown up after midnight, which promised our travellers not at all an agreeable travelling-day. The river and the brooks roared loudly, and raged and thundered amid the rocks around them. In the course of the morning the wind however abated, but Harald cast now and then thoughtful glances upon the grey roof of cloud which grew ever thicker above their heads. Susanna saw him once cast an inquiring glance upon the guide, and he shook his grey head. In the mean time all the men seemed cheerful; and Harald seemed to wish, by his animation, to remove the impression which his continued unusual paleness might occasion.

Through the whole forenoon they continued to ascend higher into the region of winter, and the snow-fields stretched out wider and wider. No one living thing shewed itself in this desert, but they frequently saw traces of rein-deer, and here and there flies lay upon the snow in deep winter-sleep. The wind fortunately subsided more and more, and let its icy breath be felt only in short gusts. But ever and anon were heard peals and roarings, as if of loud thunder. They were the so-called 'Fjellscred,' or falls of great masses of rocks and stones, which separate themselves from the mountains, and plunge down, and which in these mountain-regions commonly occur during and after tempests. The peasants related many histories of houses and people who were crushed under them.

The road became continually more and more difficult. They were often obliged to wade through running rivers, and to pass over snow-bridges, under which the rivers had made themselves a path. Harald, alike bold, as prudent and determined, often averred danger at his own risk, from Mrs. Astrid and Susanna. Neither was he pale any longer. The exertions and fever, which nobody suspected, made his cheeks glow with the finest crimson.

In the afternoon, they had reached the highest point of the rocks. Here were piled up two great heaps of stones, in the neighbourhood of a little sea called Skiftesjö, which is covered with never-melted ice in the hottest summer. Here the brooks begin to run westward, and the way begins from here to descend. The giant shapes of the Vassjern and Ishang, together with other lofty snow-mountains, shewed themselves in perspective.

The wind was now almost still; but it began to snow violently, and the cloudy sky sank down, dark and heavy as lead, upon the travellers.

"We must hasten, hasten," said the old Hal-ling peasant, as he looked round with an intelligent glance to the party whom he led, "else we shall be snowed up on the mountains, as it happened to the late Queen Margaret, when——"

He ended not, for his horse stumbled suddenly on a steep descent, and threw him over. The old man's head struck violently against a stone, and he remained lying senseless. It was a full hour before they succeeded in bringing him to consciousness. But the blow had been so severe, and the old man was so confused in his head, that he could no longer serve as guide. They were obliged to place him on the same horse as his grandson rode, and the high-spirited young man took charge of him with the greatest tenderness. Harald rode now at the head of the party, but every moment increased the difficulties of his undertaking, for the snow fell with such terrible rapidity, and the thickness of the air prevented him distinguishing with certainty 'the comfortable way-marks,'—the traveller's only means of safety. They were obliged often to make windings and turnings, to come again upon the right path. Nevertheless they succeeded in reaching Björö-Säter, an uninhabited sater, but which stands upon the broad and rapid Björöa.

Here they halted to take counsel. The Björöa was now so swollen, and rushed along so violently, that they soon saw the pure impossibility of passing it at this place. The old Hal-ling-peasant advised them to make a circuit to another place, where they might with safety cross the river; this would take them near to the Storlie-Säter, and near to the great waterfall of the same name, the roar of which might be heard at three miles' distance. It is true that they must make a circuit of some miles, but what could they do? Great was the danger of pursuing the journey in this storm, but greater yet to stand still in this desert, where the snow fire quently fell to the depth of many yards. The old Hallinger, however, chose this last; for he found himself unable to sit on the horse, and prayed to be left quiet in the hut, with provisions for a few days, in which time he hoped that the snow would cease and begin to thaw. He did not wish that his grandson should remain with him, but he was resolute not to leave his old grandfather, and the rest considered it alike proper and necessary; and the two therefore were hastily supplied with whatever they might require in this wintery solitude. Their horses were supplied with provender, and led likewise into the hut.

Susanna bound up the old man's head with the carefulness of a daughter. It was to her infinitely difficult to leave the old man behind them there. "And if no thaw come?" said she; "if snow and winter still continue, and thou art buried in here and frozen?"

"That has happened before now to many a better fellow than me," said the old man calmly. "One cannot die more than once, and God is also at home in the wilderness. And he who rightly can utter the Lord's Prayer, need not to fear the under-earth spirits. With me, an old man, it may go as it will. My best time is, in any case, past; I am anxious only for the youth. Think on him when thou comest to human beings."

Susanna was affected. She impressed a kiss upon the old man's forehead, and a warm tear fell from her cheek upon his. The old man looked up to her with a cordial, bright-beaming glance; "God's angel guide thee!" cried he after her, as she left the hut to attend the rest.

Again was the little train in motion, and wandered over snow-fields, naked rocks, and half-thawed morasses. The snow reached high up the legs of the horses, and only slowly and almost reluctantly went they forward. It grew darker and darker. No one spoke a word. Thus they went on for an hour's space.

With great uneasiness had Susanna fancied for some time that she observed Harald to reel in his saddle; but she endeavoured to persuade herself that it might be only a delusion, which the unequal paces of the horse occasioned, and by the thick snow-mist through which she saw him. All around her had, in fact, a bewildering appearance, and seemed to her waving and spectral. A dull cry from Mrs. Astrid broke the ghostly silence—was this also a delusion? Harald's horse stood still, and was without its rider. Of a truth, it was only too certain. Harald had, seized by dizziness, fallen down beside his horse. He had borne for long in silence the increasing pain in his shoulder and breast, and endeavoured to conceal from himself, as well as from others, feelings of feverish dizziness which seized his head. Even now, when it threatened to overpower him, he would not allow it to be of any consequence. With the help of the servant, he made several attempts to seat himself again upon his horse, but in vain. He could no longer lift up his fevered head. Lying upon the snow on his knees, and with silent misery, he leaned his burning forehead against a piece of rock.

"Here, then—here shall we die!" said Mrs. Astrid, half aloud to herself, in a gloomy voice; "and this young man must be sacrificed for my sake. My fate is always the same!"

Then followed a moment of fearful silence. Men and animals stood immovable, and as if turned to stone, while the snow fell over them, and seemed to threaten to bury them. But now a clear, cheerful voice raised itself, and said—

"I see a flat rock yonder, which will shelter us from the snow. We must carry him there!" And Susanna raised up Harald and seized his arm, while the servant went before and made a path through the snow. About forty paces from the place where they stood, a vaulted projecting rock stretched forth, under which they could obtain shelter from the snow, which reared itself in high walls around the open space.

"Support yourself on me; better—better! Fear not; I am strong!" said Susanna, while she, with a soft but vigorous arm, embraced Harald. He allowed himself to be led like a child; although he was not properly conscious, still he felt a certain pleasure in submitting himself to the young girl's guidance, who talked to him with such a mild and courageous voice.

As commodiously as possible was Harald laid under the sheltering rock, and Susanna took off her shawl, which she wore under her fur cloak, and made of it a soft pillow for Harald. "Ah! that is good!" said he softly, and pressed Susanna's hand, as he found himself relieved by this position. Susanna returned now to her mistress.

"Susanna," said she, "I would also gladly get there. It seems safe resting there. But I am so stiff that I can scarcely move myself."

Susanna helped her lady from her horse; and guided and supported by her, Mrs. Astrid reached the sheltering vault. Here, in comparison with that of the open plain, the air was almost of a mild temperature, for the rock walls and the piled-up snow prevented the cold wind from entering. Here Susanna placed softly her lady, who was almost stiffened with cold and fatigue.

Susanna, also, was frozen and weary; but, O what a southern clime of life and warmth cannot love and a strong will call forth in a human being! It was these powers which now impelled the young girl's pulse, and let the blood rush warm from the chambers of her heart to her very finger ends. She rubbed the stiffened limbs of her mistress, she warmed them with kisses and tears, she warmed her with her throbbing breast. She prevailed upon her to drink from a bottle of wine, and prepared also for Harald's parched and thirsty lips a refreshing draught of wine and water. She moistened her handkerchief with snow, and laid it upon his aching brow. Around them both she piled cloaks and articles of clothing, so that both were protected from the cold. Then stood she for a moment silent, with a keen and serious look. She was thinking on what was farther to be done to save these two.

Harald had raised himself on his sound arm, and looked silently down with the pain which a manly nature experiences when it is compelled to renounce one of its noblest impulses—sustaining and helping the weak who are confided to their care. A tear—the first Susanna had ever seen him shed, ran down his cheek.

Mrs. Astrid gazed with a mournful look up to the grave-like vault.

But Susanna's eyes beamed even brighter. "Hark! hark!" said she, and listened.

Mrs. Astrid and Harald fixed upon her inquiring looks.

"I hear a noise," resumed Susanna, "a noise like that of a great waterfall."

"It is the roar of the Störle-forse!" exclaimed Harald, for a moment animated, "but what good of that?" continued he, and sunk down disheartened; "we are three miles off—and cannot get there!"

"Yes, we can, we will!" said Susanna, with firm resolution. "Courage, courage, my dear lady! Be calm, Mr. Bergman! We will reach it, we will be saved!"

"And how?" said Harald, "the servant is a stupid fellow, he never could find his way."

"But I can find it, be sure of that!" replied Susanna; "and come back hither with people and help; tell me only the signs by which I may know the right way. These, and the roar of Storlie-fore, will guide me."

"It is in vain! You would perish, alone and in the snow-storm!"

"I shall not perish! I am strong! No one shall hinder me. And if you will not tell me the way, I shall, nevertheless, find it out."

When Harald saw her so firmly resolved, and her cheerful and determined tone had inspired him with a degree of confidence, he endeavoured to point out to her the objects by which she must direct herself, and which consisted of rock and crag, which, however, in the snowy night, she probably could no longer distinguish.

With deep attention, Susanna listened, and then said cheerfully, "Now I have it! I shall find the way! God preserve you! I shall soon be back again with help!"

When she came out into the open air, she found the servant seeking his comfort in the brandy bottle, and the horses sunk in a spiritless stupor. She admonished him to take care of these, and charged him earnestly, both with threats and promises of reward, to think about his employers and watch over their safety. She herself gave to her horse fodder and water, patting him the while, and speaking to him kind and encouraging words. After that she mounted to commence her solitary, dangerous journey. But it was only with great difficulty that she could make the horse part from his companions, and when it had gone about twenty paces forward, it stopped, and would return again to its company. This manoeuvre it repeated several times; at length it would obey neither blows nor encouragement. Susanna therefore dismounted and let the horse go. A few tears filled her eyes as she saw him thus abandon her, and desecingly she lifted her hands to Him, who here alone saw the solitary defenceless maiden.

After that she pursued her way on foot.

This indeed was not long, and the length of it was not the difficulty; but he who had seen Susanna making her way through the deep snow, then clambering up rocks, then wandering over morasses, where at every step she feared to sink, would have been filled with amazement at her courage and her strength. But 'God's angel,' whom the old man had prayed might guide her seemed to be with her on the way, for the fall of snow ceased, and ever and anon shot a moon-beam forth, and showed her some of the objects which Harald had described as landmarks. Besides, the din of the Storlie-fore grew ever louder and louder, like the trumpet of the resurrection in her ears. A strong resolve to attempt the uttermost, a secret joy in testifying her affection, even though it should be with the sacrifice of her life, gave wings to her feet, and prevented her courage failing for a single minute.

So passed two hours. Susanna now heard the water roaring beneath her feet. She seemed to be on the point of plunging into an abyss; around, all was darkness and snow. She stood still. It was a moment of terrible uncertainty.

Then parted the clouds, and the half-moon in full glory beamed forth, just as it was about to sink behind a rock. Susanna now saw the abyss on whose brink she stood; she saw the Storlie-fore spread its white masses of water in the moonlight, saw the Sater-huts there below! . . .

Beneath the stone vault where Mrs. Astrid and Harald found themselves, prevailed for some time after Susanna's departure, a deep and wild silence. This was at length broken by Mrs. Astrid, who said in a solemn tone—

"I have a request to make of you, Harald!"

"Command me!" answered he. "Might I but be able to fulfil your wish?"

"We seem both," resumed Mrs. Astrid, "now to stand near the grave; but you are younger and stronger than I, you I hope will be rescued. I must confide to you an important commission, and I rely on the honour and the soundness of heart which I have observed in you, that you will conscientiously execute it, in case I myself am not in a condition to do so, and you as I trust, will outlive me!"

Mrs. Astrid had uttered this with a firm voice, but during the following relation she was frequently agitated by contending emotions. She spoke rapidly, and in short, abrupt sentences, as thus—

"I had a sister. How I loved her, I am not able to express. She was as gay and gentle in her mood as I was serious. When I married, she accompanied me to my house. But there was no good luck. The fortune which my sister possessed placed her in a condition to follow her own heart's bias, and she gave her hand to a poor but amiable young man, a Lieutenant Wolf, and lived with him some months of the highest earthly felicity. But brief was the happiness to be. Wolf perished on a sea-voyage, and his inconsolable wife sunk under her sorrow. She died some hours after she had given birth to a son, and after she had laid her tender babe in my arms, and prayed me to become its mother.

"And I became a mother to this child. An own son could not have possibly been dearer to me. I was proud of the handsome, lively child. I saw a beautiful future for him. He should realize the ideal of my youth, he should . . . O! amid my own poor and desolate life I was yet rich in this boy. But the man who had received my hand endured not that my heart should belong to this child. He took a hatred to the poor boy, and my life became more than ever bitter. Once I was obliged to make a journey to visit a sick relative. I wished to take the seven-year-old boy with me, for he had never been separated from me. But my husband would retain him with him, and assumed a tone of tenderness to persuade me. This I could not resist; and spite of the boy's entreaties, and an anxiety which seemed to me ominous—I left my poor child. I persuaded myself that I was acting strongly, and I was really weak. I had promised the child's mother to protect it—I knew that I left it in hard and hostile hands, and yet!—When after a week's absence I returned from my journey, the boy—had vanished. He had gone out one day, it was said, and never came back again. They had sought for him everywhere, and at length had found his little hat upon a rock on the edge of the sea—it was held for certain that he had fallen over it. I found my husband busy in taking possession of my sister's property, which in case of the boy's death should, according to her will, fall to us. From this moment, my soul was seized with the most horrible suspicions! . . . God be praised that these were false! God forgive me that I ever entertained them! For twenty years have they gnawed at my heart; for twenty years have they hung the weight of lead on the fulfilment of my duties. All my researches were fruitless: no one could be suspected; no one seemed to have acted herein, except a dreadful fate. This was all: he had had permission to go out and play, had left the house alone, and no one had seen him afterwards.

'Twenty years—long, dark years—had passed since this period, and hope had by degrees expired in my heart, the feeble hope, which sometimes revived in it, that I should yet recover my beloved child. After having been many years deprived of both bodily and mental vigour by his paralysis, my husband died. I was free; but wherefore should I live! . . . I had lost my faith in every thing which makes life dear, and I stood alone, on the verge of old age, surrounded by darkness and bitter memories. Thus did I still feel but a few days ago, when I received a writing from the present Commandant of R—. Within lay an unsealed letter, which he said had been found in a drawer into which my husband was wont to throw old letters and papers, of no worth or importance. And this letter . . . Oh! how it would have changed my heart, and my future! This letter was written by my husband, apparently immediately after his severe paralytic stroke, but its words, in an unsteady hand, said, that the lost child still lived, and directed me for further explanation to a certain Sergeant Rönn, in Bergen. Here the letter appeared to have been broken off by a sudden increase of his attack. I was, as it chanced, absent from home on this day. When I returned, I found my husband speechless, and nearly lifeless. Life was indeed restored through active exertions, but consciousness continued dark, and half of the body powerless—thus he lived on for some years. In a moment of clearness which occurred to him shortly before he expired, I am convinced that he desired to unfold to me the condition of the boy, or the existence of the aforesaid letter—but death prevented him . . . How this letter became thrown amongst the old papers I do not understand—perhaps it might be done by my husband's own hand, in that moment of privation of consciousness in which the letter closed—enough, the hand of Providence saved it from destruction, and allowed it to reach me! . . .

"You know now the cause of my hasty journey. And if it should for me terminate here,—if I shall never achieve the highest wish, and the last hope of my life,—if I never may see again my sister's son, and myself deliver into his hands that which has been unjustly withheld from him,—then, listen to my prayer, my solemn injunction! Seek out, as soon as you can, in Bergen, the person whom I have named, and whose address you will further find in the paper. Tell him, that in my last hour I commissioned you to act in my stead; spare no expense which may be necessary—promise, threaten—but search out where my sister's son is to be found! And then—go to him. Bear to him my last affectionate greeting; deliver to him this;—it is my Will, and it will put him in possession of all that I possess, which is properly that of his mother, for my own is nearly consumed. Tell him that care on his account has worn away my life, that—my God! What do you? Why do you thus seize my hand?—you weep!"

"Tell me—" stammered forth Harald, with a voice nearly choked by emotion; "did this child wear on a ribbon round his neck a little cross of iron?—the head of a winged cherub in its centre?"

"From his mother's neck," said Mrs. Astrid, "I transferred it to his!"

"And here—here it yet rests!" exclaimed Harald, as he led Mrs. Astrid's hand to the little cross hanging to his neck. "What recollections awake now! Yes, it must be so! I cannot doubt—you are my childhood's first cherisher, my mother's sister!"

A cry of indescribable emotion interrupted Harald. "Good God!" exclaimed Mrs. Astrid, "you are—"

"Your sister's son, the child that you mourn. At this moment I recognise again myself and you."

"And I— Your voice, Harald, has often struck me as strangely familiar. At this moment I seem again to hear your father's voice. Ah, speak! speak! for heaven's sake, explain to me—make me certain—you give me then more than life."

"What shall I say?" continued Harald, in the highest excitement and disquiet; "much is obscure to myself—incomprehensible. But your narrative has at this moment called up in me recollections, impressions, which make me certain that I neither deceive you nor myself. At this instant I remember with perfect clearness, how I, as a child, one day ran my little sledge on the hill before the fortress, and how I was there addressed by the, to me, well-known Sergeant Rönn, but whose name till this moment had entirely escaped me, who invited me to ascend his sledge, and take a drive with him. I desired nothing better, and I got in. I remember also now extremely well that my hat blew off, that I wished to fetch it, but was prevented by the Sergeant, who threw a cloak round me, and drove off at full speed. And long did the drive continue—but from this moment my recollection becomes dark, and I look back into a time as into a dark night, which ever and anon is illuminated by lightning. Probably I fell then into the heavy sickness which long afterwards checked my growth. I recollect it as a dream, that I would go home to my mother, but that my cries were hushed by the Sergeant, first with good words and then with menaces. I remember dimly, that I at one time found myself in a foul and wretched house, where hideous men treated me harshly, and I longed to die.—Then comes, like a sunbeam, the impression of another home, of a clear heaven, pure air, green meadows, and of friendly, mild people, who, with infinite tenderness, cherished the sick and weakly child which I then was. This home was Alethe's; and her excellent parents, after they had recalled me to life, adopted me as their son. My new relationships became unspeakably dear to me; I was happy; my illness and the long succeeding weakness had almost wholly obliterated the memory of the past. I had forgotten the names of both people and places, yet never did I forget my childhood's earliest, motherly cherisher. Like a lovely and holy image has she followed me through life, although, with the lapse of years, she, as it were, folded herself continually in a thicker veil.

"When I was older, I requested and received from my foster-father an explanation of my reception into his house. I then found that he had one day called on Mr. K—— in Christiansand, and had seen there a most feeble and pale child, who sat in the sunshine on the floor. The child began to weep, but hushed itself in terror when Mr. K—— went up sharply to it, and threatened it with the dark room. Moved by this occurrence, my benefactor inquired to whom the boy belonged, and received for answer that it was a poor child without connexions, and who had been taken in charity and committed to K——'s care. Alette's father resolved at once, cost what it would, to take the child out of this keeping, and offered to take the boy himself, and try what the country air would do for the restoration of his health. It was in this manner that I came into the family which I thence called my own. I could obtain no explanation respecting my parents, nor respecting my peculiar connexion with Mr. K——. K—— died a few weeks after my removal from his house, and his wife either knew or pretended to know nothing whatever about me.

"But my excellent foster-parents never allowed me to feel that I had no real relatives. They made: no difference between me and their own child, and Alette became to me the tenderest and best of sisters. Death deprived us of this beloved support; Alette's father has been now dead two years: Alette removed to some near relatives, in order, after a certain time, to give her hand to a man whom she has long loved; and I sought in travel to dissipate the feeling of desolation which had seized on my heart. It was at this moment that business, or rather Providence, conducted me to you. Admiration, and an interest whose power I cannot describe, drew me toward you; perhaps, unknown to me, darkly operated in me the delightful recollections of my childhood. At this moment they have ascended in all their clearness. I seem now again transported into the years of boyhood, when I called you mother, and loved you even to adoration; and now—" and with passionate tenderness Harald seized the hand of Mrs. Astrid, while he stammered forth—"now . . . what says your heart? . . . Can you trust this dim recollection . . . this narrative without all testimony? . . . May I again call you mother? Can you, will you, receive me as a son?"

"Do I wish it? . . . Feel these tears of joy! I have not shed many such upon earth. I cannot doubt . . . I believe . . . I am happy! . . . Thou art my sister's son, my child . . . I have thee again. But oh! have I found thee merely to see thee die—die here—for my sake? Am I then born to be unfortunate? This moment is bitter!"

"But delightful also!" exclaimed Harald, with warmth; "we have found each other; we are united."

"To die!"

"Rescue is yet possible!"

"But only through a miracle."

"Providence permits wonderful things to happen; we have just had evidence of it!" said Harald, with a gentle, admonitory tone.

"Thou art right, Harald; but I have been so unhappy! I have difficulty to believe in happy miracles. But, at all events, God be praised for this moment, and let His will be done!"

"Amen!" said Harald softly, but with manly fortitude; and both ceased, exhausted, and all was in deep darkness around them, for the moon was gone down, and the snow fell thickly. They seemed to be entombed alive.

But the miracle of rescue was near. There gleamed a light—there were heard voices out of the snowy wilderness.

"Susanna!" exclaimed with one voice Mrs. Astrid and Harald. "Susanna, our angel of salvation!"

And it was Susanna who, with a blazing torch in her hand, rushed into the dark vault. It glittered at once as with a million of diamonds. Some of these gleamed in human eyes.

"You are saved, God be praised!" exclaimed Susanna. "Here are good, strong men who will help you. But we must hasten; the snow falls heavily."

Several peasants, bearing lights and two litters, were now seen; and Mrs. Astrid and Harald were each laid on one of these, and covered with soft skins.

"Susanna," said Mrs. Astrid, "come and rest here by me!"

"Nay," answered Susanna, lifting aloft her torch; "I shall go on before and light the way. Fear not for me; I am strong!"

But a strange sensation suddenly seized her, as if her heart would sink, and her knees failed her. She stood now a moment, then made a step forward as to go, then felt her breast, as it were, crushed together. She dropped on her knees, and the torch fell from her hands. "Hulda!" she whispered to herself, "my little darling . . . farewell!"

"Susanna! great God!" exclaimed now two voices at once; and, strong with terror and surprise, sprang up Mrs. Astrid and Harald, and embraced Susanna. She sank more and more together. She seized the hands of her mistress and of Harald, and said with great difficulty, earnestly praying—"My little Hulda! The fatherless . . . motherless . . . think of her!"

"Susanna! my good, dear child!" exclaimed Mrs. Astrid, "thou wilt not, thou shalt not now die!" And for the first time fell a beam of anxious love from her dark eyes upon the young, devoted maiden. It was the first time that Susanna had enjoyed such a glance and she looked up as joyfully as if she had gazed into the opened heaven.

"O Harald!" said Susanna, while she gazed at him with an inexpressible tenderness and clearness; "I know that I could not make you happy in life, but I thank God that I can die for you. Now—now despise not my love!"—and seizing his hand and that of her mistress, she pressed them to her bosom, saying with a sobbing voice—"Pardon my fault, for—my love's sake!"

A slight shiver passed through her frame, her head sank upon her breast. Without a sign of life, they laid Susanna by her mistress, who held her in her arms, and bathed with her tears the young, pallid countenance.

THE AWAKENING.

I woke, for life assumed victorious sway,
And found my being in its weakness lay.
There the beloved ones round my couch I saw.

RAIN.

Months went on, and life was for Susanna merely a wild, uneasy dream. In the delirious fantasies of fever she again lived over the impressions of the mountain-journey, but in darker colours. She saw the subterranean spirits how in terrible shapes they raged about in the now wilderness, and sought to suffocate her beneath piles of snow and ice, which they flung upon her. Susanna combated with desperate exertions against them, for she knew that if she fell, the defence for those she loved would be taken away, and that the subterranean ones could seize upon it; and therefore any mass of snow which the spirits cast upon her, she cast back upon them. Finally, the subterranean ones desired a parley, and promised that if she would voluntarily accompany them, they would permit her friends to be at peace; yes, even heap upon them wealth and happiness. Then strove Susanna no longer; but saluting the beautiful heaven, and earth with its green dales and beloved people, whom she should behold no more, let herself be dragged down in silence by the spirits, into their subterranean dwellings, and experienced there inexpressible torments. But she was contented to suffer for those she loved; and out of the dark, cold abyss, where she was doomed to dwell, she sent up the most affectionate, moving farewells to her Hulda, to her mistress, to Harald, and Alette, revealing thereby, unknown to herself, all her heart's secrets, conflicts, and sufferings.

One day it seemed to her that she had already dwelt hundreds of years in the Northern world, and she was now in their church, for her time was up, and she should now die, and in death (that she knew) should she be delivered from the power of the mountain spirits. But she could feel no joy over this, so faint was her heart, so chilled was her bosom. She lay stretched out upon a stone floor, and over her vaulted itself a roof of ice. That was her funeral vault, and there should she die. And by degrees all feelings and senses grew benumbed, all torments vanished, and there came a sleep so deep, but so secret and peaceful, that Susanna, who still retained her consciousness, regarded death as a salutary repose, and wished not to awaken. But it seemed to her that the door of the vault opened, and she saw a light, like that of the sun; and some one approached her, and touched her lips with a flame, a flame as of life. Then beat her heart more rapidly, the blood streamed warmly through her veins, and she looked up and saw a female figure stand by her pillow, which bent over her with a look full of love and compassion. The look, the beautiful life-giving look, Susanna seemed to have seen some time before, and the longer she gazed on the face of this female shape, the better she seemed to recognise familiar features—the noble and beloved features of her mistress. But she looked younger and fairer than formerly. At her feet she saw roses standing, and the sun shone upon them; but all appeared to her so beautiful, so wonderful, that she involuntarily whispered—

"Are we now in heaven?"

"Still on the earth," replied a voice, full of tenderness. "Thou wilt here live for those who love thee."

"Ah! who loves me?" said Susanna, faint and spiritless.

"I!" answered the voice; "I and others. But be calm and quiet—a mother watches over thee."

And Susanna continued calm and quiet, and resigned herself, in her great state of weakness, with gratified confidence to the motherly guardian. Mrs. Astrid's presence, the mere sound of her light tread, the mere sight of her shadow, operated beneficially on her mind; all that she received from her hand was to her delicious and healing. There arose between them a relationship full of pleasantness. Mrs. Astrid, who saw the young girl as it were born anew under her hands, conceived for her an attachment which surprised herself, much as it made her happy. The strong and healthy Susanna had stood too distant from her; the weak, and in her weakness the so child-like affectionate one, had stolen into her heart, and she felt her heart thereby bloom, as it were, anew.

Such is the operation of all true devotion, all true affection, and that in every stage of life; for affection is the summer of life and of the heart.

So soon as strength and clear memory again revived in Susanna, she begged to be informed of the fate of all those who had made the mountain journey. With astonishment and joy did she then learn how Mrs. Astrid had discovered in Harald her sister's son; and how, by this, much darkness had vanished from her life.

Through Sergeant Rönn, and the subsequent inquiries to which his statement led, within a short time perfect clearness was obtained on all that concerned the circumstances of Harald's childhood. It was then discovered that Mr. K. had been a confidant of Colonel Hjelms, and was of a sufficiently worthless character to enter, for the sake of gain, into the plans of the Colonel, and to receive Harald, and cause him by degrees to forget his former circumstances. Sickness came in aid of severe treatment; and after a sojourn of some months in K.'s house, he found the poor boy so much stupified, that he could, without fear of the betrayal of the secret, yield to the solicitations of Mr. Bergman, and make over to him a child whose daily aspect was a torment to him. But we return now to the present.

Harald, under a skilful medical care in Bergen, after the mountain journey, was quickly restored to health. When he had attended the marriage of Alette, he had travelled abroad, but would, in the course of the summer, return to Sem, where he would settle down, in order to live for the beloved relative whom he had again discovered.

The guide, the honest old peasant of Halling, had met with his death on the mountains. His grandson wept by his corpse till he was himself half dead with hunger and cold, when the people from the dales, sent by Mrs. Astrid and Harald, succeeded in making a way through the snow-drifts to the Björöj-säter, and in rescuing him.

Susanna dropped a tear for the old man's fate, but felt within her a secret regret not to have died like him. She looked toward the future with disquiet. But when she could again leave her bed, when Mrs. Astrid drove her out with her, when she felt the vernal air, and saw the sea, and the clear heaven above the mountains, and the green orchards at their feet; then awoke she again vividly to the feeling of the beauty of the earth, and of life. And she contemplated with admiration and delight the new objects which surrounded her, as well the magnificent forms of nature as the life and the changing scenes in the city; for Susanna found herself in the lovely and splendidly situated Bergen, the greatest mercantile city of Norway, the birth-place of Høllberg, Dahl, and Jøle Bull.

Yet would she speedily separate herself from all this, and, what was still harder, from her adored mistress; for Susanna had firmly determined never again to see Harald. Crimson blushes covered her cheeks when she recollected her confession in the mountains, at the moment when she thought herself at the point of death, and she felt that after this they could not meet, much less live in the same house without mutually painful embarrassment. She would, therefore, not return again to Semb; but, so soon as her health would permit it, would go from Bergen by sea to Sweden, to her native town again, and there, in the bosom of her little darling, seek to heal her own heart, and draw new strength to live and labour.

But it was not easy for poor Susanna to announce this resolve to her mistress. She trembled violently, and could not restrain her tears.

It was at the same time calming and disturbing to her feelings, when Mrs. Astrid, after she had quietly listened to Susanna, answered with much composure—

"You are at liberty, Susanna, to act as you find it best; but in three or four months, for so long will my affairs yet retain me here—in a few months I shall again return to Semb, and it would be a trial to me to be without you on the journey."

"Then I shall accompany you," replied Susanna, glad that she was needed; "but, then . . ."

"Then," began again Mrs. Astrid, "when you will leave me, I shall arrange for your safe return to your native place."

"So, then, yet some months!" thought Susanna, with a melancholy pleasure. And these months were for her inexpressibly pleasant and strengthening. Mrs. Astrid occupied herself much with her, and sought in many particulars to supply the defects of her neglected education. And Susanna was a quick pupil, and more affectionately than ever did she attach herself to her mistress, while she on her part experienced even more and more the truth of the adage: "the breath of youth is wholesome."

In the beginning of the month of July Mrs. Astrid travelled again with Susanna over the mountains which had once threatened them with death; but at this season of the year the journey was not dangerous, though always laborious. Mrs. Astrid was the whole time in the highest spirits, and seemed every day to become more joyous. Susanna's mood of mind, on the contrary, became every day more depressed. Even Mrs. Astrid's gaiety contributed to this. She felt herself infinitely solitary.

It was a beautiful July evening when they descended into Heimdal. Susanna's heart swelled with sadness as she saw again the places and the objects which were so dear to her, and which she should now soon quit for ever. Never had they struck her as so enchanting. She saw the sun's beams fall on the Krystalberg, and she called to mind Harald's sagas; she saw the grove of oaks where Mrs. Astrid had sat and had enjoyed the fragrance which Susanna's hand had prepared for her in silence. And the spring where the silver-weed and the ladies-mantle grew, the clear spring where she had spent so many happy hours; Susanna seemed to thirst for it. The windows in Semb burned with the radiance of the sun, the house seemed to be illuminated: in that house she had worked and ordered; there she had loved; there the flame of the winter evenings had burned so brightly during Harald's stories. Silently ascended the pillars of smoke from the cottages in the dale, where she was at home, knew each child and each cow, knew the cares and the joys which dwelt there, and where she had first learned rightly to comprehend Harald's good-heartedness—always Harald—always did she find his image as the heart in all these reminiscences. But now—now should she soon leave all this, all that was beautiful and dear!

They arrived now in Semb, and were greeted by Alfiero with barkings of clamorous delight. Susanna, with a tear in her eye, greeted and nodded to all beloved acquaintances, both people and animals.

The windows in Mrs. Astrid's room stood open, and through them were seen charming prospects over the dale, with its azure stream, its green heights and slopes, and the peaceful spire of its church in the background. She herself stood, as in astonishment, at the beauty of the grove, and her eyes flashed as she exclaimed—

"See Susanna! Is not our dale beautiful! And will it not be beautiful to live here, to make men happy, and be happy oneself!"

Susanna answered with a hasty Yes, and left the room. She felt herself ready to choke, and yet once more arose Barbra in her, and spoke thus—

"Beautiful! Yes, for her. She thinks not of me; she troubles herself not the least about me! Nor Harald neither! The poor maid-servant, whom they had need of in the mountain journey, is superfluous in the dale. She may go; they are happy now; they are sufficient to themselves. Whether I live or die, or suffer, it is indifferent to them. Good! I will therefore no longer trouble them. I will go, go far, far from here. I will trouble myself no farther about them; I will forget them as they forget me."

But tears notwithstanding rolled involuntarily over Susanna's cheeks, and the Barbra wrath ran away with them, and Sanna resumed—

"Yes, I will go: but I will bless them wherever I go. May they find a maid equally faithful, equally devoted! May they never miss Susanna! And then, my little Hulda, then my darling and sole joy, soon will I come to thee. I will take thee into my arms, and carry thee to some still corner, where undisturbed I may labour for thee. A bit of bread and a quiet home, I shall find sufficient for us both. And when my heart aches, I will clasp thee to me, thou little soft child, and thank God that I have yet some one on earth whom I can love, and who loves me!"

Just as Susanna finished this ejaculation, she was at the door of her room. She opened it—entered—and stood dumb with astonishment. Were her senses yet confused, or did she now first wake out of year-long dreams! She saw herself again in that little room in which she had spent so many years of her youth, in that little room which she herself had fitted up, had painted and embellished, and had often described to Harald; and there by the window stood the little Hulda's bed, with its flowery coverlet, and blue muslin hangings. This scene caused the blood to rush violently to Susanna's heart, and, out of herself, she cried—"Hulda! my little Hulda!"

"Here I am, Sanna! Here is thy little Hulda!" answered the clear joyous voice of a child, and the coverlet of the bed moved, and an angelically beautiful child's head peeped out, and two small white arms stretched themselves towards Susanna. With a cry of almost wild joy Susanna sprang forward, and clasped the little sister in her arms.

Susanna was pale, wept and laughed, and knew not for some time what went on around her. But when she had collected herself, she found herself sitting on Hulda's bed, with the child folded in her arms, and over the little, light-locked head, lifted itself a manly one, with an expression of deep seriousness and gentle emotion.

"Entreat Susanna, little Hulda," said Harald, "that she bestow a little regard on me, and that she does not say nay to what you have granted me; beg that I may call little Hulda my daughter, and that I may call your Susanna, my Susanna!"

"O yes! That shalt thou, Susanna!" exclaimed little Hulda, while she with child-like affection threw her arms about Susanna's neck, and continued zealously: "O, do like him, Susanna! He likes thee so much; that he has told me so often, and he has himself brought me hither to give thee joy. And seest thou this beautiful necklace he has given me, and he has promised to tell me such pleasant stories in winter. He can tell so many, do you know! Hast thou heard about Rypan in Justedale, Sanna! He has told me that! And about the good lady who went about after the Black Death, and collected all the motherless little children, and was a mother to them. O Sanna! Do like him, and let him be my father!"

Susanna let the little prattler go on without being able to say a word. She buried her face in her bosom, and endeavoured to collect her confused thoughts.

"Susanna!" prayed Harald, restlessly and tenderly. "Look at me! Speak to me a kind word!"

Then raised Susanna her burning and tear-bathed countenance, saying, "O! how shall I ever be able to thank you?"

"How!" said Harald. "By making me happy, Susanna. By becoming my wife."

Susanna stood up, while she said with as much candour as cordiality, "God knows best how happy I should feel myself, if I could believe—if words were spoken for your own sake, and not merely for mine. But ah! I cannot do it. I know that it is your generosity and goodness—"

"Generosity! Then am I right generous towards myself. For I assure you, Susanna, that I never thought more of my own advantage than at this moment; that I am now as completely egotistical as you could desire."

"And your sister Alette," continued Susanna, with downcast eyes; "I know that she does not wish to call me her sister, and——"

"And since Alette once was so stupid," said now a friendly female voice, "therefore is she here to deprecate it." And Alette embraced heartily the astonished Susanna, whilst she continued—"O Susanna! without you I should now no longer have a brother. I know you better now, and I have read in the depths of his heart and know that he can now no longer be happy but through you. Therefore I implore you, Susanna, implore you earnestly, to make him happy. Be his wife, Susanna, and be my sister."

"And you too," Alette," said Susanna, deeply moved; "will you too mislead me with your sweet words! Ah! could you make me forget that it is my weakness—that is, I who, through my confession, have called forth— But that can I never; and, therefore, can I not believe you, ye good, ye noble ones! And, therefore, I implore and adjure you—"

"What fine speeches are making here!" now interrupted a solemn voice, and Mrs. Astrid stood before the affectionately contending group, and spoke thus with an assumed sternness. "I will hope that my young relatives and my daughter Susanna do not take upon them to transact and to determine important affairs without taking me into the council! But yes, I perceive by your guilty countenances that this is the fact; and, therefore, I shall punish you altogether. Not another word of the business, then, till eight days are over; and then I demand and require, as lady and mistress of this house, that the dispute be brought before me, and that I have a word to say in the decision. Susanna remains here in the mean time in safe keeping, and I myself shall undertake to watch her. Dost thou believe seriously, Susanna," and Mrs. Astrid's voice changed into the most affectionate tones, while she clasped the young maiden in her arms, "dost thou believe that thou canst so easily escape me! No, no, my child, thou deceivest thyself there. Since thou hast saved our lives, thou hast become our life-captive—thou, and with thy little Hulda! But supper is laid under the lime-trees in the garden, my child; and let us gather strength from it for the approaching strife."

THE LAST STRIFE.

The winged troops hie
From the black woods outpouring;
Under them fly
Storms and waves roaring.
Over them waken
Mild stars, and beckon
The troop to the sheltering palms.

AUTUMN SONG, BY VELHAVER.

THERE is on earth much sorrow and much darkness; there is crime and sickness, the shriek of despair, and the deep, long, silent torture. Ah! who can name them all, the sufferings of humanity, in their manifold, pale dispensations! But, God be praised! there is also an affluence of goodness and joy; there are noble deeds, fulfilled hopes, moments of rapture, decades of blissful peace, bright marriage-days, and calm, holy death-beds.

Three months after the strife just mentioned, there was solemnized at Semb, in Heimdal, one of those bright wedding-days, when the suns of nature and of men's hearts combined to call forth on earth a paradise, which is always to be found there, though frequently hidden, fettered, deeply bound by the subterranean powers.

Yet from the faces of the fallen shine out
The lofty features of their heavenly birth,
And Daphne's heart beats 'neath the rugged bark.

Figuer.

It was an autumn day, but one of those autumn days when a sun warm as summer, and a crystally pure air cause the earth to stand forth in the brightest splendour before the azure-blue eyes of heaven; when Nature resembles a novice, who adorns herself the most at the moment that she is about to take the nun's veil, and to descend into her wintry grave. The heights of the dale shone in the most gorgeous play of colours. The dark pines, the soft-green firs, the golden-tinged birches, the hazels with their pale leaves, and the mountain ashes with their bunches of scarlet berries, arranged themselves on these in a variety of changing masses; while the Heimdal river, intoxicated with the floods of heaven, roared onward more impetuous and powerful than ever. Many-coloured herds, which had returned flat and plump from the sätters, wandered on its green banks. The chapel-bells rung joyously in the clear air, while the church-going people streamed along the winding footpath from their cottages towards the house of God. From the margin of the river at Semb ran a little fleet of festally adorned boats. In the most stately of these sat, under a canopy of leaves and flowers, the Lady of Semb; but no longer the pale, sorrowful one, whose glances seemed to seek the grave. A new youth appeared now to play upon her cheeks, to breathe upon her lips, while the clear eyes, with a glad and quiet enjoyment, gazed around her, now on the beauties of nature, and now on a more beautiful sight which she had immediately before her eyes—a happy human pair. Near her, more like a little angel than a mortal child, sat little Hulda, with a wreath of the flowers called by the Norwegians 'thousand-peace,' in her bright locks. All looks, however—as they ought—were fixed on the bride and bridegroom; and both were, in truth, handsome and charming to look upon; the more so, because they appeared so perfectly happy. In a following boat was seen a little strife between a young lady and her husband, who would wrap round her a cloak, which she would not willingly have. The spectators were tempted to take part with him in his tender care for the young wife, who was soon to become a mother. The issue of this strife was, that—Alf got the upper hand of Alette. Other boats contained other wedding guests. The men who rowed the boats had all wreaths round their yellow straw hats. And thus so advanced the little fleet, amid joyous music, along the river to the chapel.

The chapel was a simple building, without any other ornament than a beautiful altar-piece, and an abundance of flowers and green brauches, which now, for the occasion, adorned the seats, the walls, and the floor.

The sermon was simple and cordial, the singing pure; in a word, no dissonant tone came hither to disturb the devotion which the arrangement of divine service in Norway is so well adapted to call forth and maintain.*

Here Harald and Susanna called on Heaven, from faithful and earnest hearts, to bless their sincere intention, in joy and in trouble on the earth, to love one another, and were declared by the congregation to be a pair.

Many people had come this day to church; and when the wedding-train returned homewards, many boats joined themselves to it, and followed it to the opposite shore with singing and loud huzzas.

But Susanna did not feel herself truly calm and happy till in Mrs. Astrid's quiet room she had bowed her forehead on her knee, and had felt her maternal hands laid in blessing upon her head. Her heart was so full of gratitude it seemed ready to burst.

"I have then a mother!" she exclaimed, as she embraced Mrs. Astrid's knees, and looked up to her with the warmest and most child-like affection;—"Ah! I am too happy, far too happy! God has given me, the poor solitary one, a home and a mother——"

"And a husband too! Forget him not, I beseech! He too will be included!" said Harald, as he gently embraced Susanna, and also bent his knee before the maternal friend.

Mrs. Astrid clasped them both warmly in her arms, and said, with a still, inward voice, as she went with them to the window, whence was seen the beautiful dale in all its whole extent: "We begin to-day together a new life, and we will together endeavour to make it happy. At this moment when I stand surrounded by you, my children, and looking forward as it were into a beautiful future, I seem to myself so well to understand how that may be. We have not here the treasures of art; we have not the life of the great world, with its varying scenes, to enliven and entertain us; but our lives need not therefore be heavy and earth-bound. We have Heaven, and we have—Nature! We will call down the former into our hearts and into our home, and we will inquire of the latter concerning its silent wonders, and through their contemplation elevate our spirits. By the flame of our quiet hearth we will sometimes contemplate the movements of the great world-drama, in order thereafter with the greater joy to return to our own little scene, and consider how we can best, each of us, play out our part. And I promise you beforehand," continued Mrs. Astrid, assuming a playful tone, "that mine shall not be, to make so long a speech as now!"

But both Harald and Susanna joined in assuring Mrs. Astrid that she could not possibly speak too long.

"Well, well," said she friendly; "if you will sometimes listen to the old woman's preachings, she, on the other hand, will often be a child with you; and learn with you, and of you. I am at this moment equally curious about nature, and long to make a closer acquaintance with her. The thought of it throws a kind of vernal splendour over my autumn."

* The divine service in Norway is not, as still in Sweden, mingled with worldly affairs. After the service, merely some short prayers are read, in which the clergyman blesses the people in the same words which for thousands of years have been uttered over the wanderers of the deserts. They have not here the barbaric custom of reading from the pulpit announcements of all possible things—inquiries after thieves and stolen pieces of clothing, etc., which to the worshippers, and especially to the partakers of the sacrament, are so unpleasantly painful, and in cold winter days are enough to freeze all devotion.

"And assuredly," said Harald, "the intercourse with nature operates beneficently, and with a youth-restoring power upon the human heart. I always remember with delight the words of Goethe, when, in his eightieth year, he returned one spring from a visit in the country, sunburnt and full of gladness: 'I have had a conversation with the vine,' said he, 'and you cannot believe what beautiful things it has said to me.' Do we not seem here to behold a new golden age beam forth, in which the voices of nature become audible to the ear of man, and he in conversation with her to acquire higher wisdom and tranquillity of life?"

"Our wisdom," said Mrs. Astrid, as she looked smilingly around, "has not in the mean time prevented Susanna from being more sensible than us, for she has thought of the wedding-guests, while we have quite forgotten them. But we will now follow her!"

After the wedding-dinner, spiced with skals and songs, and especially with hearty merriment, Mrs. Astrid retired to her own room, and Alette assumed the hostess's office in the company.

Sitting at her writing-table, Mrs. Astrid, with an animated air, and quick respiration, sketched the following lines:

"Now come, come, my paternal friend, and behold your wishes, your prognostications fulfilled; come and behold happiness and inexpressible gratitude living in the bosom which so long was closed even to hope. Come, and receive my contrition for my pusillanimity, for my murmurings; come, and help me to be thankful! I long to tell you orally how much is changed within me; how a thousand germs of life and gladness, which I believed to be dead, now spring up in my soul restored to youth. I wonder daily over the feelings, the impressions which I experience; I scarcely know myself again. O my friend! how right you were—it is never too late!"

"Ah! that I could be heard by all oppressed, dejected souls! I would cry to them—'Lift up your head, and confide still in the future, and believe that it is never too late!' See! I too was bowed down by long suffering, and old age had moreover overtaken me, and I believed that all my strength had vanished; that my life, my sufferings were in vain—and behold! my head has been again lifted up, my heart appeased, my soul strengthened; and now, in my fiftieth year, I advance into a new future, attended by all that life has of beautiful and worthy of love."

"The change in my soul has enabled me better to comprehend life and suffering, and I am now firmly convinced that there is no fruitless suffering, and that no virtuous endeavour is in vain. Winter days and nights may bury beneath their pall of snow the sown corn; but when the spring arrives, it will be found equally true, that 'there grows much bread in the winter night.' It has pleased Providence to remove the covering from my eyes here upon earth; for many others will this only be removed when their eyes have closed on the earthly day; all will, however, one day see what I now see, and acknowledge what I now acknowledge with joy and thankfulness."

"Clear and bright now lies my way before me. In concert with my beloved children, with the teacher of my youth, and my friend, who I hope will spend in my house the evening of his days, I will convert this place into a vale of peace. And when I shall leave it and them, may peace still remain among them with my memory! And now, thou advancing age, which already breathes coldly on my forehead; thou winter twilight of earthly life, in which my days will sink more and more, come and welcome! I fear thee no longer; for it has become warm and light in my heart. Even under bodily spasms and pains, I will no more misconceive the value of life; but with an eye open to all the good upon earth, I will say to my dear ones:

Bewail me not, for I am still so blest,
The peace of heaven doth dwell within my breast."

Mrs. Astrid laid down her pen, and lifted up her tear-bright and beaming eyes; she caught sight of Harald and Susanna, who arm-in-arm wandered down the dale. They went on in gladness, and yet seemed to contend; and the question between them was, indeed, upon a most important matter—namely, which of them should hereafter have in their house the last word. Harald wished that this should hereafter be, as lord and master, his exclusive prerogative. Susanna declared that she should not trouble herself about his prerogative; but when she was in the right intended to persist in it to the uttermost. In the mean time they had unconsciously advanced to the spring—the Water of Strife—which had witnessed their first contention, and over which now doves, as at the first time, circled with silver-glancing wings. And here Harald seized Susanna's hand, led her to the spring, and said solemnly—

"My wife! I have hitherto spoken jestingly, but now is the moment of seriousness. Our forefathers swore by the bright water of Leipter, and I now swear by the water of this clear spring, that if thou hereafter shalt oppose me beyond the power of my mind to bear, I will silence thee, and compel thee to hold thy peace in this manner—"

The doves, attracted by some wonderful sympathy, now flew rapidly down upon the head and shoulders of the young couple. All strife was hushed, and you might hear the soft and playful murmur of the spring, which seemed to whisper about—what?

O heaven-azure well,
Say what thou now didst see!

The well whispered—

"By a kiss—two disputants Untied happily!"

"Aha! here we have them!" exclaimed a merry voice, a little way behind the two who were kissing; "but I must tell you that it is not polite thus to go from your guests, to—"

"Come, Susanna, interposed Alette smiling, while she took the arm of the deeply blushing Susanna, "come, and let us leave these egotistical gentlemen, who always will be waited upon, to themselves a little. It does them an infinite deal of good. We will in the mean time go together, and open our hearts to each other about them."

"Sweet Alette!" said Susanna, glad in this way to be released from Brother-in-law Lexow's jokes, "how happy it makes me to see you so gay and healthy, spite of your residence up in the North, which you feared so much."

"Ah!" said Alette, softly and sincerely, "a husband like my Lexow can make summer and happiness blossom forth all over the earth; but —" and now again the melancholy expression crept over Alette's countenance; but she constrained herself, and continued joyfully, "but we need not now hold forth in praise of these good gentlemen, who, I observe, have nothing better to do than to come and listen to us; and therefore—(and here Alette raised her voice significantly)—since we have done with my dear husband, we will give yours his well-merited share. Has he not shockingly many faults? Is he not—between us two—selfish and despotic?"

"That I deny!" exclaimed Harald, as he sprang forward, and placed himself before Susanna; "and thou, my wife, contradict it if thou—dare."

"Dare!" exclaimed Alette; "she must dare it, for you strengthen my word by your deed. Is he not a despot, Susanna?"

"Am I a despot, Susanna? I say a thousand times 'No!' thereto. What doest thou say?"

"I say—nothing," said Susanna blushing, with a graceful movement, and drew closer to Alette; "but—I think what I will."

"It is good, however," cried Harald, "that I have found out a way to have the last word!"

"Have you discovered that, brother-in-law?" said Lexow, laughing; "now, that is almost a more important discovery than that which Columbus made. Impart it to me above all things."

"It will serve you nothing at all," said Alette, as, with jesting defiance, she turned her pretty little head towards him; "because my last word is, in every case, a different kind of one to yours."

"How!"

"Yes. My last word, as well as my last thought, remains—Alf!"

"My Alette! my sweet Alette! why these tears?"

"Susanna," whispered Harald, "I will prepare you for it in time, that my last word remains—Sanna!"

"And mine—Harald!"

Susanna went now again on Harald's arm, Alette on her Alf's.

After we have, towards the end of our relation, presented such cheerful scenes—ah! why must we communicate one of a more tragical nature! But so fate commands, and we are compelled to relate, that — the grey and the white ganders—weep not, sentimental reader! which already, three weeks before Susanna's marriage, had been put up to fatten, closed a contentious life a few days before the same, and were united in a magnificent à la dube, which was served up and eaten, to celebrate the day of Harald's and Susanna's Last Strife and the beginning of an eternal union.

Often afterwards, during her happy married life, stood Susanna by the clear spring, surrounded by the feathered herd, which she fed, whilst she sang to two little, healthy, brown-eyed boys, and to a young blooming girl, this little song, with the conviction of a happy heart:

At times a little brawl
Injures not at all,
If we only love each other still
Cloudy heaven clears
Itself, and bright appears,
For such is Nature's will.
The heart within its cage
Is a bird in rage,
Which doth madly strive to fly
Love and truth can best
Flatter it to rest,
Flatter it to rest so speedily.*

AN AFTER-WORD.

FRIENDLY reader! Now that thou hast arrived at a happy conclusion of the foregoing contentions, thou perhaps dost not dream that now a contest exists between—thee and—me! But it will infallibly be so, if thou, as often has happened before, will call that a Novel, which I have called Sketches, and which have no pretension to the severe connexion and development of the novel; although, to be sure, they be connected. If thou wilt, on the contrary, regard them—for example—as blades of grass, or as flowers upon a meadow molehill, which wave in the wind upon their several stalks, but which have their roots in the same soil, and unfold themselves in the light of one common sun; behold then, we conclude in peace, and I wish only that they may whisper to thy heart some friendly word, respecting the point of light which may be found in every circumstance, in every portion of existence—respecting the spring, which, for noble souls, sooner or later, reveals itself from its wintry concealment. To the Norwegian authors, who in the mountain journey, or in my wandering among the legends of the country, were my guides, I here offer my thanks; and also from the depth of my heart to many benevolent and amiable people, whom I have become acquainted with in that beautiful country, in whose wounds one breathes so fresh and free, in whose hospitable bosom I also once found a dear and peaceful home.

THIS volume completes the published works of Miss Bremer. The introduction of these writings to the British public has been a great pleasure to me; and I am sure that they have not only strengthened many a heart in the fulfilment of daily duties, but have caused the path of household life to be strewn with the roses of love and kindness

We all owe thanks and gratitude to Fredrika Bremer; and whilst I shall endeavour, through the favour of the Public, to perfect still more and more these my translations, I now bid her for the present an affectionate farewell.

PART I.

ARRIVAL.—TEA.—PORTRAITS

TOWARDS the end of February 1829, I found myself one evening at the custom-house, waiting for the compulsory visit of the officer, after which I could enter the capital of Sweden. It was during a terrible storm, and I was sitting in a small open sledge, frozen, weary, and sleepy, and consequently, as thy compassionate soul may think, my affectionate young reader, not exactly in an enviable condition.

My poor little horse, which had a cold, coughed and sneezed. The fellow who drove me, crossed his arms over his body to warm himself. The tempest howled, and the snow whirled around us. I closed my eyes and waited, as I have often done, and have always found to be the best amid all snow-storms, as well within as out of the house, which one is not lucky enough to be able to escape. At length I heard slow steps advancing over the crackling snow. The inspector arrived with his lantern in his hand. He had a red nose, and looked unhappy. I held in my hand a bank-note, and wished to slip it into his, in order therewith to purchase for myself rest and an uninterrupted progress. He withdrew his hand. "It is not necessary," said he, dryly, but courteously. "I shall not give you much trouble," continued he, as he began to lift out my travelling bags and to disarrange my bundles and handboxes. I found myself, not without vexation, compelled to alight. Out of humour, and with a secret, mischievous pleasure, I dropped again my bank-note into my reticule, and thought, "Well, then, he shall not get anything for his trouble."

In the mean time my social driver began a conversation with him.

"It is dreadfully bad weather this evening, dear sir!"

"Yes."

"I think you would have found it a deal merrier to have been sitting in a warm room, and drinking a drop, instead of freezing your fingers with stopping us here, for which nobody thanks you."

No answer.

"I would give something now to be sitting with my old folks in the warm chimney corner, and eating my Sunday groats; that would taste well, sir."

"Yes, yes!"

"Are you married?"

"Yes."

"Have you children?"

"Yes."

"And how many then?"

"Four." And a deep sigh followed this answer.

"Four! Nay, then, you have mouths enough to fill. Aha! Now you think you have found out something contraband. Cheese, dear sir; cheese, you see. Yes, your mouth may well water. I'd wager that you would rather bite into it than into the moon. Nay, do you not see that that is nothing but a butter tub! Must you of necessity dip your fingers into the brine?" etc. etc.

After the inspector had convinced himself that only a prodigious quantity of cheeses, loaves, and gingerbread, made up for the most part the lading of the sledge, he arranged all again in the most exact order, gave me his hand to assist me into the sledge, and carefully wrapped the furs around me. My displeasure had in the mean time altogether vanished. "It is," thought I, "the duty of poor inspectors to be the plague and torment of travellers, and this one has been mine in the politest way in the world." And whilst he continued to replace every thing conscientiously and carefully, arose in my soul all kind of representations which mollified me yet more. The red frosted nose, the dejected look, the stiff fingers, the four children, the snowy weather, the dark dismal evening; all these arose within me like shadows in a camera obscura, and softened my heart. I felt again after the bank note; I thought about a loaf and a cheese as a supper for the poor children; but whilst I felt, whilst I thought, the inspector opened the bar, took off his hat politely, and I drove hastily through the barrier, wishing to call out "Halt!" but without doing so. With a heavy heart, and with the uncomfortable feeling as if I had lost something valuable on the way, I drove through the city, and saw in the white whirling snow-flakes before me, as if in a transparency, the frosted red nose, and the dejected countenance, upon which I could so easily, at least for a moment, have called up a glad expression.

How many opportunities for doing good, in great or in small degree, are lost through indecision! Whilst we are asking ourselves, Shall I, or shall I not! the moment is passed, and the flower of joy which we might have given is withered, and often can no more be revived by tears of repentance.

Thus thought I sadly as my sledge slowly moved through the deep snow-slush of the streets, and often sank down into a kennel, out of which it was raised with difficulty. The wind had blown out the lights in the lanterns, and the streets were scarcely lighted at all, except by the lamps in the shops. Here I saw a gentleman who had almost lost his cloak, and whilst he wrapped it tighter around him, the wind blew his hat off; there a lady, who, holding with one hand an umbrella, with the other her pelisse, went along blindly but courageously, and drove right upon a fruit-stall, whose sharp nosed proprietor bid her with a shrill voice to look better about her.

Here howled a dog; there swore a fellow who had driven his cart against another; a little lad went whistling gaily amid the snow-storm and the hurly-burly, which did not trouble his calm, childish mind. Ever and anon sped a covered sledge with lighted lamps, comet-like, on its beaming path, and driving aside both people and animals. This was all which I on this evening saw and heard of the great, magnificent capital. In order to enliven myself, I began to think about the amiable family in whose bosom I should soon find myself, on the glad occasion which took me there, with other cheerful, light, and soul-warming things which I could bring together in my memory. At length my sledge stopped. My driver exclaimed, "Now we are there!" and I said to myself enraptured, "Now then I am here!" and I soon heard around me many voices, which, in various but in joyful tones, exclaimed, "Good day!" "Good day!" "Good evening!" "Welcome! welcome!" I, my loaves, cheeses, gingerbread, we were all heartily welcome, and installed in an excellent and warm room.

Half an hour later, I sat in the handsome and well lighted drawing-room, where Colonel H— and his family were assembled. It was tea time; and from the boiling teakettle ascended a curling cloud of steam, which floated above the glittering teacups and the baskets up-heaped with cakes, rusks, and rye-loaves, which covered the ample tea-table. Telemachus, as he came out of Tartarus into the Elysian Fields, could not have felt a greater contentment than I, arrived from my snow-stormy journey, in the friendly haven of the tea-table. The gay, pleasant beings who moved around me; the excellent apartment; the lights, which in certain moments no little contribute to making the soul light; the enlivening, warming draught which I was enjoying; all was excellently animating, inspiring, all was—ah! wouldst thou believe it my reader! that the frosted nose there at the barrier, in the midst of my pleasurable sensations set itself on the edge of my teacup, and embittered to me its nectar! Yes, yes, but it did so; and I think that I should have been less shocked to have seen my own double. In order to regain my perfect peace, said I to myself, "To-morrow I will rectify my inattention; to-morrow!" and pacifying myself with my resolution for the morrow, I now seated myself, according to my way, silently in a corner of the room, knitting my stocking, sipping now and then from the teacup, which stood upon a little table beside me, and noticing unobservedly the family picture before me. Colonel H— sat in a corner of the sofa, and laid Patience, the blockade de Copenhagen, I fancy. He was tall and strong-built, but thin, and had a sickly appearance. His features were noble, and from his deeply sunken eyes beamed forth a penetrating but quiet glance, for the most part full of an almost divine goodness, especially when it was riveted upon his children. He spoke seldom, never made speeches, but his words, uttered slowly and with a certain calm strength, had generally the effect of an oracle. Seriousness and mildness governed his whole being. He carried himself uncommonly upright; and I have always imagined that this was less the result of his military bearing than of his inflexible honesty, his firm integrity, which were the groundwork of his character, and were mirrored in his exterior.

He did not mingle himself in the conversation which, this evening, was carried on with much animation among his children; but yet, now and then, let fall dryly witty observations, which, accompanied by an expression of countenance so archly comic, and yet at the same time so full of conciliating goodness towards those to whom they referred, that these felt both embarrassment and pleasure.

His wife ("her Honour," as I from old custom mostly call her,)—her Honour sat in the other corner of the sofa, and netted, but without particularly attending to her work. She seemed not to have been handsome even in her younger years, but had, especially when she spoke, something kind, lively, and interesting, which it was a pleasure to see. There was something tender, something restless in her manner, and especially in her eyes. One read there that she incessantly bore upon her heart that long, unending promemoria of thoughts and cares which, for a wife, mother, and housekeeper, begin with husband and child, go through all the concerns, all the least branches of home and domestic management, and never once come to an end; like the atoms of dust, which must be blown away, and which yet always fall again.

Her Honour's tender and restless glances dwell this evening most frequently upon Emilia, the eldest daughter, with an expression both of pleasure and pain. An affectionate smile fluted upon her lips, and tears glittered on her eyelids; but as in the smiles, so in the tears, beamed the warm and heartfelt mother's love.

Emilia seemed not to observe her mother's glances, for she served tea quite calmly with white and beautiful hands, whilst by a grave, dignified mien she endeavoured to put an end to the tricks of her brother Carl, who introduced into the tea-service all that disorder which, as he asserted, existed in his sweet sister's own heart. She was of middle size, a stiff figure, but well-grown. Blond, fair, but without regular beauty of feature, her agreeable countenance was particularly attractive, from the expression of purity, kindness, and integrity which rested upon it. She seemed to have inherited her father's quiet character, united, at the same time, to greater gaiety, for she laughed frequently, spite of her assumed dignity, and that so heartily, that she seduced all the rest to join her.

It is becoming to very few people to laugh; one sees too many persons who during this expression of mirth, place the handkerchief before the face, to conceal the disagreeableness which is occasioned by the puckered up eyes, the movements of the stretched-out mouth, etc. etc. Emilia, had it been necessary for her to resort to this measure of prudence, would have scorned it,—she was, even in the least things, all too simple and upright to practise a single coquettish manoeuvre. She had not, however, in this case, any necessity, for her laugh was infinitely charming, as well because it was so naive and so heartfelt, as that it displayed the liveliest white teeth, that adorned a sweet and fresh mouth; yet of this she never thought.

If I had been a young fellow, I should have thought, the moment I saw Emilia, "Behold there my wife!" (N.B.—If she will.)

But yet Emilia was not in every thing as she seemed, or, rather, she had a good deal of that inconsequence which may be interwoven and united even with the noblest human natures, even as there are knots in the finest and noblest webs.

Besides all this, Emilia was no longer in her first youth; and thou, my young sixteen-year-old reader, wilt perhaps consider her very, very old. "How old was she, then?" askest thou, perhaps. She had just passed her six-and-twentieth year. "Uh! that is horrible! she was indeed an old, old person!" Not so horrible—not so old, my rosebud. She was merely a rose in its full bloom, and so thought also Mr. —; but of this hereafter.

I pity the painter to whom the difficult task should be given of painting Julie's portrait, for she is the perpetuum mobile in more than one sense. Now she played tricks on her brother, who never left a debt of this kind unpaid; now employed herself in another way with her sisters. Sometimes she snuffed the candles, and snuffed them out, in order to have the pleasure of relighting them; she arranges or disarranges the ribbons of her mother's negligée, and sneaks often behind the Colonel, lays her arms around his neck, and kisses his forehead; his exclamation, "Let me alone, girl!" terrifying her by no means from soon coming again.

A charming little head, around which rich plaits of fair hair formed a crown, blue, lively eyes, dark eyelashes and eyebrows, a well-shaped nose with a little high-bred curve, a somewhat large but handsome mouth, a small, delicate figure, small hands, small feet, more willing to dance than to walk—see there Julie, eighteen years of age.

Brother Carl—ah, I beg pardon—Cornet Carl, was three ells high, well grown, easy in his movements—thanks to nature, gymnastics, and Julie. He had a many peculiar ideas, as steadfast as the hills, three of which are his favourite ideas: Firstly, that the Swedish people are the first and most superior people in Europe. Against this none of his family contend. Secondly, he never should fall in love, because he was twenty years of age without ever having felt his heart beat, whilst many of his more fortunate companions had gone crazy out of pure love. "It will come in time," said the Colonel. Julie said he would presently be over head and ears in love. Emilia sighed, and prayed that God might defend him. Thirdly, the Cornet fancied that he was so ugly that he should even frighten horses. Julie said that this peculiarity was very fortunate for him in case of an attack of the enemy's cavalry; but she, as well as her sisters and many others, regarded the open, honest, manly expression of her brother's countenance as a full compensation for any lack of beauty in feature. She often repeated to him with a secret little joy how horribly ugly and unbearable she found Mr. P., with the handsome Apollo-head without expression and life. Cornet Carl loved his sisters tenderly, and rendered them all the service which lay in his power, more especially that of trying their patience.

Near to her father sate the youngest of the daughters, the seventeen-year-old Helena. At the first glance one cast upon her, one was ready to pity her; at the next to wish her happiness. She was plain and humpbacked, but intellect and cheerfulness beamed from her uncommonly bright eyes. She seemed to possess that steadfastness and repose of character, that clearness of mind, that stability and cheerfulness, which give a more sure guarantee for the repose and happiness of life than all those showy outward attractions which are worshipped and loved by the world. She was working zealously at a dress of white silk, and now looked up from her work to nod kindly and significantly at Emilia, or to raise to her father a glance of reverential, almost adoring tenderness.

One might almost fancy that the Colonel, most of all his children, loved this one whom nature seemed so hardly to have used, for often when Helena would lay her head upon her father's shoulder, and raise to him her affectionate glance, he would bend himself down to her, and kiss her forehead with an expression of tenderness which cannot be described. On the other side of the Colonel sate a young lady, the daughter of a relative. One might have taken her for an antique statue; so beautiful, so marble-white, so immovable was she. More beautiful dark eyes than hers were never seen; but ah! she certainly was to be pitied. Those beautiful eyes never more could behold the light of day. She had been blind from cataract for four years. That which ruled in her soul, whether storm or shine, it was difficult to see; its mirror was darkened, and something proud, cold, and almost half-dead, lay in her exterior, and repelled all questioning glances. It seemed to me as if she had said, with a feeling of proud despair, in the hour when fate announced to her "Thou shalt no more see light,"—said, with a solemn oath, "No one shall see my suffering!"

Still one other little group must come forth in my picture; namely, that which in the background of the room consisted of Magister* Nup, distinguished for his good-nature, learning, silence, shortsightedness, his turned-up nose, and his absence of mind; together with his pupils, the little Axel and the little Claes, the youngest sons of the Colonel, remarkable for their especial good condition and plumpness; for which reason they had in the family the surname of "the Dumplings."

The Magister, spite of his wig having taken fire three times, hung now with his nose over his book in the nearest possible proximity to the light. The Dumplings ate rusks and played at the famished fox, and waited for the fourth illumination of the Magister's head; the approach of which they announced to each other every now and then, by friendly elbow jogs, and "See now! Wait now! Now it comes!"

Now I should like inexpressibly to know whether any of my amiable young readers, either out of a great politeness or a little curiosity, would wish to have any nearer description of the person who sits in a corner of the room, stock still, knitting her stocking, sipping now and then from her cup of tea, and making her remarks on the company.

In order that I may not leave any wish of my readers unfulfilled, I will also give a sketch of her. She belongs to that class of persons of whose existence a simple member of the sisterhood has thus expressed herself: "Sometimes it is as if one were everywhere, sometimes again it is as if one were nowhere." This strange existence belongs in general to persons who, without belonging to families, are received into them, for sociality, for help, for counsel and action, in pleasure and in need. I will, in a few words, give a description of such a person in general; and in order that she may not remain without any part in our titled social circle, I will bestow on her the title of "House Counsellor." Her sphere of action is extensive, and is of the following nature. She may have her thoughts, her hand, her nose, in every thing, and foremost in every thing—but it must not be observed. Is the gentleman of the house in a bad humour? Then is she pushed forward either in the capacity of a lightning-conductor or else a pair of bellows, whose property it is to blow away the tempest. Has the lady the vapours? Then her presence is as necessary as the bottle of eau de Cologne. Have the daughters vexation? Then she is there to share it. Have they little wishes, plans, projects? Then she is the speaking trumpet through which they speak to deaf ears. If the children cry, then they send for her to pacify them. Will they not sleep? She must tell them stories. Is anybody ill? She watches. She executes commissions for the whole family, and good counsel must she have on all occasions, ready for everybody. Does grand company come? Is the house put in gala-array then? She vanishes; people know not where she is, no more than they know where the smoke which ascended up the chimney is gone; but the works of her invisible presence cease not to betray her. One sees not upon the festal board the pan in which the cream was boiled; this must stand quietly upon the kitchen hearth; and in like manner is it the lot of the House Counsellor to prepare the useful and the agreeable, but to renounce the honour. If she can do this with stoical patience and resignation, then is her existence often as interesting for herself as it is important in the family circle. It is true that she must be humble and quiet, go softly through doors, must move with less noise than a fly, and above all things, not like this, settle upon people's noses; must yawn as seldom as her human nature will allow. But on the contrary, she may use eyes and ears in freedom, although with prudence, and she has excellent opportunities to derive benefit therefrom. Contrary to what is required in the physical world, there is in the moral world no place so useful for an observatory as the lowly one unobserved by all eyes; and consequently the House Counsellor possesses the most advantageous position for directing around the family hemisphere her searching telescope. Every movement, every spot upon the heart's planet, becomes visible by degrees to her; the smallest wandering comet she follows upon its path; she sees the eclipses come and go; and whilst she observes the phenomena, the growing feelings and thoughts in the human soul, more countless than the stars of heaven, she learns day after day to comprehend and interpret one point after another of the Creator's great and admirable hieroglyphics. One sees, therefore, that she by degrees must acquire a good deal of that precious, ever-applicable gold, which is called knowledge of mankind; and the hope smiles upon her, that she, in the future, when spectacles adorn her nose and silver hair her aged brow, shall, as an oracle, talk to listening youth of that which she knows, and which they now do not anticipate.

So much for the personality of the House Counsellor in general. A few words now on that one who, in the family of Colonel H—, must fill this character to a certain extent. To a certain extent I say, because, thank God, she is regarded there more as a friend, and has therefore not the post of the prompter, nor stands behind the scenes; but steps often forth upon the stage, and says her word just as freely and unreservedly as any of the other actors.

The first word which her childish lips stammered forth after her twelvemonth's sojourn upon this lower earth, was "Moon." Eight years after this, she wrote her verses "To the Moon;" and the morning of a life which since then developed itself so dryly and prosaically, was a lovely poetical moonlight dream. Many a sonnet, many an ode, was consecrated by her pen to all the most attractive objects of nature, whilst the rich youthful days in which the heart beat so high, in which the feelings swelled like a spring flood, and in which the abundant well of tears flowed from so sweet a pain,—but in all which she sung, wrote, or dreamed, there was always something of moonshine.

The parents shook their wise heads. "Girl, if thou writest verses, thou wilt never learn to make soup; thou wilt let the sauce burn. Thou must think betimes that thou must learn to maintain thyself; must be able to spin thy thread and bake thy bread. One cannot satisfy oneself with moonshine." But the girl wrote her verses, and boiled the soup, and did not burn the sauce; turned round her spinning-wheel, baked her bread; but forgot not her childhood's friend, the gentle moon. Afterwards, when its friendly light shone upon the grave of her parents, she wrote no verses in their honour, but looked up with a beseeching glance to the mild heavenly countenance, as to a comforter, whose light should enliven and guide the fatherless and motherless upon her solitary way. But ah! the fatherless and the motherless might have nearly famished in the beloved moonlight, had not another light, and other beams, brought to her salvation. This came from the hearth of a count's kitchen. She succeeded in the preparation of a wine-jelly, and this made her fortune.

People had discovered in her the talent of making excellent wine jelly; people became by degrees aware that she also possessed some other similar invaluable gifts. One young lady with chapped lips found herself greatly benefited by her lip-salve; one old gentleman found in her, to his great comfort, a never-weary listener to the histories of his forty-nine ailments. The tender mother of four little wonderfully gifted children, heard with deep emotion from their rosy lips, of her uncommon ability in rhyming together father and rather, pleasure and treasure, little and brittle, birth-day and mirth-day, etc. etc. A sleepy honourable lady was all at once wide awake when this same talented person prophesied by the cards that she would very soon receive a present; nine persons celebrated within a short time her excellent advice for toothach, pain in the chest, and for colds in the head; and at a bridal and a funeral, people discovered in her a wonderful faculty for arranging all, from "her grace's" head-dress down to the dish of confectionary, from the myrtle wreath in the locks of the bride down to the bread and butter on the table with the brandy; and at the solemn marriage festival, as well as the decking of the last resting-place of the dead bride, as well as the entertainment of those who, even on mournful occasions, never forget that people must eat to live.

By the industrious use of these talents, and by the bringing forth of others of a similar kind, she rose by degrees, step by step, to the rank of a House Counsellor. The writing of verses she had almost entirely forgotten, excepting that now and then some meagre lines were forced out from duty.

Upon the moon she looks but seldom, unless to observe when it is new moon or waning; and yet its beams are perhaps the only friends which will visit her lonely grave. But here is not now the question about writing elegies. Will anybody now know anything more about the prosaic friend of the moon? Her age! That is somewhere between twenty and forty years. Her appearance! As most people's is; although, perhaps, most people might be quite offended if they were thought to have any resemblance to her. Her name! Ah! your most obedient servant,

CHRISTINA BRATA HVARDAGSLAG.

JULIE'S LETTER.—HELENA.—THE BLIND.—EMILIA.
THE BRIDEGROOMS.

I HAVE already said that it was a happy occasion which was the cause of my journey to the capital; and I should therefore give the best account of it if I laid before the eyes of my young readers the letter which I a short time before received, in my solitude in the country, from Julie H—.

My best Beata,

Lay aside thy eternal knitting when thou seest these lines; snuff thy long-wicked candle. (It is, is it not, in the evening that the post comes to R—?) Bolt thy door, so that, without any fear of being disturbed, thou canst sit in peace and comfort on thy sofa, and with the besitting attention read the great, remarkable news I have to announce to thee. I can see from here how horribly curious thou art—how thy eyes open—and now I will tell thee—a tale!

There was once upon a time a man—who was neither king nor prince, but who yet deserved to be these. He had a daughter; and although fate had not permitted her to be born a princess, yet there assembled themselves half a score of gracious fairies around the little one's cradle, merely out of pure esteem and kindness to her father. They gave to her beauty, understanding, grace, talents, a noble heart, good temper, patience, in one word, all which can be given to make a woman charming; and in order to complete the measure of good gifts, stepped forth, last of all, the fairy Prudence, speaking thus, in carefully selected words: "For the sake of her temporal and eternal welfare, shall she be in the highest degree prudent and circumspect, nay, even difficult, in the choice of a husband!" "Well said; wisely said!" exclaimed all the lady-fairies, amid deep sighs.

The richly-gifted one grew up, was as amiable as any one might reasonably expect, and lovers soon knocked early and late in the day, with sighs and prayers, upon the door of her heart. But ah! for the most of them it remained immovably bolted; and if it were, only for a moment, opened a very little to any one, it was closed again in the next minute, and fastened with double bolts. Fortunately, the time of the Princess Turandot was long passed; and in Sweden, where the lovely Elimia dwelt, the air must have been of a much cooler kind than that of the land where Prince Calaf sighed—for one never heard of the rejected lovers putting an end to their days; one saw them scarcely lose their appetite; yes, one even hears of some who (would any one believe it!) choose a beloved with as much indifference as one chooses a stocking.

The first who announced himself as pretendent to the heart of the beautiful Elimia was found by her to be too sentimental, because he was horrified at the crime of killing a gnat, and sighed over the innocent chickens which figured as roast upon the dinner-table, and besides were the favourite dish of his beloved. United to him, she feared being in danger of being starved to death on pure blanc-mange and vegetables. The second did not avoid treading upon emmets, loved fishing and hunting, and looked as if he were cruel and hard-hearted; rather, much rather, would she marry a hare than a hunter! A hare came, shy in look, trembling in his knees, stammering forth his sighs, his wishes, and his doubts. "Poor little thing," was the answer, "go and hide thyself, thou wilt otherwise be the prey of the first wild beast which meets thee in his path!" The hare hopped away. The lion-man stepped forth with proud lover-word. Now the beauty was in great fear of being eaten up, and she hid herself till the mighty one was gone past. This was the fourth. The fifth, merry and gay, was considered to be trifling; the sixth was believed to have an inclination for gambling; the seventh, in consequence of two or three pimples on his nose, to be inclined to strong liquors; the eighth looked as if he could be ill-tempered; the ninth seemed to be an egotist; the tenth said in every sentence, "the devil fetch me!"—it would not be well to venture forth into life with him. The eleventh looked too much upon his hands and feet, and was therefore a fool. The twelfth came. He was good, noble, manly, handsome; he seemed to love honestly; he talked well; people were in great perplexity what faults they should find in him. He seemed to love truly, but perhaps only seemed; or if he loved, perhaps it was rather the attractive, perishable body than the immortal soul.—God help us, what heavy sin! If it continued so then—but the lover swore that it was the soul, precisely the soul itself which he adored, and in that fortunate moment he so powerfully assailed the already yielding heart, that in the end her trembling lips moved themselves in such a way that he saw they must open the door through which the capitulating yes must proceed. He took this all for settled, regarded the word as said, fell upon his knees, kissed her hand and mouth, and lovely Elimia, ready to fall down with astonishment and confusion, found herself, she did not know how, betrothed.

The marriage was fixed by her father and her bridegroom for a short time afterwards. Elimia did not say yes to that, but neither did she say no; and her bridegroom thought "silence gives consent." As the time went on, the lovely Elimia counted. "Now there are only fourteen, now only twelve; Gracious Heaven! now only ten; and Lord God! now only eight days remaining!" Now a great anguish and horror overcame her soul. Spectral and ghostly shapes, numerous as the locusts which overwhelmed Egypt, took possession of her hitherto so bright and calm spirit, and called forth there uneasiness and darkness. Now she wished to delay, not to say break off, her engagement with the noble Almanzor; who certainly, said she, had a many more faults than people believed; and one uncommonly great one, that of being so well able to hide them. Perfection is not the lot of human nature; and they who seem to be most free from faults, are perhaps, in fact, the least so. Besides which, she fancied that their characters did not at all harmonise; further, he was too young, but she too old; and so on; and the sum and end of all was, that she should be unhappy for the whole of her lifetime.

A very good friend of Elimia had the greatest desire in the world to break the neck of the fairy Prudentia, whose unlucky gifts caused Elimia to thrust from her the happiness which awaited her in her union with a husband who seemed altogether made for her, and devoted to her in the tenderest manner.

Now, I see how impatient thou art, Beata, and askest what is the sum and substance of all this, and what purpose it serves! All this, my good friend, will serve, first and foremost, as a little whet to the appetite before dinner, because I have to shew thee what wonderful magic power is suddenly bestowed upon the little Julie; for with a few strokes of my pen I change all my above-mentioned personages; make once into now, and the tale into truth.

Almanzor then becomes the young, amiable Algernon S—; and his bride, lovely Elimia, my sister Emilia H—, who so bitterly repents of the "yes" which she has given. The fairy Prudentia again must undergo a great change; and is nothing else but the fickleness and irresolution which have so strong a power over Emilia's heart that it now questions whether she is determined to enter the holy condition of matrimony. If one do not now from all sides push her onward, she will go, like the crabs, backwards. Now this Emilia, whom I so inwardly love, and who often makes me so impatient, sits in the corner of the sofa opposite to me; is pale and restless; thinks upon her wedding-day—and has the vapours! Must one laugh about it or cry? I do both, and make Emilia do the same.

The only thing that one can now do, to prevent poor Emilia from pondering and beating her brains, troubling and distressing herself for nothing, is to allow every thing to go topsy-turvy, with bustle and stir around her, till the wedding-day—and turn her head, if possible. I know that papa would never allow any of us to break a given promise. Emilia knows this too; and I fancy that it is precisely this which makes her so dejected. And yet she loves Algernon; yea, admires him at times; but she would, for all that, if she dared, give him now a refusal. Tell me how can one explain this—how does it hang together? Still, however, when her fate is once inevitably determined, I know that that all will be well; and the drollery of the affair is, that Emilia thinks so too. In the mean time, in the next week all will be in order. On Sunday, that is to-morrow week, is the horrible wedding-day. Emilia will be married at home, and only a few acquaintance will be invited. Emilia wishes it to be so, and people gratify her now in every thing which she desires, if it be only reasonable. She says people do so with all poor sacrifices. Comical idea! Thou seest, best Beata, how necessary thy presence here is for us all. In truth, we need in every respect thy council and thy aid. Pack up, therefore, thy things immediately, and journey here as quickly as thou canst.

On Monday Algernon comes to Stockholm, and with him my bridegroom also. I have not been so hard to please, so anxious as Emilia, and yet have not chosen badly. My Arvid is an Adonis, and has a heart which is worth gold. Papa thinks much of him, and that is the most important thing. My good, my revered, my beloved papa! I had so firmly resolved never to leave him and mama—I cannot imagine how I ever determined to be a bride; but my Arvid was irresistible. Papa, however, has Helena, who never will marry, and Helena is worth three such Julies as I am. Papa was at first much against my marriage, and had so many objections that it was nearly given up altogether; but I threw myself upon my knees and wept, and Arvid's father (the friend of papa's youth) made such beautiful speeches, and Arvid himself looked so cast down, that papa in the end was softened, and said, "Nay, they may then have one another! And Arvid and I exulted like two larks. Thou wilt see him; he has a dark moustache, and imperial large blue eyes, the loveliest—but thou wilt see—thou wilt see! He has the most beautiful son de voix in the world, and Emilia may say what she will, but it is actually charming when he says, "The thousand fetch me!"

It sounds strange, perhaps, thou thinkest—but thou shalt see, thou shalt hear! Come, come, and embrace, at the latest on the evening after to-morrow. Thy friend, JULIE H.

P.S.—Bring with thee, I pray, some of the beautiful loaves which thou knowest that papa and mama think so much of: some cheese for Carl and Helena, and a little gingerbread for me. Thou hast always a store of such. Emilia, poor Emilia, poor Emilia! methinks, will have quite enough to swallow down her vapours. Thou canst not conceive how afraid I am that she may, out of pure disquiet or grief, be quite yellow or ugly when Algernon comes. Emilia, I fancy, almost wishes it in order to put his love to her immortal soul to the test. I fancy, actually, that she would require him to love her just the same if she were changed into a mole! I am really troubled. Emilia is so changeable in her appearance, and is quite another person when she is anxious and uneasy than when she is calm and cheerful. Once more farewell.

P.S.—Dost thou know who is to marry Emilia?—Professor L.; who looks so horribly grave, has a twisted foot, a red eye, and two warts upon his nose. He has lately received a living. Papa has much esteem and friendship for him. As far as I am concerned I should find no great pleasure in being married by a weak-eyed priest. But I am not to be married for a couple of years, or, perhaps, in the autumn, therefore it is not worth while thinking about it now.

I had nearly forgotten the innumerable greetings of the whole family to thee.

I immediately accepted Julie's invitation, and arrived, as has already been seen, one evening at the end of February at Colonel H's.

There remain yet a few words to be said on the occurrences of this evening, and I knit again to these the thread of my narrative. The blind girl, who had sat for a time silent and still, said at length with a kind of vehemence:

"I would sing." Helena rose up quickly, led her to the piano, and sat down to accompany her. Helena inquired what she would sing. "Ariadne à Naxos," was the short determined answer. They began. In the beginning the voice of the singer was not pleasant to me; it was strong, deep, almost dejected; but the more attentively one listened, the more one paid regard to the feeling which spoke through it, and which it revealed with magical truth, the more one was enchanted: one shuddered involuntarily; one felt one's heart beat in sympathy with Ariadne when she, penetrated by an increasing anguish, seeks for her beloved, and takes the resolution to climb the rock in order that there she may the more easily be able to discover him. The accompaniment here expressing in a masterly manner her climbing, one seems to see how she hastened breathless and full of foreboding. At length she has neared the top, her eye is cast over the sea, and perceives the white, ever receding sail. The blind girl followed Ariadne with her whole soul, and one might have believed by the expansion of her eyes, that she saw something more than—mere darkness. Tears involuntarily filled all eyes as she, with a heart-rending expression of love and pain in voice and countenance, exclaimed with Ariadne, "Theseus! Theseus!" When her inspiration and our delight had reached the highest point, the Colonel suddenly rose up, went to the piano, took the singer by the hand, led her away without saying a single word, and placed her again upon the sofa, when he seated himself beside her. I remarked that she hastily withdrew her hand from his. She was deathly pale and much excited. No one except myself appeared to be astonished at this scene. They began an indifferent conversation, in which every one, excepting the blind girl, took part. In about an hour the Colonel said to her, "You need rest;" and with that arose and conducted her from the room, after she silently, but with a kind of solemnity, bowed her head in salutation of the remaining company. Just as he was about to leave the room, the Colonel called, "Helena," and Helena followed them.

Soon after this I went up into my room to enjoy repose; but the image of the blind girl which incessantly floated before me, prevented me long from doing so. I heard her penetrating voice, saw her expressive countenance, and could not help endeavouring to guess the nature of the feelings which shook her soul.

I was not yet asleep as Emilia and Julie softly stole into their room, which lay next to mine. The door stood open, and I heard the half-aloud conversation of the two sisters. Julie said with some vexation, "You yawn, you sigh, and yet Algernon comes in the morning! Emilia, you have no more feeling than a paper-box."

EMILIA How do you know but that this is out of sympathy with Algernon, who perhaps just now does the same!

JULIE That does he not: that I am sure of. Much rather do I believe that he hardly knows on which foot he stands, out of impatient joy of soon seeing you.

EMILIA Do you judge this from his last letter?

JULIE That, indeed, was written in such haste. One is not always alike inclined for writing; perhaps he had a severe headache, or a bad cold in the head, or he had taken cold.

EMILIA Whatever you will; but nothing can excuse the cold, unmeaning end of the letter.

JULIE I assure you, Emilia, it stands there "with the tenderest devotion."

EMILIA And I am certain that it stands there quite dry and cold, "with esteem and devotion remain," and so on; just as as people write to an indifferent person, "subscribed with esteem," and so on; for the meagre esteem must always remain where the warmer feelings are gone. Where is my night-cap! Ah, see there! Ho! ho! ho! ho! You, Julie, see everything rose-coloured.

JULIE I see that a lover must take care never to speak of esteem. But I am sure that Algernon never wrote that horrible word, using one warmer and heartfelt. Sweet Emilia, fetch his letter. You will there see that you have done him injustice.

EMILIA On purpose to please you, I will fetch his letter. We shall then see that I am right.

JULIE And we shall see that I am right.

Emilia fetched the letter. Both sisters approached the light with it. Julie would snuff the candle; and either by accident or intention, snuffed it out. For a moment all was as silent as it was dark, and then Emilia's hearty laughter was heard. Julie joined in; and I could not avoid making a trio with them. Tumbling over, and running against chairs and tables, the sisters at length found their beds, and cried, laughing, to me, "Good-night, good-night!"

The day after my arrival was in the house the so-called "cleaning-day;" a day which now and then enters into all well ordered houses; and which may be likened to a tempestuous day in nature, after whose storms and rain-gusts all comes forth in renewed brightness, order, and freshness.

They scoured, aired, dusted, and swept in all corners. Her Honour, who would herself oversee every thing, went incessantly in and out through all the doors, and mostly left them all open, which occasioned a horrible draught. In order to preserve myself from earache and toothache, I fled from one room to another, and found at length in Helena's, up another flight of stairs, a haven free from storm. This little apartment seemed to me the most comfortable and most cheerful in the whole house. It had windows towards the sunny side; the walls were ornamented with pictures, which for the most part represented charming landscapes. Among these were distinguished two from Fabbrantz, in which the pencil of this great artist had conjured up the enchanting repose which a beautiful summer evening diffuses over nature, and which communicates itself so powerfully to the human heart. The eye which fixed itself attentively upon these pictures expressed quickly something loving, pensive, and dreamy; and this was the surest guarantee for their truthful beauty.

The furniture of the room was handsome and convenient. A piano, a well-filled bookcase, and easel for painting, shewed that in this little circumscribed world there failed nothing of all that which can make the pleasures of the outer world dispensable, and which can occupy the passing hours of the day in the most agreeable manner.

Large, splendid geraniums stood in the windows, and awoke, by their fresh verdure, pleasant thoughts of spring, whilst they softened and broke up the beams of the sun, which on this day shone in all the brilliancy which they commonly possess in the keen winter frost. A beautiful carpet covered the floor, which seemed to be scattered over with flowers.

Helena was seated on the sofa, at her sewing. The New Testament lay before her on her work-table.

She received me with a smile expressive of the heart's peace and satisfaction. I placed myself near to her at my work, and felt myself particularly cheerful and happy of mood. We worked at Emilia's bridal-dress.

"You observe my room," said Helena the while, smiling, whilst her eyes took the direction of mine. "Yea," replied I; "your sister's rooms are handsome and excellent, but one must confess that they are not to be compared with this."

"It has been my father's will," said she, "that Helena should be the only spoiled child in the house." She continued, with tears in her eyes, "My good papa has wished that I should never miss the joys and pleasures which are the lot of my handsome, healthy sisters, and from which I am excluded by my suffering and my infirmity. Therefore he has taught me to enjoy that which is far richer, which a knowledge and practice of the fine arts offer to those who embrace them with a warm and open mind. He therefore formed and strengthened my understanding, by regular, and anything but superficial studies, which he himself directed. He has therefore collected in this little corner, where I pass the greater part of my life, so much which is charming and beautiful for the eye, for the feelings, and the thoughts. Yet, what is more than all this, is the heartfelt fatherly love with which he embraces and surrounds me: and this secures me from ever bitterly feeling the want of love, whose enjoyment nature has denied me. He has perfectly succeeded; and I have no other wish than that of living for him, for my mother, my family, and—my God."

We were silent for a moment, and I worshipped in my heart the father who so well understood how to care for the happiness of her to whom he had given life. Helena continued, "When mamma is gone with my sisters to balls or into company, he passes his time for the most part with me. I read to him, play to him; and he permits me, out of indescribable goodness, to believe that I contribute essentially to the happiness of his life. That thought makes me happy. It is a beautiful, an enviable lot, to know that one is something to him who is a blessing to all who surround him."

"Oh!" thought I, and addressed in thought the fathers of families on the earth, "why are so few like this father! Kings of home, how much happiness could you not diffuse around you, how worshipped might you not be!"

We talked afterwards of Emilia.

"It is strange," said Helena, "that a person who generally is so calm, so clear in her judgments, so decided, so reasonable, in one word, should in this one point be so unlike herself. Determined to marry, because she regards a happy marriage as the most blessed condition on earth, Emilia has had the greatest possible difficulty to determine herself to it. Two of her young friends having most unhappily married, has infused into her a sort of panic dread; and she fears so much being unhappy in her marriage, that she never would have the courage to be happy, if others did not act for her. She is now nearly half ill with anxiety, that her union is so near at hand with Algernon S—, for whom she seems to have an actual devotion, and with whom we are all convinced that she will be perfectly happy. She has intervals of calm, and in such a one you saw her last evening. I fear that it will soon be over, and expect that with it we shall see her disquiet and irresolution increase in proportion as the deciding hour approaches, which, as I am persuaded, will perfectly put an end to it; for when once anything irrevocable is determined, Emilia submits herself, and seeks the best in every thing. It will be necessary that till the wedding-day we endeavour in every possible way to divert her, and prevent her from occupying herself with useless fancies. We have each one of us our particular part in the little comedy which we must act before and with our good sister. Papa means to make her walk industriously; mamma consults with her about every thing which now must be arranged before the wedding. Julie intends, in one way or another, never to leave her quiet. Brother Carl will often draw her into dispute about Napoleon, whom he places below Charles the Twelfth, which she cannot bear; and this is the only subject on which I have heard my quiet, good sister dispute with warmth. I, on the contrary, shall occupy her much about her toilet. My little brothers, taught by nature, have known their parts for a long time by heart, which consist in clamouring incessantly, now for this, now for that. Hitherto we have all of us divided the care of satisfying them, now it must all rest upon her alone. You, good Beata, will be delegated, upon every fitting occasion, and in a skilful manner, to introduce commendations of Algernon, which you will not find dif-scult to award him. Emilia looks upon us all as a party for him; you cannot be suspected of it, and your praise will therefore operate all the better."

I was quite pleased with my commission. It is always agreeable to praise people when one can do it with a good conscience.

After we had spoken for a long time of Emilia and her beloved, of her establishment, and so on, I turned the conversation upon the blind girl, and endeavoured to obtain more knowledge of her.

Helena avoided this subject, and merely said, "Elisabeth has been a year with us. We like her, and hope in time to win her confidence, and thereby be able to make her happier."

After this, Helena proposed to me to visit her. "I go, generally," said she, "every forenoon to her, and have not been there to-day. I would willingly give her much of my time, if she would not rather be alone."

We went together to the blind girl's room.

She sat dressed upon her bed, and sang softly to herself.

"Oh, how much has she not suffered! she is a living image of pain!" thought I, as I now approached her, and in the daylight contemplated that pale, lovely countenance, in which were intelligible traces of a severe and not yet ended fight, and of a pain too deep, too bitter, to be expressed by tears.

A young girl, whose rosy cheeks and gay exterior formed a strong contrast with the poor sufferer, sat in a corner of the room and sewed. She was there to wait upon the blind girl. With a touching cordiality in word and voice, Helena spoke to Elisabeth; she replied coldly and in monosyllables! It seemed to me as if she endeavoured, after we entered, to assume by degrees that cold and inanimate expression which I remarked in her on the foregoing evening. The conversation was continued only between Helena and me, whilst the blind girl silently occupied herself with winding and unwinding a black silk cord around her remarkably beautiful hands. All at once she said, "at! at!" and a faint crimson flamed up on her cheeks, and her bosom heaved higher. We were silent and listened; after a few seconds we heard the dull sound of footsteps, which slowly approached. "It is he!" said she, as if to herself. I looked inquiringly upon Helena. Helena looked upon the ground. The Colonel entered. The blind girl rose up, and remained standing still as a statue; yet I thought that I remarked in her a light tremor. The Colonel talked to her with his customary calmness, although, as I thought, not with his customary kindness; and said that he was come to fetch her, because he would drive out her and Emilia. "The air," added he, "is fresh and clear, it will do you good."

"Me good?" said she with a bitter smile; but without heeding it the Colonel desired Helena to assist her in dressing. The blind girl said nothing, let herself be silently dressed, thanked nobody, and went out conducted by the Colonel.

"Poor Elisabeth," said Helena with a compassionate sigh, when she was gone. I had not indeed the key to this enigmatical being, but had seen enough to make me sigh also heavily. "Poor Elisabeth!"

We returned to our work, which was continued, amid pleasant conversation, till noon.

I went then to Emilia, who was returned from her drive, and found her contending with Julie, who endeavoured with real anxiety to take from her a dress which Emilia seemed to wish to put on. Emilia laughed heartily; Julie, on the contrary, looked as if she would cry.

"Help, Beata, help!" exclaimed she, "did any one ever hear or see such a thing? Listen, Beata! Precisely because Emilia expects Algernon to-day will she put on her ugliest dress—yes, a dress which becomes her so ill that she does not look like herself in it! And not satisfied with that, she will put on an apron as thick as a swaddling-band, and she will put a comb in her hair which Medusa must certainly have left among her effects, it was so horrible! Now I have contended and laboured for a quarter of an hour against this unlucky toilet, but in vain!"

"If in Algernon's eyes," said Emilia with a dignified air and countenance, "merely a dress or a comb can contribute to make one agreeable or disagreeable, then—"

"See, there we have it!" exclaimed Julie disconcerted, "now we are come to the proofs, and I know not how ugly and horrible she may make herself in order to prove whether Algernon will not exceed in fidelity all the most renowned heroes of romance. I pray you, for God's sake, do not cut off either your ears or your nose!" Emilia laughed. "And you could so easily be handsome and amiable," continued Julie, beseeching earnestly, whilst she endeavoured to get possession of the unfortunate dress and comb. "I have determined to be thus dressed to-day," answered Emilia solemnly, "I have my reasons for it, and if I awaken your and Algernon's abhorrence—then I must submit myself to my fate."

"Emilia will nevertheless be handsome," said I to Julie with an attempt to console her, "go now and dress yourself for dinner. Think that you also have a bridegroom to please."

"Ah," said Julie, "with him this is not difficult; if I were to dress myself in a bag and put a jug on my head, he would find that it became me excellently."

"Then you believe," returned Emilia, "that Algernon has not the same eyes for me, as Arvid for you?"

Julie looked somewhat confused.

"Go, now, go," I interrupted, "we shall never be ready; go Julie, I shall help Emilia, and I dare wager anything that she will be handsome against her will." Julie went at length to Helena, who every day combed and plaited her remarkably lovely hair.

Alone with Emilia, and whilst I assisted her with the grey-brown dress, which in truth was unbecoming, I said to her some few, according to my opinion, sensible words on her state of mind and conduct. She replied to me—"I confess that I am not as I ought to be: I wish I could be otherwise; but I feel so little calm, and so little happy, that at times I cannot govern myself. I am now about to form a connexion which it perhaps would have been better never to have agreed to, and if, during the time which yet remains to me, I should be convinced that my fears are well founded, nothing in the world shall prevent me making an end of this connexion, and thereby preventing my being unhappy for my whole life. For if it be true that one sows a heaven in a happy marriage, it is just as true that an unhappy one is a hell."

"If you do not love Mr. S—," said I, "I really wonder that you have allowed the affair to go so far."

"Not love him!" repeated Emilia with great astonishment; "certainly I love him, and therefore exactly lies my misfortune; my love blinds me to the perception of his faults."

"Nobody would have imagined that, after what you have just said," replied I, smiling.

"Ah yes! ah yes!" said Emilia, "it is so, nevertheless; some are so palpable that one cannot be blind to them; for example, he is too young."

"How unworthy," said I, laughing; "that is actually mean of him."

"Yes, you may laugh. For me, it is really not laughable. I will not say precisely that it is his fault; but it is all the same as a fault in him in regard to me. I am twenty-six years old, and thus am nearly past the boundary of my youth; he is merely two years older, and consequently as a man is yet quite young. I shall be a venerable matron when he is yet a young man. Probably he may be inclined to frivolity, and gladly leave his old tiresome wife for—"

"Oho! oho!" interrupted I, "that is almost too long a perspective. Have you reason to suspect that he is a frivolous character?"

"Not exactly positive; but in this so frivolous age, truth and constancy are such rare virtues. I know that I am not Algernon's first love—who will assure me that I shall be his last? I should be able to bear every thing excepting the infidelity of my husband—that I think I could not survive. I have said that to Algernon—he has assured me—but what will not a lover assure one of! Besides, how can I know whether he loves me with the pure, true love, which alone is strong and enduring? He may have for me only a fancy; and this is a weak, easily severed thread. I have often thought (and it has often inwardly grieved me), that, perhaps, my property, or that which I may one day have, has influenced—"

"No, now you go too far," said I; "you see ghosts in daylight. How can you only seize upon suspicions? You have known him—"

"Only for two years," interrupted Emilia; "and nearly from the first moment of our acquaintance he paid court to me, and has naturally shewn to me only his amiable side. And who, indeed, can see into the heart of man? See, Beata, I cannot say that I know the man with whom I would unite my fate. And how could I become acquainted with him? When people only see one another in regular precise social life, in which scarcely any character has the opportunity of developing itself, one becomes acquainted only with the external and the superficial. A person may be passionate, avaricious, inclined to bad and peevish tempers; and what is worse than all this, may be without all religion; and yet one might see him for whole years in the social circle without suspecting the least of all this; and in particular, the person whom he is desirous of pleasing, can know the least of this."

I did not know rightly what I should say. I thought that this description was true, and Emilia's fears not unfounded.

She continued:

"Yes, if one had known and seen one another for ten years, especially if one had travelled together,—for on a journey one is not so much on one's guard, and shews most of one's natural character and temper,—then one might know tolerably well what a man is."

"That method," said I, "would be tiresome and difficult enough, however excellent one might find it; and would at furthest only be suitable for lovers during the time of the crusades. In our days, people walk in Queen Street and drive at farthest to the North Gate. One cannot diverge more than that. During this ramble, people see the world, and are seen by them; people greet and are greeted; people talk, and joke, and laugh, and find one another so agreeable, that after the little journey, they feel no more indecision about undertaking the great journey through life. But now, to talk seriously, have you never spoken openly with Algernon on the subjects on which you consider it so important to know his opinions?"

"Yes, many times," replied Emilia, "especially since we have been betrothed; and I have always found, or have fancied I have found, in him the opinions and feelings which I wished—but ah! I may so easily have-blinded myself, because I secretly wished it. Possibly, also, Algernon, in his zeal to please me, has deceived himself regarding himself. I am resolved to make use of all my observation to discover the reality and truth, during the short time which remains to me of my freedom; and shall not, if I can help it, through wilful blindness, make him and me unhappy. Granted even that he were quite perfect, yet he might not be suitable for me, nor I for him; our tempers and characters might at bottom be wholly unaccordant."

Amid all these troubling conjectures Emilia was dressed, and one was forced to acknowledge that her costume did not become her. She closed the conversation by saying—"I wish sometimes that I really were married; then I should escape plaguing myself with the thought that I would marry."

"Inconsistency of the human mind," thought I.

At dinner Emilia's toilet was universally blamed, especially by the Cornet. Julie was silent, but spoke with her eyes. The Cornet said nothing; but observed Emilia with a really sarcastic mien, which made her blush.

After dinner Julie said to Emilia—"Sweet Emilia, I did not mean that Algernon really would not think you quite amiable if you were dressed in sackcloth and ashes; I would merely say, that it is not right if a bride does not endeavour in all ways to please her bridegroom. I meant that it would be right—that it would be wrong—that it—"

Here Julie lost the thread of her demonstration, and was almost as embarrassed as a certain burghmaster who was in the same predicament. Emilia pressed her hand kindly, and said, "You have, and that quite happily, followed out your principles; for I have seldom seen you better dressed, and, beyond that, more charming than you look to-day, and certainly Arrid will think so."

Julie blushed, but had more pleasure in these words of her sister than she would have felt in a compliment of her bridegroom.

Towards evening, all the bustle in the house was ended, all retook its former excellent order; and her Honour was also at rest.

Algernon and Lieutenant Arvid arrived at tea-time. Emilia and Julie blushed like June roses; the first looked down, and the latter looked up.

Algernon looked so happy to see Emilia again, was so occupied with her alone, gave so little attention to her toilet, which he did not honour with a glance, but was evidently so charmed, so happy, and so amiable, that by degrees the joy which beamed from his eyes kindled a sympathetic glance in Emilia's, and, spite of dress, apron, and comb, she was during this evening so charming and agreeable that Julie forgave the toilet.

Lieutenant Arvid was no less delighted with his little amiable bride; although it seemed to be no affair of his to express it, like Algernon, in lively and select language. Eloquence is not given to all, and every one has his own way. He drank tea, three cups, ate a dozen rusks, kissed the hand of his bride, and looked entirely happy. I heard him say several times "The thousand fetch me!" and found that a handsome mouth and pleasant voice could soften the unpleasantness of ugly words. Lieutenant Arvid is, in truth, an Adonis.—N.B. An Adonis with a moustache.

His countenance expressed goodness and honesty, but (I beg him a thousand times pardon) something also of foolishness and self-love. His handsome twenty-years-old head did not seem to entertain many ideas.

Algernon had a remarkably noble exterior, in which manliness, goodness, and intelligence, were the chief characteristics. He was tall, had regular, handsome features, and a most agreeable and distinguished deportment.

How, methought I, can Emilia cast her eye upon that noble countenance, and not feel all her fears, all her anxieties, vanish?

For this evening they did vanish, or withdrew into the soul's darkest background. The whole family seemed to be happy, and all was joy and life.

The blind girl, on this evening, did not appear in the company.

FIVE DAYS BEFORE THE BRIDAL

Some of her joy and the satisfaction with which Monday came to an end, Emilia woke on Tuesday morning with the exclamation, "Now one day less till the horrible day!"

Beautiful presents from Algernon came in during the forenoon. Emilia did not like the custom of the bridegroom making presents to his beloved.

"It is a barbarian custom," said she, "which turns woman into a piece of merchandise, which the husband, as it were, buys. It ought to be enough to make all civilized nations abandon the usage, when they know the custom of all savage and barbarous people."

Besides this, she found in some of the presents too little regard paid to the useful, too much of luxury and the merely showy.

"If he be only, not a spendthrift!" said she, sighing. "How little he knows me, if he thinks that I love jewels better than the flowers given by him. However much I love the graceful and the elegant, I am but little attracted by outward magnificence, by pomp and splendour. Besides, these are not suitable for our circumstances."

Emilia's goodhumour was over; she scarcely noticed the presents, over which Julie could not cease to exclaim, "enchanting! charming!" Through the whole forenoon she never took the curl-papers from her hair, and went about wrapped in a great shawl, which hung awry. The Cornet compared her to a Hottentot, and besought her not to fancy that, although she was surrounded by 'savage and barbarous customs,' she could turn a savage. When we went down to dinner, I said to her, in order to act my part as a skilful and worthy commendator, how uncommonly handsome and charming I thought Algernon.

"Yes," replied Emilia, "he is very handsome, much handsomer as man than I am as woman, and this I consider a real misfortune."

"See then," thought I, "now I have run again upon a sandbank!"

Emilia continued. "It is rare that a remarkably handsome exterior does not make him who possesses it vain; and the most unbearable thing that I know is a man who is in love with his own person. He commonly thinks it to be the first duty of his less handsome wife to honour and to worship his beauty and his amiability. Vanity lessens women, but degrades men. According to my opinion, the exterior of a man is of little or of no consequence to his wife. I should be able, I am convinced, to worship a noble Esop, and would have him a thousand times rather than an Adonis. A Narcissus, who worships his own image, see, is what I find most disgusting."

As Emilia spoke these last words she opened the drawing-room door. Algernon was alone in the room, and stood—before the glass! observing himself, as it seemed, with great attention. One should have seen how Emilia blushed, and with what a demeanour she received her bridegroom; who, on his part, confounded by her confusion and her amazed appearance, perhaps also somewhat embarrassed at having been caught in his l'été-à-l'été with the glass, was completely out of countenance. It was now my business to support the conversation with remarks on the weather, the roads, and so on.

Fortunately now came in the rest of the family, which made a wholesome diversion.

Emilia continued to look troubled; and as he looked at her, Algernon's countenance became dark by degrees. I thought I remarked that he had a sty on his left eye, and considered it probable that this had occasioned his l'été-à-l'été in the glass, but Emilia will not see it. Various trifles contributed to make the understanding worse between the two lovers. Algernon accidentally discovered that he had pleasure in things which did not please Emilia, and he let Emilia's favourite dish pass by him at table. Emilia found out, of a certainty, that they did not in the least sympathise. Algernon made a true but not biting observation, and without particular application, about ill-temper and the disagreeables of it. Nevertheless, it should have not been said at this time. Emilia applied it to herself, and assumed more of a genteel and dignified demeanour. Julie was anxious. "It would be much better," said she, "that they should quarrel with one another, than that they should sit and be silent and be inwardly angry."

Cornet Carl went to Emilia and said, "My gracious sister, I pray you do not sit there like the Chinese Wall, impenetrable to all the arrows which Algernon's loving eyes shoot at you. Look, if you can, a little less icy. Look at Algernon; go to him, and give him a kiss!" Yes, looked that likely indeed! sooner might one have expected to see the Chinese Wall set itself in motion. Emilia looked not once at Algernon, who seemed infinitely to long after reconciliation. He proposed that they should sing together a newly published Italian duet, probably in the hope that the soul of the harmony should chase away all hostile and ungenteel feelings which disturbed the peace between him and his beloved; and that the duet's "Cor mio mio ben" would soon also tone into her heart. Vain hope! Emilia excused herself with headache. She had it actually, and that in a high degree, as I could see by her eyes. She was accustomed to have it easily when she was troubled and disquieted. Algernon fancied the headache a fiction; and without troubling himself about his bride, who sat in a corner of the sofa, supporting on her hands her disturbed head, made known his intention of hearing Mozart's Figaro at the opera, bowed hastily to all, and went out.

The evening crept on slowly. Nobody was in a good or gay humour. Every one said that Emilia suffered, therefore no one expressed any displeasure at her conduct.

The Colonel alone seemed to remark nothing, and quietly laid his patience.

As we separated for the night, the Cornet said to me in a whisper, "It goes quite crazily. To-morrow we must fire off a whole battery of distractions."

Wednesday came. Algernon rose early. His look was so tender, his voice so full of fervency when he talked to Emilia, that she thawed, and tears filled her eyes. All was right between the lovers. Nobody knew how or wherefore, not even themselves.

This day went quietly over, with the exception of two frights which Emilia had, and yet survived. The first occurred in the forenoon, during a conversation which Algernon had with "her Honour." Emilia heard expressions from him which convinced her for the moment that he was nothing less than the greatest miser on the earth. Fortunately she found soon afterwards that he merely quoted a word of a Harpagon of his acquaintance, at which he himself heartily laughed. Emilia breathed again, and joined him. The second happened in the afternoon, during a serious conversation which some of us carried on, sitting in a window in the clear moonlight, while I asserted, "there are, nevertheless, noble and good people who are yet unfortunate enough to have no faith in another life, in no higher object of our existence. These are to be pitied, not to be blamed." With an indescribable expression of anxiety in her beautiful eyes, Emilia looked questioningly at me. Her thought was, "Is it Algernon whom you would excuse?" I replied to her, by turning her attention to Algernon, who, at my words, cast a glance up to the star-spangled heaven—and this glance was an expression of beautiful and firm hope. Emilia looked up also with thankfulness; and as their eyes met they beamed with tenderness and joy.

This day was on the way to close so well. Ah! why during supper did Algernon receive a note; why during the reading be confused, and immediately lose much of his gaiety; why so hastily, and without saying anything, go out?

Yes, why? Nobody knows that; but many of us would gladly have given his life to know it.

"Yet it never can occur to you to think ill of Algernon on account of that note!" said Julie to Emilia, as they went to bed.

"Good night, Julie!" said Emilia, sighing.

Emilia had no good night.

Thursday. Clouds and mists around Emilia. Vain attempts on our part to dissipate them. Immediately after breakfast, the Cornet took the field with Napoleon and Charles the Twelfth. Emilia would not contend; Julie and Helena laboured in vain to enliven her. I ventured not on my part to say one single word. The note, the note, lay in the way of every thing.

At twelve o'clock Algernon came. He looked very much heated, and there was something uncommonly sparkling in his eyes. Emilia had promised him on the preceding day to drive him out in an open sledge; he came now to fetch her. A handsome sledge, adorned with magnificent rein-deer skins, stood at the door. Emilia declined to go with him, coldly and resolutely. "Why!" asked Algernon. "On account of the note," Emilia might have answered with truth; but she said,

"I wish to remain at home."

"Art thou unwell?"

"No."

"Why wilt thou not give me the pleasure of driving out with me as thou promisedst?"

"The note, the note," thought Emilia; but she only reddened, and said,

"I wish to remain at home."

Algernon was angry; he reddened hotly, and his eyes flashed. He went out, banging the door somewhat violently after him.

The servant who was left at the door with the sledge had in the mean time left it. The horse, terrified by a fall of snow, and left to himself, backed, threw down an old woman, and would probably have set off, if Algernon, who just then came down, had not thrown himself forward and seized the reins with a powerful hand. After the horse was pacified, he called a man who was near, to whom he gave it to hold, and hastened himself to lift up the old woman, who was so frightened as not to be able to move, but who fortunately was not hurt in the least. He talked with her a little while, and gave her money.

To his servant, who came at length, he gave a box on the ear, threw himself into the sledge, took the reins himself, and drove off like lightning.

Emilia, quite pale, had stood by me at the window, and had observed this scene; at the last part of it, she exclaimed,

"He is violent, passionate, mad." And she burst into tears.

"He has," said I, "human weaknesses; and that is all. He came here in an excited and uneasy state of mind; your refusal to fulfil your given promise, and without assigning any reason for it, would naturally provoke him; the negligence of his servant, which had nearly occasioned a misfortune, increased his heat, which nevertheless only shewed itself by a box on the ear, very well deserved. It is quite too much to expect from a young man that he should conduct himself perfectly coldly and calmly when one vexation after another sets his temper in a ferment. It is sufficient that during his passion he continues as humane and good, as we saw Algernon be just now towards the old woman. Besides, I believe, Emilia, that if you, instead of exciting Algernon's temper by ill-humour and unkindness (pardon me the two beautiful words), would use for good purpose the great power which we all of us have seen that you have over him, then you would never see him passionate and mad, as you call it."

I was much pleased with my little speech when I had ended it, and thought it would have a wonderfully great influence; but Emilia was silent, and looked unhappy.

Algernon did not return to dinner.

Cornet Carl related in the afternoon that he had heard from a comrade of his, of a duel which had taken place in the morning. One of the duellists was Algernon's best friend, and he had invited him to be his second. He had done this by a note (the Cornet said, with an emphatic voice) which was delivered here in this house, where Algernon was then, last evening about a quarter to ten. Algernon had done all that was possible to prevent the duel—but in vain. The parties met, and Algernon's friend had dangerously wounded his enemy. The particulars were unknown to the Cornet.

Now all was explained, and Algernon's image stood bright before Emilia.

Algernon came towards evening. He was quite calm, but grave; and did not go as usual to sit beside his bride. Emilia was not gay; seemed to fear making the first step towards reconciliation; and yet showed by many little attentions to Algernon, how much she wished to be reconciled to him. She made him tea herself; asked him whether he found it sweet enough; whether she might send him another cup; and so on. Algernon remained cold towards her; seemed often to fall into deep thought, and forget where he was. Emilia withdrew herself, wounded; was quite dejected, and sat down at a distance to sew, and for a long time never looked up from her work.

Cornet Carl said to Helena and me, "This is not exactly right; but what in all the world can one do to make it better? I cannot now come forward again with Napoleon and Charles XII. I brought it forward this forenoon, and it did not succeed particularly well. One must confess that Emilia is not an amiable bride. If she be not different as a wife, then.—Should not she now go to Algernon, and try to comfort and to enliven him? See, now she goes. No, it is only to fetch a ball of cotton. Poor Algernon! I begin to think that it is a real good fortune for me to be so without feeling. Poor lovers suffer worse hardships than we soldiers taking our degress. If I were a bridegroom,—God bless thee, little Clara, what is it that thou wants—a rusk? Go to Emilia, go to Emilia. I have no rucks. Yes, it will do her highness a little good to be moved."

The Cornet saw not how entirely humble her highness was this evening at the bottom of her heart: and that Algernon now was most to blame that the coldness continued between them.

Algernon and Emilia did not approach one another this evening, and parted coldly from each other—at least apparently so.

On Friday morning Emilia determined to make an end of their acquaintance. Algernon was noble, excellent; but he was too stern, and he loved her not. That she had plainly seen on the preceding evening. She would now have an especial conversation with him, and so on. Algernon came. He was much gayer than on the foregoing day, and seemed to wish that all disagreeables should be forgotten. Emilia was in the beginning solemn in the thoughts of her important intention; but Julie, Helena, her Honour, Cornet Carl and I, bustled so about her, and we by degrees dragged her into our whirlpool, and prevented her both from private conversation and inward cogitation. People began after a while to hear again her hearty laugh, and her thoughtfulness did not relapse into melancholy.

In the afternoon of this day the marriage contract was signed.

Even the bride of Sir Charles Grandison, the beautiful Harriet Byron, dropped (so they say) the pen which she had taken to sign her marriage contract, and had scarcely strength and presence of mind to subscribe her fate. Millions of young brides have trembled at this moment, and behaved like her; what wonder was there that the fearful and bashful Emilia was almost out of herself for terror? The pen did not only fall out of her hand, but made a great black blot upon the important paper, which she at that moment regarded as an omen of misfortune; and I doubt whether she now would have signed it, had not the Colonel (exactly like Sir Charles) taken the pen, set it between her fingers, signed and guided her trembling hand.

In the evening, when we were alone in our chamber, Emilia said, with a deep sigh,

"It must then take place! It cannot be helped any longer; and the day after to-morrow he will take me away from all whom I love so fervently."

"One might believe," said Julie, smiling, but with tears in her eyes, "that you were going to travel to the end of the world; and yet only a few streets and market-places will separate us from you, and we can see each other every day."

"Every day! Yes," said Emilia, weeping; "but not as now, every hour."

On Saturday, Emilia was kind and affectionate to every one, but dejected and uneasy, and seemed to wish to escape from the thoughts which pursued her everywhere.

Algernon became graver every moment, and observed his bride with troubled and searching looks. It seemed as if he feared that with her hand she did not give him her whole heart; yet nevertheless he seemed to shun any kind of explanation, and avoided being alone with Emilia.

I had heard from a cousin of the cook's step-sister's sister-in-law, that Algernon had distributed among several poor families, money and victuals; with the observation, that on Sunday they should have a good dinner, and make merry. I related this to Emilia, who on her part had done the same. This sympathy in their thoughts rejoiced her, and gave her again courage.

In the mean time, people on all sides had sewed and worked industriously, so that, the day before the wedding, all was ready and in order.

There was something solemn in the adieu of the evening. Every one embraced Emilia, and in all eyes stood tears. Emilia mastered her emotion, but could not speak. All thought upon the morrow.

THE WEDDING-DAY.

THE great, the expected, the dreaded day came at length. Emilia, scarcely arisen, looked with a foreboding glance up to heaven. It was overcast with grey clouds. The air was cold and damp; everything which one could see from the window bore that melancholy stamp which on the cold winter-day weighs both upon the animate and the inanimate. The smoke which ascended from the chimneys was depressed again, and rolled itself slowly over the roofs, blackening their white snow-covering. Some old women, with red noses and blue cheeks, drove their milk-carts to the market, step by step, dragged by lean horses, which hung their rough heads nearer than common to the earth. Even the little sparrows seemed not to be in their usual lively tempers; they sat still, and clung together along the roof-spouts, without twittering or eating. Now and then one of them stretched their wings and opened their little bills, but it was done evidently out of weariness. Emilia sighed deeply. A bright heaven, a little sunshine, would have cheered and refreshed her depressed mind. Who does not wish that a bright sun may beam on their bridal day? It seems to us as if Hymen's torch could not clearly burn if it be not kindled by the bright light of the beams of heaven. A secret belief that Heaven does not look with indifference on our earthly fate remains constantly in the depths of our hearts; and however we may be dust and atoms, yet we see, when the eternal vault is dimmed by clouds or shines in splendour, in this change always some sympathy or some foreboding which concerns us, and often, very often, are our hopes and our fears—children of winds and clouds.

Emilia, after a sleepless night, and depressed by the events of the preceding day, was quite dispirited by this dull morning. She complained of headache; and after she at breakfast had embraced her parents and her brother and sisters, she requested that she might pass the forenoon alone in her own room. It was allowed. The Colonel looked more serious than common. Her Honour had so troubled a demeanour that it went to my heart to see it. Anxiety and uneasiness for Emilia, cares and troubles for the wedding dinner, possessed her soul alternately, and all she said began with

"Ah!" Neither was the Cornet cheerful; and Helena's expressive countenance had a slight trace of sorrow. Julie was inexpressibly amazed that a wedding-day could begin so gloomily, and changed her countenance incessantly, which was now ready to weep and now to laugh. Only Mr. Magister and the Dumplings were in their usual state of mind. The former bit his nails, and was silent and looked up in the air; the latter never left off breakfast.

I assisted her Honour the whole forenoon, and it was not little which we had to do—in part talking, in part arranging, in part working ourselves and laying to a helping hand. We whipped citron creams, poured water upon the roasts, salted the bouillon, lamented over unlucky pastry, rejoiced ourselves over the magnificent set-out, and burnt our tongues over at least twenty sauces. Oh, those are no poetical flames which Hymen's torch kindles at the kitchen fire!

The Colonel himself prepared the bowls with bishop and punch, and occasioned us no little difficulty and disturbance; so many things, so many people, so much room, did he require for the purpose, and seemed to think that there was nothing else of consequence to be done; which no little angered her Honour. She gave her husband, therefore, a little lecture; and he—he conceded that she was right.

Whilst I instructed the cook on the most elegant manner of serving up a first course, Julie came running into the kitchen with tears in her eyes. "Give me! give me!" exclaimed she with her customary liveliness, "something good for Emilia; she ate nothing at breakfast, she will be ill; she will die of mere fatigue to-day! What have you here? Boiled eggs! I take two! Glasses of jelly! I take two! I may do so! Ah, a little caprin sauce, that makes one lively—and now a little bit of fish or meat to it, and a few French rolls—see! now some tarts—now then I am pleased. Emilia likes sweet things so!—Do you know what she is doing, Beata?" she continued in a whisper: "She prays to God. I have peeped in through the key-hole; she is on her knees, praying. God bless her!" and bright pearls ran down Julie's cheeks as she hastened out with those plates full, which she carried I cannot conceive how.

At length our arrangements came to an end; all was now left, together with the necessary instructions, in the hands of the servants and the Colonel. Her Honour and I went to dress ourselves for dinner.

Somewhat later I went in to Emilia. She stood before a glass, dressed in her bridal robe, and contemplated herself with a look which expressed neither that pleasure nor that self-satisfaction which a handsome and well dressed woman almost always feels in the contemplation of her beloved. Helena clasped her bracelet; and Julie was kneeling as she arranged some of the lace trimming. "Look," exclaimed Julie, as I entered the room, "is she not sweet!—is she not lovely!—and yet," added she in a whisper, "I would give half of that which I possess to purchase for her another man: she looks as troubled and grey as the weather!" Emilia, who heard her sister's words, said, "One cannot look gay when one is not happy. Every thing seems to me so heavy, so unbearable! This day is a horrible day. I would willingly die!"

"Lord God!" said Julie to me, wringing her hands; "now she begins to cry. She will have red eyes and a red nose, and will not be handsome again. What shall we do?"

"Dear Emilia," said Helena, mildly, as she conducted the hand of her sister to her mouth; "are not you a little irrational! This marriage is your own wish, as well as all our wishes. According to all by which human nature can form a judgment, you will be happy. Has not Algernon the noblest qualities? Does he not love you most tenderly? Where would you find a husband who would be for your parents a more affectionate son—for your brother and sisters a more devoted brother?"

"All this is true, Helena; or rather, all this seems like truth. But ah! when I think that I now stand at the point of changing my whole existence—that I shall leave my parents—leave you, my good, my affectionate sisters—that home, where I have been so happy,—and this for the sake of a man whose heart I do not know as I know yours; whose conduct may change towards me, who may make me unhappy in so many ways. And this man will be in the future every thing to me,—my fate must be irrevocably bound to his. Ah! my sisters, when I think on all this, it becomes dark before my eyes. I feel my knees tremble; and when I think that it is to-day—to-day—within a few hours, which shall decide my fate; and that I still have freedom, still can withdraw—then I feel the pang of indecision, of uncertainty, which nobody can conceive. Beata, my sister, never marry!"

"But sweetest Emilia," began Helena again, "you who find it so easy to submit to necessity, think only that your fate is already decided, that it is already too late for you to renounce your own happiness."

"Too late!" exclaimed Emilia, without regarding the last word. "Too late is it not, as long as the priest has not united us. Yes, even at the foot of the altar I have the right, and can —"

"And would you have the heart to do it?" interrupted Julie, in the most tragic tone; "would you drive Algernon to despair? You would actually —"

"A scene!" said a voice in the doorway; and the Colonel, with his arms folded, observing Julie with his comic look, whose attitude was not unlike that for which the celebrated Mademoiselle George is applauded in Semiramis and Maria Stuart. Julie reddened, but still more Emilia.

The Cornet, who followed his father, presented to his sister, from Algernon, some fresh exquisitely beautiful flowers, together with a note, which contained lines which were anything but cold and unmeaning. Emilia's countenance cleared up—she pressed her brother's hand. He threw himself on his knee, in a rapture of knightly enthusiasm, and prayed for the favour of kissing the toe of her shoe. She extended to him, with a gracious smile, her little foot; and while he bent himself down, not as I thought, to kiss the shoe-toe, but to bite it in two, she threw her arms around his neck, and kissed him heartily. The Colonel took her hand, led her into the middle of the room, and we all made a circle around her. When she saw her affectionate father's glances, and ours full of joy and love, riveted upon her, she was possessed by pleasant feelings, blushed, and was as lovely as ever Julie could have wished. Her dress was simple, but in the highest degree tasteful and elegant. For those of my young readers who wish to know something more of her toilet, here it is. She had on a white silk dress, trimmed with lace; and her light and wonderfully beautifully dressed hair, adorned with the green myrtle crown, over which a veil (Helena's magnificent work) was thrown in a picturesque manner, and which gave to her gentle and innocent countenance much resemblance to a Madonna of Paul Veronese. In order to make her enchanting, there failed only the expression of happiness, hope, and love, which is the most excellent ornament of the bride.

In the mean time, her heart seemed to have become somewhat lighter; and, as if in harmony with her feelings, the sun broke forth from the clouds, and threw his pale beams into the room.

The outward, as well as the inward brightness, lasted but for a moment. It darkened again. As we went down to dinner, Julie shewed to me with a lamenting look, that all that which she had carried up for Emilia was untouched—only one glass of jelly was emptied.

At dinner, Emilia looked around her at all those whom she should so soon leave; and her heart swelled, and tears incessantly filled her eyes. At dinner, nobody seemed to have their customary liveliness, and nobody seemed to eat with any appetite, with the exception always of the Magister and the Dumplings. Emilia, who seemed more dejected under the myrtle crown than ever was king under the diadem, ate nothing; and laughed not once during the dinner, spite of the excellent occasions for so doing, which were given to her by three remarkable pieces of absence of mind of the Magister, at which not even the Colonel could avoid smiling. The first was, that he mistook his snuff-box and the salt-cellar, both of which stood beside him on the table; scattered a portion of snuff in his soup, and took a considerable pinch out of the salt-cellar, which caused him to make many strange grimaces, and to shed many tears. The second was, that in order to dry these, he, instead of his pocket handkerchief, seized hold on one corner of her Honour's shawl; which she, however, snatched from him with haste and horror. The third was, that he bowed and was ceremonious with the servant who offered him meat; and prayed that the young lady would be so good as to help herself. Julie looked troubled in the extreme at her sister. "She neither eats nor laughs," whispered she to me; "it is pitiable!"

But it was more pitiable in the afternoon, when the guests who were invited collected; and Algernon, who was expected early, was not heard of at all. Her Honour wept, looking incessantly at the door, with the most uneasy countenance in the world; and came to me three or four times, only to say, "I cannot conceive why Algernon delays so!" The guests, who had arrived, asked also after him. Emilia asked not, did not look at the door; but one could very plainly see how, with every moment, she became more serious and paler. Julie seated herself near me; to'd me who the guests were as they arrived, and added thereto some observations. "That handsome, well grown lady, who carries herself so well, is the Baroness S—. Who, indeed, would believe, that every time she enters a drawing-room she is so embarrassed that she trembles! Look at her intellectual eyes, but trust them not; she can talk of nothing but the weather, and at home she yawns all the day to herself. Who comes now, and holds his hat in so beggar-like a manner before him, as he comes through the door! Ha, ha! Uncle P—. That is a good old fellow, but he is lethargic; I shall give him a kiss instead of a farthing. God grant only that he do not snore during the ceremony. Look at my Arrid, Beata! there by the stove. Is he not an Apollo? I think that he warms himself too much at his own convenience—he seems altogether to have forgotten that there is anybody in the room. That is my cousin, Mrs. M—, who is now come in. She is an angel; and the little delicate person encloses a large soul.

"Look how Emilia receives them all; altogether as if she would say, 'You are very good, gentlemen and ladies, who come to witness my funeral.' I cannot conceive what Algernon is thinking about that he tarries so long. Gracious Heavens! how unhappy Emilia looks.

"See, there is the clergyman. Spite of his warts and his red eye, he looks attractive; I feel, as it were, respect for him.

"Look how Carlo tries to enliven and to occupy Emilia. Well done brother; but it helps nothing.

"Now, thank God, here is Algernon at last. But how pale and serious he looks! And yet he is handsome. He goes up to her—see only how proud her demeanour is. He excuses himself, I fancy. What! he has had a horrible toothache—has just had a tooth out! Poor Algernon! Toothache on his wedding-day! What a fate! See now, they all sit in a circle. A circle of sitting people gives me the vapours! What do they talk about? I fancy really that they talk about the weather. A most interesting subject, that is certain! But it is not very enlivening. Hark! how snow and rain patter against the windows. It is horribly warm in here, and Emilia contributes to make the atmosphere heavy. I must go and speak to her."

Soon afterwards, some one came in, and said that people were crowding on the steps and in the hall, wishing to see the bride.

New torment for the bashful Emilia. She rose, but sat down again quickly, turning quite pale. "Eau de Cologne! Eau de Cologne!" cried Julie to me; "she grows pale, she faints!" "Water!" exclaimed the Colonel, with thundering voice. The Magister took up the tea-kettle, and rushed forward with it. I know not whether it was the sight of this, or some effort of the soul to control her excited feelings, which enabled Emilia to overcome her weakness. She collected herself quickly, and went out, accompanied by her sisters, while she cast a glance of uneasiness and displeasure upon Algernon, who stood immovable at a distance, observing her with an usually, almost severe gravity.

"Are you mad!" exclaimed Uncle P—, half aloud; and seized the Magister by the arm, who now stood with bewildered eyes, and the tea-kettle in his hand. The Magister, terrified, turned himself round hastily and stumbled over "the Dumpings," who fell one over the other like two ninepins which the ball has struck. The tea-kettle in the hand of the Magister wagged about, burnt his fingers, and he dropped it with a cry of pain on the unlucky little ones, over whose immovable bodies a cloud of whirling steam ascended. If the moon had fallen down, it could not have occasioned a greater confusion than at the first moment of this catastrophe with the tea-kettle. Axel and Claes uttered no sound, and her Honour was ready to believe that it was all over with the little Dumpings. But after Algernon and the Colonel had lifted them up, and shook them, it was perceived that they were perfectly alive. They were only so astonished, frightened, so out of themselves, that at the first moment they could neither move nor speak. Fortunately, the hot water wherewith they were wetted, had for the greater part run upon their clothes; besides this, it was probably somewhat cooled, because people had left off drinking tea for half an hour. Only one spot upon Axel's forehead and Claes' left hand required looking after. The Magister was in despair—the little ones cried. They were put to bed in a room, in which I promised to spend as much time with them as I had to dispose of. Her Honour, whose amiable kindness would not quietly permit there to be an unhappy face near her, next consoled the Magister. She succeeded best in so doing, by calling upon him to observe with what a true Spartan courage the little boys had borne the first shock, and she regarded it as a remarkable proof of the excellent education he had given them. The Magister was quite happy, and quite warm, and drawing himself up, said that he hoped to bring up her Honour's sons as real Spartans. Her Honour hoped that this would not be done by renewed shower-baths of boiling-water; but she was silent in her hope.

In the mean time, the exhibition of the bride was ended; and Emilia, fatigued, left the room where, according to the customary, strange, but old usage of Sweden, she had been compelled to shew herself to a crowd of curious and indifferent people.

"They did not think her handsome," said Julie to me, in a doleful tone; "and that was not extraordinary; she was dark and cold as an autumn sky."

We had conducted Emilia to a distant room, in order that she might rest a moment. She sank down in a chair, put her handkerchief before her face, and was silent.

Every thing in the drawing-room was ready for the ceremony. They waited only for Emilia.

"Smell at the eau de Cologne, Emilia! Sweet Emilia, drink a glass of water," prayed Julie, who now began to tremble.

"They wait for you, best Emilia!" said Cornet Carl, who now came into the room and offered to conduct his sister out. "I cannot—I really cannot go!" said Emilia, with a voice expressive of the deepest anxiety.

"You cannot!" exclaimed the Cornet, with the greatest astonishment. "Why!" And he looked inquiringly at us all. Julie stood in a tragic attitude, with her hands clasped above her head.

Helena safe with an expression of displeasure upon her placid countenance; and I—I cannot possibly remember what I did; but in my heart I sympathised with Emilia. None of us answered.

"No, I cannot go," continued Emilia, with emphasis altogether unusual. "I cannot take this oath, which is binding for ever. I have a positive foreboding—we shall be unhappily united—we are not suited for each other. It may be my fault—but it is, for all that, certain. At this moment he is certainly displeased with me—looks upon me as a whimsical being—thinks with repugnance of uniting his destiny with such a one. His severe glance says all this to me. He may be right, perfectly right; and therefore it is best for him, as for me, that we now separate."

"But Emilia!" exclaimed her brother; "do you think on what you are saying! It is now too late. The clergyman is really here—the bridal guests—Algernon—"

"Go to him," best Carl, "exclaimed Emilia, with increasing emotion; "pray him to come here; I will myself talk to him, tell him all. It cannot be too late when it concerns the peace and happiness of a whole life. Go, I beseech of you, go!"

"Good Heavens! Good Heavens! What will be the end of it!" said Julie; and looked as if she would call heaven and earth to help. "Think on papa, Emilia!"

"I shall throw myself at his feet—he will not wish the eternal unhappiness of his child!"

"If we could divert her mind from this—occupy her for a moment with any thing else!" whispered Helena to her brother.

Cornet Carl opened the door, as if to go out; and at the same moment we heard the sound of a heavy blow. "Ah, my eye!" cried the Cornet. A universal terror took place, because this little deceit was played off so naturally that at the first moment none of us thought that it was a trick.

Emilia, always ready to be the first to hasten to the help of others, was the same now, spite of her own great uneasiness, and rushed to her brother with a pocket handkerchief dipped in cold water; drew his hand from his eye, and began with fervency and anxiety to bathe it, whilst she asked with uneasiness, "Is it very bad! Do you think the eye is injured? Fortunately there is no blood—"

"It is perhaps therefore the more dangerous," said the Cornet, dryly; but an unfortunate treacherous smile nullified at the same moment the whole guile. Emilia observed it nearer, and quite convinced herself that the blow was any thing but real. "Ah!" said she, "I see what it is. It is one of your jokes; but it will not mislead me. I pray, I conjure you, Carl, if you have the least affection for me, go to Algernon; tell him that I beseech for a few minutes' conversation with him."

"That none of you had the présence d'esprit to blow out the candle!" exclaimed the Cornet, and looked angrily at us, especially at me. Helena whispered something to him, and he went out of the room, followed by Julie.

Helena and I were silent, whilst Emilia, in evident anguish of mind, went up and down the room, and seemed to talk to herself. "What shall I do! How shall I act!" said she several times, half aloud. We saw heard footsteps in the next room. "He comes!" said Emilia; and her whole frame trembled. The door opened, and Algernon—no, the Colonel entered, with an expression of imposing gravity. Emilia gasped for breath, seated herself, rose up again, grew pale, and crimsoned.

"You have waited too long for yourself," said he, calmly, but not without severity; "I now come to fetch you."

"Emilia clasped her hands, looked beseechingly up to her father, opened her lips, but closed them again, discouraged by the stern, grave expression of his countenance; and as he took her hand, all power of resistance seemed to abandon her; and with a sort of despairing submission, she arose and allowed her father to lead her out. Helena and I followed them.

The drawing-room was strongly lighted, and all the people there had their eyes directed to the door through which Emilia, conducted by her father, entered.

She has told me since then that at her entrance she could not have distinguished one single object, and that everything was black before her eyes. "Then it is not wonderful," said her brother, "that you looked as if you were walking in your sleep."

Algernon regarded her with a seriousness which at this moment did not inspire her with courage.

Neither of them spoke. The drama began. The young couple stood before the clergyman. Emilia was pale as death, and trembled. Julie altogether lost heart. "It is terrible!" said she, and was nearly as pale as her sister.

Now the voice was heard which announced their holy duties to the young married pair. The voice was deep and well-tuned, and seemed to be animated by a divine spirit. It spoke of the sanctity of the state of wedlock, and the mutual obligations of the husband and wife to love one another, to lighten to each other the fatigues of life, to soften its appointed cares, to be an example to each other in a true fear of God; it spoke of those prayers for each other which unite so inwardly, which draw them towards the eternal First Cause; of how the highest felicity on earth is assisted by a union which in this way is begun and continued in the will of God—and then called down the blessing of the Most High upon the young married pair. Those words, so pleasant, so beautiful, so peaceful, awoke in every breast quiet and holy emotions. All was so still in the room, that one might have thought that nobody was in it. I saw plainly that Emilia became calmer every moment. The few words which she had to say, she spoke out intelligibly, and with a firm voice. Whilst she knelt, it seemed to me that she prayed with hope and devotion. I cast, in the mean time, abundant glances around me. The Colonel was paler than common; but contemplated the young couple with an expression full of composure and tenderness. Her Honour wept, and looked not up from her pocket handkerchief. Julie was greatly affected, although she moved neither hand nor foot. Helena looked up to Heaven, with prayers in her bright eyes. The Cornet was at some trouble to make it appear that it was something else beside tears which made his eyes so red; the blind girl smiled quietly; the remainder of the spectators seemed more or less affected, especially the Magister, who alone, towards the close of the ceremony, interrupted the silence by blowing his nose aloud. Fortunately he had his pocket handkerchief.

The blessings were spoken over the bridal pair by a voice as delightful as majestic, as if it had come from heaven. The marriage was ended. Emilia and Algernon were united for ever. Emilia turned herself round to embrace her parents. She seemed to me to be quite another person. A mild beaming glory seemed to rest upon her brow, and smiled from her eyes; a clear and warm crimson glowed upon her cheeks. She was all at once changed to the ideal of a young and happy bride.

"God be praised, God be praised!" whispered Julie with tears in her eyes, and clasped her hands, "now all is right!"

"Yes, now it can no longer be helped!" said the Colonel, endeavouring to control his emotion and to assume his comic expression, "now you are fast—now you can no more say 'no!'"

"I shall not wish to do so any more," replied Emilia, smiling charmingly, and looking up to Algernon with an expression which called forth in his countenance a lively and pure delight. A sentiment of satisfaction and cheerfulness diffused itself through the company. Every one looked as if they had a mind to sing and dance. Uncle P—, who was wide awake, called for a quadrille, and stamped his feet merrily by the side of the elegant Baroness S—, who, zephyr-like, floated up and across the floor. Julie and Arvid distinguished themselves in the dances in a charming manner; people could not take their eyes from this attractive couple. I danced with the Magister, who invited me as I hope—not out of absence of mind. We distinguished ourselves, though in a peculiar manner.

It seemed to me as if we were a pair of billiard balls, which perpetually lay ready to jostle the other. Certain it is, that we were in part pushed, and in part pushed others continually, which I particularly attribute to my cavalier's incessantly confusing left and right, as well as all the figures of the quadrille. In the mean time we laughed as well and as loudly as the others at our droll skippings about, and the Magister said that he had never before danced such a lively waltz!

Helena played on the piano for the dancing. Emilia wished not to dance; she sat in a little boudoir, the doors of which opened into the dancing-room. Algernon was at her side. They talked low, with animation and affection in their looks, and I fancy that in this moment the gergian knot of all misunderstanding, all uncertainty, all uneasiness, all doubt, which hitherto had divided them, was loosened for ever. The mild lustre of one solitary lamp, beaming through its alabaster globe, cast magical light over the young married pair, who now seemed to be as happy as they were handsome.

They seemed to forget the whole world around them, but none of the company had forgotten them. Every one threw stolen glances into the boudoir, and smiled. Julie came many times to me showing me the affectionate pair, and said, "See, see!"

Later in the evening a great part of the company assembled in the boudoir, and a general conversation ensued.

Some works which had lately been published, and which lay on a table, gave occasion to various observations on their worth and on reading in general.

"I cannot comprehend," said Uncle P—, speaking in his Finnish dialect, "what is come to me for some time; I am in a common way as wide awake and as lively as a fish, but the moment I cast my eyes into curs—books they drop down directly upon my nose, and I can see nothing of God's gifts."

"Have you pleasure in reading, gracious Aunt?" asked Emilia from the Baroness S—.

"Ah, good heavens!" replied she, casting her beautiful eyes up to the ceiling, "I have no time for that, I am so occupied;" and she wrapped carefully around her her magnificent shawl.

"If I should ever marry," said a gentleman of probably sixty years, "I should make it a condition with my wife, that she should never read any other books beside the hymn-book and the cookery-book."

"My late wife read no other books; but then—what a splendid housekeeper she was!" exclaimed Uncle P—, as he dried his eyes and took a pinch of snuff.

"Yes, I cannot conceive, the thousand fetch me! why ladies now-a-days busy themselves so with reading, the thousand fetch me! I cannot understand," said Lieutenant Arvid, stretching forth to a plate of confectionery and taking a handful.

Julie cast a bitter glance at her bridegroom, and I fancy that "the thousand fetch me!" this time struck her as not very agreeable.

"I would," said she, reddening with vexation, "much rather dispense with meat and drink than be deprived of reading. Is there anything which is more ennobling to the soul than the reading of good books? Anything which elevates more the soul—I would say, elevates the thoughts and feelings to—over—to—"

"My poor little Julie was never fortunate when she would strike up into the sublime. Her thoughts were rather of the nature of rockets, which mount suddenly upward like glowing rays of fire, but are extinguished in almost the same manner, and lose themselves in ashes.

Gornet Carl hastened to spill a glass of wine and water over Lieutenant Arvid, and pretended that he had interrupted his sister's speech by his exclamation.

"Did I not know that it would go crazily; I tried to balance the glass upon the point of my thumb. Pardon, brother-in-law, but I fancy that you certainly sate in my way. I had not my arm at liberty—"

"I will certainly take care and not disturb you another time," said Lieutenant Arvid, half merrily and half vexed, as he stood up and dried his coat with his pocket-handkerchief, and out of circumspection took a seat on the other side of the room.

In the mean time Julie could not so quickly get out of her dilemma. The old book-hating gentleman turned himself with great gravity to her, and said—

"I presume that cousin Julie reads, for the most part, moral books and sermons!"

"N—o, not exactly so much sermons," replied Julie; and, as she just then became aware of the searching glance with which Professor L— observed her, she crimsoned deeply.

"Probably cousin reads history more!—that is truly a very excellent study."

"Not directly history," said Julie, again lively and courageous. "but histories, on the contrary, most gladly. Short and good, if my uncle will know for what reading I would willingly resign eating and drinking, then it is—novels."

The old gentleman lifted up his eyes and his hands with an expression of horror. From his countenance one might have been tempted to believe that Rousseau's assertion, "jamaïs fille sage n'a lu de romans," had made him abominate such dangerous reading.

Something of displeasure betrayed itself in almost every one's looks at Julie's candid declaration. The Baroness seemed altogether shocked at her niece. The Professor alone smiled, full of goodness, and the Cornet said, full of zeal:

"It is really not extraordinary that people read such novels as are written now-a-days. Madame De Staël's 'Corinne' has cost me a sleepless night; and on account of Sir Walter Scott's 'Rebecca,' I have for three days lost my appetite."

Julie looked at her brother with the greatest amazement. Emilia's mild blue eyes were raised to him inquiringly; but he thought it best to avoid them.

"My Euphémie shall never read novels," said Baroness S—; upon which she set her lips firmly together, and seated herself higher in the corner of the sofa, and looked down at her handsome shawl.

"Ah, my aunt!" said Mrs. M—, smiling and shaking her head, "but then, what shall she read?"

"She shall read nothing at all."

"A most excellent idea!" said the old gentleman.

"I think, really," said Algernon, "that it is better to read nothing than to read only novels. Novel reading is for the soul, what opium is for the body; an uninterrupted, continued use of it weakens and injures. Pardon, Julie, but I think that a young lady could better employ her time than in devoting it to this reading."

Julie looked as if she had no desire to pardon this remark.

Emilia said, "I think with Algernon, that (especially for young ladies) this reading is far more injurious than useful."

Tears filled Julie's eyes, and she looked at Emilia as if she would say, "Do you set yourself against me?"

"I confess," said Mrs. M—, "that they may be very injurious if—"

"Injurious!" interrupted the old gentleman, "say destructive, poisonous, ruinous to the very foundation."

Julie laughed. "Best Professor," cried she, "help! help! I begin almost to believe that I am a lost and misguided being. Say, I beseech you, something in favour of the novel readers, and then I will give you something good;" and, archly laughing, she held up a garland of confectionery.

"It has, certainly, its entirely good side," replied the Professor, "when it is used with discretion and moderation. For my part, I regard the reading of good novels as one of the most useful, as well as the most agreeable for young people."

"Hear! hear!" exclaimed Julie, and clapped her hands.

"But that requires reasons, my good sir; it requires reasons!" cried Uncle P—.

"Yes, yes—reasons! reasons!" cried the old gentleman.

"Good novels," continued the Professor, "that is to say, such as, like good pictures, represent nature with truth and beauty, possess advantages which are united in no other books in the same degree. They present the history of the human heart; and for what young person, desirous of becoming acquainted with himself and his fellow beings, is not this of the highest worth and interest! The world is described in its manifold changing shapes in the liveliest manner, and youth sees here, with its own eyes, maps of the land over which they so soon must travel in the long journey through life. The beauty and amiability of every virtue is in novels represented in a poetical and attractive light. The young, glowing mind is charmed with that which is right and good, which, perhaps, under a more grave and severe shape, might have been repulsive.

"In the same manner, also, are vices and meannesses exhibited in all their deformity; and one learns to despise them, even if they be surrounded by the greatness and the pomp of the world, whilst one feels enthusiasm for virtue, even though it struggles under the burden of all the world's miseries.

"The true picture of the reward of the good and the punishment of the bad among men, however little their outward fate may bear traces thereof, is set forth in novels with all the clearness, life, and strength, which one must wish to be given to every moral truth, in order to maintain it rightly and universally attractive, and productive of fruit.

"For the rest, it is natural that noble youth should love novels as their best friends, in whom they find again all the glowing, great, and beautiful feelings which they cherish in their own hearts, and which have given to them the first heavenly foreknowledge of felicity and immortality."

Julie now started up with warm delight in her charming countenance, went to the Professor, gave him, not the sweetmeat garland, but embraced him with child-like devotion, whilst she said to him, "A thousand thanks! a thousand thanks! I am contented, quite contented."

The old gentleman looked up to heaven and sighed.

Lieutenant Arvid did not look "quite contented," but ate confectionery assiduously.

Uncle P— slept and nodded; the Cornet declared that it was not, in token of approbation.

The Professor looked quite contented, and kissed with an expression of fatherly kindness, first the lively maiden's hand, and then her brow.

Lieutenant Arvid pushed his chair with a great noise from him ; at the same moment the doors of the supper-room opened—supper was announced.

A repast has always its peculiar interest for those who have had to do with its preparation, arrangement, and so on.

Every dish, the child of our care, has its own share of our interest and satisfaction, as it now stands adorned and fascinating upon the table, just about to vanish for ever. Yet one has, on such occasions, a heart of stone ; and I am sure that her Honour enjoyed as much I did seeing how all the delicate fish, middle and after courses, vanished through the mouths of the bridal guests, evidently to their great delight and satisfaction. Her Honour, at ease about Emilia, and seeing how excellently well all was served, did the honours with a satisfaction and cheerfulness which seemed only to be disturbed by thoughts about the little Dumplings.

The bride was gentle and beaming. Algeron seemed to be the happiest of mortals. "Look at Emilia! look at Emilia!" said Cornet Carl, who was my neighbour at table, every ten minutes, "could one really believe that she was the same person who plagued herself and us so for half the day!"

Julie assumed a dignified and proud air towards her lover whenever he spoke to her. He in the end did the same, and pouted, but always with his mouth full.

Uncle P— dozed with a piece of blanc mange on his nose, and amid the talk and laughter of the company was heard now and then a snore, which sounded like the droning of a base-viol which struck up to the tweedle-dees of little fiddles.

Towards the close of the repast skals were drunk, not ceremoniously and tediously, but gaily and heartily. The Magister, warmed by the occasion and by the wine, made, glass in hand, the following impromptu in honour of the bridal pair—

Hand about the brimming glasses ;
Hurrah ! let us drain the bowl !
Let the foam the ceiling sprinkle :
Happy couple—here's your skål !
Ring the glasses altogether !
May we e'en, as now, be gay ;
When, in fifty years, we gladly
Keep your golden bridal-day !

Amid universal laughter and ringing of glasses the skål was drunk. Afterwards one was also drunk for the Magister, who, I am persuaded now regarded himself as a little Bellman.*

After supper the most agreeable surprise was prepared for Emilia. Upon a large table in the drawing-room were spread the portraits of her parents and her sisters, painted in oil, and most of them most striking likenesses.

"We shall in this manner all of us accompany thee to thy new home," said the Colonel, embracing her ; "yes, yes, thou wilt not get rid of us!"

Sweet tears ran down Emilia's cheeks : she threw her arms around her father, her mother, her sisters, and was not for some time able to thank them. After this the company undertook to make an accurate examination of every portrait, and there was no lack of remarks of every kind. Here they discovered a fault in the nose ; here in the eyes, which were too small ; here in the mouth, which was too large ; besides this, the artists had not laboured to beautify—rather the contrary, and so on.

* A celebrated Swedish popular poet.

Poor artists ! see, then, the review which censoriousness—the most common of all maladies—compels your works to undergo. Poor artists ! happy, happy, for you, that you are often a little deaf, and are satisfied with the feeling of the money in your pockets and the consciousness of your talent in your souls !

Emilia alone saw no fault. It was precisely her father's look, and her mother's smile ; her sister Julie's arch countenance, brother Carl's hasty demeanour, Helena's expression of kindness and peace ; and the little Dumplings, O ! they were astonishingly like. One had a desire to give them a sweetmeat.

The poor little Dumplings ! burnt and frightened, they had been obliged to leave the feast, about which they had rejoiced for three weeks. During the whole evening some of us had kept sneaking up to them with apples, sugar-bread, and so on. The Magister himself at first had been the most industrious upon the stairs ; but after he had fallen down three several times upon this to him little known path, he remained quietly in the drawing-room. Her Honour had, during the evening, said at least six times to me, with an expression of the greatest disquiet, "My poor little boys ! I shall positively sit up with them to-night !" And I replied every time, "That shall not her Honour, but I will sit up with them !" "But you will certainly sleep !" "I shall not sleep, your Honour !" "Parole d'honneur !" "Parole d'honneur, your Honour !" And, chased by the uneasiness of her Honour, I went up to them, before the company had separated, well supplied with packets of plaster, bottles of drops, and sweet things.

The little boys were much pleased with the latter, and enchanted that, merely on their account, a light should be kept burning all the night. The adventure of the evening occupied them greatly, and they had never done informing me how the Magister had knocked them, how they had fallen down, and what they felt and thought as the Magister let the tea-kettle fall upon them. Axel thought about the deluge, Claes upon the last judgment. Amid these relations they went to sleep.

At half-past eleven I heard the noise of bells, horses, and carriages before the house of the Colonel. At twelve o'clock all was still and silent, as well within as without the house.

"Soon they all will be sweetly asleep," thought I, and began by degrees to be indescribably sleepy.

Nothing is more painful than to be alone, to be sleepy and be compelled to keep awake, especially when those for whom one keeps awake snore with all their might ; and had I not given my parole d'honneur not to close my eyes, I should probably have speedily done so. I knit at my stocking ; but was obliged to put it down, because every minute I was nearly pricking my eyes. I read, and did not understand a word which I read. I looked out of the window, gazed upon the moon, and thought—on nothing. The wick of my candle grew as big as a lily. I wished to snuff it—I unfortunately snuffed it out.

My part as watcher became by this means more difficult than ever. I endeavoured now to keep myself awake by terror, and wished, in the uncertain glimmering of the white stove, to see the ghost of the White Lady. I thought if a cold hand should suddenly seize mine, and a voice should whisper horrible words in my ear, or a bloody form should ascend up from the floor—when suddenly the crowing voice of a cock was heard in a neighbouring yard, which, in connexion with the dawning day, chased away all imaginary spectres.

The melancholy song of two little chimney-sweepers, who, from the tops of their smoky pleasure-houses, saluted the morning, formed the ouverture to the general awaking life.

In the region of the kitchen soon blazed a friendly fire; coffee diffused its Arabian perfume through the atmosphere of the house; people moved about in the streets, and through the clear winter-air sounded the musical bells of the churches which invited to morning prayers. The smoke-clouds curled purple-tinted up to the bright blue heaven, and with joy I saw at length the beams of the sun, which first greeted the vane and stars of the church towers, and afterwards spread their mantles of light over the roofs of the dwellings of man.

The world around me opened bright eyes; I thought about closing mine; and as glad voices greeted me with "good morning," I replied, half asleep, "good night."

PART II.

ABOUT OF MANY THINGS.

The wedding-day—has also a morrow! a wearisome day in the bridal house! Of all the festivity of the preceding day, one has only that which remains of an extinguished light—the fume. And when from the familiar circle of home, together with all festal sounds and habiliments, has vanished also a friendly countenance (one of the star-lights of its heaven), then it is not extraordinary that its horizon is cloudy; yes, my little Julie, I thought it quite natural that thou gottest up and went about all day like a rain-cloud, whilst thy brother was not unlike a tempest, as he wandered from one room to another, humming the "songs of the stars," which was horrible to hear.

Everybody had agreed that the new-married pair would pass this day with Algernon's old grandmother, who lived quite retired from the world, with her maid, her cat, her weak eyes, and her human love, which occasioned her to wish that nobody should ever marry,—which pious wish she had even expressed to her grandson and Emilia, but in vain. She had, in the mean time, spite of her vexation, wished to see the young couple at her house, and had herself, as report said, peeled the apples for the apple-cake which was to crown the conclusion of the frugal dinner. The day afterwards we were to see them with us, and the next we were to pass with them.

In the mean time we spent the day after the bridal in a sort of stupid quietness. Her Honour ate the whole day nothing but thin water gruel.

After we had brought this heavy day to an end, and every one had betaken himself to his chamber, Julie felt a lively need to animate herself a little; she sent for walnuts, came into my room, and sat down to crack them, and to praise her bridegroom.

"How incomparably charming he is! So regular, so sensible, so even in temper, so pleasant, so—so order—(a delicate nut!)—so attentive, so prudent, so regular in his affairs—not niggardly either—so good—not too good either—so—so altogether just what he should be!"

I nodded my approval of all this, wishing Julie much happiness, and—yawned quite indescribably. There are perfections which put one to sleep.

The next day we had a little fresher wind. The newly-married came to dinner. A capsuited Emilia excellently; she was gentle, pleasant, able, but not exactly gay; whilst, on the contrary, Algernon was unusually cheerful, animated, and talkative. This annoyed and vexed Julie; she looked at them alternately, and knew not exactly where she was. The domestics put themselves to infinite pains to call Emilia "her Honour." This new appellation did not seem to give her any pleasure; and when an old, faithful servant said to her for the seventh time, "Sweet Miss, ah—Lord Jesus! her Honour," Emilia said, somewhat impatiently and weariedly, "Dear me, let it be: it is not really so important." The servants presented no dish to her at table without making it very formidable with their question, "Does your Honour please?" "Yes, yes, the fellow knows his world," remarked the Colonel. Emilia looked as if she found that world not at all agreeable.

Full of anxiety of heart, Julie took her sister after dinner into another room, threw herself on her knees before her, and, clasping her arms around her, exclaimed with tears, "Emilia, how is it! Sweet Emilia! Lord God—thou art not happy—thou lookest—dejected! Art thou not satisfied! Art thou not happy?"

Emilia embraced her sister warmly, and said, consolingly, but with tears in her gentle eyes:

"I ought to be, indeed, sweet Julie; Algernon is so good, so noble—I must be happy with him."

But Julie, like all persons of lively tempers, was not satisfied with this. "I ought to be!" She wished for "I am," and considered it quite desperate, unheard of, and unnatural, that a young wife should not be indescribably happy. She had read novels. She conducted herself through the remainder of the day stiffly towards Algernon, who did not seem to trouble himself particularly about it.

When Emilia, with tearful eyes, had again parted from her home, Julie gave full scope to her displeasure, and highly enraged herself against Algernon, who could be so well pleased and merry whilst Emilia was so dejected; he was an icicle, a savage, a heathen, a —. N.B. The Colonel and her Honour were not present during this philippic: the Cornet, again, took another view of the affair—was displeased with Emilia, who, he thought, required quite too much from her husband. "Had not he, poor fellow, to spring up and look for her work basket! Did he not put on her fur shoes, her shawl, her cloak! And did she once thank him?" Julie took her sister's part, the Cornet, Algernon's; the spirit of controversy threw already one and another bitter seed into the dispute.

and the good brother and sister might, perhaps, have remained at variance had not they, as they both stooped to pick up Helena's needle, knocked their heads together, the shock of which ended the contention by a burst of laughter; and the question of the rights of man and woman—that sea, upon whose billows the two disputants found themselves unexpectedly betrayed, was quickly given up.

The next day was consolatory for Julie. Emilia was gay and happier to receive her parents and her brother and sisters in her own home, busied herself with the most unconstrained grace, with the warmest cordiality, to entertain them well. All the Colonel's favourite dishes were on the table, and Emilia's eyes gleamed with joy as her father desired to be helped a second time to turtle soup, adding that it was "outrageously good!" Her Honour was not a little pleased with the excellence and good order of the dinner, as well as with all the arrangements over head. She blinked, to be sure, a little uneasily at a pudding, one side of which seemed to be somewhat rusty; but Julie turned round the dish unobservedly, and her Honour, being near-sighted, believed that the fault lay in her own eyes, and was quiet.

Emilia had the deportment of a housewife, and it became her infinitely well. The Cornet was charmed with his sister, and with every thing that surrounded her in her new home; every thing spoke Swedish, thought he; sofas, and chairs, and tables, and curtains, and porcelain, and so on. There was nothing foreign; and it was precisely this, according to his opinion, which made one feel so comfortable and so much at home.

Julie was much pleased with Algernon, who, if he did not exactly make much of his young wife, yet either was beside her, or continually followed her with his loving eyes; one saw plainly how his soul surrounded her, and Emilia cast many bright and friendly glances to unite themselves with his.

How good the coffee tastes when there is snow falling without, and there is the air of summer within. That we ladies all found, as we, in the afternoon, assembled around a blazing fire, enjoying the Arabian bean, had a long and cheerful conversation, during which Emilia talked of the domestic institutions and arrangements which she thought of making, that she might bring comfort and good order into her home; and of which she had in part talked, and should further talk of, with her—her husband. (This little word caused Emilia some little difficulty in the utterance); and see! it was all quite prudent, quite good, and quite to the purpose. We proved all, accurately and maturely, between the coffee-cups and the blazing of the fire; we added to, and took from; and could not, however, find out anything much better than that which Emilia had herself devised.

The family is, at the same time, like a poem and a machine. Its poetry or song of the feelings, which streams through, and unites, one with another, all its members; which twines flower-wreaths around the thorny crowns of life, and brightens with the green of hope "the naked rocks of reality," therewith every human heart is acquainted. But the machinery (without whose well-directed movements l'opera della vita, however, remains a fragment without support) many regard as not essential, and neglect it. And yet this part of the institution of domestic life is not the least important to its harmonious progress. It is with this machinery as with the clock. Are all wheels, springs, and so on, well arranged? It needs merely that the pendulum swing, and all is set in proper motion, which goes on as if of itself, with order, and the golden finger of peace and prosperity points out the hours upon the clear face.

Emilia felt this; and she was determined from the beginning, so to arrange her home and her household, that they, spite of the little accidental blows and knocks of fate, should stand to the end, till the weight had run down.

One great and important thing towards the accomplishment of this end, is the prudent and exact management of money matters in housekeeping. In Emilia's case, this was put upon a good and rational footing. From the great common purse there branched out and arranged themselves, various little purses, which, like brooks flowing from one and the same fountain considerably towards various quarters, made the household plantations fruitful.

Emilia was to receive annually, for her own particular expenditure, a certain sum, which she should devote to her own dress and other little purposes, which were not to come into the household register. And as her dress was always to continue simple and tasteful as it had hitherto been, so she would be able to spend a great part of this money to gladden her own heart. Guess, or say in what manner, dear reader—you know how.

A woman ought to have her own purse, great or small, whichever it may be. Ten, fifty, a hundred, or a thousand dollars, according to circumstances, but her own, for which she accounts to—herself. Would you know "why," you gentlemen who make your wives render an account of pence and farthings! Why most especially and particularly, for your own sublime peace and prosperity. You do not think so! Well, then. A maid-servant knocks down a tea-cup, a servant breaks a glass, or suddenly tea-pot, cup, and glass, all at once fall in pieces, and nobody has broken them; and so on. The wife who has not her own purse, but who must replace the cups and glass, goes to her husband, relates the misfortune, and begs for a little to make good the damage. He scolds the servants, his wife, who ought to look after the servants. "Money, indeed!—a little money—money does not grow out of the ground, nor yet is it rained down from heaven—many small brooks make a great river." And such like. At last he gives a little money, and remains often in a very ill humour.

Again, if the wife have her own little purse, then such little vexations never come near him. Children, servants, misfortune, remain the same; but no disorder is remarked; all is made right as at first; all is in order; and the head of the house, who, perhaps, with the greatest ease, could lay down a thousand rixdollars at once, need not for a few pence, squeezed out at different times, lose the equipoise of his temper, which is as invaluable to the whole house as to himself.

And dost thou reckon as nothing, thou unfeeling nabob, those little surprises, those little birthday and namesday pleasures, with which thy wife can give herself the delight of surprising thee—those thousand small pleasures which, unexpected as falling stars, gleam, like them, on the heaven of home, and which must all come to thee from the affection of thy wife, through—a little money, which thou must give to her in the gross, in order to receive again in the small, with rich interest of comfort and happiness.

Now, is it clear yet? Algernon had long seen this, and that operated greatly on Emilia's future happiness.

To every true woman's heart it is indescribably delightful to give;—to feel itself alive in the satisfaction and happiness of others; it is the sunshine of the heart, and is more needed here in the cold North perhaps than elsewhere. Besides this a little freedom is so refreshing.

But where was I just now? Ah! taking coffee with Emilia. Thence go we upon the wings of time to undertake a longer journey.

He who undertakes to relate histories with the pen, must take good care how he husbands the reader's patience. Sometimes he can very well give an account of to-day, of to-morrow, and the next day; but on other occasions he must lump together time and circumstance, if he do not wish that the reader shall lump together his book, and jump from the fifth to the eighth chapter. Highly important is it that it should not be so with my honourable family; so I hasten to take a little leap over probably three months, and only shortly to put together how my H— friends passed them.

Julie and her bridegroom passed them in walking. Every day, when the weather permitted it, they went down the whole length of Queen-street, exchanged greetings and talked with acquaintance, noticed figures and dresses amid the pleasant consciousness how handsome and distinguished their own were. Sometimes they went to a shop and bought trifles, or ate a tart at Berndt's, which was often "dreadfully delicious." In the evenings there was a supper somewhere, or an exhibition somewhere, or a ball somewhere,—and this always furnished a subject for the next day; so that, thank heaven! the betrothed had no lack of conversation. Besides this, Lieutenant Arvid, who had everywhere entrance into the great world, had always something small to relate—some anecdote of the day, some word of this and this about that and that; and so it was all very amusing—thought Julie.

The Cornet had taken an odd fancy. He had set himself to study. Studied the science of war, of mathematics, history, etc., and discovered more and more that as his bodily eyes were formed to look in all directions over the earth and up to heaven, so also was his spiritual eye designed to look into the kingdoms of nature and science, and to acknowledge the light of heaven in these. It was peculiar, that the more he learned to see, the darker he became. He had dread of and for spectres! Yes, gentlemen, it is actually true, and the spectre which he feared has been from time immemorial known in the world under the name of Ignorance, an extraordinary fat lady, dressed in a shining white stuff; Self-sufficiency, her long-necked daughter, who always went and trod in the footsteps of her sweet mama; and Boasting, who might be the ghost of an old French language-master, who during his lifetime was related to this lady, and often was seen in company with her.

For the rest, he sought gladly the company of older and more learned men; was much at home with his father and with Helena, and often let his young gentlemen acquaintances knock and shake his bolted door in vain. Sometimes, nevertheless, he would be in doubt whether he should not open it, because he thought—"Perhaps my good friends come to repay me my money;" but then he considered to himself and thought again, "then they would not shake the door so stoutly," and remained quiet. The Cornet had two young friends for whom, at a given sign, his door always flew open. These young men formed a noble triumvirate. Their watchword, in time of war as in peace, was, "Forwards! March!"

Emilia and Algernon made a journey in the beginning of April to Blekinge, where, on a large estate, an old aunt and godmother of Emilia's lived. Emilia received immediately after her marriage a letter from her, in which she begged Emilia and her husband to visit her as soon as possible. She had lately lost her only child, a son, and wished now, at the age of sixty, to gladden, or rather to reanimate, her heart, by giving it something else to love, to live for. She desired the new-married pair to spend the spring and summer with her; she spoke of neighbours, and of various good and pleasant things which could make their summer residence agreeable. She mentioned that she should make her will; that her property would be theirs after her death, if they would regard her as a mother.

"Upon my word a beautiful letter!" said Uncle P—. "Set off straight there at once, Nephew, with your wife—have the horses put to the carriage immediately. I wish I were in your clothes, you lucky fellow! Wait till the beginning of April!—Madness! What, and if the old lady should die in the mean time! Sir, that is what one may call sleeping over one's luck! I would take care that it did not happen to me!—Dear Julie, wake me when the coffee comes in."

When the travelling carriage stood before the door, and the weeping Emilia sat beside Algernon exchanging tearful heartfelt glances and anxious adieus with her parents and family, who stood around the carriage, Algernon seized her hand and inquired, "Wouldst thou now rather remain here with these, or accompany me?"

"Accompany thee," replied Emilia gently.

"With thy whole heart!"

"With my whole heart!"

"Drive off!" exclaimed Algernon gaily.

"Emilia, we accompany each other on the journey—through life!"

The carriage rolled away. O that the carriage of every marriage swung upon such springs!

Quietly and sadly did the blind girl pass her dark days; her health visibly declined. Her soul resembled the fires in a charcoal-heap; its flames appear not, do not burst forth, but consume their dwelling silently and surely. In song alone did she at times utter forth her feelings, and when she believed herself to be alone she composed both words and music—which bore the stamp of an unhappy and unquiet heart. In company she spoke scarcely a word, and only her incessant occupation of twisting around her hands and fingers a ribbon or a cord, betrayed the restless disquiet of her heart.

There is in woman a state of mind which operates by causing to do well whatever she does in her domestic circle; which causes a quiet peace to attend her, like that of a pleasant spring day; that where she lingers, lingers also a prosperity and a well-being which she imparts to every one who approaches her; this state of mind proceeds from a pure, god-fearing and devoted heart. Happy, happy above all others (however in other respects richly gifted) who is possessed of this! And happy was Helena, for it was she who was thus richly gifted. In a letter which she wrote at this time to a friend, she painted vividly herself her happy condition.

"Thou askest what I do!" wrote she at the conclusion of the letter, "I enjoy life in every moment of it. My parents, my family, my work, my books, my flowers, the sun, the stars, heaven and earth: all give me joy, all make me feel the indescribable joy of happiness and of existence. Thou askest me what I do when dark thoughts and doubts seize upon my soul. I have them not—for I trust in God; I love him, I hope in him. I have no cares or anxious fears, for I know that he will make all right—that sometime all will be good and bright. Thus thinking, thus feeling, I must indeed be happy."

"Curro, curri, currum, currere," repeated the little Dampings. "Curri, cursum, currere, you little sinners!" corrected the Magister; and thereon they honestly spent (I never exaggerate!) nearly three months.

"It goes on slowly,—but it goes on safely," said the Magister consolingly, and full of consolation, to her Honour.

Her Honour—God bless her excellent Honour!—but could it only have been managed that for her our flight into the country had been without so much trouble, so many an "ah! oh!" and so many packages and so many trunks! The Colonel said, half in joke, a little word on this subject.

"That is easily said," replied Her Honour gravely.

The Cornet, who could not bear the least remark about his mother, in whose proceeding and action he would never see the least fault, held by her in all her trouble, and contradicted us, who thought it a little unnecessary; and when she was altogether too much put out of sorts, he went about singing "God save the King" (the only English which he knew), in order to withdraw our attention from her Honour.

A month before and a month after the removal, she wearied herself and worked for our good, and on the day of the journey itself—O heavens!

What packing and pitching,
In cellar and kitchen!
In parlour and hall
All the things have a hall,

And wherever we tread,
Things turn heels over head.
And gentlefolks ringing,
And servants off springing.

Guests come, and breakfasts and trunks in array,
All throng about us, and all must have way.
Of friendship they talk, goose and beefsteak attack,
And up go the mouths all—and up goes the pack:
The lady smiles, grins, and then sighs forth—"Good lack!"
Quick the travelling time comes,
The alarm drum booms.
Thus hurrying, thus hurrying, run hither and hither!
"Drive onward! drive onward! the mantles bring hither!"
Such packing and stowing Reminds me of going;

and going to—

THORSBORG:

THE paternal estate of the Colonel, where we arrived in the middle of May.

Had I a drop of the vein which sprung forth from Sir Walter Scott's inkstand, spread itself through "all lands," and has wetted with historical-antiquarian ink the pens of hundreds of authors, then would I give in this place a magnificent description of the stately castle of Thorsborg, built during the Thirty Year's War by a high-minded and nobly descended lady in nine month's time, with walls as firm as the minds of those times, and with leaded window panes, as small as the rays of light which emanated in those days from the choisters. I would tell how Mrs. Barbro Akeadotter, of Göholm and Hedeås, wife of the Admiral Stjernbjelke (whose portrait is to be seen at Thorsborg, and shews her to be a proud and dignified woman), in order to surprise her husband, then fighting for the cause of freedom in Germany, she raised this noble building upon the height where it now stands in princely grandeur, commanding immeasurable fields and meadows, to an extent of many miles; and how she, on the arrival of our hero at the home of his fathers, had burning lights placed in all the windows of the castle, in order to delight and charm his eyes, I would also whisper that this was not successful, and that tradition says that he was exceeding angry at Mrs. Barbro's handiworks. I would further relate somewhat of the fate of the successors who afterwards lived upon the estate, of whom one, who was gifted with the power of a skald, scratched upon a pane of glass in the castle saloon, and which, in the time of Colonel H—, was still to be seen, the following dictum, as a memorial of themselves, and for our edification:

"Miss Sigrid with her Scoop,
Are both great fools."

And if I had descended down the stream of time, from the burnt-out volcanoes of the Middle Ages to the calm places of rest of our days, I would, wandering among these, searching among the remains of the lava-streams, and after the extinguished fires collected in the urns of memory, scatter them through these pages, and—that is to say (to talk a little less flowery) I would speak about all the old armour, helmets, and spears, which still are preserved at Thorsborg, and which Cornet Carl embraced with particular tenderness; of the bloody dresses, swords, murder-halls, and such like; and mention among the peaceful remembrances, the doors, overlaid with a thousand wooden figures, of the sleeping-room of Gustavus Adolphus the Second, which were removed here from the more ancient castle; of the immeasurable saloon with its floor of oak laid chequer-wise, and the oak spars of its roof; of the portrait of Mrs. Barbro, as she sits with her trowel in her hand; of her spinning-wheel, etc.; and, in order not to forget salt to the soup, would I forget to relate of the spectral apparitions which occur in the castle, and which nobody was so liable to perceive as the Magister. He often heard terrible sounds—a mixture of the clangour of the trumpet and the howl of the wolf; he heard how at night time there was a soft moving about in the billiard-ball; how the balls rattled; small bells were rung, and so on. I would relate how the people in the house knew about one ghost, which walked without a head in the great oak saloon in moonlight evenings; and how very often, amid dark nights, lights suddenly beamed from all the windows; and how there was nobody who had not heard sofas, tables, and chairs dragged with a terrible noise up and down the room where nobody was; and that even her Honour—Ha! but I begin to be horrified myself; and I now see clearly how I have only ability with common ink to write about common and every-day things; and therefore find it more safe and agreeable to tell how the little Dimples, happy beyond all description to be in the country, leapt about, and dug among the ditches and heaps of stones, where were the ruins of the old house, sought for treasures and found—primroses. How Julie herself, like a butterfly, sprang after her winged sister beings, defying her bridegroom to run in pursuit of her, until she observed that it was not worth her trouble, for he did not exert himself at all. "It was too warm."

He liked, above all things, to sit upon a soft sofa with his little bride, comfortably resting upon the softly swelling cushion, in a sort of inward observation of life's—easy side. In the mean time he busied himself with hunting alternately on the Colonel's estate and that of his own father. His father was a cheerful, good-hearted, grey-headed man, who esteemed highly five things on earth; namely, his old noble name, his son, the friendship of Colonel H—, his set of white horses called "swans," and his tobacco pipe, for the lighting of which an incessant fire burnt, both winter and summer, in his stove. He was enchanted with his little daughter-in-law elect, who, however, played him many a little trick, over which he was just as easily made angry as he was easily put into good humour again. He related histories willingly, exaggerated prodigiously, swore boldly, and was, after all, that which people called a man of honour.

At Thorsborg the family soon fell into a quiet and cheerful way of life. Her Honour went about, to be sure, with her bunch of keys and her troubles, but allowed nobody to disturb themselves on that account; and so intrinsically good was she, that she never annoyed or made any one uneasy but herself.

The evenings were especially agreeable. When we were all assembled in a little green boudoir, rich with pictures and flowers, and where the reading of the works of Franzén, Tegnér, Stagnelius, Sjöberg, Nicander, and many other Swedish poets, which Professor L—'s expressive eloquence and excellent declamation taught us more to value, and made us every day richer in noble and fresh thoughts and feelings. Frequently, also, there was reading of a more serious kind; that, namely, whose object it is to diffuse clearness upon subjects of the highest importance to the human heart—on God and immortality. This, I soon observed, was done with an especial reference to the blind girl, upon whose marble-pale countenance the looks of the Colonel always lingered during the reading of those passages where the rays of divinity penetrated most clearly and most warmly, although through the veil of human weakness. Often, too, were the evenings spent in conversations on the same subjects. Professor L—, the Colonel, and Helena, took the principal part in these. The measures taken by the Colonel, in common with the Professor, for the moral improvement of his dependents, by good schools and other establishments, which were intended as much for their benefit as their enjoyment, gave an unconstrained occasion for these conversations. The human being—his organisation—his education—his dignity—his weakness—the ennobling of humanity through a rightly preaching of a rightly understood gospel—this life in connexion with the future;—these were subjects which were handled by Professor L— with the greatest warmth, beauty, clearness, and power. His fervid and powerful eloquence, which expressed so excellently his rich feelings—the happy ability, which he possessed in an admirable manner, of giving clearness even to the most abstract ideas, by examples drawn from the riches of history, morals, and nature—the calm, beautiful wisdom, which was the result of his learning, and the beneficial strength of which irresistibly passed to the hearts of all his auditors—the fine tone of his manly voice, the dignity and expressiveness of his features—all this caused people to listen to him with delight for whole hours. And when, as he went deeper into his subject, he expressed himself with an ever-increasing warmth, with a more forcible utterance, expressed more lofty and profound ideas, people felt themselves, as it were, lifted from the earth and brought nearer to heaven. It was an apotheosis of thought and feeling, and the heavenward journey of the moment left always behind it in our hearts a living spark of the eternal fire.

It was during these evenings that I saw feelings of a higher and nobler kind arise in the hitherto somewhat childish and volatile Julie. I saw her breast heave, her cheeks crimson, whilst she listened to the conversations on truth and virtue; and her expressive eyes dwelt on the lips of the noble interpreter, as if to draw in every word; and she answered her bridegroom shortly and with indifference, as he sometimes would solicit her judgment on pretty little paper things and cuttings-out, in which accomplishment he possessed a real talent.

The blind girl remained silent during these conversations, and rarely did any movement in her statue-like countenance betray the feelings which stirred within her.

We had also in the evenings conversations of another kind—of a light, but, nevertheless, of an important nature. In these Cornet Carl and her Honour took part. One evening as Professor L— and the Colonel were absent, Lieutenant Arvid gave a long lecture on the best mode of cooking reindeer flesh, and on the sauce thereto. Julie inquired whether Arvid's speech did not give us a great appetite to eat an early supper, and go quickly to bed. Universal applause.

Our day, as Julie and I sat at an open window and worked—a pot of Provence roses standing on the table between us—and we had long sat silent, Julie said all at once, quite hastily, “Do you not think?”—and was still again.

I looked up at her, and asked, “What then?”

“Yes—that—that Professor L—— has something very noble in his countenance, and particularly in his brow?”

“Yes,” I replied, “one reads there his noble soul, his mild wisdom.”

Julie smelled at the Provence rose—its buds seemed to have blossomed upon her cheeks.

“Aha!” thought I.

Again Julie asked, “Do you not think?”—New pause.

“That Prof——” said I, leading the way.

“Yes—that—that Professor L—— has a fine voice, and that he talks most excellently! He makes every thing so clear, so rich, so beautiful. One feels oneself better whilst one hears him.”

“That is true. But do you not think that Lieutenant Arvid has very handsome moustaches, very handsome teeth, and a particularly handsome voice, especially when he says, “the thousand fet——”

“Now you are malicious, Beata,” said Julie hastily, reddening, as she sprung up and ran away. In going past him, she woke Lieutenant Arvid, who, upon a sofa in the next room, was taking his after-dinner nap; upon which he grumbled a little, and demanded, whilst he leisurely stretched out his arms and legs—a kiss in compensation.

He received—“Yes, indeed; pish!”

In the mean time, Julie became more serious every day; her temper, hitherto so constantly cheerful and good, began to be irregular, and sometimes unfriendly; her demeanour became more still and grave and sometimes a faint expression of melancholy dwelt upon her charming countenance. For a long time, however, none of her family remarked this change; every member of which had much of his own to look after.

Her Honour, whose lively nature and active goodness always kept her in motion, had in the country every hour occupied. She was the comforter, the counsellor, and teacher, in great as well as in small; and besides this she was the physician of the whole neighbourhood. She was all this, with an ease and a possession of mind which one could hardly have expected from her, on seeing her troubled manner on occasions of the least perplexity in her own home and household. She herself went about to people with medicines and encouragement, soup and good counsel; and the first gave substance and force to the latter. She was the darling of the whole district; old and young, rich and poor, praised her as “so very good and condescending!”

The Colonel occupied himself apparently in a more passive manner; but in fact was more actively busied about the welfare of those over whom he had power. He was to his dependents, as well as his domestic servants, a good and just, but strict ruler. He was generally more feared than loved; but every one acknowledged that, during the time the property had been in his hands, depravity of manners, drunkenness, and crime of all kinds, had decreased every year; and, on the contrary, order, honesty, morality, social intercourse, and their consequences, prosperity and contentedness, advanced more and more, even to neighbouring places; and the excellent institutions which he formed, the good schools which he established, and which every year made more perfect, gave hope of the increasing cultivation and happiness of the rising generation. Professor L—— stood now at his side as a powerful coadjutor.

This is the place to say a word of explanation regarding Professor L. It shall be short and good.

Professor L—— was the son of a man of property, and was himself in very good circumstances. He had become a clergyman, in order to be, according to his opinion, the most useful to his fellow creatures. He was, in the most beautiful signification, the father of his parish.

Remarkable is it, that he, next to me, and perhaps more than me, paid attention to Julie. His eye followed her often, so kindly serious, so searching—

Helena had the oversight of the parish girls' school, which important office she filled excellently, and with as much pleasure as care.

The Cornet had—oversight of the boys' school!—Does anybody perchance believe it? No, heaven forbid! And that was well, both for him and the school. He had suddenly taken a violent passion for botany; went out early in a morning, remained often abroad the whole day, and came home in the evening quite wearied, with pockets full of weed—plants I will say. He talked a deal about the interest of botany, of its benefit and usefulness; showed Julie incessantly the difference between a pentandria, and an octandria, etc. In particular he was bent upon finding the Linnea borealis, which he had been told grew in the neighbourhood, but could not discover. This he now went out to seek both early and late.

“It is very queer with Carl,” said Julie, “when he comes home from his botanical rambles; either he is so joyous that he is ready to embrace everybody, or he looks so cross as if he were ready to bite.”

“He is too much taken up with his botany,” said the Colonel.

Helena smiled and shook her head—and so did I—and so also wouldst thou, my young reader. I guess that thou guessest that he—but hush, hush as long—do not let us betray the secret which will come in proper time to light. In the mean time, we drive in the great family carriage to make—

VIRTS.

THE Colonel, her Honour, Julie, the Cornet, and I. Her Honour, who sometimes had ideas which seemed to have fallen from the moon, had lately come upon the notion that I began to be melancholy; which proceeded, she fancied, from my having beaten my brains over the Book of the Revelations, because she had found me a few times with the Bible in my hands open at the last page, where the coming of the New Jerusalem is described. Now her Honour was afraid of nothing so much as of beating one's brains over books; she half believed that my reason was in danger, and in order to divert me, and to draw me a little from "such things," she was altogether determined that I should accompany her on the visits which were to be made in the neighbourhood.

We set off one beautiful afternoon, and all of us in good humour.

We drank coffee with Mrs. Mellander, who, together with her husband (the appendage of his wife), rented a little place from the Colonel. Mrs. Mellander was uncommonly ugly; marked by the small-pox, and had a bearded chin; carried her nose very high over her silent, worthy husband, who deeply acknowledged her power, and talked about good breeding and morality the whole day long to her two handsome but somewhat awkward daughters, whom the Cornet likened to weeping birches. For the rest she was neat, orderly, and domestic; kept in good order her husband, her daughters, a maid-servant, and three cats, and believed herself therefore to have an excellent head for government.

"Yes, yes!" said she once, sighing, "now people say Count Platen is dead; next year they will perhaps say Mrs. Mellander is dead."

"That would indeed be dreadful," said the Colonel who was present.

Whilst Mr. Counsellor Mellander led the Colonel down into the little orchard to shew him a newly laid out, or, as he called it, a newly broken up piece of land in an old potatoe field, we began to hear every kind of news from Mrs. Mellander. First, that she had read a very entertaining book about a young fellow who was called Fritz.

"Is it a romance?" asked her Honour.

"Yes, it is a romance. It is very amusing. The whom Fritz loved is called Ingeborg."

"Who wrote the book?" again asked her Honour.

"Yes, that I do not know. He must be a clergyman. And it stands there so beautifully how they voyage over the seas, and how she claps her small white hands."

"Can it be Frithiof?" exclaimed the Cornet, perfectly screaming with pure astonishment.

"Frithiof—yes, Fritz, or Frithiof, so was he called."

"By Tegnér?" exclaimed her Honour quietly.

"Ten—yes, yes, some such a name have I heard."

Julie lifted her eyes up to heaven.

Her Honour, who at the first moment looked as if it were desirable to turn the conversation from such a subject, now asked Mrs. Mellander whether she had heard that the Countess B— had removed from her estate.

"No!" replied Mrs. Mellander sharply, and with decision, "I know nothing about her. Between us there is no longer any intercourse. Would you think it, your Honour, that she and I were brought up together? Yes—we were in our childhood together every day; and I had a straw hat with red ribbon, and I said to her,

'listen, Jeannette,' and she said to me, 'listen, Lisette,' and we were the best friends in the world. Then she went on her way, and I went on mine—to my uncle, Counsellor Stridsberg, at Norrtelge. Your Honour knows him certainly!"

"No!" replied her Honour.

"The cross! not know the rich Stridsberg—he married Mamsell Bredström, daughter of shopkeepe Bredström in Stockholm, your Honour knows really—brother-in-law to Lönnquist—who lives in the Packar-market."

"I do not know," replied her Honour, smiling and half embarrassed.

"Indeed—indeed!" said Mrs. Mellander, somewhat displeased, and perhaps with lessened esteem for her Honour's acquaintance. "Yes," said she, continuing her relation, "and thus it happened that we did not see one another for several years. But then, when I was married to Mellander, I went to a concert in Stockholm, and there saw my old youthful friend, who had now become the Countess B—. And I bowed and bowed to her—but what do you think? She looked point-blank at me and never moved again, and acted exactly as if she did not recognise me. 'Aha!' thought I. Now, however, when she drives past my house in her country carriage, she puts her head out of the window and bows and nods. But—I knit. What does your dear Honour think?"

That which her dear Honour thought, however, Mrs. Mellander did not know this time; for in the same moment came in her dear better-half, together with the Colonel, who mentioned our setting off, as the clock had already struck five, and we had almost seven miles to drive to Löfstaholm, where we had to make our next visit, to the Ironfounder D—. In the mean time every one of the company must take two cups of coffee, with the exception of the Cornet, who cursing Mrs. Mellander, her good intention and her coffee, resolutely declined. He and Julie had during this time done their best to enliven and amuse the two Mamselles Eva and Amalia. The Cornet said to them, in his gay good humour, all kind of little polite things. Julie praised their flowers, promised to lend them books, patterns, etc., which had the effect of making the handsome weeping birches, as if shaken by a brisk wind, or enlivened by a beneficial rain, lift up by degrees their branches, and move their leaves; that is to say, Amalia and Eva were quite lively, and their eyeballs turned both to east and west.

At Löfstaholm were the Colonel and his family received with the liveliest and most noisy joy. In an especial manner was great attention shewn to Cornet Carl, who, for his generous deportment, his lively temper, together with his merry fancies, was universally beloved and thought much of by the neighbours, and was in especial favour at Löfstaholm, where balls, theatricals, and pleasures of all kinds were perpetually alternating, and where he had danced now with twelve ladies in four-and-twenty dances—by turns as Captain Puff, or Cousin Pastoreau, or as the Burgomaster in Carolus Magnus—and occasioned universal delight. The parts of lovers he had never been able to take, because he had never been in love; and, therefore, could not naturally represent that which was contrary to his nature.

In order to celebrate the name-day of the Ironmaster D—, his three talented daughters, and his four talented sons, gave on this evening a little concert, to which a tolerably large company of listeners had been invited, and to which now the H— family made a welcome five.

Mrs. D—, whom report called a very accomplished lady, who talked of Weber and Rossini, of education and accomplishment, poetry, colouring, taste, tact, and so on, made therefore a flowery speech to her Honour about her views of education, and of a system which had laid the foundation of that which she had given to her children, and without which, both Weber and Rossini, accomplishment, taste, and tact, would move themselves with any tact.

At the beginning of the concert, Eleonora D— bashfully and blushing seated herself at the piano-forte and played “Con tutta la forza della desparazione.” In every accord which she struck, she gave to the ears of the auditors two or three notes into the bargain; and the shakes, thanks to the bass-pedal and fermaté, went over the keys like a dash of India-rubber, over a drawing. The close produced much effect—the whole piano thundered. After this, the blue-eyed Therese sang an Aria out of the barber of Seville. Magnificent staccato tones, and powerful rolls, as if shook with manual force, and shrill exclamation, drew from the audience the most lively declarations of gratitude for so much—trouble.

The Ironmaster D—, a little fat and merry old man, was fascinated by his children, whom, in his paternal heart, he compared to the Seven Wonders of the World, and went up during all this to Colonel H—, rubbing his hands, and asking, with flashing eyes, “Now, what thinks my brother? What says my brother! What? What!”

The Colonel, who had in part too good natural taste, and in part had heard too much good music, not quite well to know what he was about, took refuge in his good-humoured arch smile and the two-sided praise, “They play devilishly!” or, “She sings like the thousand!”—which dubious expressions the happy father received with the most lively pleasure.

A duet which succeeded this, between Adolf D— and one of his sisters, got a little (as the Colonel said) out of joint; and a duet of angry looks took place between the brother and sister; whilst the song, by degrees, again adjusted itself.

The finale, or chorus, which all the seven virtuosos sang together, in which “long life,” and “free from strife,” “howls,” and “skäls,” and such like words rhymed, composed, together with the thereto-belonging and preceding row of words, by Adolf D—, would, I thought, have shook down the house.

Her Honour, who during all this sat as if she were at evening service, with a devotional and rather deplorable mien, now did her best to satisfy the musical family's thirst for praise. The Colonel repeated his words of power, and the company sang a chorus of bravo! and charmant! which, however, were accompanied by many equivocal looks. This behaviour scandalised the Cornet—he had an easy part to act—who could say, and did say it freely, that he did not at all understand anything about music, and could not, therefore, give any judgment upon it. Another, who from his musical knowledge (or for his sins' sake) is called upon to give an opinion, is badly off at such a concert as this. One may condemn artists, for one has purchased the right of doing so; but amateurs one can only praise, that one considers oneself obliged to do; and if one cannot do it with a good conscience, the truth takes its flight not willingly without shewing a sour face.

It was not to be thought of that we should return home before supper. The clock struck eleven before we were again in the carriage. It was a mild, unusually lovely spring night. Her Honour was soon asleep, lulled by the rocking of the carriage and by our conversation. We all grew silent by degrees. The Colonel's countenance was gloomy. The Cornet sat and looked at the moon, which, pale and mild, stood above the green peaceful earth. There was a something enthusiastic in his look, which I had never remarked before. Julie was also full of thought. The coachman and horses must also have thought about something for we only crept slowly through wood and fields. When we, about midnight, drove past the parsonage, the residence of Professor L—, we saw a light shining in one of the windows. The Colonel saw it, and said, whilst his eyes beamed kindly, “There, now, sits L—, and wakes and labours for the good of his fellow-creatures. He himself enjoys no nightly repose; and may do so, perhaps, for fifty years or more, before his work will be rightly understood and valued; and such nights succeed to days which are wholly dedicated to the fulfilment of his manifold duties.”

“He is like his light,” said the Cornet, “he consumes himself to illuminate others.”

“He must be a most noble man,” said Julie, with a tear in her eye.

“Yes, indeed,” said the Colonel, “I know none nobler. But he cannot live long in that way; he kills himself.”

“Has he not,” asked Julie, “any sister, or a mother, or somebody at home with him, who will look after him, and love him, and value him?”

“No, he is solitary.”

“Solitary,” repeated Julie, softly and anxiously. Whilst we drove in a half-circle around the parsonage, she leaned out of the carriage-window, and kept her head still turned in one and the same direction.

“What are you looking after, my child?” asked the Colonel.

“After the light, papa—it glimmers so beautifully in the night.”

On the following day several visits were to be made in the neighbourhood; but now it was altogether impossible for the Cornet to accompany us upon these. He had got an intimation that the Linnaea borealis was to be found in a woody district about three or four miles east of Thorsborg; and in order to convince himself thereof, it was necessary that he left us before dinner.

“I cannot comprehend,” said Julie, “upon what Carl lives on certain days. He never takes anything with him, however much I may beg of him to do so, whenever he goes on his pilgrim journeys. It seems to me, also, that he gets very thin."

"Now again he runs to the woods!" said the Colonel, as he saw his son go with great strides across the court. "I fear that his Linnaea borealis has turned his head."

Our visits to-day were less fortunate. At the L—'s of Vik the children had the measles; and, for the sake of our little Dumplings, we posted away, on this news, at full speed.

At M—, the Countess was not at home. In a pleasure-house in the garden sung her canary-birds, hungering in splendid cages; and seemed, by alternately lamenting, alternately joyous quavering notes, both by fair means and foul, to draw attention to their want.

Her Honour gave them seed, water, sugar, bird-grass, and a thousand flattering names.

"With all these," remarked the Colonel, "we shall not get a cup of tea this afternoon."

Between six and seven o'clock in the afternoon, not to have tea was a great loss to the Colonel; and her Honour, who knew that, sate with a troubled and anxious countenance in the carriage, whilst we turned upon our homeward way, which would require a full half hour. In order to take a shorter cut, as he believed, the coachman drove by a new way, which also brought us acquainted with a new district. We drew up in a wild spot, overgrown with wood, to give the horses breath. To the right, and at no great distance from the carriage, we saw above the tree tops a column of smoke arise, which a gentle wind drove towards us.

"Upon my faith," said the Colonel, "do I not believe that they have tea ready for us there. See, Julie; does there not shine a white wall through the wood?"

"Yes, I see something grey-white; there is actually a house there; the smoke seems to come from it. It is plain that a fairy is waiting for us there to entertain us. Faeree, which bids to tea, that rhymes excellently."

"My opinion is," said the Colonel, "that if there be no fairy there, yet there are quite certainly people, and who most surely will bestow tea upon us, if we—What do you think, Charlotte; shall we not pay a visit to that little charming palace in the wood yonder? We will tell the gentlefolks there that we wish to make their acquaintance, and that we—in one word, that we are thirsty."

Julie laughed heartily. Her Honour looked quite horrified.

"My good friend," said she, "that would never do."

"It would do for me, charmingly," said the Colonel, "to get a cup of tea."

"Besides, sweet mamma," said Julie, "we might, perhaps, make a very interesting acquaintance. For example, think if Don Quixote did not die of his blood-letting, as people said, but travelled up into the north, and had set himself down here with his handsome Toboso, and received us; or if we should meet with a hermit, who would tell us his history; or a disguised princess—"

"What and whom you will," said the Colonel, "if they be only Christian enough to give us a cup of tea."

As the Colonel now certainly, for the fourth time, had come out with his "cup of tea," her

Honour rebutted so gravely this visit à la Don Quixote, as she called it, that all thoughts of it were given up, and it was determined to continue the drive.

As the carriage was now again set in motion, crack went off one of the hind wheels; the carriage went slowly over, and amid a variety of exclamations we tumbled, the one over the other, down upon the road.

Her Honour lay upon me; but endeavoured, however, before she herself thought of getting up, to draw away her reticule, which by chance was under me, and which I assured her was quite impossible for her to do as long as I was unable to move from the spot.

At length we, every one of us, stood again upon our feet. Her Honour was pale, and we gathered all around her, with fear and anxiety, and asked a thousand questions—"Whether she had struck herself—was much frightened, and such like." But as she replied to all with "No," and as we, to her anxious inquiries about us could also say that we felt neither fright, wounds, nor bruises (of being squeezed I will not speak), Julie burst out into such a hearty and loud fit of laughter that we were compelled to join her. The coachman and servant were both, like us, uninjured, and scratched their heads with troubled faces.

With their assistance, the Colonel now endeavoured to raise the old heavy carriage; but the road consisted of deep sand—the carriage had fallen as good as into a ditch—the coachman was an invalid—the servant an antiquity. They cried out "Eu!—uh!" The Colonel alone worked, and the carriage came not from the spot.

A visit to the grey house (the only human habitation which was visible) was now necessary, and the Colonel, who was so bent upon this visit and his "cup of tea," that he was quite pleased about this affair of the carriage, exclaimed, "We must go altogether in pleasure and need;" offered his wife his arm, and led her, with unusual cheerfulness and merry jokes, along the narrow path, which wound through a thick spruce and pine wood, and seemed to conduct to the so much talked of grey house.

"It will rain," said her Honour, and looked anxiously up to heaven. "My bonnet!—could we not stop here under the trees, whilst Grönvall runs and fetches people to the carriage?"

"It will not rain," said the Colonel.

"It does rain," said her Honour.

"Let us hasten to get under a roof," said the Colonel, and hurried merrily onward, holding his hat over her Honour's head.

At last we arrived before the little grey house. It had a gloomy and forlorn appearance; and with the exception of a little kitchen garden, all around was wild and uncultivated. The silver waves of a lake glittered at some distance through the dark fir wood.

It began to rain in earnest as we reached the house. A door on the right of the entrance stood ajar. It led to the sanctuary of the kitchen. As the Colonel entered, a maid-servant started from a corner, like a hare from her form, and fixed upon us her only half-awake grey eyes and stammered forth—"Be so good as to go up stairs—the gentlefolks are at home."

We mounted up a narrow and dark staircase, at the head of which the Colonel opened a door, which gave us a view of a little room filled on all sides with washing. Tables and chairs, as well as baskets, were covered with clothes, partly folded and partly not. The air steamed hotly towards us as if from a heated oven.

"Go on, go on!" said the Colonel, friendly admonishing her Honour, who made a halt on the step.

"My sweet friend, I really cannot go and step into the clothes baskets," replied she a little disturbed. The Colonel and I drew these aside, and we went through the land of clothes to another door, at the opening of which we all stood for a moment in astonishment and surprise.

A perfectly beautiful, majestic lady, dressed magnificently in black silk and lace, stood in the middle of a room, tastefully ornamented with beautiful glass, vases of flowers, mirrors, and other useless things. Somewhat behind her stood, although she seemed to me only to float, a young—yes, actually only a young girl,—but so enchantingly, so angelically beautiful, that one was ready to doubt whether there were anything earthly in her existence. She could not be more than sixteen at the most, had her light hair fastened up with a gold pin, wore a light gauze dress, which surrounded like a bright cloud the lily-white, lovely, ideally beautifully formed angelic being.

The elder lady approached us, whilst her dark blue eyes regarded somewhat proudly and inquiringly the uninvited guests. Her Honour stepped backward and trod upon my toes. The Colonel, whose noble bearing and open, and at the same time cheerful manner, made upon every one an agreeable impression, soon called forth an amiable smile upon the lips of the handsome Wood-lady, whilst in a manner at once pleasant and comic he related the cause, or rather the causes of our unexpected visit; besought forgiveness for it; mentioned his name, which seemed to make an extraordinary impression upon the beautiful unknown, and presented his wife and daughter—me, he forgot. I forgive him. Who talks of the sauce to the goose? It follows of itself, of course, as appendix. The handsome Wood-lady replied in broken Swedish, but with a voice which was actual music. "Very welcome! the carriage shall have help, and we will have tea—as good as I can. My daughter, my Hermina," added she, whilst she pushed back the shadowing curls from the brow of the sylph.

In the mean time her Honour advancing to the sofa, stood and curtsied with great politeness before a gentleman who hitherto had been half concealed by the window-curtains, but who now stepped forward, took the hand of the astonished lady, shook it and kissed it, laughing the while, and saying, not without embarrassment, "Sweet Mamma!" It was—the Cornet.

Her Honour said merely, "Good heavens!" and seated herself quite hurriedly and quite confounded upon the sofa, with clasped hands and looks riveted upon her son. The Colonel opened his eyes wide, made a most comical grimace, but said nothing. A sort of embarrassed, uneasy constraint took place in the company. The Cornet, who in particular seemed to stand upon needles, went out to look after the repair-tion of the carriage.

The handsome Wood-lady went out also, and we remained alone with the sylph, whom the Colonel observed with apparent delight. He, as well as her Honour and Julie, endeavoured with questions and observations on a variety of subjects to make her talkative, but it did not succeed; she talked only a little, and avoided answering questions. Child-like innocence, inward grace, and an almost heavenly repose, lay in her whole being, and impressed itself upon all which she said. She spoke tolerably good Swedish, but with an accent in which the fine tones of the Italian tongue betrayed itself. Julie was delighted, and ceased not to whisper to me, "She is an angel, an angel! Look at her mouth!—no, look at her little hand,—no, look at her foot—no, look at her eyes!—ah, brother Carl!—now art thou certainly fast!—she is a real angel!"

In that little tastefully ornamented room stood also a harp and lyre. To Julie's question whether she played upon either of these instruments, she answered by going up to the harp, and playing and singing a canzonetta of Azioli, with a grace and a voice so touchingly sweet that it drew tears from all our eyes.

She had scarcely ended when her mother entered; immediately afterwards came the Cornet and tea. The occupation which this last gave to one and all made the constraint in the conversation less observable, although it did not go on altogether straight forward.

I could not help remarking (one may pardon this in a House-counsellor) the poverty of the tea-service. The cups were of Rörstrand's coarsest porcelain (three of them were joined), the sugar was common, and very grey lump,—of bread or rusks I saw not a trace.

I feared that our handsome hostess observed that I looked a little about me, and that her Honour also looked a little about her, and glanced with half an eye at me. For her countenance betrayed a painful confusion, whilst she stammered out something about the difficulty of getting white flour. With her willing kindness her Honour offered to send her some from her own store, but received for answer a decided and cold "No, I thank you!" whereupon she was at once discouraged, and rather offended.

The Colonel drank with satisfaction his second cup of tea, when all at once we heard a loud noise, and somebody hastily coming up the stairs. Our hostess crimsoned, turned pale, rose and made a few steps towards the door, when it was thrown open, and a man with a wild expression of repressed anger in a pale, sternly significant countenance, entered hastily, moved haughtily and negligently to the company whom he found in the room, and went and seated himself in a window, where he remained silent; whilst he cast, nevertheless, wild, angry, and penetrating glances upon our handsome hostess, who, evidently trembling, came silently and resealed herself by her Honour. By degrees, however, her demeanour became calmer, and she answered several times the angry glances which were cast at her with a look full of pride and even disdain.

The Colonel, who measured the newly-arrived with searching looks, addressed to him a question respecting the weather. At the sound of his voice the Unknown turned himself quickly round, regarded the inquirer keenly, and a pale red tinged his sunken cheeks, as he replied, without seeming to know that which he said. "Yes, yes—it rains no longer—people may go their ways."

He looked again through the window, and repeated, "It clears up—one could go out without any danger."

The Colonel, who on this day seemed to be possessed by the spirit of contradiction, said, against all appearances, for it cleared up every moment, "It changes now—it clouds over, and begins certainly to rain worse than ever."

Her Honour gave him now a little friendly beseeching glance, and at this silent prayer he rose up, and saw at length that it had cleared up, and that one might "go one's ways."

Amid expressions of gratitude and excuses we made our adieus to the Wood-lady and her daughter, who had large tears in her beautiful eyes when we left the room; silently saluting Mr. Zernebok, as Julie called him, who seemed to wish to shoot us with his eyes, and to help us off.

"You will accompany us, Carl!" said the Colonel to his son; "or do you still think of looking for the Linnæa borealis?"

"I shall run and see whether the carriage is in order," returned the Cornet, and was off like a storm-wind.

When we again were seated in the carriage, the Cornet was assailed with questions. He declared that he knew no more of the handsome foreigner than we did: upon one of his rambles into the country he had made her acquaintance—he knew that she was handsome and amiable, lived apart from the whole world, and seemed to be poor—for the rest he knew nothing more—nothing at all.

"Poor!" exclaimed her Honour, "and dressed in that way—such lace!"

The Cornet crimsoned, and merely said—"They are always very well dressed."

"But who in all the world was the cross gentleman?" asked Julie.

"The gentleman of the house," answered the Cornet; "he seems to have an unhappy and an irritable temper—for the rest, I do not know this family."

The Colonel looked sharply at his son, who was evidently embarrassed.

It was silent in the carriage. Her Honour nodded her head as an accompaniment to her own thoughts.

Once the Colonel interrupted the silence, as he said smiling good-humouredly, "I have yet her 'kling, kling,' in my ears."

"Kling, kling!" repeated the Cornet, reddening.

"Yes, yes!" replied the Colonel, dryly, and it was again silent.

Julie had, it is true, her heart and her eyes full of animated words about the two handsome foreigners, but she did not rightly know upon what ground she stood with regard to her brother's acquaintance with them, and besides that, seldom ventured in the presence of her father to give vent to her raptures, from dread of his sarcastic looks, of which she had a panic-terror.

"It is extraordinary," said the Colonel again, "that exactly in that woody region, east of Thorsborg the rare Linnæa borealis—"

"Do you not think, papa," interrupted the Cornet, hastily, "that I should close the window; or perhaps papa should not talk just now—so much—the cold mist comes in."

"Thanks for your care, my son; there is no danger for me. I fear more for you—that you may have caught some malady on your botanical excursions—that you have taken cold—have the ague."

"The ague!" said the Cornet laughing, but reddening at the same time, "one might rather talk about a fever—"

"I will be your doctor," said the Colonel; "and as I see already considerable symptoms, I order you—"

"Thanks most humbly, my best papa! But there is now no danger at all—that I assure you. Besides which, I have much—respect for medicines."

The Colonel was silent. Her Honour sighed. Julie cast roguish glances at me. The carriage drew up, we were at home. It was already quite late in the evening.

During supper the Colonel said to his son, "Now Carl, when were you so fortunate as to meet with your Linnæa borealis?"

The Cornet answered briskly, "Exactly today, papa!" and taking out his pocket-book, drew from it a little plant, saying, "this little northern flower, which, with the exception of Sweden and Norway, is found only in Switzerland, and upon a mountain in America, has a most remarkable smell, particularly in the night time. It has already begun to dry, but it smells well yet—does it not, Julie?"

"The cross, best Carl!" exclaimed Julie, "it smells really strong of wormwood!—or, no—what do I say!—it smells—"

"Wormwood!" said the Cornet confusedly, and looked with embarrassment upon his sprig of wormwood; "I have made a mistake—I have lost, I had—"

The Colonel laughed sarcastically, "One must confess," said he, "that this Linnæa borealis is a most curious plant!"

The one, however, who, soon after this, came to know something more about the Linnæa borealis, was her Honour. There existed between mother and son such an inward tenderness, the questions of the one inevitably drew forth the confidence of the other, if this were not volunteered. Of all her children her Honour loved most her eldest son, although she would not confess that her heart knew any difference between them. He was the most like her of all, not only in feature, but in the intrinsic goodness of the heart. Besides, the care which his extremely weak and delicate childhood required, had cost her a great deal of her own health and strength, and that, perhaps, more than all the rest, had fostered her maternal heart to the child who was preserved through so many sacrifices. That which costs us much becomes precious to us. Now also was she rewarded by the most heartfelt filial love.

If her Honour knew of any mystery, she did not help us out of our darkness. The Colonel seemed to know no more than we did, because he used frequently to joke in gay humour about botany and the Linnæa borealis, of which word the Cornet had a real horror—and the utterance of which he always endeavoured to prevent, by the introduction of some new subject, the first that offered.

In the mean time he continued his rambles uninterruptedly; even undertook a little journey on foot to an adjacent district, which would occupy a week; because—but of that hereafter.

The Colonel said with his customary quietness, "In a fortnight the young gentleman will join the army, afterwards an expedition to Roslagen will occupy him the whole summer; he will lose his love for botany and the Linnæa borealis during that time."

During all this Julie was in her way in a deplorable condition. Lieutenant Arvid, who in the country missed those subjects of conversation which were furnished by a city life, began in his l'été à l'été with his bride, to have nothing to say but, "My little Julie!" to which by way of filling up the pause a kiss always ensued, to which the "little Julie" was sometimes averse. After the lovers had sat beside each other for a long time in silent attention, she began to yawn. Then said Arvid, "Thou art sleepy, little Julie."

"Yes," she replied; "and thanks to thee for it," she thought.

"Lean against me, my angel, and get a little nap," said the gentle voice of her future earthly support, "lean against me and the sofa cushion, which I will place thus. I will lean against the other pillow, and also have a nap—that will be divinely beautiful!"

With rather a troubled look, Julie followed the advice, and presently people saw, both forenoon and afternoon, the betrothed sitting and half-slumbering together. Julie often said, to be sure, that it was a sin and a shame thus to sleep away life, but her bridegroom thought that it was thus that one enjoyed it most, and thus, as only a good little wife but a bride will attend to the wishes of her beloved, and so Julie took for the present her forenoon and afternoon nap. Once she was heard to say half angrily, in return to Lieutenant Arvid's prayer that she would consider him as a cushion, "I assure you, that I begin to do so in real earnest."

THE BLIND GIRL.

I see—the night alone.

HIS Honour, who now for certainty had discovered the grounds of my supposed melancholy in a probable tendency to consumption, prescribed for me a course of milk diet, and leisurely walks into the fresh air early in the morning.

Perhaps also she did so in order that in an easy manner she might make me the companion of Elisabeth, to whom the physicians had prescribed the same diet. But however it might be, four things were made out: I was melancholy; I had consumption; I should be cured; and I must walk.

I began thus to drink milk, and walk out arm in arm with the silent Elisabeth through the beautiful parks when the birds, especially at this time of the day, struck up concerts, in which they were not disturbed by the gentle steps of the two wanderers, nor by merry words from their lips.

Elisabeth's state of mind was in the beginning cold and unfriendly. She was silent almost always, and the few words which she uttered bore the impression of a diseased and irritable temper. She often asked, "What o'clock is it!" And upon my reply, there always followed from her an impatient sigh, "Not more!"

I was silent, because I—because I really did not know what to say—because I dreaded by an imprudent word to wound her restless, sensitive, unhappy soul. I saw her suffer—would so gladly have endeavoured to console her, but knew not what tone I must strike that it might beneficially reach her heart. Besides, it seems true that human words have less power to assuage the sufferings of a being than this mild, fresh, life-giving spring air which floated around us, than this melodious chorus which swelled forth from the soothing groves, than this rich delicious odour which seemed to be the breath of young nature, which we drew in with ours, and which lovingly pressed to the inmost of our souls. Ah, what could I have said, indeed, more beneficial, more tender, more calming, than this beautiful, wonderful poesy of nature!

By degrees Elisabeth's state of mind became gentler. My silent but unobtrusive attentions were no longer repulsed unkindly. She spoke more frequently, and with greater calmness.

One day she said to me, "You are as quiet and kind as nature; it does me good to be with you." As I never, with a single question, sought to intrude into the inmost of her soul, she seemed by degrees to forget altogether that she was surrounded by anything else than that nature in whose bosom the most unfortunate being need not fear to pour forth her sufferings, and who often is the best, the most consoling friend. She often uttered broken sounds—now full of a still sorrow, now mysterious, wild, murmuring; sometimes she sung monotonously, but charmingly, a sort of cradle-song, as if she would hush to sleep the stormy feelings of her heart. This pensive, pleasing song produced in me sometimes exactly that melancholy which her Honour wished to cure.

In her behaviour Elisabeth gave the same play as hitherto to her unrestrained outbreak of feelings. She often stretched forth her arms with vehemence, or made movements with them as if she would remove from her something horrible; sometimes she pressed her hands tightly upon her breast, or clasped them together upon her brow with an expression of unutterable suffering. Often her movements were so violent and so wild that it seemed to approach an outbreak of insanity. But as soon as our morning promenade was ended, and we drew near home, she regained by degrees her reserved, cold, almost unnaturally stiff demeanour.

One morning when we had sat upon a bench, she said hastily to me, "We sit in the sun—is it not so? I feel its warmth. Let us seek the shade. I do not like the sun, and it has no part in me."

I led her to a bench where a leafy hedge of lilacs kept off the beams of the sun.

"It must be right beautiful to-day," said Elisabeth; "I think that I have never felt such a sweet air." And now she began to question me about the colour of flowers, about trees and birds, about all which surrounded us, beautiful, but for her invisible, and all this with a tone so mournfully gentle, so filled with quiet resignation, that a deep and inward emotion overcame my heart; and some tears, which I sought not to repress, fell from my eyes upon her hand, which rested in mine. She hastily withdrew it, saying, "You weep for me, you can feel compassion for me! Nobody should do so—nobody should pity me—nobody should deplore me,—I do not deserve it! You shall no longer be deceived in me—know me—detest me! This heart has wished to commit a crime—this head has committed a murder! I advance now—I know it—I feel it—towards death, but towards a quiet, almost easy death, far from shame and dishonour,—and I had deserved to end my days by the hand of the executioner upon the gallows."

I seemed at these words as if the day darkened around me—I was silent in quiet horror. The blind girl was silent too; first with an expression of wild despair, then with a laugh of scorn upon her pale lips. At length this passed off in an expression of gloomy dejection, as she softly and slowly asked, "Is anybody near me now?"

"I am here," replied I, as calmly and as gently as possible, for I felt how much more the unhappy guilty one needs the kindness of his fellow-creatures than the innocent sufferer.

"Soon," said Elisabeth, and laid her hands upon her breast; "soon will the flames of hell, which rage here, be extinguished! Silent death, I know thy friendly approach! The fanning of thy waving wings gives to me at times a moment's alleviation. Soon will this cold heart rest, stiff in the cold earth! Motherly earth, thou wilt clasp in thy breast the weary child, whom no maternal heart, no father's breast, no friend's sustaining arm has known and blessed, during the whole of life's long, long day! But why do I complain! That I may receive the alms of despicable pity! And not once do I deserve that! I am a miserable being!"

She was silent; but, after a pause, began again:

"It is strange!—to-day—to-day—after so many hundred days of the silently-sustained misery of life, my heart will speak—will, like a long-fettered captive, breathe a freer air—will step forth to-day, regardless of the feelings of horror and detestation which the view of the miserable criminal must awake in others. The flames will now blaze up once more, and cast abroad a light, even though a ghastly one, before it is extinguished for ever.

"Turn from me your face, Beata! Follow the example of the sun—it is of no consequence,—or rather is it right so,—I have now something to lose—your pity. Well, I have deserved this punishment."

She was again silent. Vehement and painful feelings seemed to shake her soul, and an indescribable expression of enthusiasm and melancholy was painted on her beautiful countenance, as she stretched forth her arms longingly, and exclaimed—

"Father-land, freedom, honour! Could I have lived, and fought, and died for you! I should not then have been the wretched fallen being that I now am. O if I had been a man! Then would not my heart have beaten fruitlessly for you, the worthy goal of the eagle-flight of the soul! These flames, which now consume my criminal breast, have then been kindled upon your altars, and blaze on high, a clear and holy flame of sacrifice. But now! Oh, how unfortunate is the woman to whom nature gives a soul, full of fire, strength of feeling, and enthusiasm! Unfortunate the woman who sees in the narrow circle within which she is called upon, quietly and untruly to live and work, only a joyless condition, a prison, a grave of life!

"I was this unhappy one. Oh, how have I not suffered through this contest against destiny! This was the dragon with which I fought—which I fancied myself elected to conquer; and it has thrown me down into the dust, crushed me, trampled upon me like a worm!

"In the haughtiness of my youthful feelings I was proud of my fire, of the depth and expansion of my feeling. I disdained to regulate myself by reason, to acknowledge any other power than my own will. I felt that I had wings. I would fly. I would raise myself above every thing—I have fallen!

"O that my dying voice could be heard by every woman who, fiery and impassioned, believes herself formed to be something great, splendid, and astonishing; who fancies that the breadth and expansion of feeling wherewith she is gifted, entitle her to despise the silent world, within which her place in the social ordination is assigned, which is appointed to her both by divine and human laws. O that she could see me, fallen by over-stepping these laws, and hear me warningly say, 'Misguided, pitiable being! struggle against thyself—against thy own impassioned soul! Behold the dragon with which thou oughtest to contend—whose fire will consume thee, and be the bane of others, if thou do not subject it. Submit thyself to the laws of destiny and society—combat with thyself, or thou wilt suffer, and will be crushed like me!'

"For me it is too late to combat—the power is gone, the will is gone! The fire has the upper hand. The temple burns, burns, burns; and will burn, till the winds find in it nothing but ashes. I have myself kindled my funeral pile—I consume and suffer!

"Thou world around me; full of harmony, beauty, and song; which, like an awakened, smiling child, surrounded me with caressing arms; in vain thou smilest, in vain thou flatterest. I understand thee not—I suffer!

"When I was young—a century since then—there reigned a storm in my breast, but then I was nearer to the first—now I see a heaven no longer. When I was young, very young, I loved already with the whole strength of passion. My first love was for my native land. You smile perhaps, find perhaps this feeling ridiculous in the breast of a girl. So have others done; and yet—my native land! The noble, beloved land of Sweden, had all thy so-called my heart, then wouldst thou now be the home of heroes—the non of Europe!

"You have read—have heard speak, of martyrs—of the fearful torments, of the almost incredible cruelties which the friends of freedom and fatherland have suffered in all ages; and you have turned away your eyes in horror, withdrawn your thoughts. I read also, I heard also of the fate of these, but thirsted to share them: dwelt with curiosity upon all pangs, all torments of hell; the bliss of heaven seemed they to me. if borne, O fatherland, for thee! I besought from heaven for the honour, the joy of these!

"Whilst the flower of my youth unfolded, and my feelings swelled like the streams of spring, rolled the murder-chariot of war, through Europe—only an echo of the clangour of arms, which glittered forth from contending masses, reached our peaceful land. But it reached my heart, and awoke there the wildest, the most transporting feelings. Ah, I was only a woman! people laughed at my enthusiasm, they ridiculed it. I wept the bitterest tears of indignation, and concealed my fervour in my own breast.

"Peace was made, and the names fatherland and freedom, which in the blaze of the fires of war seemed so splendid and bright, lost, under the shadow of the olive, many of their enchanting rays. Even in my breast these beautiful names lost their magical power, since no longer was united to them, thoughts of danger, combat, and honourable death. Peace was made; the excitement of mind was stilled. The world which surrounded me was more common-place and uniform than before. But my heart remained like itself, wished to live, wished to labour; I was as before, and more than before, full of desire to reach the splendid heights of existence, and was by my fellow-creatures, the laws of society, conventional life, and established proprieties, repulsed again for ever to my life of nothingness. Never was a galley-slave so unhappy as I. Restless as the spirit of the tempest my soul agitated itself, embracing the world, it desired to raise itself to the stars, pressed through the covering of every feeling, the impediments to all knowledge; and my body and my observation remained fettered to that which is the most despised, and the most trivial in life. I lived as it were, two existences in one,—and the one was the torment of the other.

"The only passion permitted by the world to the heart of woman—in education its development mostly takes place through the reading of novels, sentimental poetry, and such like,—is love. I became acquainted with it. People say that it ennobles the woman, that it creates her happiness,—it has conducted me to crime, it conducts me now to my grave!

"My father died. He never understood, never loved me, never made me happy! why did he give me life? Had my mother lived, (O she would have understood, would have loved me! I have heard much said of her; she had suffered much—combated much. I was the offspring of her last sigh, which I drew in with my first breath—with the first and last mother's kiss. Therefore was perhaps my whole life also like to a work of death—a strife, an eternal combat. Soon, however, it will be at an end!

"My guardian, from whom I had lived hitherto very distant, took me to live with him. You know him—but no, you know him not! You fancy him to be a God upon earth,—and he is a stern, inflexible man,—an irreconcilable, severe judge. O how stern has he not been with me! How I loved him! I had nobody and nothing upon earth. He was every thing to me. I saw nothing and nobody except him. I told him so.

O if he had only had some gentleness, some mercy towards me! But he was only severe. His eye was cold, his word austere. I was in despair, but I adored him nevertheless.

"I was handsome, I was intellectual; full of youth, and life, and feeling. As the waves in vain strike against the rock which resists and repels them, so in vain were all my feelings, all my natural gifts, offered like a sacrifice on his altar. Ah, the waves may yet bathe with tears the hard breast which breaks and repulses them! I could not weep upon the hand which thrust me back,—which extended to me the chalice of death. He whom I above all things valued and loved, he called my feeling for him criminal. I know not whether it were so or no. Common it was not,—and perhaps not suitable for earth. I should not at that time have shunned the glance of angels into my heart—they would have understood me. The angels of heaven love indeed!—and must love in a higher and purer degree than the children of earth, for they love the highest good—they love God! Ah, he was a god to me! Why was he only a vengeful austere judge? His judgment of me caused me to despise myself, and adore him only the more!

"At one moment worldly pride arose in my breast; I wished to conquer my passion,—to punish the inflexible severity of its object.

"I betrothed myself to a young man—good and amiable I believe—who loved me; I do not remember much about him. I wished to punish, and thought I could do so by this means; yes—because sometimes there passed through me the belief that—I was loved by him who was every thing to me. Can love be the only fire which does not possess the power to warm the object about which all its burning rays collect? And besides that, I was so beautiful—and he was, I know it, weak towards female beauty. Yet what have I said! when indeed was he weak? When did I see him waver—the proud, noble, strong! Oh, I—I was the weak—the bewildered, the besotted, the miserable!

"Preparations were made for my marriage; the bridal dresses were all ready; they surrounded me with presents, caresses, and flatteries. I looked upon him whom I loved—he was very pale.

"The marriage-day came—the hour for the ceremony came—I looked at him, he was pale; there burned in his eyes a gloomy flame; but he said—nothing. In the last important moment—I looked again at him—at that time he turned his face from me; his handsome, noble, beloved face, he turned from me,—with a look—O memory! I said, yes! Hell was in my heart!

"That same evening I went forth and hid myself—hid myself from every one. It was strange in my head and in my breast. How they sought for me!—ha, ha, ha! there was a commotion!

"I had some money with me, and succeeded by travelling under an assumed name, in reaching one of the seaports of Sweden.

"I saw the sea—a storm agitated it—the morning heaven stood above it with red flames. I remember it yet—ah! it was beautiful! I sat upon a rock, and looked out at the sea. The immeasurable opened its arms for me; but low rolled over billow—roaring, foaming—thither—thither—in the infinite, towards the unbounded distance, where ocean and heaven embraced each other. It roared and raged—hu! it was fearful and magnificent. Something like a fresh gale swept through my troubled breast. I felt myself refreshed, strengthened. The billows spoke a language which did me good. They whispered, they beckoned to me, 'Thither! thither!' Half the day I sat silent upon the rock, looked out at the sea and listened; saw the sun ascend from the waves, saw the sails with white dove-like wings upon the blue sea, under the blue heaven, floating away towards some far-off peaceful shore. I listened to the admonitory voices of the billows, and determined to follow their call.

"I wished to go to America. I wished to go far, far from the earth which he trod, from the air which he breathed; from the language, the manners, which were his.

"The day was come on which I was to set out—it was now the hour. I was about to ascend into the ship of my deliverance, its streamers floated merrily in a favourable wind; soon should I be rocked upon the heaving waves, which sung so pleasantly,—amid their song, all at once was heard the sound of a voice—I felt my arm seized, and dragged back by force. Terrible words were spoken to me by a beloved voice. I scarcely understood them—every thing appeared to me strange, incomprehensible. Like a prisoner was I brought back to my husband. At that time I felt something extraordinary in my head and breast—it was a dance, a whirling—and, as it were, a gnawing grief. It increased and increased in violence—I became what people call—mad!

"The same hand which led me with force from the shore of deliverance, now fettered my hands. He whom I loved so infinitely—for whom I would have given my life a thousand times—laid me in chains—and conducted me to—the madhouse!

"A time, without time, passed over for me there—days, nights, mornings, evenings, all were alike,—all were a blank. Of this time I remember nothing,—only this, that I several times heard a well-known voice name my name; also this, that once somebody near me said, 'Yet if she could but weep!' I wondered, then, very much what all this meant, and often repeated, in a sort of confused uneasiness, 'weep!'

"One day—I know not where they had conducted me—nor with whom I was. Before my eyes every thing floated in wild, confused masses. Then all at once I perceived a roaring, like that of a stormy sea; but the roaring was possessed of a sound, a tone—swelled in wonderful and mighty harmony, sunk into a pleasant and grave melody.

"With this a voice united itself, which sang clear and still,

'O Lamb of God, which takest away the sins of the world.'

"Like a cloud which, full of the dew of heaven, sinks down upon a hard, barren earth, thus sank down upon my stiffened soul the holy harmony, and extinguished its scorching lava.

"Impelled now by a strange power, I began loudly to accompany the singing, and sang with a full remembrance of the words and the music.

It was that which I heard when I received the communion first—when I, with holy feelings, bowed my knee, and saw heaven open itself above me. At the words,

'Give us thy peace,' my tears began to flow, and from this hour my consciousness returned. Yes, that—but peace—ah, I perceived not that; and now always, and perhaps for ever, tarried heaven's dove far from me.

"Ah, I desired not that it should come to my breast! there was no submission, no sanctification, no desire for it.

"My husband was dead. I was glad of it. I came again to the house of my guardian; I wished to do so; my heart had undergone a change, and I believed that I hated as much as I had loved before. I wished again to see him for whom I had suffered so much—see him to defy him; to let him see, and, if possible, feel, that even I could be proud, cold, disdainful. I wished to humble him. Adored by wife and children, and loving them in return, I saw him stand calmly and happily in the bosom of his family. For all—for the very meanest had he kindness; for me he had only a look more cold, more proud, more severe than before.

"I felt all the chords of my soul vibrate. A horrible feeling took possession of my breast. His actual coldness mocked my assumed coldness; his strength, my weakness; his calmness, my perpetual disquiet. He had acted severely towards me. I thought that he, in his happy pride, trampled me like a worm in the dust. His image pursued me; sleeping or waking, I saw only it. It stood before me like a giant; he stifled, he stopped my breath. If he were not, then I should breathe! If he were not, then I should be! If he no longer lived, then he would cease to be my life's torment. Struck out from the number of the living, he would soon cease to exist in the memory of the living. I would give myself air—revenge—punish him—revenge! To-day, to-day his calm look defied me—to-morrow!

"Crime, like a word, the offspring of thought, springs forth and appears often, like something harmless; but its consequences extend themselves through eternity.

"One evening I mixed arsenic in a glass of almond milk, which my guardian was about to drink.

"I had some by me to mix for myself; for it occurred to me that I should feel—remorse."

"Have you felt remorse?"

I was in no mood to answer.

Elisabeth continued, "After I had done this horrible deed, I went up to my own room; I felt myself calm and cold; marble cold was my body; so seemed my heart too; its throbbing was stupified. I stood before the fire, warming my icy hands, when I began to bear violent movements and an anxious noise in the house.

"Anxiety then took hold of me. I went down and saw my victim, pale as death, almost without consciousness, sitting leaning back on the sofa, surrounded by wife and children, who were sunk into an actual agony of despair.

"As I entered, my guardian cast a look upon me; never shall I forget it! Then a burning spirit of hell approached me, and seized with sharp bloody claws upon my heart. It was remorse!

"I confessed my crime aloud; called for the curse of them whom I had made unhappy. I threw myself on the floor, and let my forehead kiss the dust. Nobody raised against me a voice of accusation; but no hand was extended to me. I crept to the feet of him whom I had murdered; I wanted to kiss them; but another foot thrust me back—it was his wife. I kissed it, and was so happy as to lose consciousness.

"I continued for a long time in perfect bewilderment of mind. When I recovered my consciousness, I saw my guardian standing beside my bed, heard his recovery from his own lips, heard him give me his forgiveness.

"So sunk, so deeply sunken was I, that I would rather have heard his curse. It would, it seemed to me, have made my unworthiness less deep, and him less great.

"The wildest storm of all passions raged in my heart. I cursed the light, and the light withdrew its beams from my unworthy eyes, and eternal night enclosed my body as well as my soul.

The storms of nature are short; to them calm, clear days succeed. In the human breast the hurricanes of passion rage long, and have only a moment's calm. I knew such, but it was the calm of night—the stupefaction of life—stifening—the cradle-song of darkness. It ceased in order to give place to a new rending, burning fire, which the eternally flowing fountains of tears never could quench. I felt an infinitely oppressive, burning desire for reconciliation.

"Oh, the death of the crosses—torments, bloody sweat, unending pain! to suffer it, and through it reconciliation; that, that had been delight! But blind, like a mummy among living beings; a criminal broken off from humanity; a nullity in ability, a nothing.—I stood, despicable, despised! O misery, misery, misery!

"That I might, however, at the least, punish myself, I determined to live—to live—a mark for the scorn of those whom I loved and honoured; to repulse every compassionate hand—and to torment myself as much as possible.

"I left once more the family whose happiness I had nearly destroyed, and for several years passed a wretched life. I returned because death had laid his hand upon my breast. My guardian wished it. He will govern my existence till its last breath. I can no longer help it—it is the decree of fate. I have power no longer,—with me all is past—past!"

She ceased. I began now to speak some composing, admonitory words. I spoke of patience, of submission—I mentioned—prayer.

"Prayer!" repeated Elisabeth with a bitter smile. "Listen Beata. For the whole of many years I have prayed,—night and day, at all times, at every moment; I have lain upon my knees till the cold has stiffened my limbs to ice, and prayed, 'O Father, take this cup from me!' Like a stone, which has been thrown upwards and falls down again and wounds the breast of the sufferer, has prayer become to me—I pray—never again!"

"O pray, O pray!" I said, weeping, "pray only with the right mind—Gud pities—gives strength to the pure will."

"God!" said the Blind, with a gloomy voice, "O world,—which I shall never more see;—

sun, which no more will light my eyes, thou speakest of a God! Heart, eternal disquiet! in thy throbbing sounds his name. Conscience, chaatser—thou proclaimeest revenge! Fire of love,—thou life of my life! in thy flames I divine of thy eternal origin. But, bright angel,—thou, faith,—which canst shew me my God—thou I know not. I had been early cast down into the abyss of doubt. I deny not—but I believe not. I see—darkness alone."

"And the clearness of reconciliation! And the beaming glory of the Crucified?—and Jesus!" I asked with astonishment and horror.

The Blind was silent a moment, with an expression of bitter melancholy, and then said—

"I once read about a vision or dream—and many a time has its spectral form arisen, horrible and sad, in my inward being.

"In the middle of the night,* shaken by invisible hands, the doors of the church sprang open. A crowd of dejected shadows thronged around the altar, and only their breasts heaved and moved with violence. The children rested, however, quietly in their graves.

"Then descended from on high down to the altar, a beaming shape, noble, sublime, and which bore the stamp of unobliterated suffering. The dead exclaimed, 'O Christ! is there no God!' He answered, 'There is none!' All the shades began to tremble violently; and Christ continued, 'I have gone through the worlds, I have ascended above the suns,—and there also is there no God. I have trodden to the extreme bounds of creation, I have looked down into hell, and I have exclaimed, 'Father, where art thou?' But I heard there only the rain, which fell down, drop after drop, in the depth,—and the eternal storm, which no order leads, alone replied to me. I then raised my eyes to the vault of heaven, and found there only space—dark, silent, boundless. Eternity rested upon chaos, and gnawed it, and consumed itself slowly. 'Renew your bitter, heart-rending cry of lamentation and disperse yourselves, for all is over!' The unconsolated shadows vanished. The church soon was empty; but all at once—horrible sight!—hastened forth the dead children, which in their course had awoke in the churchyard, and threw themselves down before the majestic form of the altar, and exclaimed, 'Jesus, have we no father!' and he replied, but with a torrent of tears, 'We are all fatherless; you and I, we have no —,'"

Here the Blind broke off, as if in horror of this disease, delirious fantasy; was silent a moment; but after this clasped together her hands, stretched forth her arms as she uttered a wild, penetrating cry, full of the most horrible despair.

At this moment hasty steps approached us, and the Colonel stood suddenly before us, fixing upon me an inquiring and uneasy look. The Blind, who knew his step, let fall her hands, trembling, but raised them again quickly towards him, beseeching him, with a heart-rending expression, "Be reconciled! be kind to me! I am so unhappy! If I am again mad—take me not to the madhouse! It will soon be all over with me. Let beloved hands, at least close my eyelids!"

Compassion and deep pain agitated the countenance of the Colonel. He looked long at Elisabeth, seated himself beside her, placed his arm sustainingly around her waist, and let her head rest upon his breast.

It was the first time that I had seen him tender towards her. The tears flowed slowly down her pale cheeks. Beautiful she was, but beautiful like a fallen angel, whose expression of despair and deep shame shew that she felt herself unworthy of the pity that was given to her.

I now saw her Honour approaching us in the distance. When she saw Elisabeth in the arms of the Colonel, she paused for a moment, but again advanced to us, although with some astonishment expressed in her face. The Colonel remained still. Elisabeth seemed to see nothing around her. Her Honour came near to us, the glances of husband and wife met, and—melted together in a clear and friendly beam. From a common feeling they extended to each other their hand.

Her Honour caressed Elisabeth, and spoke tenderly to her—she answered merely by sobs. After a moment the Colonel rose, and giving one arm to Elisabeth, his wife took the other, and softly and with tender care they led her home between them.

I remained alone quietly in the park. Amid uneasy and painful feelings, I looked up to the mild spring-blue heaven, with inward longing that its clearness might beam down into my soul.

During the wandering through a quiet destiny, saved from the agitations which visit so many pilgrims of life, and sustaining in a peaceful breast a living faith, a sanctifying hope; for the greatest part have the misfortunes, suffering, and despair of my fellow-creatures been the cloud, which at times has concealed my beautiful sun and the gladness of my life, which many times has made me look up on high with a painful—"wherefore!"

But the answer is not long delayed, because it has been demanded with the inward voice of prayer. Calming winds have wafted through my excited soul, and have whispered,—

"The clouds fly, the sun remains still. The crime, pains, and despair of human beings cannot darken the goodness of the Creator. We see merely a small part. Those die—change. God is unchangeable."

In vain is it that we doubt, that we murmur, that we disquiet ourselves. All the erring paths of life have a point of exit. In the moment when the darkness seems to us the deepest, we are perhaps the nearest to the light. After the hour of midnight strike indeed the hours of morning; and were it even the bell of death, which announced the hour of deliverance, what could we indeed say to ourselves more consolatory, if to us the labyrinth of life has been narrow and dark, than, "A door will open, and we shall come forth—to the light!" Let it seem to us ever so narrow and so closed against us,—we know it—"A door will open to us!" Well then,—let us wait, let us hope!

Elisabeth's state of mind remained from this day yet more unquiet. She had now and then attacks of actual insanity, and the care and anxiety for her were obliged to be redoubled.

Her suffering and her unpeaceful life diffused frequently some gloom over the remainder of the family. In particular it seemed to operate prejudicially on the health and temper of the Colonel.

That I may not weary the attention of my readers by fixing their eyes upon a picture so dark, I will conduct them now to another. It is bright and gay; in it appears united the youth of the earth and the human heart. We will call it—

SPRING AND LOVE.

"I, I too was in Arcadia!"

INNOCENT joys! innocent cares! ye friends of my young years,—angels, who, amid smiles and tears, opened to me the portals of life, upon you I call to-day! And you also, thoughts, pure as the blue of heaven! feelings, warm as the beams of the May sun! hope, as fresh as the breath of the spring morning! I call you—come, O come to revive my wearied mind.

I will sing of spring and love, youth and gladness;—pleasant and fresh memories, the nightingales of the moments of youth; lift up your tones, I will set to notes your melodies, and be yet once more enchanted by your song!

On the two-and-twentieth day of May ascended a clear spring-sun, and tinged with gold-yellow beams Cornet Carl's eyelids. The stars of the order of the sword glittered as it were by dozens before his dreaming eyes. He endeavoured eagerly to see them more clearly, strove to open his eyes,—woke, and saw the stars vanish before the splendid beams of the day, upon whose prisms of light millions of atoms danced.

A quarter of an hour after this he was to be seen, with his game-bag upon his shoulder, brushing through the fresh morning dews. It was a spring morning, beautiful as that described by Böttiger:

All nature lay so glad and still;
Green stood each molehill there;
And every lark sang sweetly shrill,
To every floweret's prayer.
The little brooks flowed softly on;
And o'er the lake's calm breast,
Through reeds she went, the silent swan,
So rich in song, in silver vest.

Up to the sun the eagle flew,
Its brightness thence to draw;
From flowers the bees their nectar drew,
And annets dragged their straw.
In the rose's cup the butterfly
Its purple wings conceal'd,
And the maple green, that grew hard by,
Two cooling doves reveal'd.

A young man there, in joyous mood,
Was walking in the shade;
